That's his wife, bristling with jewels and doused in perfume to cover up her smell, her hair glossy as hot tar, the valley of her flesh bared in front of her. "Just a man about a bottle," he tells her.

"Odd hour to phone. Don't be long. The girls are dancing with anticipation of the fireworks."

I'm afraid he may cut me off before he learns how he's been tricked, and so as soon as his cheek presses against mine I say "Did you mention a restaurant, sir?"

"We own one. You may have heard of it. The Groaning Board."

Of course I haven't, since I've never eaten in a restaurant, not when my father showed me all the cuttings he'd collected about diseases people caught there, but I say "I know it has a reputation."

His chin edges forward. "What kind are you saying that would be?"

"Your kind, Mr Dunbobbin."

Maybe he thinks I said he was kind, because when he speaks it's only "You were going to talk to me about wine."

"Your kind."

"You keep saying that, and it signifies..."

"The kind you're going to make."

"I wonder if you've confused me. What sort of wine are you under the impression I make?"

"The sort whiners do."

"Who is this?" he demands, low but so fierce I hear his spit rattling the mouthpiece. "By God, you crazy lunatic, you've rung once already, haven't you?"

"That's me," I say, grinning down at him, but I'm about to tell him how his insult has worsened his situation when a fat hand with one finger bulging out of a ring plants itself on top of my computer monitor.

I lift my head slowly to give my grin time to straighten itself. Mr Maudlin is protruding his purple waistcoat at me as his donkey teeth force his sloppy lips apart. "Are you winning?" he inquires with the stupid heartiness I always think is meant to contradict his name.

"I'm not whining." I can't resist that answer, not when the voice I've crushed against my ear is snarling "You call this number once more and I'll have you traced." I kill it and let the corners of my mouth lift my face towards the supervisor.

"That's what I like to hear," he brays, but then "Are you ill?"

I dig my knuckles into my mouth until I've finished swallowing. "Just a taste."

"I should give it some medicine when you get it home. Shift's finished."

Sometimes I feel as if he put me at the end of the room the same way teachers used to sit me at the back of the class because I wouldn't waste my time with the drivel they had to teach to live, but my position means nobody can overhear me or watch me from behind. "See you tomorrow," I say, sounding enough like the rest of them to fool them, not that it takes much.

I let my bicycle off its chain on the cold sweaty pipe in the Gents and carry it down the worn concrete stairs and out of the side door. A puppy or a rat scuttles down the alley, away from the bins outside the Chinese restaurant, where the kitchen is full of jabbering not much more alien than the talk that surrounds me every day. Above the senseless assortment of roofs the clouds are a slab of grease, holding down the heat of all the drudges who tramp the streets at lunch time. They've gone home now to pretend they've lives worth living, only some have changed into this season's uniform and are swarming to the lights of clubs and pubs. I pedal past couples stuck together by their hands and imitating dummies in shop windows, past people who've given up pretending that a home is worth the effort and are nesting in the doorways of dead shops. Then there are buildings that are being mushed and burned, and a park with a lake that litter is soaking up and trees that move about so much I have to keep my curtains shut. I cycle through, past two children undressing each other in a shelter, and then I'm where I try to live.

The faded stale three-storey house smells of stewed tea and charred vegetables. On the ground floor Mr Dunn and his parrot are screeching at each other to shut up. On the middle floor Mrs Venable is talking to a play on the radio as if she's got friends in. I haul my bicycle to the top, over the threadbare carpet narrower than the stairs under the grudging bulbs. I slip past my door and shove it closed with the back wheel.

The threads I tacked at ankle height between the skirting boards are undisturbed. I switch on the lights in the bathroom and kitchen and the room that's everything else and empty disinfectant into the bath I only hope is hot enough to kill the day's germs. When it finishes stinging and starts lulling me to sleep I dry myself and sit at my table. The first page of the book I'm going to write remains blank, and I find myself putting faces to the voices in the play under the floor. I'd rather do that to people who haven't been made up. I listen for the Dunbobbin phone to stop ringing as I crawl under my mother's old quilt on the couch.

A girl answers, not one I remember having heard. "Hi, it's Theodora."

"Theodora Dunbobbin?"

"That's me."

"Amelia's elder sister."

"Is it me you want?"

"Don't you worry, you'll do."

"No, I meant did you want her? I call her Me."

"You must be close. That's good. That's what I like to hear."

"Are you a friend of hers?"

"As much as I am of your father. She did well, I hear."

"At her exams? She did, but she nearly gave herself a breakdown. I keep telling mum and dad not to push her so hard."

"People survive breakdowns, take my word for it. Maybe it's the only way she can live up to your example."

"You're joking, aren't you? I didn't do half as well."

"Not a jealous inch in you though, is that right? Still looking after your little sister. Feeling a trifle unnoticed all the same, I can see."

"A bit."

"What do you do when you want to be noticed? What's your talent?"

"I don't know. I used to dance."

"You still can then, can't you? You never forget. It's like cycling. Go and fetch your father and we'll show him what you can do."

"I don't get this."

"You will, and so will Charles. I guarantee he'll be impressed."

I'm in control. No sooner have I drawn a breath that makes my chest throb than she's back.

"I've brought my dad."

"I don't want to speak to him this time, but give him a message."

"He wants me to give you a message, dad. Don't take the phone. He sounds serious."

"Tell him I can see you and if you don't do as I say he'll know I can."

She tells him, and I hear him gasp "It's him."

"That's who I am. That's who it's going to be whenever any of you picks up the phone. Tell Charles to lie on the floor. Do it now."

"Dad, he wants you to lie on the floor. You better had. I'm frightened."

"Is he down? Tell him to stay down till he's told he can get up. Now then, let's show him a routine he won't forget. Let's see you dance, Theodora. Dance on him."

"Dad, he wants—"

"Never mind telling him, show him. Dance all over him. Start on his face."

"Christ, Teddy, what are you—Oh, oh God, my—"

"Dad, I'm sorry. Don't try and get away, he can see you. I'm so sorry, dad."

The trouble is, I can't see her. That's so frustrating I wish I had a phone, except there's nobody I'd want to hear from. I unclench my hands on the quilt and roll over, away from the overhead light I can't sleep without, and pull the quilt over my face. I watch Dunbobbin being danced on until he has too little of a face to keep me awake. In the morning I can't see him at all. I want to see him realise what he's brought on himself, but for that I need to hear him. I send some of the stale taste of hate down to the ache in my stomach with a glass of milk and force down the contents of a can of beans. My mother always said that if food wasn't in a can or wrapped in cellophane it would have germs. I move my chair around the table and rest my face on the blank page, which has nothing for me but a smell of paper. I spring to my feet and stalk between the threads and out to the phone box on the far side of the park.

There's no response from the Dunbobbin house. Charles and his girls are either out or sleeping off the party, in which case I hope he's dreaming about me. He will. I'm so eager to renew our acquaintance that I cycle early to work.

"Good to see a smiling face," Mr Maudlin chortles as I tramp to my desk and call Charles. Perhaps the happy family is at the restaurant, but when I find the number an answering machine is waiting, as if I'd ever be trapped like that. Now the drudges are at their desks, and I add my pleas to the mumble of the room. I've succeeded in netting two fools by the time Jonquil Dunbobbin's voice takes over the machine's job. "The Groaning Board."

"Are you the restaurant?"

"Part of it," she thinks she's quipping, with a flash of her teeth and her jewels as idiotically extravagant as her name. "What can we do for you?"

"Can you fit in a mob of twelve people tonight?"

"What time?"

"About eight?"

"That's our busiest, but let me look. We should be able to accommodate you."

"I ought to have said thirteen people. I nearly forgot myself. Can you cope with that number?"

"That many more the merrier, but we do like a deposit when it's a large party."

"I don't think I can get in before eight. You're where my daughter wants to celebrate passing her exams."

"We've had some festivities ourselves."

Shouldn't she be thinking I'm the same kind of creature she is, a victim of parasites called children? My mouth is filling with the taste as my skull begins to tingle with frustration when I hear Gordon on my right, and I'm inspired. "I'd be able to bring a deposit if I didn't need to be here for my daughter," I say into the secret place between my hands. "She's in a wheelchair, you see."

Jonquil Dunbobbin exhibits a caring smile that gleams like her necklace. "In that case there'll be no problem. We'll look forward to seeing you and your party at eight."

"I'm looking forward already," I assure her, and that's true for hours, so that I scarcely hear myself talking to the faceless, even the several we manage to snare. A few minutes before eight I call the restaurant and tell a waitress the party will be there in half an hour. Half an hour later I tell her we've broken down on the way. I let the Dunbobbins have a good stare at the thirteen empty places while I speak to three people as unimportant as Charles, and then I ring back. As soon as the waitress asks when I think we may arrive I hear Charlie shout "I'll speak to him."

I lower my head to meet him and see his chin stick up at me. "May we know what the problem is?" he says.

"It's you."

"You'll forgive me, but I don't follow."

"It's you, Chas. It's you."

"Sorry." He sounds as if he very slightly is. "You've the advantage of me. Should I know you?"

"Don't you wish you did?"

His chin tugs his lips so tight his voice can barely escape. "Have we spoken recently?"

"Chas, you remembered."

"It's you."

There's so little to him that he even has to steal my lines. "Are you always that quick?" I say through my tilted grin. "Maybe just in bed with Jonquil, eh?"

"Good God, what kind of—" He rubs his mouth to loosen it, and a different tone of voice comes out. "Look—"

"I'm doing that, believe me. Me and God."

"Look, if I offended you the first time you called I—I apologise. I know we've all got to make our living as best we can."

"Like you, you mean."

"There are worse ways, I should think."

"Like mine."

"I didn't say that, did I? I'm trying not to offend you. I just hope that if I did you feel you're even."

The taste of hate is bigger than my mouth, so that a pool of saliva appears on the desk. It froths as I say "You think I'd want to be even with you?"

"What do you want, then? What's this supposed to be about?"

"I'll tell you what I want," I say lower than ever, and the pool shivers like a lake under a storm. "I want you to know how worthless you are, and everything you've spent your money on. I want you to see how nothing you've got can protect you from someone like me."

"Well, that's intriguing. That's certainly ambitious. Are you in a mood to give me an idea of a few of the ways you might try to bring it off?"

My senses have almost closed around the sight of him when I hear Gordon repeating "Clearview Windows", and I know what Charlie's up to—he's using all the words he can in the hope of overhearing where I am. "You'll find out," I say between my hands. "Part of it's the waiting."

"If you—" he starts, but I've gone. I rub away the pool on my desk and come back into the room. My grin jerks my head up, and Mr Maudlin matches the expression. Anything he approves of doesn't deserve approval, and I see how petty I've been—how I've done nothing worth doing to Charlie so far.

In the morning my hatred has a new taste. The world tastes of it, a cold flavour of metal and ash. Leaves on the trees in the park wither as I glare at them. Water by the kerbs holds litter in its icy traps. It's my day off. I know I can call from the phone by the park, but I walk to where the houses have bigger ideas of themselves. I shut myself in a booth and dial Charlie's number while the taste spreads out of me and turns the mirror above the phone as grey as the end of the street that leads towards his house. Two glittering rings and a girl's voice says "Hello?"

"It's Theodora, isn't it? Theodora Dunbobbin."

That takes her off guard, and my face is gone before she says "How did you know?"

"Because I can see you." Which I can, skirt too short to have cost half as much as it did, and half a shirt that lets her stomach peer out one-eyed, and too much expensive makeup, and hair that's a costly mess. "Do you understand? I see you, and I'll see if you don't do exactly as you're told."

Her breaths and her voice shrink into themselves. "What do I have to do?"

"Answer this question first and don't do anything but answer it. Is your father there?"

Her lips pinch together, pulling up her big chin that I bet she blames him for. "He's in the next room."

"Don't make any fuss, but call him. I want him to be watching you as well."

"Dad." When that doesn't work her voice goes higher and louder. "Dad."

His chin is first into the room. "Is it... "

"I think so."

"You think you know me, do you, Theodora? You don't know a scrap of the worst." Presumably because her father's there, she doesn't sound nearly as apprehensive as she should. "When did Chas last see you with no clothes on?" I say, rubbing my grin clear in the mirror.

"Why are you asking me that?"

"Because it's going to be now, only this time there'll be someone else watching. Take that top off for a start."

"Dad, he wants—"

"Don't tell him, show him. Take it off or you'll find out I haven't even started doing what I can do to you and yours."

"It's coming off. You said you could see."

I can. Her bare breasts flop into the open, pink-nosed as newborn rats. My skull rises, throbbing with my talent. I've taken control of her—I've been able to ever since I dreamed her name! I feel my mind closing around the Dunbobbins, but I'm opening my mouth to have her remove her skirt when the phone screams in my ear. "Who are you, you sick swine? What are you saying to my daughter?"

"Jonquil. Hello."

"Don't you dare talk like that to me. You leave my children alone or I'll find you and deal with you before the police do," she cries, jabbing and scratching at the air with the light on all her jewels, and tries to damage my ear by slamming down the expensive antique phone. It only makes the noise phones make when they're cut off, and I grin as I hang up its frustrated monotonous moan.

I could call them back at once, but they'll be expecting me. I want to see them when they don't know they're being watched. I walk to their house rather than cycle, since that would single me out as too thrifty for their district. The houses pale as they retreat and try to hide from me, but the cold makes me shiver. I detour to a store that sells clothes for people who don't want to be noticed. I buy a padded grey coat, and as I catch sight of myself in a mirror that bows to me I see I've another reason to grin.

By the time I reach Charlie's street I'm as hot as I was cold. I might feel closed into myself if I didn't see through the show the properties are putting on, stagecoach wheels leaning against them, old lamps sticking out of them, curtains tied back as if the front rooms are stages. I'm expecting Charlie's house to be called Dunbobbin, but it hasn't got a name. It's only as big as its neighbours, not nearly as impressive as he made it sound with his champagne party—it has to leave space for a Mercedes and a Toyota in the drive. I've pulled up the hood of my coat, and I don't grin until I've strolled by. But my grin doesn't last, because I couldn't see a single Dunbobbin. All the curtains are drawn.

Charlie and his sluts must be afraid I'm watching, but they're making their house look how I kept my parents' house until the landlord went and opened the curtains. My parents were the only people I ever met who were worth knowing, but however hard I thought, I couldn't stop them and their minds shrivelling and dying. My brain is stronger now, and I ought to feel pleased to have driven the Dunbobbins under cover, but I want to see them so that my thoughts can seize them. I walk to the end of the street and swing around a thin tree sprouting from the pavement and with half its branches snapped. I've just come abreast of Charlie's house when the front-room curtains twitch like an eye standing on end and pretending to be asleep.

I don't run, I only twist my hooded head aside. Once there's a tree between me and the house I walk faster, my clenched teeth aching with rage. I'm close to the end of the street when I hear a front door open, and at the corner when Charlie calls above his stuck-out chin "Excuse me..." I sidle around the corner, and then I do run, into an alley that leads behind his house. I try his back gate as I pass in case I can hide in his home—it would be like squatting in his mind. The gate is bolted, and I dash out of the alley and across another road where all the houses are infected with alarms and into an alley that takes me even further from where I live.

Most of an hour later I slam myself into my flat. The pretentious streets I had to detour through haven't driven away the smell of the waste in the alleys at the backsides of the houses; they've only turned it into more of a flavour of hatred. My skull is blazing with all the heat my flight trapped inside my coat—with fury at my having had to act like a coward, a criminal, a Dunbobbin. I fling myself on the couch and grab my eyes, and as soon as the light stops pounding enough to let me see I grope downstairs and find my way to the phone box.

When Charlie answers my lips peel back, because he doesn't sound nearly so sure of himself—he doesn't sound quite like himself. "Hello?"

"Can I help you?"

Just in time I understand that I'm seeing his chin deflate not because he's beaten but because it isn't Chas at all, and I'm seeing the real face. "Can I help you?" I say in as much of his voice as I can steal.

"Who is this, please?"

I'd repeat that too if it wouldn't make me almost as stupid as him. I can see his helmet now, and his uniform as dark as the clothes of the men who took away my parents. He wants me to talk long enough to be traced. "Nobody you'd like to know," I say and hang up. I'm halfway to my flat when I dash back and grab the receiver to wipe off my fingerprints.

I eat my dinner to keep the fear down, vegetable soup straight out of the can even though my mother said you should cook everything. Maybe I'm trying to make myself sick so that I can stay off work. The thought of the police arresting me in front of everyone—bringing me as low as them—glares in my eyes, harder when I try to sleep. I do my best to change the thought into a rage at it, which urges me off the couch in the morning, the way my mother used to get me out of bed, saying this would be the day when everyone would see how special I was.

I'm so hungry to speak to Charles I do without breakfast. The chill ashen taste of the day is sufficient to fill my mouth. When I speed into the car park and vault off the bicycle, the way I used to make my mother gasp and cheer, a gust of paleness like my breath grown huge seems to sink into the concrete of the building. I'll make Charlie's house blanch like that, and him. I dig my nails into the seat of my bicycle while the lift raises us, then I wheel my companion to the Gents and chain it up. Once I've shaken the padlock hard I stride along the corridor, tasting some of what I'll say to Charles. But Gordon is already in the office.

His coat is, at any rate, the coat he always wears outside as soon as he begins to moan about the cold. Cycling has kept me hot enough, a heat that concentrates itself in my head. I'm wondering if I have time to focus it on Charlie when Gordon appears, heralded by the squeal of the door to the Gents. He must have been the grunting and complaining I could hear in there. He looks more harassed than ever, but if he's waiting for me to care he'll die of waiting. He mutters about the weather and his family and the ends they have to make meet, and I'd tell him to get rid of some of his problems, starting with the family, if they bother him so much except I'm saving my thoughts for Charles. I manage to agree with everything Gordon says until Mr Maudlin and his minions gather and I can stop feeling expected to talk to anyone in the room. "Good luck, everyone," Mr Maudlin chortles once the desks have trapped their drudges, and claps his fat hands to indicate it's time to start work.

How fast can the police trace a call they're waiting for? Maybe I should confine myself to phones away from the office, however furious having to hide among the drudges makes me. I'm ducking lower to hide my grimace at being forced to pretend I resemble them when someone sneaks into the room.

Before he stoops over Mr Maudlin's desk I see he has a small black moustache as straight as his face is lopsided, and temples eating away his hair. One of his shoulders jerks up and wags about, lifting his jacket to display more of his pale blue suit than is worth a look, as he talks rapidly and low. Mr Maudlin tries a smile, but not for long. "You called earlier," I see him whisper.

"Let's step outside," the man whispers back—challenging him to a fight? Mr Maudlin follows him into the corridor, and I'm forgetting the man's face when I hear Charlie's voice outside the door. The pool of froth that appears on the desk drags my head low so fast I feel as if I'm going to disappear into it. I can't grasp what he's saying until I realise only two men are talking out there. The bearded man is using Charlie's voice to say "Apparently he can't deal with rejection. He turned very nasty when I wouldn't buy his spiel." If that's meant to make me lose my temper, it almost does. I grind the dead phone against my jaw as Mr Maudlin says "That's not on at all. I tell all my people to always, whatever the response, not that I'm saying for a moment yours was anything but courteous, be polite."

"That wouldn't be anyone's word for him. When I wouldn't buy he accused me of whining, let me tell you, and then he rang up the restaurant my wife and I run and made a false booking. And yesterday he called my daughter and made suggestions I won't repeat."

"I can only offer you my deepest apologies, Mr Dunbobbin. hope you've informed the police."

"Not yet."

He's trying to throw me, I see that now. He's trying to convince me my talent is less than it is. Maybe he's talking while the bearded man keeps mum. "I wanted to remember the name of the firm he was calling for," he says. "I knew I'd heard it, and this morning it came to me."

"The trouble is, Clearview could be more than one of my chaps."

"I'll know him." In order to infuriate me even more than he and Mr Maudlin already have, Charlie dares to laugh. "Would you believe it, be thought my daughter was following his instructions when all she was doing was sticking out her tongue at him. He seemed to think she was someone else. Kept calling her by some stupid name we'd never have dreamed of burdening her with."

The pain of bone and flesh ground down beneath plastic spreads up my face to the white-hot core of my head. My body has grown stiff as metal, and I'm about to stalk to the door when Charlie says "All the same, it's no laughing matter. The man needs seeing to. He didn't only lose us business at the restaurant, he had the gall to claim the party was for his daughter who was in a wheelchair."

I hear a clatter to my right. Gordon has finished a call and dropped his phone. Though nearly all the drudges are talking, I hear a breathless silence underlying the murmur. It feels as if I'm poised to take control. Then Mr Maudlin, more subdued than I've ever heard him, says "If you wait here I'll have a word with someone."

"I'd rather come in, thank you. I told you I'd know him," Charlie says and marches into the office, or the bearded man does. His gaze starts at the front of the room and rises slowly as a gun to level itself at the back row of desks. It fixes them as he paces towards them, and I meet it with a blank stare behind which all my power is hiding. I'll betray nothing if I can just stop my legs from shivering under the desk as my power leaves the rest of my body for my skull. I'm about to lift the phone and place a call when Gordon steps away from his desk, having tangled with his chair, and grabs his fat grey hooded coat from the stand. The man is in the far aisle, and gestures at Mr Maudlin to cut Gordon off. "It's him."

Gordon shoves one arm into the coat and lurches towards the door. The coat snags on a computer monitor and almost tips it over. When Mr Maudlin trots at him, trying to look both sympathetic and reproving, Gordon shouts "Leave me alone." Mr Maudlin tries to catch his less fat arm, but Gordon shoves him away and dodges into the corridor. "Leave me alone, can't you," he yells as Mr Maudlin and the bearded man chase him. More of that fades down the stairs, and I stare at Madge as if I've no more idea of what's happening than she has. Eventually only Mr Maudlin reappears and watches everyone until they, we, go back to work.

Having to drone so as to go unnoticed is close to unbearable. I feel as if my talent is guttering somewhere in the dimness of my skull. I repeat the formulas over and over while I struggle to understand what happened, but I can't think for performing my idiotic toil. If Gordon has drawn the chase away from me, he has also taken the credit. At last I'm allowed to go home, but even when I stare at the blank page I'm unable to think. I hear my mother tell me "Always know you're better," and in my sleep too, what there is of it. In the morning she's alone, but the blank page stays ahead of me as my body cycles to work.

Mr Maudlin is waiting for me. When I try to head for my desk he beckons me over. The power starts to reach for my eyes until I hear what he wants—what he would have told whoever was first into the office. Gordon won't be coming back. It seems he's heading for a breakdown. He was working at two jobs to buy things for his daughter in the wheelchair, but he'd only told the tax people about one. Charlie has taken pity on him and won't be calling the police.

"You think you know people," I say, and stroll to duck behind my screen. I can't have him wondering why I'm grinning as comprehension lights up the inside of my skull. My talent is as strong as I knew it was—it made Gordon take the blame. It wasn't as powerful when I called Charlie, which is why I saw him wrong, but now I know how he looks. I've only his word that his daughter isn't named Theodora or that she didn't do as I said. Soon I'll find out, when they least expect it, and there will be others. The world is my blank page. Before I'm finished its parasites will see me for what I am. I stroke the phone and wait for the drudges to gather, to give my voice somewhere to hide.

1999

No Story in It

"No Story In It was written around an Alan M. Clark painting—the image the luckless protagonist poses for his book cover. As with Never To Be Heard, the Clark image let me focus ideas I'd already scattered through my notebooks for possible development."—Ramsey Campbell, introduction to the story in Dark Terrors 5, 2000

Written in: 1999
First published in Imagination Fully Dilated, Volume 2, May 2000
Also published in: Told By The Dead

'Grandad.'

Boswell turned from locking the front door to see Gemima running up the garden path cracked by the late September heat. Her mother April was at the tipsy gate, and April's husband Rod was climbing out of their rusty crimson Nissan. 'Oh, Dad,' April cried, slapping her forehead hard enough to make him wince. 'You're off to London. How could we forget it was today, Rod?'

Rod pursed thick lips beneath a ginger moustache broader than his otherwise schoolboyish plump face. 'We must have had other things on our mind. It looks as if I'm joining you, Jack.'

'You'll tell me how,' Boswell said as Gemima's small hot five-year-old hand found his grasp.

'We've just learned I'm a cut-back.'

'More of a set-back, will it be? I'm sure there's a demand for teachers of your experience.'

'I'm afraid you're a bit out of touch with the present.'

Boswell saw his daughter willing him not to take the bait. 'Can we save the discussion for my return?' he said. 'I've a bus and then a train to catch.'

'We can run your father to the station, can't we? We want to tell him our proposal.' Rod bent the passenger seat forward. 'Let's keep the men together,' he said.

As Boswell hauled the reluctant belt across himself he glanced up. Usually Gemima reminded him poignantly of her mother at her age—large brown eyes with high startled eyebrows, inquisitive nose, pale prim lips—but in the mirror April's face looked not much less small, just more lined. The car jerked forward, grating its innards, and the radio announced 'A renewed threat of war—' before Rod switched it off. Once the car was past the worst of the potholes in the main road, Boswell said 'So propose.'

'We wondered how you were finding life on your own,' Rod said. 'We thought it mightn't be the ideal situation for someone with your turn of mind.'

'Rod. Dad—'

Her husband gave the mirror a look he might have aimed at a child who'd spoken out of turn in class. 'Since we've all overextended ourselves, we think the solution is to pool our resources.'

'Which are those?'

'We wondered how the notion of our moving in with you might sound.'

'Sounds fun,' Gemima cried.

Rod's ability to imagine living with Boswell for any length of time showed how desperate he, if not April, was. 'What about your own house?' Boswell said.

'There are plenty of respectable couples eager to rent these days. We'd pay you rent, of course. Surely it makes sense for all of us.'

'Can I give you a decision when I'm back from London?' Boswell said, mostly to April's hopeful reflection. 'Maybe you won't have to give up your house. Maybe soon I'll be able to offer you financial help.'

'Christ,' Rod snarled, a sound like a gnashing of teeth.

To start with the noise the car made was hardly harsher. Boswell thought the rear bumper was dragging on the road until tenement blocks jerked up in the mirror as though to seize the vehicle, which ground loudly to a halt. 'Out,' Rod cried in a tone poised to pounce on nonsense.

'Is this like one of your stories, Grandad?' Gemima giggled as she followed Boswell out of the car.

'No,' her father said through his teeth and flung the boot open. 'This is real.'

Boswell responded only by going to look. The suspension had collapsed, thrusting the wheels up through the rusty arches. April took Gemima's hand, Boswell sensed not least to keep her quiet, and murmured 'Oh, Rod.'

Boswell was staring at the tenements. Those not boarded up were tattooed with graffiti inside and out, and he saw watchers at as many broken as unbroken windows. He thought of the parcel a fan had once given him with instructions not to open it until he was home, the present that had been one of Jean's excuses for divorcing him. 'Come with me to the station,' he urged, 'and you can phone whoever you need to phone.'

When the Aireys failed to move immediately he stretched out a hand to them and saw his shadow printed next to theirs on a wall, either half demolished or never completed, in front of the tenements. A small child holding a woman's hand, a man slouching beside them with a fist stuffed in his pocket, a second man gesturing empty-handed at them... The shadows seemed to blacken, the sunlight to brighten like inspiration, but that had taken no form when the approach of a taxi distracted him. His shadow roused itself as he dashed into the rubbly road to flag the taxi down. 'I'll pay,' he told Rod.

'Here's Jack Boswell, everyone,' Quentin Sedgwick shouted. 'Here's our star author. Come and meet him.'

It was going to be worth it, Boswell thought. Publishing had changed since all his books were in print—indeed, since any were. Sedgwick, a tall thin young but balding man with wiry veins exposed by a singlet and shorts, had met him at Waterloo, pausing barely long enough to deliver an intense handshake before treating him to a headlong ten-minute march and a stream of enthusiasm for his work. The journey ended at a house in the midst of a crush of them resting their fronts on the pavement. At least the polished nameplate of Cassandra Press had to be visible to anyone who passed. Beyond it a hall that smelled of curried vegetables was occupied by a double-parked pair of bicycles and a steep staircase not much wider than their handlebars. 'Amazing, isn't it?' Sedgwick declared. 'It's like one of your early things, being able to publish from home. Except in a story of yours the computers would take over and tell us what to write.'

'I don't remember writing that,' Boswell said with some unsureness.

'No, I just made it up. Not bad, was it?' Sedgwick said, running upstairs. 'Here's Jack Boswell, everyone...'

A young woman with a small pinched studded face and glistening black hair spiky as an armoured fist emerged from somewhere on the ground floor as Sedgwick threw open doors to reveal two cramped rooms, each featuring a computer terminal, at one of which an even younger woman with blonde hair the length of her filmy flowered blouse was composing an advertisement. 'Starts with C, ends with e,' Sedgwick said of her, and of the studded woman 'Bren, like the gun. Our troubleshooter.'

Boswell grinned, feeling someone should. 'Just the three of you?'

'Small is sneaky, I keep telling the girls. While the big houses are being dragged down by excess personnel, we move into the market they're too cumbersome to handle. Carole, show him his page.'

The publicist saved her work twice before displaying the Cassandra Press catalogue. She scrolled past the colophon, a C with a P hooked on it, and a parade of authors: Ferdy Thorn, ex-marine turned ecological warrior; Germaine Gossett, feminist fantasy writer; Torin Bergman, Scandinavia's leading magic realist... 'Forgive my ignorance,' Boswell said, 'but these are all new to me.'

'They're the future.' Sedgwick cleared his throat and grabbed Boswell's shoulder to lean him towards the computer. 'Here's someone we all know.'

BOSWELL'S BACK! the page announced in letters so large they left room only for a shout-line from, Boswell remembered, The Observer twenty years ago—'Britain's best SF writer since Wyndham and Wells'—and a scattering of titles: The Future Just Began, Tomorrow Was Yesterday, Wave Goodbye To Earth, Terra Spells Terror, Science Lies In Wait... 'It'll look better when we have covers to reproduce,' Carole said. 'I couldn't write much. I don't know your work.'

'That's because I've been devouring it all over again, Jack. You thought you might have copies for my fair helpers, didn't you?'

'So I have,' Boswell said, struggling to spring the catches of his aged briefcase.

'See what you think when you've read these. Some for you as well, Bren,' Sedgwick said, passing out Boswell's last remaining hardcovers of several of his books. 'Here's a Hugo winner and look, this one got the Prix du Fantastique Écologique. Will you girls excuse us now? I hear the call of lunch.'

They were in sight of Waterloo Station again when he seized Boswell's elbow to steer him into the Delphi, a tiny restaurant crammed with deserted tables spread with pink-and-white checked cloths. 'This is what one of our greatest authors looks like, Nikos,' Sedgwick announced. 'Let's have all we can eat and a litre of your red if that's your style, Jack, to be going on with.'

The massive dark-skinned variously hairy proprietor brought them a carafe without a stopper and a brace of glasses Boswell would have expected to hold water. Sedgwick filled them with wine and dealt Boswell's a vigorous clunk. 'Here's to us. Here's to your legendary unpublished books.'

'Not for much longer.'

'What a scoop for Cassandra. I don't know which I like best, Don't Make Me Mad or Only We Are Left. Listen to this, Nikos. There are going to be so many mentally ill people they have to be given the vote and everyone's made to have one as a lodger. And a father has to seduce his daughter or the human race dies out.'

'Very nice.'

'Ignore him, Jack. They couldn't be anyone else but you.'

'I'm glad you feel that way. You don't think they're a little too dark even for me?'

'Not a shade, and certainly not for Cassandra. Wait till you read our other books.'

Here Nikos brought meze, an oval plate splattered with varieties of goo. Sedgwick waited until Boswell had transferred a sample of each to his plate and tested them with a piece of lukewarm bread. 'Good?'

'Most authentic,' Boswell found it in himself to say.

Sedgwick emptied the carafe into their glasses and called for another. Blackened lamb chops arrived too, and prawns dried up by grilling, withered meatballs, slabs of smoked ham that could have been used to sole shoes... Boswell was working on a token mouthful of viciously spiced sausage when Sedgwick said 'Know how you could delight us even more?'

Boswell swallowed and had to salve his mouth with half a glassful of wine. 'Tell me,' he said tearfully.

'Have you enough unpublished stories for a collection?'

'I'd have to write another to bring it up to length.'

'Wait till I let the girls know. Don't think they aren't excited, they were just too overwhelmed by meeting you to show it. Can you call me as soon as you have an idea for the story or the cover?'

'I think I may have both.'

'You're an example to us all. Can I hear?'

'Shadows on a ruined wall. A man and woman and her child, and another man reaching out to them, I'd say in warning. Ruined tenements in the background. Everything overgrown. Even if the story isn't called We Are Tomorrow, the book can be.'

'Shall I give you a bit of advice? Go further than you ever have before. Imagine something you couldn't believe anyone would pay you to write.'

Despite the meal, Boswell felt too elated to imagine that just now. His capacity for observation seemed to have shut down too, and only an increase in the frequency of passers-by outside the window roused it. 'What time is it?' he wondered, fumbling his watch upwards on his thin wrist.

'Not much past five,' Sedgwick said, emptying the carafe yet again. 'Still lunchtime.'

'Good God, if I miss my train I'll have to pay double.'

'Next time we'll see about paying for your travel.' Sedgwick gulped the last of the wine as he threw a credit card on the table to be collected later. 'I wish you'd said you had to leave this early. I'll have Bren send copies of our books to you,' he promised as Boswell panted into Waterloo, and called after him down the steps into the Underground 'Don't forget, imagine the worst. That's what we're for.'

For three hours the worst surrounded Boswell.

SIX NATIONS CONTINUE REARMING

CLIMATE CHANGES ACCELERATE, SAY SCIENTISTS

SUPERSTITIOUS FANATICISM ON INCREASE

WOMEN'S GROUPS CHALLENGE ANTI-GUN RULING

RALLY AGAINST COMPUTER CHIPS IN CRIMINALS ENDS IN VIOLENCE: THREE DEAD, MANY INJURED

Far more commuters weren't reading the news than were: many wore headphones that leaked percussion like distant discos in the night, while the sole book to be seen was Page Turner, the latest Turner adventure from Midas Paperbacks, bound in either gold or silver depending, Boswell supposed, on the reader's standards. Sometimes drinking helped him create, but just now a bottle of wine from the buffet to stave off a hangover only froze in his mind the image of the present in ruins and overgrown by the future, of the shapes of a family and a figure poised to intervene printed on the remains of a wall by a flare of painful light. He had to move on from thinking of them as the Aireys and himself, or had he? One reason Jean had left him was that she'd found traces of themselves and April in nearly all his work, even where none was intended; she'd become convinced he was wishing the worst for her and her child when he'd only meant a warning, by no means mostly aimed at them. His attempts to invent characters wholly unlike them had never convinced her and hadn't improved his work either. He needn't consider her feelings now, he thought sadly. He had to write whatever felt true—the best story he had in him.

It was remaining stubbornly unformed when the train stammered into the terminus. A minibus strewn with drunks and defiant smokers deposited him at the end of his street. He assumed his house felt empty because of Rod's proposal. Jean had taken much of the furniture they hadn't passed on to April, but Boswell still had seats where he needed to sit and folding canvas chairs for visitors, and nearly all his books. He was in the kitchen, brewing coffee while he tore open the day's belated mail, when the phone rang.

He took the handful of bills and the airmail letter he'd saved for last into his workroom, where he sat on the chair April had loved spinning and picked up the receiver. 'Jack Boswell.'

'Jack? They're asleep.'

Presumably this explained why Rod's voice was low. 'Is that an event?' Boswell said.

'It is for April at the moment. She's been out all day looking for work, any work. She didn't want to tell you in case you already had too much on your mind.'

'But now you have.'

'I was hoping things had gone well for you today.'

'I think you can do more than that.'

'Believe me, I'm looking as hard as she is.'

'No, I mean you can assure her when she wakes that not only do I have a publisher for my two novels and eventually a good chunk of my backlist, but they've asked me to put together a new collection too.'

'Do you mind if I ask for her sake how much they're advancing you?'

'No pounds and no shillings or pence.'

'You're saying they'll pay you in euros?'

'I'm saying they don't pay an advance to me or any of their authors, but they pay royalties every three months.'

'I take it your agent has approved the deal.'

'It's a long time since I've had one of those, and now I'll be ten per cent better off. Do remember I've plenty of experience.'

'I could say the same. Unfortunately it isn't always enough.'

Boswell felt his son-in-law was trying to render him as insignificant as Rod believed science fiction writers ought to be. He tore open the airmail envelope with the little finger of the hand holding the receiver. 'What's that?' Rod demanded.

'No panic. I'm not destroying any of my work,' Boswell told him, and smoothed out the letter to read it again. 'Well, this is timely. The Saskatchewan Conference on Prophetic Literature is giving me the Wendigo Award for a career devoted to envisioning the future.'

'Congratulations. Will it help?'

'It certainly should, and so will the story I'm going to write. Maybe even you will be impressed. Tell April not to let things pull her down,' Boswell said as he rang off, and 'Such as you' only after he had.

Boswell wakened with a hangover and an uneasy sense of some act left unperformed. The image wakened with him: small child holding woman's hand, man beside them, second man gesturing. He groped for the mug of water by the bed, only to find he'd drained it during the night. He stumbled to the bathroom and emptied himself while the cold tap filled the mug. In time he felt equal to yet another breakfast of the kind his doctor had warned him to be content with. Of course, he thought as the sound of chewed bran filled his skull, he should have called Sedgwick last night about the Wendigo Award. How early could he call? Best to wait until he'd worked on the new story. He tried as he washed up the breakfast things and the rest of the plates and utensils in the sink, but his mind seemed as paralysed as the shadows on the wall it kept showing him. Having sat at his desk for a while in front of the wordless screen, he dialled Cassandra Press.

'Hello? Yes?'

'Is that Carole?' Since that earned him no reply, he tried 'Bren?'

'It's Carole. Who is this?'

'Jack Boswell. I just wanted you to know—'

'You'll want to speak to Q. Q, it's your sci-fi man.'

Sedgwick came on almost immediately, preceded by a creak of bedsprings. 'Jack, you're never going to tell me you've written your story already.'

'Indeed I'm not. Best to take time to get it right, don't you think? I'm calling to report they've given me the Wendigo Award.'

'About time, and never more deserved. Who is it gives those again? Carole, you'll need to scribble this down. Bren, where's something to scribble with?'

'By the phone,' Bren said very close, and the springs creaked.

'Reel it off, Jack.'

As Boswell heard Sedgwick relay the information he grasped that he was meant to realise how close the Cassandra Press personnel were to one another. 'That's capital, Jack,' Sedgwick told him. 'Bren will be lumping some books to the mail for you, and I think I can say Carole's going to have good news for you.'

'Any clue what kind?'

'Wait and see, Jack, and we'll wait and see what your new story's about.'

Boswell spent half an hour trying to write an opening line that would trick him into having started the tale, but had to acknowledge that the technique no longer worked for him. He was near to being blocked by fearing he had lost all ability to write, and so he opened the carton of books the local paper had sent him to review. Sci-Fi On The Net, Create Your Own Star Wars™ Character, 1000 Best Sci-Fi Videos, Sci-Fi From Lucas To Spielberg, Star

Wars™: The Bluffer's Guide... There wasn't a book he would have taken off a shelf, nor any appropriate to the history of science fiction in which he intended to incorporate a selection from his decades of reviews. Just now writing something other than his story might well be a trap. He donned sandals and shorts and unbuttoned his shirt as he ventured out beneath a sun that looked as fierce as the rim of a total eclipse.

All the seats of a dusty bus were occupied by pensioners, some of whom looked as bewildered as the young woman who spent the journey searching the pockets of the combat outfit she wore beneath a stained fur coat and muttering that everyone needed to be ready for the enemy. Boswell had to push his way off the bus past three grim scrawny youths bare from the waist up, who boarded the vehicle as if they planned to hijack it. He was at the end of the road where the wall had inspired him—but he hadn't reached the wall when he saw Rod's car.

It was identifiable solely by the charred number plate. The car itself was a blackened windowless hulk. He would have stalked away to call the Aireys if the vandalism hadn't made writing the new story more urgent than ever, and so he stared at the incomplete wall with a fierceness designed to revive his mind. When he no longer knew if he was staring at the bricks until the story formed or the shadows did, he turned quickly away. The shadows weren't simply cast on the wall, he thought; they were embedded in it, just as the image was embedded in his head.

He had to walk a mile homewards before the same bus showed up. Trudging the last yards to his house left him parched. He drank several glassfuls of water, and opened the drawer of his desk to gaze for reassurance or perhaps inspiration at his secret present from a fan before he dialled the Aireys' number.

'Hello?'

If it was April, something had driven her voice high. 'It's only me,' Boswell tentatively said.

'Grandad. Are you coming to see us?'

'Soon, I hope.'

'Oh.' Having done her best to hide her disappointment, she added 'Good.'

'What have you been doing today?'

'Reading. Dad says I have to get a head start.'

'I'm glad to hear it,' Boswell said, though she didn't sound as if she wanted him to be. 'Is Mummy there?'

'Just Dad.'

After an interval Boswell tried 'Rod?'

'It's just me, right enough.'

'I'm sure she didn't mean—I don't know if you've seen your car.'

'I'm seeing nothing but. We still have to pay to have it scrapped.'

'No other developments?'

'Jobs, are you trying to say? Not unless April's so dumbstruck with good fortune she can't phone. I was meaning to call you, though. I wasn't clear last night what plans you had with regard to us.'

Rod sounded so reluctant to risk hoping that Boswell said 'There's a good chance I'll have a loan in me.'

'I won't ask how much.' After a pause presumably calculated to entice an answer Rod added 'I don't need to tell you how grateful we are. How's your new story developing?'

This unique display of interest in his work only increased the pressure inside Boswell's uninspired skull. 'I'm hard at work on it,' he said.

'I'll tell April,' Rod promised, and left Boswell with that—with hours before the screen and not a word of a tale, just shadows in searing light: child holding woman's hand, man beside, another gesturing... He fell asleep at his desk and jerked awake in a panic, afraid to know why his inspiration refused to take shape.

He seemed hardly to have slept in his bed when he was roused by a pounding of the front door knocker and an incessant shrilling of the doorbell. As he staggered downstairs he imagined a raid, the country having turned overnight into a dictatorship that had set the authorities the task of arresting all subversives, not least those who saw no cause for optimism. The man on the doorstep was uniformed and gloomy about his job, but brandished a clipboard and had a carton at his feet. 'Consignment for Boswell,' he grumbled.

'Books from my publishers.'

'Wouldn't know. Just need your autograph.'

Boswell scrawled a signature rendered illegible by decades of autographs, then bore the carton to the kitchen table, where he slit its layers of tape to reveal the first Cassandra Press books he'd seen. All the covers were black as coal in a closed pit except for bony white lettering not quite askew enough for the effect to be unquestionably intentional. GERMAINE GOSSETT, Women Are The Wave. TORIN BERGMAN, Oracles Arise! FERDY THORN, Fight Them Fisheries...Directly inside each was the title page, and on the back of that the copyright opposite the first page of text. Ecological frugality was fine, but not if it looked unprofessional, even in uncorrected proof copies. Proofreading should take care of the multitude of printer's errors, but what of the prose? Every book, not just Torin Bergman's, read like the work of a single apprentice translator.

He abandoned a paragraph of Ferdy Thorn's blunt chunky style and sprinted to his workroom to answer the phone. 'Boswell,' he panted.

'Jack. How are you today?'

'I've been worse, Quentin.'

'You'll be a lot better before you know. Did the books land?'

'The review copies, you mean.'

'We'd be delighted if you reviewed them. That would be wonderful, wouldn't it, if Jack reviewed the books?' When this received no audible answer he said 'Only you mustn't be kind just because they're ours, Jack. We're all in the truth business.'

'Let me read them and then we'll see what's best. What I meant, though, these aren't finished books.'

'They certainly should be. Sneak a glance at the last pages if you don't mind knowing the end.'

'Finished in the sense of the state that'll be on sale in the shops.'

'Well, yes. They're trade paperbacks. That's the book of the future.'

'I know what trade paperbacks are. These—'

'Don't worry, Jack, they're just our first attempts. Wait till you see the covers Carole's done for you. Nothing grabs the eye like naïve art, especially with messages like ours.'

'So,' Boswell said in some desperation, 'have I heard why you called?'

'You don't think we'd interrupt you at work without some real news.'

'How real?'

'We've got the figures for the advance orders of your books. All the girls had to do was phone with your name and the new titles till the batteries went flat, and I don't mind telling you you're our top seller.'

'What are the figures?' Boswell said, and took a deep breath.

'Nearly three hundred. Congratulations once again.'

'Three hundred thousand. It's I who should be congratulating you and your team. I only ever had one book up there before. Shows publishing needs people like yourselves to shake it up.' He became aware of speaking fast so that he could tell the Aireys his—no, their—good fortune, but he had to clarify one point before letting euphoria overtake him. 'Or is that, don't think for a second I'm complaining if it is, but is that the total for both titles or each?'

'Actually, Jack, can I just slow you down a moment?'

'Sorry. I'm babbling. That's what a happy author sounds like. You understand why.'

'I hope I do, but would you mind—I didn't quite catch what you thought I said.'

'Three hundred—'

'Can I stop you there? That's the total, or just under. As you say, publishing has changed. I expect a lot of the bigger houses are doing no better with some of their books.'

Boswell's innards grew hollow, then his skull. He felt his mouth drag itself into some kind of a grin as he said, 'Is that three hundred, sorry, nearly three hundred per title?'

'Overall, I'm afraid. We've still a few little independent shops to call, and sometimes they can surprise you.'

Boswell doubted he could cope with any more surprises, but heard himself say, unbelievably, hopefully 'Did you mention We Are Tomorrow?'

'How could we have forgotten it?' Sedgwick's enthusiasm relented at last as he said 'I see what you're asking. Yes, the total is for all three of your books.

Don't forget we've still the backlist to come, though,' he added with renewed vigour.

'Good luck to it.' Boswell had no idea how much bitterness was audible in that, nor in 'I'd best be getting back to work.'

'We all can't wait for the new story, can we?'

Boswell had no more of an answer than he heard from anyone else. Having replaced the receiver as if it had turned to heavy metal, he stared at the uninscribed slab of the computer screen. When he'd had enough of that he trudged to stare into the open rectangular hole of the Cassandra carton. Seized by an inspiration he would have preferred not to experience, he dashed upstairs to drag on yesterday's clothes and marched unshaven out of the house.

Though the library was less than ten minutes' walk away through sunbleached streets whose desert was relieved only by patches of scrub, he'd hardly visited it for the several years he had been too depressed to enter bookshops. The library was almost worse: it lacked not just his books but practically everyone's, except for paperbacks with injured spines. Some of the tables in the large white high-windowed room were occupied by newspaper readers.

MIDDLE EAST WAR DEADLINE EXPIRES

ONE IN TWO FAMILIES WILL BE VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE, STUDY SHOWS

FAMINES IMMINENT IN EUROPE

NO MEDICINE FOR FATAL VIRUSES

Most of the tables held Internet terminals, from one of which a youth whose face was red with more than pimples was being evicted by a librarian for calling up some text that had offended the black woman at the next screen. Boswell paid for an hour at the terminal and began his search.

The only listings of any kind for Torin Bergman were the publication details of the Cassandra Press books, and the same was true of Ferdy Thorn and Germaine Gossett. When the screen told him his time was up and began to flash like lightning to alert the staff, the message and the repeated explosion of light and the headlines around him seemed to merge into a single inspiration he couldn't grasp. Only a hand laid on his shoulder made him jump up and lurch between the reluctantly automatic doors.

The sunlight took up the throbbing of the screen, or his head did. He remembered nothing of his tramp home other than that it tasted like bone. As he fumbled to unlock the front door the light grew audible, or the phone began to shrill. He managed not to snap the key and ran to snatch up the receiver. 'What now?'

'It's only me, Dad. I didn't mean to bother you.'

'You never could,' Boswell said, though she just had by sounding close to tears. 'How are you, April? How are things?'

'Not too wonderful.'

'Things aren't, you mean. I'd never say you weren't.'

'Both.' Yet more tonelessly she said 'I went looking for computer jobs. Didn't want all the time mummy spent showing me how things worked to go to waste. Only I didn't realise how much more there is to them now, and I even forgot what she taught me. So then I thought I'd go on a computer course to catch up.'

'I'm sure that's a sound idea.'

'It wasn't really. I forgot where I was going. I nearly forgot our number when I had to ring Rod to come and find me when he hasn't even got the car and leave Gemima all on her own.'

Boswell was reaching deep into himself for a response when she said 'Mummy's dead, isn't she?'

Rage at everything, not least April's state, made his answer harsh. 'Shot by the same freedom fighters she'd given the last of her money to in a country I'd never even heard of. She went off telling me one of us had to make a difference to the world.'

'Was it years ago?'

'Not long after you were married,' Boswell told her, swallowing grief.

'Oh.' She seemed to have nothing else to say but 'Rod.'

Boswell heard him murmuring at length before his voice attacked the phone. 'Why is April upset?'

'Don't you know?'

'Forgive me. Were you about to give her some good news?'

'If only.'

'You will soon, surely, once your books are selling. You know I'm no admirer of the kind of thing you write, but I'll be happy to hear of your success.'

'You don't know what I write, since you've never read any of it.' Aloud Boswell said only 'You won't.'

'I don't think I caught that.'

'Yes you did. This publisher prints as many books as there are orders, which turns out to be under three hundred.'

'Maybe you should try and write the kind of thing people will pay to read.'

Boswell placed the receiver with painfully controlled gentleness on the hook, then lifted it to redial. The distant bell had started to sound more like an alarm to him when it was interrupted. 'Quentin Sedgwick.'

'And Torin Bergman.'

'Jack.'

'As one fictioneer to another, are you Ferdy Thorn as well?'

Sedgwick attempted a laugh, but it didn't lighten his tone much. 'Germaine Gossett too, if you must know.'

'So you're nearly all of Cassandra Press.'

'Not any longer.'

'How's that?'

'Out,' Sedgwick said with gloomy humour. 'I am. The girls had all the money, and now they've seen our sales figures they've gone off to set up a gay romance publisher.'

'What lets them do that?' Boswell heard himself protest.

'Trust.'

Boswell could have made plenty of that, but was able to say merely 'So my books...'

'Must be somewhere in the future. Don't be more of a pessimist than you have to be, Jack. If I manage to revive Cassandra you know you'll be the first writer I'm in touch with,' Sedgwick said, and had the grace to leave close to a minute's silence unbroken before ringing off. Boswell had no sense of how much the receiver weighed as he lowered it, no sense of anything except some rearrangement that was aching to occur inside his head. He had to know why the news about Cassandra Press felt like a completion so imminent the throbbing of light all but blinded him.

It came to him in the night, slowly. He had been unable to develop the new story because he'd understood instinctively there wasn't one. His sense of the future was sounder than ever: he'd foreseen the collapse of Cassandra Press without admitting it to himself. Ever since his last sight of the Aireys the point had been to save them—he simply hadn't understood how. Living together would only have delayed their fate. He'd needed time to interpret his vision of the shadows on the wall.

He was sure the light in the house was swifter and more intense than dawn used to be. He pushed himself away from the desk and worked aches out of his body before making his way to the bathroom. All the actions he performed there felt like stages of a purifying ritual. In the mid-morning sunlight the phone on his desk looked close to bursting into flame. He winced at the heat of it before, having grown cool in his hand, it ventured to mutter, 'Hello?'

'Good morning.'

'Dad? You sound happier. Are you?'

'As never. Is everyone up? Can we meet?'

'What's the occasion?'

'I want to fix an idea I had last time we met. I'll bring a camera if you can all meet me in the same place in let's say half an hour.'

'We could except we haven't got a car.'

'Take a cab. I'll reimburse you. It'll be worth it, I promise.'

He was on his way almost as soon as he rang off. Tenements reared above his solitary march, but couldn't hinder the sun in its climb towards unbearable brightness. He watched his shadow shrink in front of him like a stain on the dusty littered concrete, and heard footsteps attempting stealth not too far behind him. Someone must have seen the camera slung from his neck. A backwards glance as he crossed a deserted potholed junction showed him a youth as thin as a puppet, who halted twitching until Boswell turned away, then came after him.

A taxi sped past Boswell as he reached the street he was bound for. The Aireys were in front of the wall, close to the sooty smudge like a lingering shadow that was the only trace of their car. Gemima clung to her mother's hand while Rod stood a little apart, one fist in his hip pocket. They looked posed and uncertain why. Before anything had time to change, Boswell held up his palm to keep them still and confronted the youth who was swaggering towards him while attempting to seem aimless. Boswell lifted the camera strap over his tingling scalp. 'Will you take us?' he said.

The youth faltered barely long enough to conceal an incredulous grin. He hung the camera on himself and snapped the carrying case open as Boswell moved into position, hand outstretched towards the Aireys. 'Use the flash,' Boswell said, suddenly afraid that otherwise there would be no shadows under the sun at the zenith—that the future might let him down after all. He'd hardly spoken when the flash went off, almost blinding its subjects to the spectacle of the youth fleeing with the camera.

Boswell had predicted this, and even that Gemima would step out a pace from beside her mother. 'It's all right,' he murmured, unbuttoning his jacket, 'there's no film in it,' and passed the gun across himself into the hand that had been waiting to be filled. Gemima was first, then April, and Rod took just another second. Boswell's peace deepened threefold as peace came to them. Nevertheless he preferred not to look at their faces as he arranged them against the bricks. He had only seen shadows before, after all.

Though the youth had vanished, they were being watched. Perhaps now the world could see the future Boswell had always seen. He clawed chunks out of the wall until wedging his arm into the gap supported him. He heard sirens beginning to howl, and wondered if the war had started. 'The end,' he said as best he could for the metal in his mouth. The last thing he saw was an explosion of brightness so intense he was sure it was printing their shadows on the bricks for as long as the wall stood. He even thought he smelled how green it would grow to be.

The Unbeheld

Written in: 1999
First published in The Spook, July 2002
Also published in: Just Behind You

On the first day of the autumn term the traffic seemed more reluctant than ever to acknowledge Leonard. Many drivers didn't slow even when he stepped into the road, raising his sign. As his hands on the metal pole grew slippery with anger, a silver Volvo with a rusty indentation in the driver's door added itself to the rank of cars parked opposite the school. He was stalking towards it when the driver dashed around the car to let a child out, leaving a furious terrier to yap. The woman led her daughter by the hand to Leonard. "Are you here all the time?" she asked him.

"As long as there are children. Would you mind—"

"May I have your name?"

"All the children call me Leonard."

"I see, and it's Mr..."

"Bailey. I was just going to say—"

"Polly, this is Mr. Bailey. You can always go to him if for any reason I'm not here."

"Hello, Mr. Bailey," the little girl said, taking his hand. She was about eight, with a plump face that looked uncertain whether to be pert, and large blue eyes adorned with the longest lashes he'd ever seen on a child. "Hello, Polly," he said. "Some people would pay for those eyelashes."

Apparently that failed to appeal to her or her mother. "I thought there was one like them on my pillow this morning," Leonard said, still hoping for a laugh.

"Shall we see if that's one of your teachers in the playground, Polly? She looks nice."

"A false one, I mean," Leonard insisted, since he was telling the truth, "but it was only an old dead spider."

Polly giggled and her fingers squirmed. "It was dead, Polly," her mother said—unnecessarily, Leonard thought. "Come along now. You don't want to be late on your first day or any other either."

Soon the long building the colour of the scabs on half a dozen of that morning's knees reduced the shrill uproar in the playground to a murmur before sucking it into a hush. While Leonard ushered latecomers across the road, the Volvo shook and yapped as the dog leapt within, all the more vigorously when Polly's mother returned. "Thank you for guarding my car," she said. She might have been speaking to, rather than over, the dog. Once she'd eased the car forward into a vacated space, however, she lowered her window. "I'm sorry I stopped where I shouldn't. I wanted to be sure she had time to settle in."

"So long as it was just this once. Have you moved far?"

"From London."

"That's a good way, isn't it? What brought you?"

"My job and my husband's. Social work."

"There's a lot of that about these days. I hope you won't find us Northerners too different. I've not long moved myself."

"Aren't you local?"

"Some wouldn't say so. They think if you were born the other side of town you're a foreigner."

"You're telling me about yourself."

"Born and lived there till the kids next door started keeping me awake half the night. Any road, I didn't need all that space without my mam and dad, and now I'm just up the street from the school."

"Is that the appeal? Quiet now, Sheba," Polly's mother said, twisting round to pat or slap the dog.

"She had her way with Polly, didn't she, Sheba?"

The woman pushed the dog down on the seat and frowned at Leonard. "Have you a pet, Mr. Bailey?"

"The landlord won't allow them. When I was Polly's age—"

"How old is that?"

"Eight, isn't it?"

"Seven." Having stared at him, Polly's mother said, "I should introduce myself. I'm Mrs. Marsh."

"Pleased to meet you, I'm sure."

When the Volvo sped away as though powered by yapping he used his pole to make himself a gap in the relentless rush hour traffic. He felt like a knight issuing a challenge to anyone who tried to cross his path. He stored his pole and his fluorescent orange coat in the office where Miss Devine, the school secretary, leaned her lanky upper half over her strewn desk at him. "Off somewhere good now?" she inquired, and seemingly in case he hadn't understood her, "Off somewhere good?"

"Home to see who's written to me."

Only computers had. At the end of his walk through three increasingly narrow streets to the midmost of a clump of houses squeezed together, all the envelopes on the muddy cork doormat were brown. His name peeked out of two cellophane windows, another bill was for his deceased predecessor, and the last for Mr. Flanagan upstairs, whose cigarettes Leonard always smelled on entering the house. He thought he heard Mr. Flanagan panting on the stairs, but there was no sign of him, and the noise ceased as Leonard unlocked his apartment door.

He sipped tea at the table in the kitchen that was also the dining room and wrote letters contesting the utility bills. Even if he had to agree to the amounts eventually, his bank balance would have put on an extra few pence. At the post office the morose postmaster pretended to think Leonard was there for his pension, though he must know by now Leonard was a Monday man. Outside the post office Leonard caught a bus that delivered him as close to the nearest cinema as public transport was allowed.

Five minutes' walk past elephantine branches of a very few stores brought him to the cinema, only to find that little on the ten screens attracted him. "A fairy tale in another galaxy" sounded too childish, and he wasn't to be tricked by "A movie for anyone who's ever felt gay." Even less tempting were "The most grossest comedy ever," "A crime film to terrify us all," "A ninety-minute rollercoaster ride..." He had his suspicions about "A sensitive study of modern relationships," but at least nobody was heading for it armed with enormous tubs of popcorn. He displayed his bus pass to a regally indifferent ticket clerk who bestowed a ticket on him.

Perhaps the sensitivity of the film was meant to lie in how all the lovers were hugely overweight, but it only made him feel dwindled. It contained lashings of language he heard too many children use these days and masses of rampant flesh. The sly movement of the exit doors beside the screen was a welcome distraction until an usher appeared through the doors and clanked the bar into place. The man plodded up the aisle, and Leonard was reluctantly attending to a renewed surge of blubber on the screen when he glimpsed a shape making its four-legged way along the row of seats to him.

It wasn't his dog, he told himself—just a dog. He wished he could remember his dog's name and a good deal else. He leaned down to pat the animal's head. It flinched back, and his hand encountered its wet nose. He cried out with disgust as it did, too. "What are you doing with that child?" a grandma demanded behind him.

"What's a child doing in a film like this?" Leonard countered.

"I'm sure I don't know. I didn't bring them."

"I hope you aren't saying I did."

The lobby doors slammed behind the intruder. "Disgraceful. Shouldn't be allowed," the woman muttered to her companion, and Leonard was uncertain if she meant the film. She should. When the combination of her commentary and the film grew intolerable, he left the auditorium.

At least he had time to walk home, and not much else to do. As he admitted himself to his flat he heard panting, no doubt his own. He held his breath, then gripped his mouth with a hand that smelled of the brass doorknob. There was a sound—a scuttling, a stirring of claws—at the end of the hall.

He found the maker of the spasmodic noise on the kitchen table: half an earthworm. He scooped it into the dustpan with the orange plastic brush and shook it out of the couple of inches of kitchen window he always left open at the top, since the sash would budge no further. Could a bird have struggled in through the gap? Perhaps it was still in his rooms. Searching hadn't rid him of a sense that something was by the time he had to leave.

The day had grown hotter, or he had. He arrived at the school flapping the armpits of his shirt, and once he'd donned his orange coat, its too. He desisted when children began to run or skip or amble to the gates. "You'll want to be off and get changed," he said to some, and told others "I'll bet you'd like to go to the baths." When Polly's mother led her to the kerb, having parked so far away the source of the incessant yapping was invisible, he said "How did you like Miss Jennings, Polly?"

"She was nice. She gave me a sweet for getting all my sums right," Polly said as her eyelashes rendered a blink more dramatic. "How did you know who my teacher is?"

"We know all about little girls, don't we, Mrs Marsh?" When that earned him the faintest of smiles he said "I know who teaches your year, that's all. I was saying to your mam, when I was your age I had a dog."

"About her age."

"Fair enough, about." Leonard was starting to find conversation with the woman rather a task. "They last longer than a year, most dogs."

"What was his name," Polly had already began to ask, "or was he a she?"

Leonard found he didn't know. "How about yours?"

"His name's Tiger."

"Because he's like a prawn, is that?"

Polly dealt him a pitying look. "Because he's striped."

Leonard supposed the dog was. "I should go to him before he does a mischief," he said, and had an impression too momentary to grasp that he was talking, or ought to be talking, about himself.

***

In the morning he was wakened by sunlight on his face. He should have been up by the time the sun reached his pillow. He twisted under the blankets to grope for the bedside clock, and dislodged an object from the foot of the bed. It struck the floor with a soft thud. As he clutched at the edge of the mattress and leaned out, he found he was expecting to see an old lost toy from his childhood. Lying on the shabby carpet, stiff legs outstretched and tiny claws splayed wide, was a dead sparrow.

At least that explained the worm, he thought. The bird must have dropped it and then become trapped in the apartment. He loaded the small corpse onto the dustpan and shovelled it onto the back doorstep for later burial, then hurried to do as little as he absolutely had to in the bathroom.

"Overslept," he panted at Miss Devine, not that she seemed eager to know. "Too fond of my bed," he told the first of the parents and children he escorted across the road. "Maybe I'm starting my second childhood. You can rely on me in future," he assured them, and was interrupted by a yapping that claimed all their attention. "Why, it's pretty Polly and her stripy friend," he cried. "Is he going to school as well?"

"I just want him to see where I go."

"He'll have plenty of chances, Polly," her mother said. "I'm sure he'll be with us longer than you're at this school."

Leonard wondered why that should be accompanied by a frown at him, then understood. "That's right, Polly. I didn't mean yesterday they live only a couple of years. They grow up with you, do dogs."

"Have you thought what yours was called yet?"

"Flea," he said, and with further inspiration, "because he was made of them."

"Not really."

"No, just seemed to be," Leonard said, increasingly unsure of the truth.

Polly's mother talked to Miss Jennings until the bell signalled the end of fun—that was how Leonard remembered it, at any rate—and then she and sloppily striped Tiger made for him. "No tears, then," he said.

"Should there be?"

"I'd never want any, if that's what you mean. I just thought, you know, new school and all that, having to make new friends.

"She's good at telling who her friends are."

"I'm sorry if I made her worried for her best one. I didn't think."

"It takes more than that to upset her. When she is, there's usually a very good reason."

"I'm glad. I was wrong about my dog, by the way. I called him Flea because he used to run away."

"Why would he do that, Mr. Bailey?"

He'd only said it hoping for a laugh. "Things do when you're my age," he said.

On returning home he found the doormat scattered with letters for Mr. Flanagan and a purple envelope addressed to himself. It contained a birthday card premature by a week. The card depicted an unbalanced man with crosses in his eyes and bubbles spiralling around his head, and was from Pat, Leonard's next-door neighbour from his life on the other side of town, whom he'd taken at first sight for a man. He propped it on the mantelpiece above the dusty gas fire and took the envelope to the kitchen bin—or rather, as far as the kitchen door, which stuck. A soft object was blocking it from the far side. He threw his weight against the door, which dragged the obstruction out of the way, all except one sodden feather. It was the dead sparrow.

How thin would anything have had to be in order to climb with the bird over the top of the sash? The corpse must have been flung into the room, and the only culprit who came to mind was Mr. Flanagan. Leonard grabbed the letters from the mat and bore them into the atmosphere of stale cheap smoke, but no amount of pounding on the unpainted door brought an answer. He tramped downstairs and shovelled the bird and its feather into a bin-liner, and scrubbed the linoleum before laying the package to rest in the weedy flower-bed alongside the concrete of the back yard. Having failed to close the sash, he stalked out of the house.

His anger fetched him up at the library where he used to work, a windowless white bunker guarded by the remains of young trees. A uniformed man stood reading a small newspaper outside the electronic arches that raised the alarm if anything was pilfered. While Leonard didn't recognise the guard, Mr Bloore was behind the counter. Leonard had grown to dislike the librarian as much as Mr Bloore had disliked him for chatting so much to the children rather than simply warning them to take care of books. There were considerably fewer of those than there had been in Leonard's time, not to mention bookcases, and no sign of Mr. Flanagan. Nevertheless the experience of being a member of Mr Bloore's public amused Leonard, and he sat down to wait for a newspaper.

Eventually someone even older than himself finished with the Telegraph. The government proposed a curfew not only for children convicted of wrongdoing, Leonard read, but also for their parents or guardians, who would have to stay home with them. If only all children were like Polly and his other favourites, he thought—not like the pair of boys no more than twelve years old who were giggling at the display on an Internet terminal. He raised his head to tut at them, but the sound he unleashed was louder and less restrained. "You shouldn't be watching that," he protested hot-cheeked. "Nobody should."

Mr. Bloore limped over, every step sending quivers through his face, a fat, pink, egg hairless except for eyebrows. "What's all the noise about?" he demanded, and with very little less hostility, "It's Leonard Bailey, isn't it? What brings you here?"

"The same thing I'm paid to do, seems like," Leonard was provoked into retorting. "Seeing after kids. Those two ought to be at school, and don't you have to keep an eye on what they're looking at?"

"Please don't presume to tell me my job, Leonard." Mr. Bloore raised his voice for the last word as though reminding a child of its age. "These two young gentleman have a perfect right to be here, though I would ask them to be a trifle quieter. They're researching a wildlife project for their schoolwork."

"That's what they call it, is it?" Leonard said wildly, and saw that the screen was indeed now exhibiting only a dog. "There was a woman there before," he insisted, and whispered, "I'll tell you what they were up to if you like."

"You've said quite enough already, a good deal more than enough. If you continue in front of these children I'll have to ask you to leave."

"They're trying to trick you, can't you see that? Dogs aren't wildlife, they're pets. You wouldn't put books on dogs under wildlife."

"That's all. More than all," Mr. Bloore said and turned to the uniformed guard, who had mooched to him. "Will you remind Mr. Bailey where the door is, Harold? He's disturbing other people."

"They ought to be disturbed. You ought. Can't you see what they're up to?" Leonard was shouting by now, having shrugged away from the guard's descending grasp. When the boys began to giggle harder he lurched at them, then veered doorwards. He had to restrain himself from striking out at the electronic arch to trigger the alarm.

Some of his fury had its roots in the notion that Mr. Flanagan might be back at the house and up to more of his senile mischief. Leonard panted home and shouted his neighbour's name. It roused only an echo of the end of itself, or did he hear a surreptitious movement? He followed his voice up the stairs, but even bruising his knuckles on the man's door brought no response. Wheezing with the threat of having to inhale smoke of which the air was giving him a taste, Leonard slammed his own door as if that could communicate his anger. As he found himself wondering if the little grave he'd dug had been tampered with, he strode along the hall. He was unlocking the back door when a kitten darted out from under the sink and across the yard to leap over the wall with a screech.

He hadn't time to see how much of its grey it owed to cobwebs, tatters of which had trailed from its hiding place almost to the door, he knew only that it had been terrified by whatever had been done to it. If it had squeezed through the gap above the sash it would have been able to clamber out again. It must have been shoved through by Mr. Flanagan in an attempt to make trouble for Leonard, just because Leonard had asked him not to smoke in the hall for the sake of other people's health. Leonard locked the back door and leaned in the doorway opposite the stairs to be sure of catching Mr. Flanagan when he came home.

All that earned him was an aching shoulder, and another, and an accumulation of rage. He waited until it was nearly time to set off for his patrol, then longer still, and had to fling himself out of the house in more of a fury than ever. He did his best to calm down before reaching the school, but the children's voices seemed painfully shrill even when they greeted him. How would Tiger's yapping sound? Leonard was close to wishing Polly's mother had already taken her away. But here they came across the schoolyard, and the dog was silenced by a chewed ball almost bigger than its mouth. "That's more like it," Leonard said as the seven-year-old smiled at him. "That's the Polly I want to see."

"How many have you got?"

"She's quick, isn't she?" Since her mother went no farther towards agreement than to raise her frown by a fraction of an inch, he said, "Just you. Just room for one."

"And your dog."

"Yes, I started to tell you about him, didn't I, only he wasn't called Flea." It took Leonard a moment to realise he'd somehow convinced himself he could leave it at that. "He was called," he said as it came to him, "Frog."

"Why?"

"Because he'd always give me a jump. Because he was always jumping up, I mean." Since that appeared not to have made an impression, he added, "And he used to bring me things like yours does. Slept with me as well."

"Can Tiger, Mummy?"

"Certainly not." Mrs. Marsh's frown spread to the skin around her eyes and wrinkled her lips as well. "That's a nasty idea. Dirty," she said so forcefully that Tiger almost neglected to retrieve the ball she'd made him drop.

Leonard told himself her vehemence hadn't been aimed at him, but now he was confused as well as furious. Having abandoned his regalia in the office, he marched home. The front door wasn't fully open when he released the shout that had been welling up in him. "Mr. Flanagan."

"I'm here in front of you," his burly red-faced neighbour complained, emitting a noseful of smoke that turned his extensive moustache even greyer. "What's more, I've a headache."

"Why would you have one of those?"

"The state of the world, for a start. They'll be telling us next we can't smoke in the street," Mr. Flanagan said, and scowled more fiercely at him. "What are you trying to get at?"

"I thought it might be yowling that made your head hurt."

"Not yowling, yelling. That was you. Why, what have you been hearing that I've not?"

"Someone's been putting creatures in my rooms, as maybe you might know."

"Have you been having a bit of a tipple?"

"I don't drink or smoke either."

"Maybe you should," Mr. Flanagan said and gave him a sly yellow-toothed grin. "Putting them in your rooms, eh? Even Mr. Taggart, who lived there before you didn't think up that excuse."

"For what?"

"For keeping a dog when he knew none of us was let. Silly bugger used to hide it when the landlord came, in his bed, or in a cupboard under the sink, or in his dirty washing, and God alone knows where else. Only it got to keeping me awake, worse than a woman for yapping, so I had to tell on him. The landlord paid him a visit unexpected-like, and he still tried to hide the thing under some towels in the bath. Know what old Taggart did when he was told he'd have to go if the dog didn't? Kicked it to death and then had a heart attack that finished him off. That's what comes of losing your temper."

"Sounds more like it came of you telling tales out of school."

"You want to grow up, old boy. You aren't going to get me livid. There's a nag owes me some money," Mr. Flanagan said, and paused to light a cigarette from the one he threw out of the house and suck on it before pushing past him.

His nonchalance didn't fool Leonard. What might he have interrupted that Mr. Flanagan had been up to so close to Leonard's flat? Once the fading of his rage gave Leonard his sight back he fumbled the door open and searched the rooms. The absence of evidence that anyone or anything had sneaked, or been sneaked in didn't satisfy him. Not least because Mr. Flanagan had denied all knowledge, Leonard was certain that more was to come. He hurried to the nearest fish-and-chip shop to bring home a greasy dinner, and searched the rooms again before he ate it, one eye alert for the kitchen window, one for the hall.

Nothing had happened by the time the apartment set about growing dim. The thought of sitting all night in the kitchen enraged him further. He left the kitchen door wide open and sat opposite his birthday card, watching the television with the sound turned down. Mr. Flanagan's was louder, causing a slapstick comedian to utter a political speech, after which a newsreader broke into an Irish comic song. At least the noise overhead meant Mr. Flanagan was there—or could he have left the set on to cover up some surreptitious activity? Leonard kept lurching into the kitchen to surprise him, but vainly. Eventually he tired of that—tired enough for bed. He manhandled his mattress into the hall and, having wedged the kitchen door with it, dumped blankets and pillows on it, then himself.

The switch for the kitchen light was out of reach. He reared up and clawed at the switch as a preamble to stumbling over the pillow and twisting around like a dog before dropping to all fours and then none to drag the bedclothes over himself. He tried not to be aware of the floor through the mattress and the dim walls towering too high above him, but more than these kept him sleepless. Hours seemed to ooze by while he listened for hints that he was about to be visited. Whenever sleep began to settle on him he jerked awake, seized by an impression that something had crawled to him so as to nuzzle or otherwise touch his face. In the depths of the night he was only half aware of floundering through the apartment to peer in the bath, and the washing bin, and the cupboard under the sink, and his improvised bed, into which he then subsided. It was even darker when he struggled free of the start of a nightmare that had required no more than an instant of sleep. "No more spiders. Don't bring me anything," he mouthed and to some extent said. "It's not my birthday till next week."

The words roused his nerves, and realising what he'd had in mind didn't help. He'd been about Polly's age when he'd wakened in the early hours to find his mother on her hands and knees beyond the bed, doing her best not to disturb him by leaving presents there, though it had been not his birthday but Christmas. If his mother were to creep now to the foot of the bed or to the pillow, what would the darkness be concealing? He wished he hadn't thought that—wished he hadn't let her see how upset the knowledge that there was no Santa Claus had left him. He tugged the sheet over his face to fend off a sensation that felt like the imminence of cobwebs or of a sprinkling of earth. His head was crawling with unwanted thoughts, and he found he was unable to close his eyes until the walls set about collecting the dawn.

A cold touch on his forehead wakened him. A tongue, he thought—a tongue too cold to be alive. He'd thrown off the bedclothes before he realised he'd felt merely a draught from the kitchen window. He bruised an elbow on the hardened mattress as he raised himself to blink. The sash was several inches wider open than he'd left it, and a pale, ungainly object was advancing across the kitchen floor towards him. When he found his eyes with the knuckles of his prop of an arm and rubbed his vision clear he saw that the intruder was a naked boy about a year old, trailing wisps of cobweb.

Leonard filled his lungs to yell at the floor overhead, but let the breath whisper out of him. Surely even Mr. Flanagan wasn't capable of this latest trick—couldn't have dropped the baby into the kitchen without making it scream. It looked healthy enough. Leonard staggered to his feet and backed away from it to search the rooms. Except for the baby he appeared to be on his own. He had to get rid of it before anyone realised it had been there, but he was about to be late for work. He wrapped the baby in a towel and buttoned a raincoat around it and himself on the way to venturing unwashed and unshaven out of the house.

Every step bumped the baby against his chest. When he tried to put on speed his burden squirmed and wailed, and he had to rub it through the coat until it subsided. Though the parents and children in the streets weren't close enough to notice, they gave him no chance to leave the baby anywhere. He had to pass an empty push-chair outside an open door, because mothers were in conversation not a hundred yards away. There would be plenty of prams outside the school, he almost reassured himself aloud.

There were, but all the parents seemed unusually aware of him. Why couldn't they be lost in chat as usual? "I'll be out as soon I'm dressed," he told them, waving at the school to prove he had a free arm as well as the one that was clutching his chest. He was making his dainty way across the schoolyard when the front of his trousers grew warm and wet. He thought age and panic had ambushed him until he realised the moisture was trickling from higher up. He waddled splay legged into the school, desperate to be unobserved for just the few minutes that leaving the baby somewhere would take, but Miss Devine caught sight of him through her doorway at once. "Feeling the cold, Mr. Bailey?"

"Got a bit of one. A bit of a temperature," he babbled, unable to remember how hot the day was, incapable of glancing down at his coat for fear a stain was visible on him. He stared hot-eyed around the office and was suddenly inspired. "Someone's looking for you in the yard," he said.

"Didn't you tell them to come in?"

"They can't," he assured her, and rubbed his bulging chest as he tried to think why. The only reason he could manufacture was, "They said they can't."

After a pause that turned Leonard's chest and trousers wetter, the secretary sighed and stood up not too straight with a groan and trudged stooping out of the room. Leonard darted to the filing cabinet behind the desk and began to pull the drawers forth, only to slam them back in. He was close to despairing when the bottom drawer proved to be empty except for several erotic magazines, presumably confiscated. He snatched his coat open, snapping off a button, and laid the baby on top of a glossy woman with gigantic breasts, then tucked the sodden towel around the wriggling limbs and slid the drawer shut. He dragged his orange uniform over the raincoat to hide his stained chest and crotch, and almost buttoned himself up wrong in his haste to be clear of the office before Miss Devine returned.

He'd barely stepped out of the building when she came at him, head low. "Who's supposed to be wanting me?"

"They must have gone." He surveyed the playground in an attempt to seem convincing, but she recoiled from him, wagging a hand in front of her face. "I know. Smelly old man," he said. "It's because I'm ill."

He raised his pole and strode across the playground, not sure whether to ignore or joke with the children who held their noses and giggled at him. He hadn't time to play with them, he was needed on the road. He dipped his pole almost as low as the oncoming windscreens until a car halted with a grudging screech. "Come along," he called to the mothers and children at the opposite kerb, "you're all safe while I'm here," and heard Tiger yapping close by and, further off, a baby's wail. Surely it wasn't the child he had stored in the office; how could it be so audible? He lingered in the middle of the road even though nobody was waiting to cross. Before long he was rewarded not just by the impatient blare of a car's horn but, better, by the arrival at the kerb of Mrs. Marsh and Polly, who was leading the dog. "That's it, hurry along," he called. "Bring him too. Show a leg, Polly Wolly Doodle."

"I'm not a wally."

"Of course you aren't," Leonard shouted in the hope that would drown the wailing somewhere behind him. "You're more of a delight every time I see you. Give me a closer look."

She and her mother stayed where they were, staring past him at the schoolyard. He mustn't let himself be distracted from his job. He had to strike the road with his staff before Mrs. Marsh said "Cross over quickly, Polly." Was it Tiger's tugging that made Polly dash past him to the school gates? He tried not to see Miss Devine advancing, stooped over a loud bundle, but she raised her voice above the clamour. "Did you leave this in my office, Mr. Bailey?"

He almost succeeded in laughing. "What would I be doing with a baby?"

A car honked and lurched forward an inch, urging him off the road. He didn't want to be seen to retreat from Miss Devine. He almost tripped as he stumbled onto the pavement alongside the schoolyard. "Go in, Polly. Leave Tiger here," Mrs. Marsh said far more briskly than usual, and bent to give the little girl a swift kiss before joining other parents and the secretary in staring hard at Leonard. "He took some children in to see a dirty film the other day," a mother said.

"And he got thrown out of the library for letting kids see porn on the Internet."

"I've had my doubts about the way he talks to Polly. He says he moved because of some children. I'm starting to wonder how he found them disturbing, if you know what I mean."

Their fights and their thumping stereo had kept him awake; they'd shoved rubbish through his letterbox and then denied they had. Before he could explain any of this the secretary turned towards the school, shooing away children and declaring over the wail of her burden, "I'm phoning the police."

Leonard knew at once he had no chance. If the mothers couldn't see him as he was, nobody would. He leaned his pole against the railings and removed his orange coat to hang it on a spike. He saw the mothers back away from him, and wasn't sure if he was smelling only the stain the baby had bestowed on him. "Nasty old man," he said, and called through the railings, "I never had a dog really. I wished I had. I just used to pretend." He didn't know if Polly heard him—didn't know if the further muttered accusations he thought he heard were issuing from the mothers or from the pal he'd nearly had, lurking somewhere close to see him off, behind a wall or a car. It was too late to matter. He pushed himself away from his abandoned uniform. "You can't see me," he said, and stepped into the traffic.

Illustration by Chris Roberts, taken from Spook Magazine, 2002.

One Copy Only

Written in: 1999
First published in Shelf Life: Fantastic Stories Celebrating Bookstores, 2002
Also published in: Just Behind You

Call it fantasy. Call it addiction if you like. At least its effects are more benign than those that bring criminals before me. Take today's case, though it could have been any of a hundred where a denizen of the estate beyond the hill crossed town to rob a homeowner. The thief loaded his pockets with jewels but left his victim's first editions, merely flinging them off the shelves to make sure none of them was a storage box and using a few pages to demonstrate how he'd been trained as a child. As for his victim, the old dear may not even need crutches for the whole of what's left of her life. Her assailant was doing his best to appear incapable of causing so much damage: he was thinner than last time I'd had him in court, and wearing a new suit to compensate. He still watched you sidelong, showing as little of his face as he could, and kept feeling his chin for stubble as if to signify how much he missed the decoration. His social worker spoke up for him, and his lawyer applied himself to casting doubt on the victim and the police, so that barely enough of the jury found against the culprit to let him be sent to stay with many of his friends from the estate, though not for as long as I would have wished and of course not as long as I announced. If that leaves me more resigned than enraged, it's at least partly because I have to persuade myself yet again that Ken Gregory and I didn't do worse for less—not that I would expect anyone to understand who wasn't a privileged customer of Books Forever.

I've no idea how many there may be—it's one of several questions I wouldn't presume to ask. Quite a number of the customers are postal and have never seen the shop. I learned of it ten years ago, when the bookshop chains had begun to devote themselves to fewer and fatter titles, no doubt fattening their authors in the process. I still leafed through any books that seemed at all promising, but the best they had to offer were imitations of greatness: even Clarence Colman Hope had abandoned his visions of dark worlds illuminated by magic and heroism, having thought up a protagonist to my mind too criminal to be presented as a hero. I turned to spending my Saturday afternoons in the second-hand establishments, and in a Care For Children shop I was rewarded more than I immediately realised with a handful of issues of Fantasy Magazine the best part of forty years old. Not only did they cost me under a fiver, but when I sat down after dinner to them and a brandy, I found stamped on each contents page the address of Books Forever.

Some of the tales told of challenges met and wrongs righted, and I thought there might be more where they came from. The next day I walked across the city to the hill. A November wind was sweeping the thoroughfares that swarmed with litter, and bearing stenches of the pinched streets of pygmy houses past the hill, the reek of charred garbage and of buildings set on fire to terrify the occupants or bring an end to them. The hill was the edge of that territory, and I found it hard to believe it could support a bookshop.

From the foot of the narrow potholed street I managed to distinguish part of a sign at the summit. Boo, it cried, a kind of glimpse I'd known to lead me only to a chemist's or a bookmaker's. Nevertheless I toiled up the uneven pavement crowded with parked cars, past sullen huddles of neglected houses, past cramped front gardens that doubled as play areas and rubbish tips, until I gained the height. Books Forever stood in the custody of a wine store and a Pakistani corner shop daubed with swastikas. Its meagre window was so grimy I was barely able to discern shelves packed with books. Sunday had left it closed and lightless, and its sometime painted door displayed no opening hours, but the presence of so many books and the possibility that some might store up wonders brought me back. Indeed, I returned the very next day as soon as I was able to leave my chambers.

On the hill gangs of children stared as if I had mistaken my course, not they theirs. Several called out words and suggestions I should have hoped never to see admitted to print. Since they were too young for the law to apply, I could only soldier onward. The last of the sunset lingered on the hill, so that the window over the faded sign of Books Forever glowed as though the sun had found a haven above the stunted houses, while it was impossible to determine whether the lower window was lit from within. When I applied my shoulder, the door stumbled inward under the unwelcoming clunk of the bell.

The man seated at the venerable desk on the far side of the dim room crammed with books on shelves and on the floor barely raised his face from the task of slipping photocopied catalogues into envelopes, and I couldn't tell for the sunset in his eyes whether he was gazing at me or beyond. He had a high wide frowning forehead, a long wedge of a face, a sprawl of grey hair that rested on the shoulders of his shabby leather jacket. "Are you closing?" I felt bound to enquire.

He gazed at me as if hoping for better and fingered his forehead, adding more ink to its wrinkles. "Depends what you're after."

"A good book."

"I don't buy any other kind."

"I found your address in a magazine I bought in the Care For Children shop. Four issues from the fifties, the whole set."

"Fantasy Magazine?" he said as though answering a question almost too easy to be acknowledged. "Should have brought them back here."

"I will if you think I ought to."

"Not you. The old fellow who bought them and then turned in his ticket, or his family should have looked where they came from, more like. They're your style, are they?"

"Anything that lets me see past the horizon."

He seemed to focus on me at last. "Look around," he said. "There's a light if you need it."

The unstable brass switches were just inside the doorway, by a bookcase piled with volumes too tall or too crippled to stand. Three bare bulbs came alight above the cramped aisles. Perhaps shadows deepened the bookseller's frown, or perhaps he mistook for dislike my reaction to the spectacle of thousands of books arranged only by author. "This is how bookshops used to be," I hastened to remark.

"It's how you find what you didn't know you wanted," he said and turned back to his catalogues.

There was no lack of favourite names—Haggard, Hope, Malory, Tolkein—and nothing that I hadn't read by them. I looked into several novels that apparently promised to be fantastic, but the worlds they revealed were altogether too mundane. I was kneeling before the Vs when a fragile old man in a tweed overcoat and matching hat clambered down the stairs behind the desk. From the glances both he and the bookseller threw in my direction as the old man hurried empty-handed out of the shop, I took him as some kind of private customer. In case the proprietor wanted to close for the night I called "Could you recommend something?"

"MacDonald," he responded without looking up.

A book under that name boasted a knight in armour on its spine, while the cover had him on horseback, surrounded by goblins. He and the price were enough to send me with the book to the desk. "If it's no good to you," the bookseller said as he consigned the volume to a supermarket bag, "bring it in."

At least I was being invited to return. I picked my way downhill to the nearest car park and drove to my apartment, the higher floor of a detached Victorian town house. After dinner, which would have been either half of last night's casserole or the first half of that day's, I entrusted myself to the book. The armoured horseman proved to be not a knight but the old king; the hero was a miner's son who rescued him and married the princess. After their deaths the city was destroyed by greedy mining of the gold beneath it. The novel was a children's book.

Rather than resent being thought childish, I appreciated the recommendation, not one any other bookseller I'd encountered would have been sufficiently imaginative to propose. It was my kind of tale, and would have been during my childhood if my parents hadn't confined me to improvingly prosaic fiction about the supposed deprivations of youngsters unluckier than the reader. At the end of a week of establishing at least a modicum of temporary protection for the public I returned to Books Forever.

The bookseller looked ready to be disappointed as he said "Had enough of it?"

"On the contrary, I've kept it to read again. Have you anything else as good?"

He fingered his inky forehead as if it contained a Braille message. "White," he said, and went back to securing a parcel with tape.

The name led me to a corner out of sight of his desk. I had barely touched the copy of The Sword in the Stone when he declared "That's the early version, the best one."

He was clearly pleased that I trusted his advice. "We'll be seeing you again, shall we?" he asked as I paid for the book.

"I'll be in to see what's new or rather what's good."

"I'll keep an eye open for you," he said, and extended a hand of friendship. "Ken Gregory."

"Chris Miles," I confided over a handshake that faintly inked my fingers, and left him when the ageing phone rang or more accurately rattled on the desk. At home I discovered he had sold me another children's book.

While parts of it were wry, it did sound the note of heroism. Next he introduced me to the tales of Alan Garner at the rate of one a week. The fourth concerned itself too much with the brand of teenage awkwardness the defenders of young miscreants try to offer as an excuse, and it was the only volume I returned to the shop. Gregory met it with wide-eyed surprise that aggravated his frown. "Not your kind of myth?" he said.

"I'm more than happy reading adult books. Doesn't anybody write the sort of fantasy they used to?"

I remember my exact words and the way he gazed at me, as though attempting to peer deep into me or to decide whether I had given him a password. After quite a pause he said "Maybe you should have a session with my private stock."

On two further occasions I'd seen customers descend the stairs. Each had bought a book from the public shelves; I assumed the price included payment for whatever they'd concealed about them. "I didn't mean adult in that sense," I said as neutrally as I could.

"Nor me either. Just trying to make your dreams come true." He seemed honestly disappointed, but the impression remained that the contents of the upper room were somehow illegitimate. I took it as my duty to investigate. "Then I shouldn't turn you down," I said and stepped behind his desk.

"I ought to tell you I only keep reading copies upstairs."

"By which you're implying..."

"If you find anything you like you'll have to read it while you're there."

I found this yet more suspect, and felt uncomfortably conspiratorial as I set foot on the lowest stair. Once I began to climb I felt insecure as well. The stairs were even steeper than they had appeared to be, and the wall seemed uncertain of its grip on the right-hand banister, while the left rail shifted as if all its crutches were about to prove inadequate. I had no doubt the bookseller could find himself in trouble for endangering his customers. By taking the stairs as a challenge I succeeded in reaching the top. Faced with a door that stood invitingly ajar, if only because it was unable quite to close, I pushed it wide.

The room beyond was smaller than I expected. Beneath a baggy ceiling webbed with cracks the stained walls were brown as aged pages. On either side of a burst armchair that squatted in front of the window a bookcase was less than full of books, none of which immediately looked objectionable. Through the dwarfish window, over the ridges of a few mean roofs, I could see the sky but no horizon. As I trod on the ragged carpet, to be greeted by a smell suggesting that the redolence of all the oldest books had gathered in the upper room, I glanced about for a switch but found none. "Is there a light?" I called.

"There'll be enough."

There was. Indeed, although the sun was nowhere to be seen, one hook appeared to stand out from the rest as if a sunbeam had fallen on it, illuminating the words on the spine: The Glorious Brethren by Clarence Colman Hope. I had never heard of it, and yet it sounded unblessed with his recent cynicism. I read the opening pages and was hardly conscious of sitting down to read the entire book, in the armchair that contrived to be unobtrusively accommodating. The story told of a band of almost invincible and practically deathless knights who intervened on the side of the just when summoned by faith, and well short of the end I recognised it as Hope's finest work. Having lingered over the final scene, in which after the victory over Hitler the knights withdraw into the mists and are heard by a wounded soldier to vow "Till the world has need of us again", I would gladly have reread the book from start to finish. I was making my way to the door when Gregory hurried upstairs. "I'm guessing you found something to your taste," his head remarked over the threshold.

"As you see. May I make you an offer? Whatever you think reasonable."

"It's the only copy, sorry," he said, staring up beneath his fiercest frown. "Not for sale."

I assumed he was waiting for its value to increase, even if that would be hindered by the absence of a jacket. As I reluctantly consigned the volume to a shelf I was tempted to wish there were books whose nature might make him eager to appreciate my overlooking them, but I saw that the room hid nothing of the kind. "If you want another read of it," he said, "you can always come back."

I felt obliged to buy some item to express my gratitude. I bought a Tolkein omnibus, another edition of which I already owned, and bade Gregory adieu until next week. I was surprised to meet twilight outside the shop so soon after the brightness of the upper room, but my mind was still brimming like a chalice with the book I'd read.

Despite Gregory's offer, I was loath to take advantage of him, especially at the end of a Monday spent in preventing wrongdoers from doing so to the law. That evening I stayed in town to visit More 'n' Books. Beyond the posters for signings by chefs and footballers and television actresses a few books had found space among a mob of snowmen in the window. I struggled through crowds of shoplifters or customers to the fantasy section, which was manned by a youth with a shaved pate at odds with his kaftan. "Can I put you together with anything?" he said.

I'd had conversations with him before despairing of the present trend in fiction, and had found him to be knowledgeable. "A book by Clarence Colman Hope," I told him.

"We've got him signing his new one next month, but you said you don't like them that gritty." He glanced around before murmuring "Nor me either."

"I'm looking for an early book. The Glorious Brethren."

He raised a hand as if to feel for a recrudescence of hair. "Would you know who by?"

"I just told you by whom."

"We've never had it. In fact I'm sure—" Instead of finishing his supposition he typed the title on a computer. "There, I was certain I'd have heard of it," he said. "Never published and not forthcoming."

"I assure you it has been published. I've not only seen it but read it."

"If you can get more details we'll try and order it for you," he said, though plainly more convinced by his machine than by me, and then gave in to asking "What was it like?"

"Altogether his best."

"If you're at the signing you'll have to tell him."

"You think that might put him back on the right path."

"Somebody should if they can."

Who was better qualified than I? But I'd forgotten Christmas. I delayed visiting Books Forever until the weekend, only to find the shop locked for a week. As I trudged downhill past houses sparkling like constellations of stars so false they had fallen to earth, I could almost have imagined I had merely dreamed of mounting to the upper room, where a light appeared to have been left burning for the benefit of some solitary reader, unless it was the glow of the smudged sun.

Christmas resurrected memories of peace. At Midnight Mass in the church opposite my apartment I was able to believe for an hour that the children in the choir might never descend from the heights of mystery, even once their voices did. I spent the quiet week reaffirming the community I shared with a few friends, and in my hours alone read Tolkein in the edition I'd recently bought, though it was corrupted by misprints of which my old copy was innocent. All too soon a New Year as wicked as its predecessor was upon us, bringing revelry that turned into violence, some of the perpetrators of which it was my burden to judge. I wearied of their lies and excuses long before the week was done, and that Saturday I climbed the hill in something like despair. But the shutters had gone.

Gregory glanced up as though the clenching of his frown had raised his head, then nodded to me. "May I go up?" I asked at once.

"There's nobody else."

I took this for assent and hauled myself upstairs as swiftly as was safe. I was unsurprised to find the upper room offered more light than the sullen shady sky. I retrieved The Glorious Brethren from the shelf and examined the spine, then both sides of the title page, before taking the book to the threshold. "Do you know who published this!"

"Wait there." Gregory was already more than halfway up the stairs. "Which is it?" he said, then didn't look. "It'll be a proof copy. That's why they don't have jackets and some other bits and pieces, and why I can't sell them."

"It's Clarence Colman Hope. They need to know the publisher at More 'n' Books so they can order it for me."

Gregory shrugged as if attempting to dislodge an encumbrance that had landed on his shoulders. "He's only ever had one publisher I know of," he said, and watched until I replaced the volume on the shelf. None of its companions displayed a publisher's name. I lowered myself down the stairs to find Gregory awaiting me, his frown pressing his eyes narrow. "What will you be telling them?" he said.

I couldn't see that he'd committed any offence, and so I cried to reassure him. "I won't mention where I found it if you'd rather I didn't."

"This was my father's shop. That was his room."

"I understand," I said, uncertain whether I did.

"He died up there. He said he wouldn't come down till he'd finished all the books he wanted to read."

"I imagine I know how he felt."

"He had the strongest mind I've ever come across. He didn't care about anything but books."

For a moment I had the dismaying impression that the son proposed to cite childhood neglect to extenuate some crime. "We all care about those," I said, and left him.

Outside it was darker than seemed reasonable for the hour or after the illumination of the upper room. The twitching of obsolescent Christmas lights urged me downhill. The bogus snowmen that stood guard in the window of More 'n' Books showed no sign of melting. The aisles were clogged with clots of youngsters demonstrating in various ways their hostility to books. In the fantasy section several children were leafing through pornographic comics while their cronies contented themselves with disarraying the alphabet. I should have expected the assistant with the grey pate to intervene, but perhaps he was abashed by his kaftan. He limited himself to telling me "I did a search for that title you asked after."

"May I look forward to having it soon?"

"I'm afraid that's all you'll be able to do." He took time to produce an apologetic smile before adding "It must have been some dream."

"Please make yourself clear."

"The book doesn't exist."

"You'll excuse me, but I've had a proof of it in my hands."

"Did it have a publisher?"

"None was shown."

"Then that's no proof."

Though he'd let his smile drop, I couldn't judge if he was mocking me. I was close to betraying Gregory's confidence, but instead I suggested "Perhaps you can trace another book for me."

"If our computer can't nothing can."

"The Club of the Seven Dreamers by H. P. Lovecraft."

He tapped the keyboard and sent an arrow darting about the screen. After some minutes he said "Never published."

"Then The House of the Worm by the same author."

It took him less time to decide to say "No sign of that either."

"Try Last Dangerous Visions by—"

"I know it," he said, smiling as if someone had winked at him. "You aren't going to say you've seen that too."

Of course I had seen all of them in Gregory's upper room, but I'd heard enough to indicate that the assistant was as lacking in imagination as the computer. "You mentioned you'd have Clarence Colman Hope here this month," I said.

"I did."

That sounded wary enough to be a question. "When may we meet him?" I enquired.

"Next week."

"More precisely, please."

"Saturday," the assistant was compelled to admit, and handed me from a stack on a counter a glossy sheet advertising Hope's appearance and The Third Book of Shagrat the Sly. As I turned away he watched me, visibly regretting having given me the information, and I felt suspected of mischief. On the very few occasions when my parents had cause for that, they would fall silent enough to suggest I had done away with them—the first time for hours, the next for days, the last for nearly a week. I had learned not to plead and rage in my desperation to revive them, but now the injustice I was suffering and the sight of the children left unchecked among lewdness found the voice in which I pronounce sentence. "Perhaps someone in authority will see fit to escort these boys somewhere more suitable," I advocated, and as staff and loiterers gawped at me, went forth from the shop.

I might have sought solace in Books Forever, but my skull had begun to feel crushed, as it did when my parents' silence closed around it. For much of the rest of the weekend I lay on my bed, watched over by books that had been crowded out of the sitting room. This was scarcely enough preparation for the succeeding week, throughout which the jury seemed bent on flaunting its distrust of the law. More than determination to hear Hope acknowledge his best work drove me when the week was executed to return to More 'n' Books.

The snowmen had been ousted from the window by posters of Hope's strongly angular square-bearded face and by piles of his books. A few seconds' survey confirmed that The Glorious Brethren was nowhere in evidence, and so I followed the throng to the performance area. This was a large upstairs room, bare except for a table heaped with Shagrat the Sly and confronted by perhaps a hundred sketchy chairs. Most were occupied, and I seated myself on the back row, eyed by the assistant with the scraped pate, who had donned a suit in deference to the celebrity. I saw him resolve to accost me, only to be prevented by the arrival several minutes late of Clarence Colman Hope.

I might not have recognised him. His beard had vanished, exposing his chin as weaker than he'd made it appear, and he was grown plump as a stuffed goose. He was at least a head shorter than any of his characters, and shorter still when measured against myself. He left no doubt that he was meant to be the centre of attention by flourishing his fists above his head and roaring "Where's the applause?" Once that had subsided, and the assistant had stumbled through a redundant introduction during which his subject fed himself swigs of wine and mimed falling asleep, the author set to reading aloud passages from Shagrat the Sly of which I struggled to believe he could never be proud. Even worse than the way Shagrat stole and lied and cheated to defeat his opponents was the presentation of their magical skills as a pretext for his behaviour, as if envy can ever be an excuse. Worst of all were Hope's knowing glances at his audience beneath a cocked eyebrow that incited them to share his esteem for his creation. I could only clamp my lips together and wish at least some of the laughter to be merely dutiful. Eventually the ordeal was brought to an end, and the assistant was inviting questions when Hope interrupted him. "I see some of you've got old books of mine. I'll sign them all so long as you buy the new one first."

Two people with laps heaped with books laboured to their feet and tramped out shamefaced, and I wondered if they had been the only others of my mind. I was heartened when the first questioner to be chosen, a young woman with waist-length hair surmounted by an ornate silver comb, ventured to ask "Will you be writing any more heroic fantasy?"

"Being a writer's heroic and all I write is fantasy."

"I meant will you ever write any more like—"

"You mean you want me to regress."

"No, just—"

"Just not letting anyone else get a word in, eh? I hope she quiets down when she's reading at least," the author said with a leap of one eyebrow that advised his audience they were expected to laugh, which a few did. "My turn for a question. How many of you would buy three hardcovers of it if I wrote some more old stuff?"

One girl's hand shot aloft, and two more wavered up elsewhere in the room. "Well, you're my kind of readers. I'll be putting special messages in yours," Hope told them. "Only you aren't enough. I'd need everyone here and the rest of my fans to buy themselves a trio to keep my sales up where they ought to be. In case some of you are better at fantasy than sums, that means Midas tried reissuing my dusty stuff and only shifted a third of what Shagrat does for them."

"Are you saying," a man with a senile pony-tail suggested, "you can't afford to write the kind of book you'd like to?"

Hope stared wordlessly at him for quite a pause, until the assistant mumbled red-faced "Another question. Yes—"

"Let's have someone more my age," Hope interrupted. "Big lady at the back."

"What can you tell us about The Glorious Brethren?"

"Give us a clue what you want to hear."

"When you wrote it and when it's to be published."

He looked as if he regretted having selected me. "Not one of mine," he declared. "Doesn't sound like it ever would be, either."

"I've seen it," I assured him.

"Then you must be even better at fantasy than me," Hope said, jerking up an eyebrow to ensure everyone else saw the joke.

I was about to inform him where the book was to be found until I realised that would put it at risk. Suppose it was indeed the only copy? I waved away any further dialogue, and the assistant was hastily choosing another questioner when someone in the middle of the room said "I've seen it too."

Before I'd finished willing that to have been elsewhere than Books Forever I recognised him as one of Gregory's privileged customers, a stooped shaggy greying man with an unnecessarily large head. "I can show you if you like," he said. "It's here in town."

"What is?" Hope demanded.

As I drew breath to head off the information, though I had little idea how, the crouched man said "The Glorious Brethren. It's got your name on it. It's in a shop."

Hope gazed at him and then at me, and I made the worst mistake of my life: I glanced aside as though from guilt. "You two can show me where once I've finished signing," Hope said, no longer amused. "We'll have a few more questions and then get to the books."

I thought of approaching my fellow customer in case I could dissuade him from escorting Hope, but I feared that would only waste time. As I hurried out I saw the author glower at my leaving and the assistant look relieved. Entangled in my urgency was the unhelpful realisation that secretly I'd started to believe The Glorious Brethren existed for myself alone. I dodged through the Saturday crowds and dashed up the hill, egged on by the lascivious comments of children and by the flickering of laggard Christmas lights. I hoped Books Forever would be locked, but one thrust of my shoulder threw the door wide.

Ken Gregory was pencilling prices in books on his desk. He met me with the commencement of a smile that quickly sank. "Looks bad," he said.

"I'm afraid it may be. I'm dreadfully sorry."

"Long time since anyone's been that round here."

If he had asked me what was wrong it might have required less effort to say "Clarence Colman Hope's in town."

"I heard. Have you met him?"

"Sadly."

"A disappointment, was he? Writers can be. You're best off knowing just their books."

I cleared my throat hard to dislodge words. "I told him about The Glorious Brethren."

To add to my discomfort, Gregory's lips considered grinning. "How did he take it?"

"He's on his way here."

Gregory opened the next book to enter the price. "Can't blame him."

He seemed not be suggesting I was to be censured either, but it was shame that made me blurt "Aren't you going to do anything?"

"Such as?" Gregory said with some weariness.

"Shouldn't you hide it at least?"

"There's nowhere any of those books can go except where they are. I found that out the hard way once."

I was so distracted by his resignation that I might have asked him to elaborate if a car hadn't halted outside with a squall of brakes. It was black and slick as an eel, the Jaguar that disgorged Hope and his stooped admirer. The man barely had time to open the door for the author and sidle aside before Hope stalked in. As he saw me his face grew puce and petulant, but he addressed the bookseller. "I'm Clarence Colman Hope. I'm told you've got something you want people to believe is mine."

"We usually have you in stock."

Hope appeared to be taking that as a crafty insult when the stooped man strayed close to him. "It's upstairs," the man muttered, blushing with pride at having been of service, and indicated the route with a furtive thumb.

Hope strode to the gap beside the desk and planted his hands on his inflated hips. "Are you letting me go up?" he demanded of Gregory.

"I don't see anybody in your way."

The author advanced to the foot of the stairs and seized the banisters. As he set his weight on the first tread he looked suspicious of a trap. For the whole of his ascent the stairs performed a hoarse melody of protest. The stooped man was moving to follow when Gregory brandished an inky palm. "Not you, and don't ever come back."

The man averted his slumped face as he fled the shop, leaving the door ajar on the sight of a gang of children eyeing the Jaguar. I trudged in his wake, but Gregory called to me "Just shut the door."

I felt both pardoned and uneasy as I heard Hope plodding across the upper room. "Where's some bloody light?" he was complaining. Perhaps his eyes adjusted to whatever gloom he found or brought with him, because his footsteps halted where I knew bookshelves to be. "What's this?" he said in a voice subdued for him.

The silence endured longer than I was able to hold my breath. I glanced at Gregory, then away from his lack of an expression. At last Hope's footfalls thundered overhead, preceded to the doorway by his shout. "I don't know who faked this, but I'll be making sure the lawyers find out, and by God when they do—"

By this time he had set about descending with one hand on the banister. I caught myself wishing for an instant that he had missed his footing, but that wasn't why his shout became a savage gasp. The Glorious Brethren had slipped from his clutch, because there was suddenly too little of it to hold. What fluttered through the air was nothing but dust and scraps no larger than postage stamps, which crumbled as they settled to the floor. He glared down at the ruin of the book in baffled rage, then lurched back into the upper room. "All right then, I'll take something else," he vowed. "There's plenty here for the law to sort out."

The bookseller stood so abruptly that a heap of books tumbled across the desk as his chair clattered against the wall. He flung himself at the stairs and scrambled up like a monkey. "What else are you going to destroy that you can't do yourself?" he cried as he ran overhead. "Here's Edwin Drood that Dickens finished after all. Here's Arthur Gordon Pym that Poe did. Or The Castle of the Devil, how about that? That's some Robert E. Howard you won't find anywhere else. And look here, Malcolm Lowry did complete his last novel, and Scott Fitzgerald got around to finishing The Last Tycoon. Hang on though, maybe this is rarer, The Night of the Eye..."

He named other books too, a flood of them. He must have meant Hope to be unable to choose from so many, but his voice fell like the final rumble of a storm. "It's going to be Dickens, is it? You think there's already enough of him in the world."

I heard Hope retreat from the shelves and saw him back out of the room, another book in his hand. I have no idea what I might have done, but by the time I darted past the desk it was too late. I never knew if they were only Gregory's feet that rushed across the upper room. I glimpsed the snatching of the book from Hope's grasp, but did I see him pushed? I know I saw him hurl himself thoughtlessly backwards as though to avoid some contact. His head was first to strike the floor, followed by his body at an angle that wrenched his mouth into an agonised grimace, unless it was the crunching of his neck that did. His heels dealt the leg of the desk a convulsive kick that threw several books on top of him, and then he was still.

As I dragged my gaze clear of Hope's distorted outraged face, Gregory leaned out of the upper room. His eyes weren't quite admitting to a question. Before I could acknowledge it and decide on my response, we heard a car draw up outside, and the window began to throb with light. The next moment a double slam of metal doors heralded the entrance of two policemen.

It was only later that I learned they had been summoned by a householder to deter children from breaking into Hope's car. I had to deal immediately with their presence. "There's been an accident," I told them. "This chap lost his footing on the stairs not a minute ago. He'd been drinking. I'm a witness if you need one. I'm a judge."

I may always remember the look of astonishment adjoining disbelief with which Gregory met that revelation. I waited until the ambulance had cleared Hope's remains away, and answered the few questions the police found it necessary to ask. Since then Gregory and I have never discussed the incident, but I know he understands how deeply I value his shop. Without the treasures of the upper room I might despair not just of my calling but of life itself. I never leave Books Forever without having made a purchase, but for years the purpose of my visits has been to reread a solitary volume: The Return of the Brethren by Clarence Colman Hope.

Worse Than Bones

"As far as I'm concerned, inscriptions in second-hand books are a bonus."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the 2003 reissue of Told By The Dead

Written in: 1999
First published in The Museum Of Horrors, 2001
Also published in: Told By The Dead

As Hammond unpicked the staples of the padded envelope he'd been handed on his way to work, Mrs Middler arrived at her desk. "You'll break your nails if you aren't careful," she informed him, and frowned at the grey stuffing the envelope had begun to shed. "The cleaners won't thank you for that."

"What's someone sent you in a plain brown wrapper, Mr Hammond?" Charl expected to learn, though she wasn't even close to half his age.

"Maybe it's something to make you blush, Charl," Denny said, despite being younger still.

"I know you'd love to see that but you're never going to."

"Let's be polite," Mrs Middler said, Hammond wasn't sure to whom. "So may we see what all the fuss was about?"

Hammond refrained from pointing out that he'd made none of it. He lingered over relinquishing the book once he'd stripped it of its cerements of newspaper. Just enough of the dust jacket remained to show the title, Tales of the Ghostly, and the top of a wisp that might have been mist or a bit of a ghost. Mrs Middler's scent, which always led him to expect her to be wearing more makeup, met him as he handed her the book. She lowered her plump smug middle-aged face, presenting him with more of a display of her severely curled blonde hair. "I hope you didn't pay much for this," she said. "Why, it's been scribbled in."

"That's half the charm of old books for me. It makes a book seem lived in if whoever had it before leaves their mark."

Denny poked his thin permanently disappointed face at the book. Three small red spots led like the end of an unfinished sentence from the right-hand comer of his mouth. "Died in, more like," he remarked.

This book belongs to Hattie Close; so, if you've found it, please, return it to —Hammond read that and glimpsed an address down in Cornwall followed by a series of dates, and then Mrs Middler turned the page. "I won't pretend I'm a book person," she said, "but I wouldn't give you tuppence for this one."

Each title on the contents page was accompanied by a handwritten comment. "It's very rare," Hammond felt bound to protest. "The catalogue said it was only a reading copy."

Charl rested a hand on Denny's shoulder. Her hair was nearly the colour of her winter tan, and almost as short as his, both of them seeming eager for baldness. A grimace drew her small face tight. "I wouldn't be seen dead reading that," she declared.

Hammond had never seen her or her colleagues read anything but magazines composed mostly of advertisements. Mrs Middler shut the book and passed it to him, and he tried not to recoil from the sensation of inadvertently touching her hand. He had just grasped that he'd touched only the wrinkled cover when Charl said "Anyway, you can't call it that."

"Why can't I?"

"Not you," she told Hammond with a fragment of a giggle. "You can't just say tales of the ghostly. Tales of the ghostly what?"

Denny emitted a desiccated laugh of agreement and squeezed her arm until she pulled away from him. "It's a perfectly decent title," Hammond was saying meanwhile. "Back then they knew their grammar."

"I believe Charlotte's right," Mrs Middler said and stared past him at the clock beyond the dozens of occupied desks. "Put it away now, Mr Hammond. It's past time to start work."

He was being blamed for an argument of which he'd been simply the victim. He laid the book to rest among the paper-clips and rubber bands in his desk drawer, and didn't look up until his face had stopped burning. He often felt like a schoolboy who'd been given a desk near the teacher's for being unable to spell. More people knew the name of his condition than anyone had when he was at school, which meant that fewer thought he must be able to spell if he could read, but nobody had found a cure that worked for him. That was why he only checked arithmetic he would have been capable of doing, and fetched files so that people younger or much younger than himself could send out yet more correspondence about tax, and replaced files and sorted them into the alphabetical order they seemed unable to retain.

The smell of the files made him hungry for his book long before Mrs Middler sent him to brew tea for the mid-morning break. As soon as he'd dropped the sodden tea bag in his metal bin he resurrected Tales of the Ghostly from the drawer. All by itself the contents page made up for the morning so far. Each title allowed him a glimpse of an era when people had the leisure to see ghosts, as did Hettie Close's comments and the painstaking script in which they were expressed. The Gay Dancers was judged to be "A-glitter with memories", The Song in the Church "Uplifting", The Plea of a Child "Good and tearful", The Mummy's Voice "Exotic and eerie,' The Phantom Rail-way Signal "An up-to-date ghost"... He was savouring the prospect of so many unfamiliar tales—A Distant Melody as well, and The Keeper of the Light, and The Padlocked Door—when Charl, having taken a daintier sip than her coiffure would have led him to predict, blinked at him. "Are you just going to read what they're called, Mr Hammond?"

"Read us a story," Denny presumably joked.

"I liked being read to when I was little," Charl said. "Will you, Mr Hammond?"

He and his parents had read to each other almost as long as he'd had any parents. The thought of reawakening Charl's love of books made him indifferent to Mrs Middler's frown. He was turning to the first tale when he grasped how inadvisable it would be to tell his present audience that a story was called The Gay Dancers. He leafed through the warm withered pages to the tale Hettie Close found "Haunting as only true ghosts can be". "This is called The Path by the Churchyard," he announced and, resting his hand on the blank page opposite, read:

"In the twilight of a winter's afternoon of the year 18—, a traveller encountered a countryman on approaching a village in the south-east of our island, where the trees stoop close to the flat land while the winds constantly moan. 'Well met,' says J— to the countryman. 'Pray tell, who is being mourned in yonder churchyard?'

" 'None as I knows of,' responds the countryman.

" 'Then how comes it,' J— enquires, 'that I hear sighs beyond the hedge that bounds it?'

" 'Naught but wind in the trees,' returns the countryman. "Tis thirteen years since yon churchyard was chained and locked.'

"Taking his leave of him, the traveller advanced and saw that it was so..."

Hammond became aware that everyone within earshot had hushed to listen to him. He felt as if he'd been discovered at last. He was drawing a breath to do justice to the next sentence when a phone rang, and Denny was the first to laugh. Meanwhile Hammond's flattened hand jerked so nervously he might have thought the page had grown restless beneath it. "They didn't know much about writing in the olden days, did they?" Denny said. "Didn't know what year it was or the poor twat's name."

Charl dealt him a reproachful blink, only to add "Excuse me, Mr Hammond, but I think you mixed up your tenses a bit."

"I never mix up what I read. Come and look if you don't believe me."

Mrs Middler cleared her throat with a sound shriller than the phones. "We've had our break now. Lots of work to be done."

Hammond kept his hot face low for some moments after the book was shut up, then trudged to kneel by Charl. The left-hand drawer of every desk but his contained boxfuls of cards twice the size of a page of his book, each card representing a taxpayer. Hammond carried the first of the boxes to his desk and set about checking the latest column of arithmetic on every card. Charl started at Abel and finished at Bogle, but Hammond had only reached Aycliffe when it was time for lunch.

He went out for as prolonged a walk as he could stand, among buildings much like the squat five-storey concrete office block, except that people lived in them. Plastic cartons dripping red, egged on by lidded cups that sprouted straws for antennae, pursued him through the wasteland relieved only by the twitching remains of young trees. He wished he were on a heath or a hill, where the wind could find something old to enliven. Before long it and its scuttling companions drove him back to the office.

He was about to sit down when his body stiffened, wakening all its aches. The drawer with the book in it, which he'd shut flush with the desk, was open at least an inch. The front cover of Tales of the Ghostly was no longer closed but held ajar by a ballpoint pen. "Who's been in my drawer?" he demanded.

Everyone seemed to have agreed to meet him with silence until Charl admitted "I borrowed a paper-clip. I didn't think you'd mind."

"You didn't need to touch my book."

"I didn't," she said, looking hurt. "I was careful not to."

"Well, somebody did. There's a pen in it now."

"Maybe it wants more scribbling in," Denny said.

Hammond confined his response to examining the book for damage. After less of this than he felt entitled to, Mrs Middler said "I'm sure Charlotte would never have interfered with your property, and anyway I don't see anything to make a fuss about. There isn't much that could be done to it that hasn't been."

Hammond shut his lips and the drawer tight, and didn't speak to anyone for hours, even when Mrs Middler told him to make the tea. He was planting Charl's Majorca mug on her Ibiza beer-mat when Charl said "It ought to be called Tales of Ghostly Things."

Mrs Middler clearly thought that deserved more than the grunt he gave it. "Why do you want a book like that?" she apparently needed to know.

He could have said he would rather hold a book than a hand any day. Instead he told her "Most books are ghosts" as he opened his drawer to reassure himself that nothing else had befallen the book. He must have closed the drawer too hard last time; the pen was back under the cover. He transferred the pen to the top of the desk and eased the drawer shut, and would have apologised to Charl if there hadn't been an audience.

When it was time to go home he found that the cleaner had disposed of the padded bag. He slipped the book into a large brown Confidential envelope, challenging Mrs Middler to do more than frown at the use, and buttoned his coat over it. On the dwarfish bus he clung to a metal bar crowded with hands and clutched the package to his bosom with his other arm, much as a woman was holding her child on the seat below him. He couldn't help wondering if the little girl would ever read a book for pleasure. If he'd had both hands free he might have read to her from his book.

The wind rushed him from the bus stop by the park patrolled by litter and stray dogs to his house, a thin red-brick slice of a terrace. A smell of aged paper greeted him as he shut out all but the roar of the wind. He laid his prize on the balding carpet on the stairs while he draped his coat over the post at the foot of the rickety banisters, then shied the crumpled envelope into the splintered wicker wastepaper basket in the front room and sat the book erect in his father's sagging armchair.

Apart from the kitchen and the toilet, which was equally a bathroom, every room was rendered cosier by shelves of books. All his books were second-hand, and he hadn't bought an uninscribed one for years. He took down a few at random to remind himself how inscriptions brought them alive. Here was a volume of Grimm presented as a school prize in 1923, here was an Edwardian Everyday Reciter whose previous owner had indicated all the points at which he should take a breath; an espionage omnibus from a wife to her husband "so you'll remember I've got my eye on you", a dictionary of seashells from a father to his daughter "to answer all those questions you used to ask"... Hammond shelved the books and cooked himself two poached eggs on toast to accompany a bowl of cereal, quite enough of a dinner for him these days, especially when more would consume money better spent on books. Having washed up and dried the dinner things with the least tattered of the kitchen towels, he settled himself in the front room.

There must be a draught, and no wonder with the wind flinging its huge soft icy self against the house. Tales of the Ghostly had stooped forward on the armchair, propping itself on its open front cover. He glanced at the flyleaf as he retrieved the book. Hettie Close seemed to have needed to reconfirm her ownership every few years; the last date was nine years ago. He scanned the paragraphs he'd read aloud and leafed onward, each page trying to cling to his fingertips like another skin.

As J— walked through the village it began to look familiar, the buildings and the people too, though he had a sense that they were older than they should be. The only innkeeper told him there was no room and gave the impression of being afraid to have J— under his roof. As the night closed in, anyone J—approached fled into their houses and barred their doors against him. Sounds of mourning led him back to the churchyard, where he found a gap in the hedge through which he was able to pass. He followed the sounds to a gravestone, and as the sighs faded into silence, the apparition of the moon through tattered clouds showed him the plot. Carved on the memorial was his own name.

Hammond had thought as much, but the confirmation was a pleasure in itself. It wasn't why he emitted a startled grunt, muffled by the books around him. On the contents page Hettie Close had described the story as "Haunting as only true ghosts can be", yet beneath its final paragraph she had written much less neatly "Falsehood and foolishness". She must have turned against the tale in her old age.

In The Gay Dancers a young woman on a visit to friends in a remote part of France was drawn by sounds of revelry to a chateau, where she danced with a mysterious aristocratic youth who promised that their dance and the night would never end. At the height of their waltz she cried out to him to keep her always, and was never seen again. In an epilogue her friends searched for her near a chateau that had been in ruins for a hundred years. Apparently Hettie Close had ceased to find the story "A-glitter with memories"; across the blank half of its last page she'd scrawled "Lies the living want to believe".

Hammond had bought the anthology because the bookseller's catalogue had listed it as extensively annotated by the previous owner, but he was starting to find the annotations disconcerting. He riffled through the book and saw that every tale was followed by a comment, which he might have read if that wouldn't have involved glimpsing the conclusions of the stories. Each final page looked faded, both the print and the progressively effortful scrawl. He'd had enough of Hettie Close's bitter afterthoughts for one night. He turned to the shelves for companionship.

His favourite books proved less congenial than usual, perhaps because he couldn't help wondering how the people who had written in them or been addressed had ended up. Before long the smell of old paper grew oppressive, almost cloying, so that for the first time in his life he was close to wishing he had a television. When a collection of Shelley kept drooping in his hands, he took himself upstairs. Since all the shelves except those in his room were full, Tales of the Ghostly accompanied him. As he lay in the dimness thick as dust he imagined the book had perceptibly added to the smell of old paper. In the depths of the night he was wakened by sounds he put down to a mouse—less than a scratching, just a faint buried restlessness all the more annoying because indefinable. He slapped the bed until the activity ceased or at any rate passed beyond audibility. He had to tell himself it had intensified not the smell but his perception of it before he was able to sleep.

Was his memory as exhausted as he was? In the morning he saw the new book was half out of the shelf, though he seemed to remember pushing it all the way in. He lined it up with its neighbours and got hastily ready for work, having overslept for the first time in his life despite his parents' alarm clock that he'd transferred to his room, never needing it while they were present to waken him.

He was three sweaty panting minutes late for work. Mrs Middler said nothing to him until it was time for tea, and not much then. As he stood her Union Jack mug on the mat depicting a minute map of Britain she relented sufficiently to ask "Did you sort out the business with your book?"

He felt as though she'd noticed something he had overlooked.

"What business?"

"Weren't you going to get some money back at least for the condition it was in?"

"I told you yesterday," he said, and was disconcerted to realise he was about to lie. "It was what I expected."

"You'll have to forgive me for being surprised, Mr Hammond. Do you ever write in your books?"

It had never struck him before, but he didn't. "Not yet," he said.

"I hope you never reach that state."

"Pretty soon nobody will read books," Denny told Charl. "Everything worth having will be on the Internet. You'll just need to know how to use it."

"Just because it gives you a big head doesn't mean there's more in there."

Hammond had no wish to become entangled in their flirtation. It wasn't until the afternoon break that he asked Denny "Can you really find anything you want to on your computer?"

"Print it out as well. Go ahead, tell me something to bring you. If it's something Charl shouldn't see, just whisper."

Hammond would have liked to make his distaste clear, but couldn't risk offending Denny. "I'd like to know who lives at an address. I'll give you it tomorrow."

That was one reason why as soon as he reached home he tramped upstairs and took Tales of the Ghostly off the shelf. It came so readily it might have been waiting for him. He was sure the smell in the room was stronger. The book wasn't staying where he slept if it smelled that strong. In the kitchen he copied Hettie Close's address onto the message pad for which he never seemed to have any messages, then wrote his name and address on the flyleaf under hers and her trail of dates. He left the book in the front room while he fed himself his eggs and toast and cereal, wondering what second thoughts she might have in store for him. Once upon a time she'd found The Song in the Church "Uplifting", but how much had she changed her mind?

In the story a mother returned to churchgoing after the loss of her only child and came to believe that the highest voice in the choir was her daughter's. Having secreted herself in the church overnight, she heard the child alone. Next morning she was found dead, lying on a pew, smiling peacefully. "Smile while you can," Hettie Close had scrawled in ink almost as faded as the print above it. "Smile like the skull you'll be, you fool, before you're worse than bones."

Not only the sentiment dismayed Hammond. His memory must be succumbing to age, because he'd been convinced that each story was followed by far fewer handwritten words. Perhaps this one was the exception; he wasn't yielding to the urge to find out. He took down a shaky tome about ancient Greece, replacing it with Tales of the Ghostly, and tried to immerse himself in legends he'd loved to hear and then read as a child.

Tonight he found them too concerned with the underworld, with people who wouldn't stay dead. The idea struck him as both childish and distressing. He nodded over the book and jerked awake convinced he'd heard restlessness somewhere near. He left the book on the couch and climbed the stairs under the bulb that had taken on some of the colour of old paper. He tried to read himself to sleep with Dickens, and then just to sleep, but kept being roused by an impression that there was movement downstairs he couldn't quite hear. Even if only the smell of books was looming over him, in the dark that felt close to solid.

Next morning it was mostly the prospect of speaking to Denny that urged him out of bed and to the office. But Denny was late, and hid his face from Mrs Middler with a heap of files he tried to pretend he'd spent time selecting. Hammond barely waited until her scowl at Denny subsided. "Did you find out what I asked you?" he said low.

"Are you after an old girl, Mr Hammond?" Charl suggested.

"Close," Denny said.

Hammond forgot to keep his voice down. "What are you getting at? What do you mean?"

"The woman who lives there," Denny told him, "she's called Margaret Close."

Charl gave Hammond a secret grin while Mrs Middler's disapproval threatened not to remain mute. Once he was on his knees by Denny, Hammond risked whispering "Did you get a phone number?"

"Obviously," Denny muttered, yanking a folded slip of paper out of a pocket of his jeans along with a bony cigarette he quickly hid.

Nobody was supposed to make personal phone calls from the office, let alone long distance, and nobody as menial as Hammond had a phone at all. The nearest public phone was at least a mile away and unlikely to be intact. He willed Mrs Middler not to stay in the office at lunchtime, and almost sighed aloud when he saw her don her coat. He gave her five minutes away from the building and sat at her desk, ignoring Denny and Charl. As he dialled he feared Margaret Close would be out at work, but the distant bell was stilled before it had finished ringing thrice. "Hello?" a woman's voice said.

He had to take a deliberate breath. "Is that Mrs Close, or is it Ms?"

"I'm the only one there is. It's Ms."

She sounded far too young to have written any of the comments in the book. "Someone else of that name used to live there, didn't they?"

"Were you a friend of my mother's?"

"In, well, I suppose you might say in a kind of a sense," Hammond said, and immediately thought he shouldn't have.

"Are you the man she was always hoping would come back?"

"I never knew her."

"Not you, then. She carried on hoping to the end. Someone she thought she should have spent her life with. Maybe she found him waiting if that's possible. We can't know, can we?"

Hammond felt he wasn't expected to respond, but the next question was sharper. "So what's your interest in her?"

"I've got a book of hers."

"Which book is that? Don't tell me. She's in it, isn't she?"

"You could say that."

"All over it. I know the one. I sold all her books at the market. How much did you pay for it?" the daughter said, and interrupted any answer. "Forget it, I don't want to know."

He had no idea what else to say. After a pause the daughter said "I'm still not getting why you called."

"I suppose I just wondered if you could tell me anything about her or the book. As you say, it seems so full of her."

"That's how she was. You always knew when she was about or even on her way. She'd make sure you did."

"Knew," Hammond ventured to ask, "or know?"

"She's gone. She isn't here, anyway." With some briskness the daughter said "You wanted me to tell you about the book."

"If there's anything to tell."

"She died with it by her bed, if that's what you mean. Presumably realising he hardly could, Ms Close said "She thought the writers back then knew how it was going to be when you were dead, the Victorians with all their spirit stuff, you understand. I tried to make her see once they were just stories, and we had a bad argument even for us."

Hammond had thought of nothing he could say when the daughter admitted "I hope she found what she expected if there's any finding to be done."

"She didn't."

He hardly knew he'd spoken, the thought was so immediate. "I beg your pardon?" Ms Close said, not begging at all.

"Sorry, I shouldn't have—I've got to go," Hammond said and did, not soon enough. Mrs Middler had sailed into view under the clock, carrying a bag of lunch from a salad bar. He retreated to his desk and tried to look as if he'd been there all the time. As she dumped her lunch on her desk, however, her stare provoked him to say "Just borrowing a paper-clip."

Only her stare answered him, and could be avoided by lowering his head. He didn't speak to anyone throughout the afternoon—he was trying to decide whether he wanted to rush home or delay that as long as possible. The end of work was bearing down on him when Mrs Middler tapped on her desk with a pen. "Mr Hammond."

"I'm here."

"Better be over here unless you want everybody knowing what I have to say."

He watched her jab a stubby silver-varnished fingernail at a column of figures, then at another. "You passed these, Mr Hammond, and they're wrong. You'd have had this lady getting a refund she wasn't entitled to and this gentleman paying hundreds of pounds too much back tax. I hope you aren't too old to keep your mind on your job."

He might have kept his peace except for that. "There are more important things than money," he blurted.

"Perhaps you wouldn't think so if you weren't earning any." Apparently in case that wasn't enough of a threat, she added "And don't let me see you sniffing round my desk for stationery again without asking, never mind taking any home."

Another retort found its way to his lips. "I can think of a lot better uses for paper."

Denny had to snort and Charl to giggle under cover of her hand before he realised what he might have seemed to say. He no longer cared. He turned his back on Mrs Middler's incredulous glare and, having retrieved his coat from the hook by the tea urn, marched out of the office.

At least she'd made him eager to go home. In the act of opening the front door he almost called "Hello?" He wasn't surprised to find Tales of the Ghostly sprawled face down on the front-room carpet as though exhausted by its latest effort. It was more unexpected that the pages on which it lay open had nothing extra written on them. He was examining the book when it seemed to waken in his hand. As he dropped it on the table and tried to rub off his fingertips the sensation of having touched flesh that ought not to have stirred, the front cover fell open. Unlike Hettie Close, he hadn't written a date after his name and address, but one was there now, in a script so large and clumsy as to suggest that the writer was no longer able to see or the writer's hand, if it was one still, to control the scrawl. The date was today's.

He stared until it appeared to writhe, and then he turned the pages with a fingernail. Soon he sucked in a breath and did his best to expel its musty rotten taste. The comment following The Gay Dancers had been expanded. After "Lies the living want to believe" words in a larger looser version of the handwriting occupied the rest of the page. "Lies you do, Thomas Hammond."

That was too personal, too aggressive, too close. He tugged the cuffs of his coat over his hands so as to carry the book to the kitchen table, where he used an old redundant knife and fork to turn the pages. The comment at the end of The Path by the Churchyard was no longer just "Falsehood and foolishness". The scribble that almost spilled over the margins added "The path leads to me, Tommy boy."

"Good luck to it," Hammond muttered, flicking pages over. Every tale was followed by an extra message now, and even those that didn't include a version of his name seemed aimed at him. The ink on those pages was faded as though drained in order to compose the scrawl. The message at the end of the last story was the most uncontrolled in both handwriting and content. "Don't keep me waiting here in the dark long, old Tom."

He slammed the book shut and stared at its tattered back cover. He didn't know if he was challenging some movement to take place or doing his best to prevent it. When his eyes began to twitch he saw to his dinner while continuing to watch the book. As he ate he grew aware that Hettie Close no longer could. A sense of her hunger sickened him, so that he scraped half his dinner into the bin and abandoned the utensils in the sink.

He'd forgotten to remove his coat, but the house felt too cold for him to do without. He trapped Tales of the Ghostly between his cuffs again to transfer the book to his father's armchair, where he could keep an eye on it while he read something else—except that all the favourites he attempted to read, and the inscriptions in them, seemed unreachably remote. Before long he returned to staring at the book propped on the chair.

As the hours passed he began to suspect it of restraining itself until it was unobserved. Once he lurched at it and thumbed through it, but nothing appeared to have changed, except that when he slumped back into his chair he thought the smell of more than ageing followed him. Did that herald another transformation? By the time he wondered that, he was as disinclined to stir as the book seemed to be. Only his eyelids could move, and only to droop. He tried to keep them up until he forgot to keep trying.

A secretive movement wakened him. Tales of the Ghostly had fallen on its face, and the back cover was wide open. As he wobbled to his feet he saw writing on the rear flyleaf. He was stumbling around his father's chair when the ungainly ill-proportioned scrawl grew clear. "Come to me now, old Hammy, or I'll come to you."

"No you won't," Hammond retorted, "and don't call me Hammy either." Nobody ever had. He seized the book by its rear board and snatched it up, its pages flapping. He was about to thrust it into the space on the shelf when he thought he felt it writhe like some part of a withered body not quite dead. "You won't do that to me again," he yelled, ripping the pages loose from the spine, crumpling them into a wad he pitched into the dusty fireplace. "Let's see you get up to any tricks now," he said, hurling the boards into the fireplace. When there was no response beyond a feeble restlessness of paper that subsided as he watched, he stumped upstairs to bed.

He left the bedroom door ajar in case he heard any mischief downstairs. He almost kept the light on until fury at his own childishness made him tug the cord. He lay listening for indications of stealth in the dark until sleep found him. He dreamed that far too old a woman—so old that she was doing without most of her face—had set about crawling up the stairs to him without employing any limbs. As he saw the ragged brownish lump of a head waver above the edge of a stair, then over the next higher, he struggled to waken before he could see it in more detail. He managed to produce a strangled cry, and the object, as misshapen as it was determined, vanished from within his eyelids. When he opened them, however, if was beside him on the pillow.

Even if it was composed of crumpled paper, it had a crooked tongueless grin that gaped wide as he shrank back in the tangle of blankets. He wasn't trying to escape only the mockery of a head. In the twilight before dawn he could just distinguish that the print was fading from the pages while a mist as dark as ink seeped out of them. He hadn't disentangled himself from the bedclothes when the mist rushed into his eyes, filling them with blackness.

He'd hardly begun to cry out with the stinging of his eyes when it ceased. In another moment they cleared, and he tasted ink. On the pillow was nothing but a shapeless wad of paper. Its smell was in his nostrils and then deeper in him. He felt his hands tighten into claws and drag him upright against the headboard. He felt his lips part as the gap in the wad of paper had. "I'm alive," he said, or his mouth did, in a voice delighted to rediscover itself. "I'm alive."

2000

No End Of Fun

"2000 saw me complete just one short story, No End of Fun, a tribute to a J. K. Potter picture (the mirror, of course, though his image isn't of a mirror)."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the 2003 reissue of Told By The Dead

Written in: 2000
First published in J. K. Potter's Embrace The Mutation, 2002
Also published in: Told By The Dead

You don't mind, do you, Uncle Lionel? I've given you mother's old room."

"Why should I mind anything to do with Dorothy?"

"I expect you've got happy memories like us. Is it all right if Helen sees you up? Only we've got paying guests arriving any minute."

"You really ought to let me pay something towards my keep."

"You mustn't think I meant that. Mother never let you and I'm not about to start. Just keep Helen amused like always and that'll be more than enough. Helen, don't let my uncle lug that case."

"Are you helping with the luggage now, Helen? Will that be a bit much for you?"

"I've done bigger ones."

"That sounds a bit cheeky, doesn't it, Carol? The sort of thing the comics used to say at the Imperial. Is that old place still alive? That can be one of your treats then, Helen."

"Say thank you, Helen, and will you please take up that case. Here are the boarders now."

When the thirteen-year-old thrust her fingers through the handle, Lionel let it go. "You're a treasure," he murmured, but she was apparently too intent on stumping upstairs to give him his usual smile. Remarking "She's a credit to you" brought him no more than a straight-lipped nod from her mother. He had to admit to himself that Helen's new image—all her curls cropped into auburn turf, denim overalls so oversized he would have assumed they'd been handed down if she'd had an older sibling—had rather startled him. "So how have you been progressing at school?" he said as he caught up with her, and in an attempt to sound less dusty, "You can call me Lionel if you like."

"Mum wouldn't let me."

"Better make it uncle, then, even if it's not quite right. Great-uncle is a mouthful, isn't it, though you liked it one year, didn't you? You said I was the greatest one you had, not that there was any competition."

All this, uttered slowly and with pauses inviting but obtaining no responses, brought them to the third floor, where he held onto the banister and regained his breath while Helen preceded him into the room. Dorothy's sheets had been replaced by a duvet as innocently white, but otherwise the place seemed hardly to have changed since her girlhood, when children weren't expected to personalise their rooms: the same hulking oaken wardrobe and chest of drawers she'd inherited at Helen's age along with Dorothy's grandmother's room, the view of boarding houses boasting of their fullness, the only mirror her grandmother's on the windowsill. As he stepped into the July sunlight that had gathered like an insubstantial faintly lavender-scented weight in the room, he thought he saw Dorothy in the mirror.

It was Helen, of course. She resembled Dorothy more than Carol ever had —elfin ears, full lower lip, nose as emphatic as an exclamation mark, eyes deep with secrets. As she dumped Lionel's suitcase by the bed, the mirror wobbled with the impact. The oval glass was supported by two pairs of marble hands, each brace joined at the wrists; the lower of the left hands was missing its little finger. He lurched forward to steady the mirror, and his arm brushed the front of Helen's overalls. He expected the material to yield, and the presence of two plump mounds of flesh came as more than a shock.

She twisted away from him, and her face reappeared in the mirror, grimacing. For a moment it exactly fitted the oval. The sight set his heart racing as though a knot of memories had squeezed it. "Sorry," he mumbled, and "I'll see you at dinner" as she slouched out of the room.

Laying his socks and underwear in Dorothy's chest of drawers and dressing her padded hangers in his shirts and suits made him wonder if that was more intimate than she would have liked. By the time he'd finished he was oppressively hot. He donned the bathrobe that was waiting for him every year and hurried to the attic bathroom, to be confronted by a crowd of Carol's and Helen's tights pegged to a clothesline over the bath as though to demonstrate two stages of growth. Not caring to touch them, he retreated to his room and transferred the mirror to the chest of drawers so as to raise the sash as high as it would wobble. Hours of sunlight had left the marble hands not much less warm than flesh.

He might have imagined he heard the screams of people drowning if he hadn't recognised the waves as the swoops of a roller coaster. Soon he was able to hear the drowsing of the sea. Its long, slow breaths were soothing him when he saw a passerby remove her topmost head. She'd lifted her small daughter from her shoulders, but the realisation came too late to prevent Lionel from remembering a figure that had parted into prancing segments. He lay down hastily and made himself breathe in time with the sea until the summons of the dinner gong resounded through the house.

Even in their early teens he and his cousin had squabbled over who sounded the gong, until Dorothy's mother had kept the task for herself. While it was meant to call only the guests, it reminded him that he didn't know when he was expected for dinner. He was changing, having resprayed his armpits, when a rap at the door arrested him with trousers halfway up his greying thighs. "Would you mind taking dinner with the others?" Carol called. "We're not as organised as mother yet."

"I'd be happy to wait till you have yours."

"We eat on the trot at the moment. You'd be helping."

In the dining room a table in the corner farthest from the window was set for one. All his fellow diners were married couples at least his age. A few bade him a wary good evening, but otherwise none of the muted conversations came anywhere near him. He felt like a teacher attempting to ignore a murmurous classroom, not that he ever would have. As soon as he'd finished dinner—thin soup, cold ham and salad, brown bread and butter, a rotund teapot harbouring a single bag, a pair of cakes on a stand, everything Dorothy used to serve—he followed Helen into the kitchen. "Would you be terribly upset if we didn't go anywhere tonight?" he said.

"Don't suppose."

"Only driving up from London isn't the picnic it was."

"She wouldn't have been joining you anyway. It's dirty sheet night," Carol said, wrinkling her nose.

He did all the washing up he could grab, and would have helped Helen trudge to the machine in the basement with armfuls of bedclothes if Carol hadn't urged him to tell her his news. Now that he'd retired from teaching there wasn't much besides the occasional encounter with an ex-pupil, and so he encouraged Carol to talk. When her patient responses betrayed that she regarded his advice about the multitude of petty problems she'd inherited with the boarding house as at best uninformed, he pleaded tiredness and withdrew to his room.

At first exhaustion wouldn't let him sleep. Though he left the window open, the heat insisted on sharing his bed, Dorothy's ever since she was Helen's age. He found himself wishing he hadn't arrived for the funeral last December too late to see her. "We never said goodbye," he whispered into the pillow and wrapped his arms around himself, covering his flaccid hairy dugs.

He wakened in the middle of the night and also of the heat with the notion that Dorothy had grown an unreasonable number of legs. He raised himself on his elbows to peer sleepily about, and realised she was staring at him. Of course it was her oval photograph, except that there was no picture of her in the room. As he jerked upright he saw her face balanced on the marble hands, crammed into the mirror. She looked outraged, unable to believe her fate.

Lionel snatched at the overhead cord to drag light into the room. The mirror was deserted apart from a patch of wallpaper whose barely discernible pattern gave him the impression of gazing straight through the frame at the wall. When the illusion refused to be dispelled he turned the light off, trying not to feel he'd used it to drive Dorothy into the dark. She was gone wherever everyone would end up, that was all; how could dreaming summon her back? Nevertheless he felt as guilty as the only other time he'd seen her in the mirror.

It had been the year when she'd kept being late for dinner. One evening her mother had sent him to fetch her. He'd swaggered into Dorothy's room without knocking; they'd never knocked at each other's doors. Although it wasn't dark the curtains had been drawn, and at first he'd been unsure what he saw—Dorothy stooping to watch her face in the oval mirror as she'd squeezed her budding breasts. While she hadn't been naked, her white slip had let the muted light glow between her legs. The smile of pride and quiet astonishment she had been sharing with herself had transformed itself into an accusing glare as she'd caught sight of him in the mirror. "Go away," she'd cried, "this is my room," as Lionel fled, his entire body pounding like an exposed heart. He hadn't dared venture downstairs until he'd heard her precede him.

The breakfast gong quieted his memories at last. In the bathroom he was relieved to find the tights had flown. He showered away most of his coating of mugginess. and thought he was ready for the day until he opened the kitchen door to hear Carol tell Helen "You're not to go anywhere near him, is that understood?"

Surely she couldn't mean Lionel, but he would have been tempted to sidle out of reach of the idea if she hadn't given him a wink behind Helen's eloquently sulky back. "A boyfriend she's too young to have," she said. "Do you mind sitting where you did again?"

Lionel had hoped they could have breakfast together, but tried to seem happy to head for the dining room. "Morning all," he declared, and when that stirred no more than muted echoes "I'm her uncle, should anyone be wondering."

Did explaining his presence only render it more questionable or suggest he thought it was? He restrained himself from explaining that Carol had divorced her husband once she'd resolved to move in with her ageing mother. He made rather shorter work of his breakfast than his innards found ideal so that he could escape to the kitchen. "Are we going for a roam?" he asked Helen as he set about washing up.

"Too many rooms to change," Carol said at once. "Maybe we can let her out this evening if you can think how to occupy her."

He strolled up to the elongated Victorian garden that was the promenade and clambered down a set of thick hot stone steps to the beach. The sand was beginning to sprout turrets around families who'd staked out their territories with buckets and spades the colours of lollipops. He paced alongside the subdued withdrawn waves until screams rose from the amusement park ahead, and then he laboured up another block of steps to the Imperial.

The theatre was displaying posters for the kind of summer show it always had: comedians, singers, dancers, a magician. It took the mostly blonde girl in the ticket booth some moments to pause her chewing gum and see off a section of her handful of paperback, which was proportionately almost as stout as its reader. When she said "Can I help you?" she sounded close to refusing in advance.

"Could you tell me whether there are any, you won't take offence if I call them dwarfs?"

She met that with a grimace she supplemented by bulging her cheek with her tongue. "Any..."

"Small performers. You know, a troupe of dinky fellows. They used to perform here when I was a child. I don't know if you'd have anything like them these days." When she only tongued her cheek more fiercely he grew desperate. "Tiny Tumblers, one lot were called," he insisted. "Squat little chaps."

"The only little people we've got are Miss Merritt's Moppets."

"That's fine, then," Lionel said with an alacrity she appeared to find suspicious. "Any chance of a pair of your best seats for tomorrow night?"

"Best for what?"

For persuading Carol to give Helen an evening off, he hoped; she was working the child harder than Dorothy had ever worked her. "For watching, I should think," he said.

From the theatre he wandered inland. Behind the large hotels facing the sea a parallel row of bed and breakfast houses kept to themselves. Victorian shopping arcades led between them to the main street, which was clinging to its elegance. Among the tea shops and extravagant department stores, not a pub nor an amusement arcade was to be seen. Crowds of the superannuated were taking all the time they could to progress from one end of the street to the other, while those that were wheeling or being wheeled traversed the wide pavements more slowly still. When Lionel discovered that matching the speed of the walkers made him feel prematurely old, or perhaps not so prematurely, he turned aside into the park that stretched opposite half the shops.

Folding chairs could be hired from a spindly lugubrious youth decorated with a moustache like two transplanted eyebrows. Lionel plumped himself and the swelling that was breakfast onto a chair close to the bandstand. The afternoon concert was preceded by an open-air theatre of toddlers on the lawns and secretaries with lunchboxes, a spectacle he found soporific. By the time the elderly musicians in their dinner jackets assembled on the bandstand, he was dozing off.

A medley of Viennese waltzes failed to rouse him, as did portions of Mozart and Mendelssohn. He was past being able to raise his head when the orchestra struck up a piece he would have thought too brash to win the applause, much of it gloved, of the pensioned audience. Though he couldn't name the opera responsible, he recognised the music. It was the Dance of the Tumblers. Far from wakening him, it let a memory at him.

A few days after he'd seen Dorothy at the mirror, her mother had taken her and Lionel to the Imperial. She'd made them sit together as if that might crush whatever had come between them, but Dorothy had sat aside from him, knees protruding into the aisle. She had seemed to take half the evening to eat a tub of ice cream, until the scraping of the wooden spoon had started to grate on his nerves. As she'd lifted yet another delicate mouthful to her lips, the master of ceremonies had announced the Tiny Tumblers, and then her spoon had halted in mid-air. Two giant women had waddled onstage from the wings.

He'd never known if Dorothy had cowered against her seat because of their size or from guessing what was imminent. The long-haired square-faced figures had swayed to the footlights before the flowered ankle-length dresses had split open, each of them disgorging a totem-pole composed of three dwarfs in babies' frilly outfits. The dwarfs had sprung from one another's shoulders, leaving the dresses to collapse under the weight of the wigs, and piled down the stairs that flanked the stage. "Who's coming for a tumble?" they'd croaked.

Lionel had felt Dorothy flinch away from the aisle, pressing against him. If she'd asked he would have changed places with her, but he'd thought he sensed how loath she was to touch him after his glimpse in her room. As two dwarfs had scurried towards her, swivelling their blocky heads and widening their eyes, he'd dealt her a covert shove. Her lurch and her squeak had attracted the attention of the foremost dwarf, who'd shambled fast at her. She'd jumped up, spilling ice cream over the lap of her skirt, and fled to the sanctuary of the Ladies'. Her mother had needed to ask Lionel more than once to let her past to follow, he remembered with dismay. Part of him had wanted to find out what would happen if the dwarfs caught his cousin.

He came back to himself before the thought could reach deeper. He'd grown unaware of the music in the park, and now there was only clapping. He was awakened less by the discreet peal than by a sense that his body was about to expel some element it was no longer able to contain. His midriff strained itself up from the chair as the secret escaped him—a protracted vibrant belch that the applause faded just in time to isolate.

He excused himself as quickly and as blindly as he could—he had a childish half-awake notion that if he didn't see he wouldn't be seen either—but not before he glimpsed couples staring as if he'd strayed from the Imperial, which they barely tolerated for its appeal to tourists. Several pensioners on the main street frowned at his excessively boisterous progress, but he was anxious to take refuge in his room. Since Carol and Helen were busy in the kitchen, only shortness of breath delayed him on the stairs. He manhandled the door open and slumped against it, but took just one step towards the bed.

Whoever had tidied up had returned the mirror to the windowsill. It must be himself he could see in the oval glass, even if the face appeared to recede faster than he stumbled forward. Presumably his having rushed back to the hotel made him see the face dwindle beyond sight, carried helplessly into a blackness that had no basis in the room. He rubbed his eyes hard, and once the fog cleared he saw nothing in the mirror except his own confused face.

The marble hands had stored up warmth. They brought back the touch of flesh, which he'd avoided since losing his parents, not that he'd encountered much of it while they were alive. He planted the hands on the chest of drawers and turned the glass to the wall, then lay on top of the duvet, trying harder and more unsuccessfully to relax than he ever had after a day's teaching, until the gong sent its vibrations through his nerves.

He didn't eat much. Besides being wary of conjuring another belch, he felt though someone who knew more about him than he realised was observing him. When he took the last of his plates into the kitchen, Carol gave him a harassed disappointed blink. "Dinner was excellent," he assured her, though it had been something of a repeat performance of last night's, with cold beef understudying ham. "I'm just not very peckish. I expect I'm too excited at the prospect of a date with my favourite young lady."

"Do you still want to go out with my uncle tonight?"

Helen had kept her back to his comment, but turned with a quick bright smile. "Yes please, Uncle Lionel."

That was more like the girl he remembered. It lasted as far as the street, where he said "Shall we just go for an amble?"

"To the rides."

"Best save those till I've been to the bank."

"I've got some money. If we aren't going to the rides I don't want to go."

He felt as if she knew he'd manufactured his excuse. "It's your treat," he said.

All the way along the promenade he had to remind himself that the screams from the tracks etched high on the glassy sunset expressed pleasure. The sight beyond the entrance to the amusement park of painted horses bobbing like flotsam on an ebb tide provided some relief. He halted by the old roundabout to regain his breath. "Shall we," he said, and "go on here?"

Helen squashed her lower lip flat with its twin. "That's for babies."

He might have retorted that she hadn't seemed to think so last year, but said "What shall it be, then?"

"The Cannonball."

"I thought you didn't care for roller coasters any more than I do."

"That was when I was little. I like it now, and the Plunge of Peril, and Annihilation."

"Will you be awfully offended if I watch?"

"No." The starkness of the word appeared to rouse her pity for him, since she added "You can win me something, Uncle Lionel."

He felt obliged to see her safely onto the roller coaster. Once she was installed in the middle carriage, next to a boy with an increasingly red face and the barest vestige of hair, Lionel headed for the sideshows. Too many of the prizes were composed of puffed-up rubber for his taste—he remembered a pink horse whose midriff had burst between his adolescent legs, dumping him in the sea—but they were out of reach of his skill. He had yet to ring a single bell or cast a quoit onto a hook when Helen indicated she was bound for the Plunge of Peril.

He was determined to win her a present. Eventually rolling several pounds' worth of balls down a chute towards holes intermittently exposed by a perforated strip of wood gained him an owl of shaggy orange cloth. He would have felt more triumphant if he hadn't realised he'd betrayed that he wouldn't have needed to go to the bank. He was just in time to see Helen leave the Plunge of Peril.

She glanced about but didn't notice him behind a bunch of teddy bears pegged by their cauliflower ears. As he watched through the tangle of legs she shared a swift kiss with her companion, the red-faced boy crowned with grey skin, and tugged him in the direction of a virtually vertical roller coaster. Lionel didn't intervene, not even when they staggered off the ride, though he was unsure whether he was being discreet or spying on them or at a loss how to approach them. He was pursuing them through the crowds when their way was blocked by two figures with the night gaping where their faces ought to be.

They were life-size cartoons of a man and a woman sufficiently ill-dressed to be homeless, painted on a flat with their faces cut out for the public to insert their own. Lionel saw Helen scamper to poke hers out above the woman's body. Her grimace was meant to be funny—she was protruding at the boy the tongue she'd recently shared with him—but Lionel realised that too late to keep quiet. "Don't," he cried.

For a moment Helen's face looked trapped by the oval. Perhaps her eyes were lolling leftward to send the boy that way, since that was the direction in which he absented himself. She emerged so innocently it angered Lionel. "I think it's time we went back to your mother," he said, and thrust the owl at Helen as she mooched after him. "This was for you."

"Thanks." On the promenade she lowered a mournful gaze to the dwarfish button-eyed rag-beaked soft-clawed orange lump, and then she risked saying, "Are you going to tell Mum?"

"Can you offer me any reason why I shouldn't?"

"Because she'd never let me see Brandon again."

"I thought that was already supposed to be the arrangement."

"But I love him," Helen protested, and began to weep.

"Good heavens now, no need for that. You can't be in love at your age." The trouble was that he had no idea when it was meant to start; it never had for him. "Do stop it, there's a good girl," he pleaded as couples bound for the amusement park began to frown more at him than Helen, and applied himself to taking some control. "I really don't like being used when I haven't even been consulted."

"I won't ever again, I promise."

"I'll hold you to it. Now can we make that the end of the tears? I shouldn't think you'd like your mother wondering what the tragedy is."

"I'll stop if you promise not to tell."

"We'll see."

He was ashamed to recognise that he might have undertaken more if she hadn't dabbed her eyes dry with the owl, leaving a wet patch suggesting that the bird had disgraced itself; should Carol learn of Helen's subterfuge she would also know he'd neglected to supervise her. Carol proved to be so intent on her business accounts that she simply transferred her glance of surprise from the clock to him. "I've a job for you as long as you're here," she told Helen, and Lionel took his sudden weariness to his room.

As he fumbled for the light switch he heard a scream. It sounded muffled, presumably by glass—by the window. He couldn't tell whether it signified delight or dismay or a confusion of both, but he would have preferred not to be greeted by it. A memory was waiting to claim him once he huddled under the quilt in the dark.

Yet had he done anything so dreadful? Days after the incident at the Imperial, her mother had taken him and Dorothy to the amusement park. On the Ghost Train his cousin had sat as far from him as the bench would allow, though when the skull-faced car had blundered into the daylight they'd pretended to be chums for her mother's camera. For her benefit they'd lent their faces to the painted couple, ancestors of the pair behind which Helen had posed. Lionel had been growing impatient with the pretence and with Dorothy's covert hostility when he'd seen all six dwarfs, dapper in suits and disproportionately generous ties, strutting towards them.

He must have been too young to imagine how she might feel, otherwise he would surely have restrained himself. He'd grabbed her shoulders, wedging her head in the oval. "Look, Dorothy," he'd whispered hotly in her ear, "they're coming for you." In what had seemed to him mere seconds he'd released her, though not before her struggles had caused her dress to ride up, exposing more of her thighs than he'd glimpsed in her room. As she'd dashed into the darkness behind the cartoon he'd heard her mother calling "Where's Lionel? Where are you going, Dorothy? What's up now?"

In time nothing much was, Lionel reassured himself: otherwise Dorothy wouldn't have invited him to spend summers at the boarding house after she'd inherited it. Or was it quite so straightforward? He'd always thought that, having forgotten their contentious summer, she had both taken pity on his solitariness and looked to him for company once Carol had married and Dorothy's husband had succumbed to an early heart attack, but now it occurred to him that she had kept him away from her daughter. He withdrew beneath the covers as if they could hide him from his undefined guilt, and eventually sleep joined him.

He thought walking by the sea might clear his head of whatever was troubling him. There was just one family on the beach. He assumed they were quite distant until he noticed the parents were dwarfs and the children pocket versions of them. They must work in a circus, for all of their faces were painted with grins wider than their mouths, even the face of the baby that was knocking down sandcastles as it crawled about. Lionel had to toil closer, dragging his inflated toy, before he understood that the family was laughing at him. When he followed their gazes he found he was clutching by one breast the life-size naked rubber woman he'd brought to the beach.

He writhed himself awake, feeling that his mind had only started to reveal its depths. As he tried to rediscover sleep he heard a scratching at the window. It must be a bird, though it sounded like fingernails on glass, not even in that part of the room. When it wasn't repeated he managed to find his way back to sleep.

He felt he hadn't by breakfast time. Being glanced at by more people than bade him good morning left him with the impression that he looked guilty of his dream. There wasn't much more of a welcome in the kitchen, where a disagreement had evidently occurred. When Carol met his eyes while Helen didn't, he said "She'll be all right for this evening, won't she?"

"Quite a few things aren't all right. I'm afraid. Torn serviettes, for a start, and tablecloths not clean that should be." She was aiming her voice upwards as if to have it fall more heavily on Helen. "We've standards to keep up," she said.

"I think they're as high as your mother's ever were, so don't drive yourself so hard. You deserve a night or two off. Is the show at the Imperial your kind of diversion?"

"More like my idea of hell."

"Then you won't be jealous if I take Helen tonight? I've got tickets."

"You might have said sooner."

"You were busy."

"Exactly."

"I think you could both benefit from taking it easier. You and your mother managed, didn't you?"

Carol unloaded a tray into the sink with a furious clatter and twisted to face him. "You've no idea what she was like when you weren't here. Used me harder than this one ever is, and my dad as well, poor little man. No wonder he had a heart attack."

Lionel had forgotten how diminutive Dorothy's husband had been, and hadn't time to brood about it now. "Let me hold the fort while you two have an evening out," he said.

"Thanks for the offer, but this place is our responsibility. Make that mine." Carol sighed at this or as a preamble to muttering "Take her as long as you've bought tickets. As you say, I'll just have to manage."

He thought it best to respond to that with no more than a sympathetic grimace and to keep clear of her and Helen for a while. He stayed in his room no longer than was necessary to determine he had nothing to wear that would establish a holiday mood. He bought a defiantly luxuriant shirt from a shop in a narrow back street to which the town seemed reluctant to own up, and wandered with the package to the park, where he found a bench well away from the bandstand in case any of the musicians identified him as yesterday's eructating spectator. The eventual concert repeated its predecessor, which might have allowed him to catch up on his sleep if he hadn't been nervous of dreaming—of learning what his mind required unconsciousness to acknowledge it contained.

It was close to dinner time when he ventured back to his room. Rather than examine his appearance, he left the mirror with its back to him. His new shirt raised eyebrows and lowered voices in the dining room. At least Carol said "You're looking bright," which would have heartened him more if she hadn't rebuked Helen: "I hope you'll be dressing for the occasion as well."

Perhaps Helen had changed her black T-shirt and denim overalls and chubby shoes when he found her waiting on the pavement outside; he couldn't judge. He told her she looked a picture, and thought she was responding when she mumbled "Uncle Lionel?"

"At your service."

She peered sideways at him. "Will you be sad if I don't come with you?"

"I would indeed."

"I told Brandon last night I'd meet him. I wouldn't have if you'd said you'd got tickets."

"But you've known all day."

"I couldn't call him. Mum might have heard."

"You mustn't expect me to keep covering up for you." Lionel supposed he sounded unreasonable, having previously complained of not being let into the secret. "Very well, just this once," he said to forestall the moisture that had gathered in her eyes. "You two go and I'll meet you at the end of the performance."

"No, you. You like it."

It was clear she no longer did. "Where will you be?" he said, and immediately "Never mind. I don't want to know. Just make certain you're waiting at the end."

"I will."

She might have kissed him, but instead ran across the promenade to her boyfriend. Lionel watched them clasp hands and hurry down a ramp to the beach. He stayed on the far side of the road so as not to glimpse them as he made for the Imperial.

The stout girl in the booth seemed even more suspicious of his returning a ticket than she had been of the purchase. At last she allowed him to leave it in case it could be resold. In the auditorium he had to sidle past a family with three daughters, loud in inverse proportion to their size. He was flattening a hand beside his cheek to ward off some of the clamour of his neighbour, the youngest, when someone tapped him on the shoulder. Seated behind him were two of Carol's guests: a woman with a small face drawn tight and pale by her sharp nose, her husband whose droopy empurpled features had yet more skin to spare underneath. "Will you be stopping this show too?" the woman said.

Could she have seen Dorothy chased by the dwarfs? "I don't," Lionel said warily, "ah..."

"We saw you at the concert yesterday."

"Heard me. you mean." When that fell short of earning him even a hint of a grin, Lionel said "I expect I'll be able to contain myself."

The man jabbed a stubby finger at the empty seat. "On your own?"

"Like yourselves."

"Our granddaughter's one of Miss Merritt's Moppets."

His tone was more accusing than Lionel cared to understand. "Good luck to her," he said, indifferent to whether he sounded sarcastic, and turned his back.

As the curtains parted, the child beside him turned her volume up. He put the empty seat between them, only to hear the sharp-nosed woman cough with displeasure and change seats with her husband. Before long Lionel's head began to ache with trying not to wonder how Helen and her boyfriend were behaving, and he couldn't enjoy the show. He squirmed in his seat as the moppets in their white tutus pranced onstage. At least they weren't dwarfs, he thought and squirmed again, growing red-faced as another cough was aimed at him.

He had no wish to face the couple at the end of the show. He remained seated until he realised they might see Helen outside and mention it to Carol. He struggled up the packed aisle and succeeded in leaving the theatre before they did. Helen was waiting on the chipped marble steps. She half turned, and he saw she was in tears. "Oh dear," he murmured, "what now?"

"We had a fight."

"An argument, I trust you mean." When she nodded or her head slumped, he said "I'm sure it'll turn out to be just a hiccup." She only turned away, leaving him to whisper "Shall we hurry home? We don't want anybody knowing you were meant to be with me."

They were opposite the ramp down which she'd vanished with her boyfriend when she began to sob. Lionel urged her over to the far corner of her street while Carol's guests passed by. Once they'd had ample time to reach their room and Helen's sobs had faltered into silence he said "Will you be up to going in now, do you think?"

"I'll have to be, won't I?"

Her maturity both impressed and disconcerted him. Each of them pulled out a key, and he would have made a joke of it if he'd been sure she would respond. He let her open the front door and followed her in, only to flinch from bumping into her. Carol and the couple from the theatre were talking in the hall.

They fell silent and gazed at the newcomers. As Lionel struggled to decide whether he should hurry upstairs or think of a comment it would be crucial for him to make, the sharp-nosed woman said "I see you found yourself a young companion after all."

Her husband cleared his throat. Presumably he thought it helpful to tell Carol "My wife means he was on his own at the show."

Carol stared at Helen and then shifted her disapproval to Lionel. Her face grew blank before she told them "I think you should both go to bed. I'll have plenty to say in the morning."

"Mummy..."

"Don't," Carol said, even more harshly when Lionel tried to intervene.

"I think we'd better do as we're told," he advised Helen, and trudged upstairs ahead of her. Just now his room offered more asylum than anywhere else in the house., and he attempted to hide in his bed and the dark. His guilt was lying in wait for him—his realisation that rather than make up for anything he might have done to Dorothy, he'd let down both Carol and Helen. He heard Helen shut her door with a dull suppressed thud and listened apprehensively for her mother's footfall on the stairs. He'd heard nothing further when exhaustion allowed sleep to overtake him.

A muffled cry roused him. Heat and darkness made him feel afloat in a stagnant bath. As he strained his ears for a repetition of the cry he was afraid that it might have been Helen's—that he'd caused her mother to mistreat her in some way he winced from imagining. When he heard another sound he had to raise his shaky head before he could identify it. Some object was bumping rhythmically against glass.

He kicked off the quilt and stumbled to drag the curtains apart. There was nothing at the window, nothing to be seen through it except guest houses slumbering beyond a street lamp. He hauled the sash all the way up and leaned across the sill, but the street was deserted. He was peering along it when the muffled thumping recommenced behind him.

As he stalked towards it he refused to believe where it was coming from. He took hold of the mirror by its bunch of wrists, which not only felt unhealthily warm but also seemed to be vibrating slightly in time with the sound. He gripped them with both hands and turned the glass towards him. It was full of Dorothy's outraged face, glaring straight at him.

She was so intensely present that he could have thought there was no mirror, just her young woman's face balanced on the doubly-paralysed hands. More and worse than shock made his arms tremble, but he was unable to drop the mirror. In a moment Dorothy's forehead ceased thudding against the glass and shrank into it as though she was being hauled backwards. The ankle-length white dress she wore—the kind of garment in which he imagined she'd been buried—bulging vigorously in several places. He knew why before a dwarf's head poked up through the collar, ripping the fabric, to fasten on Dorothy's mouth. His outline made it clear that he'd shinnied up by holding onto her breasts. Her left sleeve tore, revealing the squarish foot of a dwarf who was inverted somewhere under the dress. Then she was borne away into darkness so complete she oughtn't to be visible, even for Lionel's benefit. He saw a confusion of feet scurrying beneath the hem. One pair vanished up the dress, and her body set about jerking in the rhythm of the dwarf who had clambered her back.

The worst thing was that Lionel recognised it all. It had lived in his mind for however many years, too deep for thought and so yet more powerful, and now Dorothy had become the puppet of his fantasy. He supposed that to be at his mercy the dwarfs were dead too. He didn't know if he was desperate to repudiate the spectacle or release the participants as he flung the mirror away from him.

It was toppling over the windowsill when he tried to snatch it back. He saw Dorothy's face plummeting out of reach as though he'd doubled her helplessness. As he craned over the sill, the button at the waist of his pyjamas snapped its thread. The mirror struck the roof of his Mini, which responded like a bass drum. One marble finger split off and skittered across the dent the impact had produced. The mirror tottered on the metal roof, and Lionel dashed out of the room.

He was scrabbling at the front-door latch while he clutched his trousers shut when he heard the mirror slide off the car and shatter. The chill of the concrete seized his bare feet like a premonition of how cold they would end up. The marble hands had been smashed into elegant slivers surrounded by fragments of glass, but the oval that had contained the mirror was intact. He hardly knew why he stooped to collect the glass in it. When his trousers sagged around his ankles he had no means of holding them up. Not until lights blazed between curtains above him did he realise that several of Carol's guests were gazing down at him.

In the morning Carol said very little to him beyond "I'm sorry you're leaving, but I won't have anyone in my house going behind my back."

This reminded him of his last glimpse of Dorothy, and he had to repress a hysterical laugh. He bumped his suitcase all the way downstairs in the hope that would bring Helen out of her room, but to no avail. "Shall I just go up and say goodbye?" he almost pleaded.

"Madam isn't receiving visitors at the moment."

He couldn't tell if that was Helen's decision or her mother's. He lugged the suitcase to the Mini and dumped it in the boot. "You're sure you don't mind if I take the mirror," he said.

"If you want to try and mend it, be my guest. I've never had any use for it," Carol said, doling him a token wave to speed him on his way before she shut herself in the house.

As the Mini backed onto the street he muttered "Here you go, old bones," crouching his lanky frame lower so that the dent in the roof didn't touch his scalp. On the seat beside him shards of glass stirred in the marble frame, but he could see nothing other than the underside of the roof in even the largest piece of mirror. He scarcely knew why he was taking the mirror with him; could it somehow help him gain control of the depths of his mind and let Dorothy go? The boarding house swung away behind him, and he wondered what the people in it might be thinking about him—worse, what they might be storing up about him unexamined in their minds. For the first time in all his years he dreaded living after death.

2001

Raised By The Moon

"Raised by the Moon was suggested by the boating lake at West Kirby. It's much like the area contained by the submerged wall in the story, although the town is nothing like the surroundings. Perhaps the creatures in the tale are distant cousins of the Deep Ones—we might call them the Shallowers."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the Weird Shadows Over Innsmouth

Written in: 2001
First published in Raised By The Moon, 2001 (Novelette)
Also published in: Just Behind You

It was the scenery that did for him. Having spent the afternoon in avoiding the motorway and enjoying the unhurried country route, Grant reached the foothills only to find the Cavalier refused to climb. He'd driven a mere few hundred yards up the first steep slope when the engine commenced groaning. He should have made time during the week to have it serviced, he thought, feeling like a child caught out by a teacher, except that teaching had shown him what was worse—to be a teacher caught out by a child. He dragged the lever into first gear and ground the accelerator under his heel. The car juddered less than a yard before helplessly backing towards its own smoke.

His surroundings grew derisively irrelevant: the hills quilted with fields, the mountains ridged with pines, the roundish moon trying out its whiteness in the otherwise blue sky. He managed to execute most of a turn as the car slithered backwards and sent it downhill past a Range Rover loaded with a family whose children turned to display their tongues to him. The July heat battered him as he swung the Cavalier onto a parched verge, where the engine hacked to itself while he glared at the map.

Half the page containing his location was crowded with the fingerprints of mountains. Only the coast was unhampered by their contours. He eased the car off the brown turf and nursed it several digressive miles to the coast road, where a signpost pointed left to Windhill, right to Baiting. Northward had looked as though it might bring him sooner inland to the motorway, and so he took the Baiting route.

He hadn't bargained for the hindrance of the wind. Along the jagged coastline all the trees leaned away from the jumpy sea as though desperate to grasp the land. Before long the barren seaward fields gave way to rocks and stony beaches and there weren't even hedges to fend off the northwester. Whenever the gusts took a breath he smelled how overworked the engine was growing. Beside the road was evidence of the damage the wind could wreak: scattered planks of some construction which, to judge by a ruin a mile farther on, had been a fishmonger's stall. Then the doggedly spiky hedge to his right winced inland, revealing an arc of cottages as white as the moon would be when the sky went out. Perhaps someone in the village could repair the car or Grant would find a room for the night—preferably both.

The ends of the half-mile arc of cottages were joined across the inlet by a submerged wall or a path that divided the prancing sea from the less restless bay. The far end was marked by a lone block of colour, a red telephone box planted in the water by a trick of perspective. His glimpse of a glistening object crouched or heaped in front of it had to be another misperception; when he returned his attention to the view once he'd finished tussling with the wheel as a gust tried to shove the car across the road, he saw no sign of life.

The car was panting and shivering by the time he reached the first cottage. A vicious wind that smelled of fish stung his skin as he eased his rusty door shut and peered tearfully at the buildings opposite. He thought all the windows were curtained with net until he realised the whiteness was salt, which had also scoured the front doors pale. In the very first window a handwritten sign offered ROOM. The wind hustled him across the road, which was strewn with various conditions of seaweed, to the fish-faced knocker on a door that had once been black.

More of the salt that gritted under his fingers was lodged in the hinge. He had to dig his thumb into the gaping mouth to heave the fish head high and slam it against the metal plate. He heard the blow fall flat in not much of a passage and a woman's voice demanding shrilly "Who wants us now?"

The nearest to a response was an irregular series of slow footsteps that ended behind the door, which was dragged wide by a man who filled most of the opening. Grant couldn't tell how much of his volume he owed to his cable-knit jersey and loose trousers, but the bulk of his face drooped like perished rubber from his cheekbones. Salt might account for the redness of his small eyes, though perhaps anxiety had turned his sparse hair and dense eyebrows white. He hugged himself and shivered and glanced past his visitor, presumably at the wind. Parting his thick lips with a tongue as ashen, he mumbled "Where have you come from?"

"Liverpool."

"Don't know it," the man said, and seemed ready to use that as an excuse to close the door.

A woman plodded out of the kitchen at the end of the cramped dingy hall. She looked as though marriage had transformed her into a version of the man, shorter but broader to compensate and with hair at least as white, not to mention clothes uncomfortably similar to his. "Bring him in," she urged.

"What are you looking for?" her husband muttered.

"Someone who can fix my car and a room if I'll need one."

"Twenty miles up the coast."

"I don't think it'll last that far. Won't they come here?"

"Of course they will if they're wanted, Tom. Let him in."

"You're staying, then."

"I expect I may have to. Can I phone first?"

"If you've the money you can give it a tackle."

"How much will it take?" When Tom's sole answer was a stare, Grant tried "How much do you want?"

"Me, nothing. Nor her either. Phone's up the road." Grant was turning away, not without relief, when the woman said "Won't he need the number? Tommy and his Fiona."

"I know that. Did you get it?" Tom challenged Grant.

"I don't think—"

"Better start, then. Five. Three. Three. Five," Tom said and shut the door.

Grant gave in to an incredulous laugh that politeness required him to muffle. Perhaps another cottage might be more welcoming, he thought with dwindling conviction as he progressed along the seafront. He could hardly see through any of the windows, and such furniture as he could distinguish, by no means in every room, looked encrusted with more than dimness. The few shops might have belonged to fishmongers; one window displayed a dusty plastic lobster on a marble slab also bearing stains suggestive of the prints of large wet hands. The last shop must have been more general, given the debris scattered about the bare floor—distorted but unopened tins, a disordered newspaper whose single legible headline said FISH STOCKS DROP, and was there a dead cat in the darkest corner? Beyond two farther cottages was the refuge of the phone box.

Perhaps refuge was too strong a word. Slime on the floor must indicate that it hadn't been out of reach of the last high tide. A fishy smell that had accompanied him along the seafront was also present, presumably borne by the wind that kept lancing the trapped heat with chill. Vandalism appeared to have invaded even this little community; the phone directory was strewn across the metal shelf below the coin-box in fragments so sodden they looked chewed. Grant had to adjust the rakish handset on its hook to obtain a tone before he dragged the indisposed dial to the numbers he'd repeated all the way to the box. He was trying to distinguish whether he was hearing static or simply the waves when a man's brusque practically Scottish voice said "Beach."

"You aren't a garage, then."

"Who says I'm not? Beach's Garage."

"I'm with you now," Grant said, though feeling much as he had when Tom translated his wife's mnemonic. "And you fix cars."

"I'd be on the scrapheap if I didn't."

"Good," Grant blurted and to compensate "I mean, I've got one for you."

"Lucky me."

"It's a Cavalier that wouldn't go uphill."

"Can't say a word about it 'til I've seen it. All I want to know is where you are."

"Twenty miles south of you, they tell me."

"I don't need to ask who." After a pause during which Grant felt sought by the chill and the piscine smell, the repairman said "I can't be there before dark."

"You think I should take a room."

"I don't tell anybody what to do. Invited you in as well, did they?" The man's thriftiness with language was affecting Grant much as unresponsive pupils did.

"Shouldn't they have?" he retorted.

"They'll do their best for you, Tom and Fiona. They need the cash."

"How did you know who they were?"

"There's always some that won't be driven out of their homes. A couple, anyway."

"Driven."

When competing at brevity brought no answer, Grant was about to add to his words when the man said, "You won't see many fish round Baiting anymore."

Grant heard the basis of a geography lesson in this. "So they've had to adapt to living off tourists."

"And travellers and whatever else they catch." The repairman interrupted himself with a cough that might have been a mirthless laugh. "Anyway, that's their business. I'll be there first thing in the morning."

The phone commenced droning like a fly attracted by the fishy smell until Grant stubbed his thumb on the hook. He dug the crumpled number of the holiday cottage out of his jeans and dialled, rousing only a bell that repeated itself as insistently as the waves for surely longer than his fellow students could have disagreed over who should answer it, even if they sustained the argument with a drink and quite possibly a toke to boot. No doubt they were expecting him to arrive ahead of them and set about organising as usual. He dropped the receiver onto its prongs and forced open the arthritic door.

He might have returned to his car along the sea wall, the top of which was nearly two feet wide, if waves hadn't been spilling over much of its length. There appeared to be little else to describe to any class he would teach; rubble was piled so high in the occasional alleys between the cottages that he couldn't even see behind them. The bay within the wall swarmed with infant waves, obscuring his view of whatever he kept glimpsing beneath them: probably the tops of pillars reinforcing the wall, except that the objects were irregularly spaced—the tips of a natural rock formation the wall had followed, then, although the string of blurred shapes put him in mind of a series of reflections of the moon. He was no closer to identifying them by the time he reached the Cavalier.

He manhandled his suitcase through the gap the creaky boot vouchsafed him and tramped across the road. He was hesitating over reaching for the knocker when the cottage door sprang open. He was bracing himself to be confronted by the husband, which must be why the sight of the woman's upturned face was disconcerting. "Get in, then," she exhorted with what could have been intended as rough humour.

Perhaps she was eager to shut out the wind that was trying all the inner doors, unless she wanted to exclude the smell. More of that lingered once Grant slammed the door than he found inviting. "Let's have you up," the woman said.

She'd hardly set one shabbily slippered foot on the lowest of the narrow uncarpeted stairs that bisected the hall when she swung round to eye him. "First time away?"

"Nothing like."

"Just your case looks so new."

"My parents bought me a set of them when I started college."

"We never had any children. What's your name, anyway?" she added with a fierceness he hoped she was directing at herself. "You know ours."

"Bill Grant."

"Good and strong," she said, giving him a slow appreciative blink before stumping shapelessly upwards to thump the first door open with her buttocks. The rumpled sea widened beyond the small window as he followed her into the room. He'd passed a number of framed photographs on his way upstairs, and here above the sink was yet another grey image of a man, nondescript except for the fish he was measuring between his hands. As in the other pictures, he was her husband Tom. His presence helped the furniture—a barely even single bed, a barren dressing-table, a wardrobe no larger than a phone box—make the room feel yet more confined. "Anything like home?" Fiona said.

It did remind him somewhat of his bedroom when he was half his size. "Something," he admitted.

"You want to feel at home if you go anywhere. I know I would." Having stared at him as though to ensure some of her meaning remained, she reached up to grab his shoulders with her cold swollen hands as an aid to squeezing past him. "We'll call you when it's time to put our snouts in the trough," she said.

He listened to the series of receding creaks her descent extracted from the stairs, and then he relieved his suitcase of the items he would need for an overnight stay, feeling absurdly as if he were preparing for a swift escape. Once he'd ventured across the tiny strident landing to the bathroom, a tiled white cell occupied by three dripping sweaters pegged on a rope above the bath and by a chilly damp that clung to him, he sat next to his pyjamas on the bed to scribble notes for a geography lesson based on Baiting, then sidled between the sink and the foot of the bed to the window.

It seemed his powers of observation needed work. The whitish rounded underwater blobs were closer together and to the middle of the sea wall than he remembered, unless any of them had indeed been a version of the moon, which was presently invisible above the roof. Perhaps he would soon be able to identify them, since the waves were progressing towards relative calm. He left his bulky bunch of keys on the windowsill before lying down to listen to the insistent susurration, which was occasionally interrupted by a plop that led him to believe the sea was less uninhabited than the repairman had said. He grew tired of craning to catch sight of whatever kept leaving ripples inside the sea wall, and by the time Fiona called "Ready" up the stairs, an invitation reminiscent of the beginning of a game, he was shelving towards sleep.

He must have been near to dreaming while awake, since he imagined that a face had edged out of hiding to watch him sit up. It might have been dour Tom's in the photograph or the moon that had crept into view above the bay, possibly appending at least one blob to the cluster along the sea wall. "I'll be down," Grant shouted loud enough, he hoped, to finish wakening himself.

He wasn't expecting to eat in the kitchen, on a table whose unfolding scarcely left room for three hard straight chairs and a stained black range crowned with bubbling saucepans and, beneath a small window that grudgingly twilighted the room, a massive stone sink. He'd thought a fishy smell that had kept him company upstairs was carried by the wind, but now he realised it might also have been seeping up from the kitchen. He was exerting himself to look entertained when Tom frowned across the table at him. "She ought to have asked you to pay in advance."

"Oh, Tom, he's nothing but a youngster." Grant was a little too much of one to appreciate being described that way.

"Can I give you a cheque and a card?"

"And your name and address."

"Let's have you sitting down first," Fiona cried, stirring a pan that aggravated the smell. Grant fumbled in the pocket of his jeans for the chequebook and card wallet. "How much am I going to owe you?" Tom glowered at his soup bowl as though ashamed to ask.

"Thirty if you're here for breakfast."

"Of course he will be, Tom."

"If he isn't sick of it by then."

Grant wrote a cheque in his best blackboard handwriting and slid it with his guarantee card and driving licence across the table. "Grant's the word, eh?" Tom grumbled, poking at the cards with a thick flabby forefinger whose nail was bitten raw. "She said you were a student, right enough."

"I teach as well," Grant was provoked into retorting. "That'll be my life."

"So what are you planning to fill their dim little heads with?"

"I wouldn't mind telling them the story of your village."

"Few years since it's been that." Tom finished scrutinising the cheque and folded it twice to slip into his trousers pocket, then stared at or through his guest. "On a night like this there'd be so many fish we'd have to bring the nets in before dawn or have them snapped."

"Nights like this make me want to swim," Fiona said, and perhaps more relevantly, "He used to like taking the boat out then."

She ladled soup into three decidedly various bowls and watched with Tom while Grant committed his stained spoon to the viscous milky liquid. It explained the smell in the kitchen and tasted just not too strongly of it to be palatable. "There are still fish, then," he said, and when his hosts met this with identical small-eyed stares, "Good. Good."

"We've given up the fishing. We've come to an arrangement," said Tom.

Grant sensed that was as much as he would say about it, presumably resenting the loss of his independence. Nobody spoke until the bowls were empty, nor indeed until Fiona had served three platefuls of flaccid whitish meat accompanied by heaps of mush, apparently potatoes and some previously green vegetable. More of the meat finished gently quivering to itself in an indistinguishable lump on a platter. Grant thought rather than hoped it might be tripe, but unless the taste of the soup had lodged in his mouth, the main course wasn't mammalian. Having been watched throughout two rubbery mouthfuls, he felt expected to say at least, "That's good too. What is it?"

"All there is to eat round here," Tom said in a sudden dull rage.

"Now, Tom, it's not his fault."

"It's people's like his." Tom scowled at his dinner and then at the guest. "Want to know what you want to tell the sprats you're supposed to be teaching?"

"I believe I do, but if you'd like—"

"About time they were told to stop using cars for a start. And if the poor deprived mites can't live without them, tell them not to take them places they don't need to go."

"Saints, Tom, they're only youngsters."

"They'll grow up, won't they, if the world doesn't conk out first." With renewed ire he said to Grant, "They need to do without their fridges and their freezers and their microwaves and whatever else is upsetting things."

Grant felt both accused of too much urban living and uneasy about how the meat was stored. Since no refrigerator was visible, he hoped it was fresh. He fed himself mouthfuls to be done with it and dinner generally, but hadn't completed the labour when he swallowed in order to speak. "At least you aren't alone, then."

"It's in your cities people go off and leave each other," muttered Tom.

"No, I mean you aren't the only ones in your village. I got the idea from your friend Mr. Beach you were."

Tom looked ready to deny any friendship, but it seemed he was preparing to demand, "Calling him a liar, are you?"

"I wouldn't say a liar, just mistaken," Grant said, nodding at the wall the cottage shared with its neighbour. His hosts merely eyed him as though they couldn't hear the renewed sounds beyond the wall, a floundering and shuffling that brought to mind someone old or otherwise incapacitated. "Rats?" he was compelled to assume.

"We've seen a few of those in our time," said Tom, continuing to regard him.

If that was meant for wit, Grant found it offered no more than the least of the children he'd had to teach. Some acoustic effect made the rat sound much larger as it scuffed along the far side of the wall before receding into the other cottage. Rather than risk stirring it or his hosts up further, Grant concentrated on downing enough of his meal to allow him to push away his plate and mime fullness. He was certainly full of a taste not altogether reminiscent of fish; he felt as though he were trying to swim through it, or it through him. When he drank a glass of the pitcher of water that had been the solitary accompaniment to the meal, he thought the taste was in there too.

Fiona cleared the plates into the sink, and that was the end of dinner. "Shall I help?" Grant had been brought up to offer.

"That's her work."

Since Fiona smiled indulgently at that, Grant didn't feel entitled to disagree. "I'd better go and phone, then."

He imagined he saw a pale shape lurch away from the window into the unspecific dimness—it must have been Fiona's reflection as she turned to blink at him. "He said you had."

"I ought to let my friends know I won't be seeing them tonight."

"They'll know when you don't, won't they? We don't want the waves carrying you off." Wiping her hands on a cloth that might have been part of someone's discarded garment, she pulled out a drawer beside the sink. "Stay in and we'll play a few games."

While the battered cardboard box she opened on the table was labelled Ludo, that wasn't quite what it contained. Rattling about on top of the familiar board inside the box were several fragments of a substance Grant told himself wasn't bone. "We make our own amusement round here," Fiona said. "We use whatever's sent us."

"He's not your lad."

"He could be." The scrape of Grant's chair on the stone floor went some way towards expressing his discomfort.

"I'll phone now," he said.

"Not driving, are you?" Tom enquired.

"Not at all." Grant couldn't be bothered resenting whatever the question implied. "I'm going to enjoy the walk."

"He'll be back soon for you to play with," Tom told his wife. She turned to gaze out at the dark while Tom's stare weighed on their visitor, who stood up.

"I won't need a key, will I?"

"We'll be waiting for you," Fiona mumbled.

Grant sensed tension as oppressive as a storm, and didn't thank the bare floorboards for amplifying his retreat along the hall. He seized the clammy latch and hauled the front door open. The night was almost stagnant. Subdued waves smoothed themselves out on the black water beyond the sea wall, inside which the bay chattered silently with whiteness beneath the incomplete mask of a moon a few days short of full. An odour he no longer thought it adequate to call fishy lingered in the humid air or inside him as he hurried towards the phone box.

The heat left over from the day more than kept pace with him. The infrequent jab of chill wind simply encouraged the smell. He wondered if an allergy to whatever he'd eaten was beginning to make itself felt in a recurrent sensation, expanding through him from his stomach, that his flesh was turning rubbery. The cottages had grown intensely present as chunks of moon fallen to earth, and seemed less deserted than he'd taken them to be: the moonlight showed that patches of some of the windows had been rubbed or breathed or even licked imperfectly clear. Once he thought faces rose like flotsam to watch him from the depths of three successive cottages, unless the same face was following him from house to ruined house. When he failed to restrain himself from looking, of course there was only moonlit dimness, and no dead cat in the general store. He did his best to scoff at himself as he reached the phone box.

Inside, the smell was lying in wait for him. He held the door open with his foot, though that admitted not only the infrequent wind but also more of the light that made his hand appear as pale as the receiver in it was black. His clumsy swollen fingers found the number in his pocket and held the scrap of paper against the inside of a frame that had once contained a mirror above the phone. Having managed to dial, he returned the paper to its niche against his unreasonably flabby thigh and clutched the receiver to his face with both hands. The fourth twosome of rings was parted by a clatter that let sounds of revelry at him, and belatedly a voice. "Who's this?"

For longer than a breath Grant felt as if he was being forced to stand up in class for a question he couldn't answer, and had to turn it back on the questioner. "It's Ian, isn't it?"

"Bill," Ian said, and shouted it to their friends. "Where have you got to?" he eventually thought to ask.

"I've broken down on the coast. I'm getting the car fixed tomorrow."

"When are we seeing you?"

"I told you, tomorrow," Grant said, though the notion felt remote in more ways than he could name.

"Have a drink for us, then, and we will for you. Won't we, you crew?"

The enthusiasm this aroused fell short of Grant, not least because he'd been reminded of the water accompanying dinner, a memory that revived the taste of the meal. "Don't get too pissed to drive tomorrow," Ian advised and made way for a chorus of drunken encouragement followed by the hungry buzz of the receiver.

Grant planted the receiver on its hook and shoved himself out of the box. Even if Baiting had boasted a pub, he would have made straight for his room; just now, supine was the only position that appealed to him. As the phone box shut with a muted thud that emphasised the desertion of the seafront, he set out along the top of the submerged wall.

It was broad enough for him to feel safe even if he wobbled—luckily for his career, however distant that seemed, teachers didn't have to be able to swim. He wouldn't have minded being able to progress at more than a shuffle towards the landmark of his car blackened by the moonlight, but the unsynchronised restlessness flanking him made him feel less than stable, as if he was advancing through some unfamiliar medium. The luminous reflection of the arc of cottages hung beneath them, a lower jaw whose unrest suggested it was eager to become a knowing grin. The shape of the bay must be causing ripples to resemble large slow bubbles above the huddle of round whitish shapes along the middle of the sea wall. He still couldn't make them out, nor how many images of the moon were tracking him on or just beneath the surface of the inlet. The closer he came to the halfway mark, the larger the bubbles appeared to grow. He was within a few yards of them and feeling mesmerised by his own pace and by the whispers of the sea, when he heard a protracted stealthy wallowing behind him. He turned to find he had company on the far end of the wall.

It must be a swimmer, he told himself. Its glistening suggested it was wearing a wet suit rendered pallid by the moon; surely it couldn't be naked. Was the crouched figure making a joke of his progress? As it began to drag its feet, which struck him as unnecessarily large, along the wall, it looked no more at home on the path than he felt. Its head was bent low, and yet he had the disconcerting impression that it was presenting its face to him. It had shuffled several paces before he was able to grasp that he would rather outdistance it than see it in greater detail. He swung around and faltered just one step in the direction of his car. While his attention had been snared, another figure as squat and pale and dripping had set out for him from the opposite end of the wall.

He was paralysed by the spectacle of the pair converging effortfully but inexorably on him, the faces on their lowered heads indisputably towards him, until a movement let him peer in desperation at the farthest cottage. The front door had opened, and over the car roof he saw Tom. "Can you come and help me?" Grant shouted, stumbling towards him along the wall.

The cottages flattened and shrank his voice and sent him Tom's across the bay. "No need for that."

"There is," Grant pleaded. "That's in my way."

"Rude bugger."

Grant had to struggle to understand this meant him. It added itself to the sight of the advancing figure pallid as the underside of a dead fish. The closer it shuffled, the less it appeared to have for a face. "What are they?" he cried.

"They're all the moon brings us these days," Tom said, audibly holding Grant or people like him responsible, and stepped out of the cottage. He was naked, like the figures on the wall. The revelation arrested Grant while Tom plodded to the car. Indeed, he watched Tom unlock it and climb in before this sent him forward. "Stop that," he yelled. "What do you think you're doing? Get out of my car."

The Cavalier was no more likely to start first time for a naked driver than it ever did for him, he promised himself. Then it spluttered out a mass of fumes and performed a screeching U-turn. "Come back," Grant screamed. "You can't do that. You're polluting your environment."

No doubt his protests went unheard over the roaring of the engine. The sound took its time over dwindling once the coastline hid the car. The squat whitish shapes had halted once Grant had begun shouting. He strode at the figure crouched between him and the cottage and, since it didn't retreat, with as little effect at the other. He was repeating the manoeuvre, feeling like a puppet of his mounting panic, when that was aggravated by a burst of mirth. Fiona had appeared in the cottage doorway and was laughing at him. "Just jump in," she called across the water.

He didn't care how childish his answer sounded if she was capable of saving him. "I can't swim."

"What, a big strong lad like you?" Her heartiness increased as she declared "You can now. You can float, at any rate. Give it a try. We'll have to feed you up."

Beyond the spur of the coastline the sound of the car rose to a harsh note that was terminated by a massive splash. "That's the end of that," Fiona called. "You can be one of my big babies instead."

Grant's mind was refusing to encompass the implications of this when Tom came weltering like a half-submerged lump of the moon around the bay. Grant dashed along the sea wall, away from Fiona and Tom. He was almost at the middle section when he saw far too much in the water: not just the way that section could be opened as a gate, but the pallid roundish upturned faces that were clustered alongside. They must be holding their breath to have grown clear at last, their small flat unblinking eyes and, beneath the noseless nostrils, perfectly round mouths gaping in hunger that looked like surprise. As he wavered, terrified to pass above them, he had a final insight that he could have passed on to a classroom of pupils: the creatures must be waiting to open the gate and let in the tide and any fish it carried. "Don't mind them," Fiona shouted. "They don't mind we eat their dead. They even bring them now."

An upsurge of the fishy taste worse than nausea made Grant stagger along the wall. The waiting shape crouched forward, displaying the round-mouthed emotionless face altogether too high on its plump skull. Hands as whitish and as fat jerked up from the bay, snatching at Grant's feet. "That's the way, show him he's one of us," Fiona urged, casting off her clothes as she hurried to the water's edge.

She must have been encouraging Grant's tormentors to introduce him to the water. In a moment fingers caught his ankles and overbalanced him. His frantic instinctive response was to hurl himself away from them, into the open sea. Drowning seemed the most attractive prospect left to him.

The taste expanded through him, ousting the chill of the water with a sensation he was afraid to name. When he realised it was the experience of floating, he let out a howl that merely cleared his mouth of water. Too many pallid shapes for him to count were heaving themselves over the wall to surround him. He flailed his limbs and then tried holding them still, desperate to find a way of making himself sink. There was none. "Don't worry," Fiona shouted as she sloshed across the bay towards him, "you'll soon get used to our new member of the family," and, in what felt like the last of his sanity, Grant wondered if she was addressing his captors or Tom.

Tatters

"Tatters came from a reference on Radio 3 to satirical street ballads, and gave me some scope to joke."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the 2003 reissue of Told By The Dead

Written in: 2001
First published in The Spook, October 2001
Also published in: Told By The Dead

"Perfect," Goldman said. The gentle dawn light lent the bricks of the warehouse apartments a glow as contented as a fire in a hearth. Across the river, which might have been holding itself still to be filmed, the faintly misted city waterfront was a dream of prosperity. Above the skyline that was scribbled with distant lines of trees interrupted by three church spires, a reddish sun was edging into view. "Mark," he called.

Simonette brandished the clapper board but kept its wooden jaws locked as she blinked over her shoulder. "What's that?"

A shadow was advancing faster than the sun along the alley between the warehouse they were about to film and its neighbour. Goldman held up a hand to delay Stephanie Maple beyond the black glass doors of the lobby, and the spectator halted out of sight. "Filming in progress, please," Goldman shouted. "Mark."

Simonette named the shot and clapped the board with a sound that drove only half the anxiety out of her small fragile face. Vanç shrugged the camera an inch higher and squinted through the viewfinder while Lezly planted her dungareed legs apart and waited to dangle the microphone over the actress, who swung open the glass doors, just failing to catch reflections of the film crew. She turned up her wide-lipped smile by fractions of an inch as she strode towards the camera. "Welcome to—"

For a breath Goldman was entranced by how graceful she seemed even at rest, her long pale face smooth as marble scarcely hinting at impatience while her blonde hair glinted in a breeze that left the rest of her tall slim lavender-suited form unmoved, and then he grew aware of the interruption, a voice almost tuneless enough to be merely speaking:

"They come down to the water
To buy themselves a flat.
They've got no room for thin ones here.
Just make way for the fat..."

The ballad and the shadow retreated down the alley as Simonette made for them so vigorously one of her pigtails began to unravel. She vanished into a silence that everyone watched until she reappeared. "I can't find anyone," she complained, blinking faster.

"I expect you chased them off," Goldman said, dismissing whatever fool it had been, and turned to his star. "Go again?"

"You're the director."

Simonette picked up her makeup box and was minutely restoring Stephanie Maple's face when Vanç shrugged his free shoulder. "Shot's gone. Too much sun."

"Could you talk us through your flat now, Stephanie, and we'll shoot you coming out same time tomorrow if we aren't putting you to too much trouble?"

The actress inserted her card in the lock to admit them to the lobby. Like the discreetly lit staircase and corridors, it was built of exposed bricks, as though the development was reverting to a past that had never quite existed. No doubt while the warehouses were derelict the walls had been too bare for anyone except the squatters, who would have had bottles and syringes to distract them.

Stephanie Maple led the camera up to her third-floor apartment, where the unplastered walls were adorned with Oriental paintings. Goldman thought those and the austerity with which she'd furnished the huge rooms—dining kitchen, social and recreational area, Jacuzzi and amenities room, twin identical bedrooms—ought to appeal to the Japanese developers. Vanç made the most of them while she enthused about them, declaring that they represented what was new and best about the town and vowing she would never abandon her roots despite the international success of her latest film, Running Mummy, in which she played an athlete coping with the demands of single motherhood. "And cut," Goldman called at last, close to being mesmerised by the sound of her musical voice in a film of his. "That's it except for the view."

He made his way between two low stark tables to the window even wider than the television. The wind had risen, shattering the track of sunlight on the water. A figure at the river's edge was silhouetted against the ripples, which made it look tattered from head to foot and too thin. It did nothing for the shot, thought Goldman. "We'll leave it till tomorrow," he said.

"Stephanie Maple seems to think I'm the genuine article."

"You'll have to come and talk to my film students."

"I will when I've made enough to impress them."

"You've already done that to me, Jonathan, but I'm only a lecturer."

"I'm not quite Hitchcock yet, Ruth. Once I've got more of a name in advertising, maybe I can make the kind of films I dream about."

"We don't need any hitches, and the rest of you is fine."

The germ of coyness in her voice and in her smile that held back from owning up to itself signified that she wanted to make love before dinner. Goldman followed her into their small bedroom that was cluttered mostly with her clothes, piled on the ironing board or waiting their turn for space in the solitary wardrobe or the stuffed chest of drawers. She stripped before he could offer to perform the ritual, and then she lay on the plump quilt, her round face framed by a spread of determinedly reddish tresses, her small breasts flattening themselves above sketched ribs, her wide lips and strong broad legs slightly parted. Goldman undressed and went to her with an urgency designed to convince his body as well as Ruth. They weren't overweight, he told himself. All the same, he kept remembering the uninvited ballad that had ruined his first shot of the day—kept almost hearing it and feeling he just had.

They gasped together and lay joined until Goldman's breathing began to lag behind Ruth's. A notion that he still ought to placate her inspired him to suggest dining out or bringing in, but she made it plain he should have known she'd prepared dinner. The vegetables were stubbornly tough, the lamb chops offered a choice of a blackened surface or a pinkish one. Goldman did his best to seem to have no difficulty, and only when the task was more than half complete risked saying "I'll have to be up before dawn again tomorrow."

Ruth pinched the lapels of her housecoat together over her bare breasts and gazed at him across the heavy unclothed secondhand table that occupied a little too much of the room. "What is it this time?"

"More of the same, I'm afraid. Well, not afraid, but the same."

"Another session with your local performer, you mean."

"I think she's a bit more than that, do you? I'm lucky to have her. Don't you think it's good of her to give her services to the community that produced her?"

"I shouldn't imagine there's much of that left." Ruth worried a chop before dropping the bone on her plate. "I thought you were getting all you wanted today," she said.

"There were distractions."

"I'm sure."

They made room for each other while they washed up after dinner. When Ruth caught him glancing at the warehouses across the river, Goldman blurted "It shouldn't matter where you live, just who with." She suffered his hug, and so he ventured to admit "I wouldn't mind going to bed soon."

"I presume you won't object if I stay up and mark some essays."

"We've both got our jobs," said Goldman and sheltered in bed, though it had stored up a chill. Some light seeped in from the living room, along with the street noise of rowdies who might well have been rehoused from across the water, but he was most aware of how the inside of his throat felt scraped by the beginnings of a cold. He kept checking its ability to swallow until sleep swallowed him. After finding himself alone in bed a few times he began to be regurgitated next to Ruth, which eventually meant he could head off the alarm from rousing her. At least his throat felt no worse, and a hasty shower helped wake him up. He dressed and hurried through a medley of feline smells from the downstairs neighbour's menagerie to ensure Vanç had no excuse for sounding his horn.

In fact the van with PHOENIX PICTURES ON LOCATION on its sides didn't turn up for almost half an hour, by which time Goldman was shivering at the sight of his breath and failing to locate what sounded like someone attempting to carry a tune in their sleep. Simonette and Lezly were sprawled in the back of the van with their equipment between them, and mumbled as Goldman climbed into the front. "It'll be worth beating the dawn for," he felt required to promise.

From the heart of the business district a tunnel—an artery white as the monumental buildings—led under the river to emerge near a square mile of houses the council used to own. Newly made up, every street looked eager to be photographed, while the tenants had been sent across the water to make room for the young and increasingly prosperous employees of a Japanese electronics firm. The far side of the estate was overlooked by the warehouse apartments, where Stephanie Maple stepped out of the lobby as the film crew unloaded the van. Was that a shadow in the alley to her left, a shadow too long and thin even for the hour and very unsteadily outlined? A glance showed Goldman none, but he hurried to reassure himself that wasn't just because the sun had moved. "Whenever you're ready," he called from the alley, and withdrew out of range of the camera.

"Welcome to Riverhaven Apartments," the actress said, "city living for the new millennium, where good jobs and better leisure are just a stroll away from home." She came out of the building a third time to repeat herself in case there had been any problem, and then Vanç ran upstairs to film the last of the dawn from her window. Once the view was captured Goldman said, "We're truly grateful to you, Stephanie. I'd love to buy you dinner if you're free, if everyone is."

"It would have to be tonight," the actress said.

Vanç and Simonette proved to be meeting people together, Lezly by herself. After the briefest of silences Stephanie Maple raised her smile. "Shall we say the Japanese along the waterfront?"

Ruth had said more than once she would like to try that restaurant, which was why for the rest of the day Goldman was distracted from editing the film by rehearsing how he should approach her. It might have been too much rehearsal that produced "I don't suppose you'd want to go out for dinner."

"Any night except tonight. I still haven't caught up with my marking."

"Only Stephanie Maple, well, I think she'd like to celebrate successful teamwork."

"Then of course you must go. I'll see to myself, don't worry."

The kiss with which Stephanie Maple greeted him at her door, having remotely admitted him to the apartments, felt like a re-enactment of Ruth's token aloha. At least neither woman ought to catch the cold that was massing like a storm of sneezes in his head. Though the apartment block threatened him with sweating, he could have lived without the enthusiastic compensation of the night air. "We'll stroll it, shall we?" the actress said with what he was surely mistaken to see as a disappointed glance at his Volkswagen.

The short walk along the riverside to the Western Dawn led them past warehouses yet to be renovated. From the depths of one hulk riddled with darkness Goldman thought he heard a mutter that might, given time, have settled on a melody. "Did you..."

"What's that, Jonathan?"

"I expect nothing. I mean, I expect it was either me or a tramp."

"No comparison," the actress said with almost too instant a smile.

He tried to open the door of the restaurant for her, but a waiter was ahead of him. Goldman hoped he hadn't offended the man by holding onto the door. The waiter betrayed no emotion as he showed them to the corner of an extensive metal-topped table and, having given them ample time to appreciate the view of the lit city founded on its own bright inversion, brought them menus swarming with ideograms interspersed with translations. "This is kind," Stephanie Maple murmured.

"It's my pleasure," Goldman assured her, largely to suppress his terror at the prices, and was uncontrollably prompted to urge her to order the most expensive items on the menu, then couldn't draw attention to this by ordering more cheaply for himself. As the waiter chopped ingredients in front of them between juggling food and knives Goldman grew aware of having remarked "Lots of tossing, eh?"

"Most people like a bit of spectacle," Stephanie Maple told him.

After that he felt bound to applaud the performance. Having sampled his dwarfish dinner, which seemed reluctant to admit to much taste, he had to say "Good?"

"All I expected."

"Good enough. I'm really pleased we got together." He hoped that was sufficient excuse for him to add "I'd really like to work with you again on something more substantial."

"I prefer younger directors."

"Even younger than me, you mean?"

Her look might have been a rebuke for denigrating himself if it wasn't for the reverse. Once she'd finished a delicate mouthful she said, "There could be a chance for you on my next film."

"That would be great," he said, but too much of his attention was entangled in the faint hovering Japanese music or rather in its background. Beneath the tinny plucking and the undercurrent of conversation, most of it Japanese, he heard a discordant voice:

"They chuck your food up in the air
And throw it on the table.
You smile at everything they serve
And swallow if you're able..."

Goldman managed to prove to himself that he could before demanding "Can you hear that?"

"I was hearing you."

He had to assume it was a symptom of fever, a thought that seemed to gather most of the heat of the restaurant under his arms. Rather than dab his forehead with his napkin, he excused himself and headed for the toilets identified by a plaque of a samurai warrior. Several Japanese businessmen in suits as dark as the tiles were conversing across the wide room. Goldman stooped to the nearest sink and was splashing cold water on his face when a stupendous sneeze overwhelmed him. A mirror showed him his face dripping not only with water. "Sorry," he choked, snatching a wad of toilet paper out of a cubicle to blow his nose. Once the prolonged routine was completed he went back to the actress, explaining "Just a sneeze and a blow, that was all."

"Not in front of anyone, I hope."

"Why not?" he said, almost remembering.

"It's a terrible insult to blow your nose around Japanese people."

He didn't dare look away from her. "Tell me about this film of yours," he came close to pleading.

"It's about a young couple who move into apartments where all the other tenants are criminals. They want to kill the couple for finding out too much but a hit man's mother tries to protect them. Hitting It Off, that's the working title. We may film some of it round here. That's why I thought of you."

"Sounds like a hit. I'm happy I impressed you so much." When she laid her cool hand on his clammy one he asked, "Is there someone I should contact?"

"I'll see to that."

Goldman felt it would be ungracious to enquire further. He was relieved to be eventually outside despite the onslaught of night air. "Shall we?" he said.

He meant only to encourage her to move, but she turned from admiring the slow dance of the dim capsized city to give him a look he thought reminiscent of her touch. "We might," she said, and as her card protruded like a coy tongue from the slot beside the lobby entrance "Will you come up?"

"If you'd—Don't say that."

"I didn't mean to confuse you."

"You haven't," he declared without the least sense whether it was true. "Am I all you're hearing?"

"You've got my attention," she said, demonstrating with a wide-eyed gaze that she was unaware of the muffled repetition of a tuneless song in the nearest empty warehouse or inside his equally lightless skull:

"You've got yourself into her life,
You've got into her head.
You'll be inside her body next
And maybe in her bed..."

"I won't tonight." Goldman didn't know if he was responding to the song or to the invitation until he added "You don't want my cold."

"Let me know what your backers think of our little film."

"I'm sure they'll fall in love with it even if they don't show it," Goldman said, "show what they feel, I mean," and left her with a kiss that barely made contact. Throughout the drive home his brain stayed clogged with the same inharmonious doggerel. When he admitted himself to the flat he barely heard Ruth's somnolent mumble from the bedroom. "Good evening," it was more likely she asked than said.

"Everything it should have been." Hearing her respond only with measured breaths he took to indicate she was asleep, Goldman retreated to the bathroom, where he could deal with the ballad or the feverish memory of it; he couldn't tell which. "That's a lie," he reiterated until he felt quiet enough to lie beside Ruth.

The morning before the films were to be screened for the developers, Goldman and the crew watched once again and agreed they'd done their best work: the most pointedly edited, the best paced, seductive in their simplicity, the equal of anything of the kind the team had seen... "I just want to glance at the footage we didn't use," he cleared his throat to croak.

"Don't you think we made the right choices?" Simonette said with as many blinks as words.

"I'm sure we did." While he was in charge of editing, he always consulted the others. "I think this is the start of our real careers. I only want to check why we didn't use a shot," he said, leading them out of the screening room, where a wide-screen television faced two rows of a few old cinema seats, and through the small office into the even smaller editing room.

He watched Stephanie Maple begin "Welcome to—" and fall silent, gazing at him. He ran the shot again and cocked his head so close to the screen he could feel heat rising from it, unless that was fever. "You didn't catch it, then," he said.

"She froze," Lezly retorted, fists on hips.

"No, I mean you didn't catch what stopped her."

"As I remember, you did."

"Only because we were being interrupted. You'll confirm that, Simonette. You went to find whoever it was."

"That's because you looked as if you thought there was somebody," Simonette told him, blinking yet faster.

"One of you must have heard them." When the crew only gazed at him as he coughed and finished coughing, Goldman grabbed the phone. Machines were answering at Stephanie Maple's apartment and on her mobile. He asked both to have her call him and looked up to find the crew watching him. "Would you like some of us to do the presentation?" Vanç said.

"That's still my job," said Goldman, nevertheless adding "Anyway, this will sell itself." He filled his briefcase with copies of the tape and its accompanying glossy brochure and hurried to his car, inside which the March day seemed unreasonably warm. He drove out of the business park beside the tunnel mouth on the renovated side of the river and through the streets of council houses rendered youthful, and left the Volkswagen just out of sight of Teshagihara Enterprises. It wasn't a first impression he cared to make.

The harbourmaster's old building had been turned into offices. A window broad as the reception area contemplated the mouth of the river. While the receptionist, who looked hardly older than school age, hurried to announce him, Goldman kept imagining that the attempts of the air conditioning to relieve the heat were the winds that stirred the waves. He remembered not to bow first to the young executive who came to usher him into the conference room.

It was panelled in pale wood and almost full of a long table and a dozen Japanese businessmen. Though Goldman was wearing his best dark suit, their unobtrusive elegance made him feel overheated because overdressed. "This is Mr. Teshagihara," his usher said, having introduced himself as Mr. Ichikawa. "I will translate."

Goldman bowed and mumbled an effusive greeting and did less of both to the rest of the men, most of whose names also sounded as if they contained a sneeze. Nor was only that why he kept fearing sternutation was about to ambush him. He was almost sure he recognised Mr. Teshagihara and several of his minions from the toilet at the Western Dawn, and couldn't tell whether their lack of expression confirmed it. He had to force himself not to allow a tickling in his throat to cut short his introduction to the film. He was slipping a tape into the projector when his briefcase shrilled.

Ought he to have switched his mobile off, or would it show he was in demand? "Excuse me," he said to Mr. Teshagihara with no visible effect, and extracted the phone. "Goldman."

"Jonathan? It's Stephanie. How did your presentation go?"

"I'm in it now."

"Sorry, I thought you might have called to let me know about it. Shall I leave you to wow them?"

"Just very quickly, and don't for a moment think it's a criticism, but can you remind me why you stopped in the middle of your first take?"

"I should think you'd know."

"As I say, remind me."

"I thought you were looking at me to stop. I like to have that kind of rapport with my director."

"But you heard something as well," Goldman insisted with a vigour that made his mouth and throat itch.

"Only your clapper girl running off where you were looking and saying there was nobody."

"That doesn't mean—" All the businessmen were gazing at him, he couldn't tell how patiently. "I'll ring you back when, afterwards," he said and switched the phone off. "That was my star. Let's let her do the talking."

He didn't trust himself to say more. His head was a clammy balloon filled with bewilderment and tickling. He started the tape and tried to admire its image on the wall-sized screen as much as he was sure his clients would. The several promotions were all introduced by Stephanie Maple, some exhibiting her apartment, others the surrounding amenities and growth of opportunity. He would have been happy to let them speak for themselves without the constant muffled accompaniment, a ballad less in any tune at every recurrence:

"You've captured their attention,
So show them what you've got.
Just remember you must never ever
Let them glimpse your snot..."

His audience couldn't hear it, he tried to reassure himself. It sounded as though it was skulking rat-like in the walls. He struggled to ignore it and the cold it was threatening to aggravate while Mr. Teshagihara discussed matters in Japanese with his subordinates. Eventually he addressed Goldman at length before Mr. Ichikawa said "Mr. Teshagihara is grateful to you for helping him see clearly."

"I'm glad." When a pause brought nothing further, Goldman asked "How?"

"He sees now the apartments are too large. It will be more efficient to build many smaller ones, Mr. Teshagihara says."

"In the warehouses you haven't done yet, you mean. You'll want us to film them when you have, then." Mr. Ichikawa's face remained impassive as he turned to his superior. After an exchange that gave Goldman time to hear the singer's voice grow hoarse with repetition, the executive said "Mr. Teshagihara will use your shortest film."

"Punchier, does he think?"

Mr. Ichikawa lowered his voice as though confiding a rebuke. "Mr. Teshagihara prefers not to see the Chinese rooms."

It became apparent to Goldman that it wasn't enough for Stephanie Maple's apartment to look Oriental—that he wasn't alone in committing a gaffe. "So you'll be using our film to be going on with," he said hastily, "and can you give me any idea when you'll want us to shoot the rest of the development?"

Mr. Teshagihara emitted a loud protracted sniff that Goldman told himself couldn't be a signal to his underling to say "Mr. Teshagihara will hire another company to do that. Your film will go on local television."

"All over the country, you mean?" Goldman said louder than the meeting appeared to like, but failed to blot out the ballad.

"Your local television."

"But it only reaches a few miles. That wasn't all you asked me for."

Mr. Ichikawa communicated some version of this to his superior, who reached stone-faced into a folder for papers that were handed along the table to Goldman. The succession of expressionless faces beneath which they passed made him feel trapped in a masked Japanese play about commerce. He was leafing in feverish search of a loophole through the contract that gave Teshagihara Enterprises sole choice of film and its exhibition when Mr. Teshagihara uttered a prolonged especially liquid sniff and then a sentence. "Mr. Teshagihara will honour what he signed," Mr. Ichikawa said.

Presumably he was translating the words rather than the sniff, but it was the latter that stayed with Goldman. "It's not about honour. It's about this," he said, jerking two fingers close to his packed nostrils, and when his voice fell short of obscuring the ballad, joined in. "It's about don't let them glimpse your snot. Never mind staring at me. It isn't as if you lot seem to know much about tunes either."

All the consonants of the last word were swept away by a Godzilla of a sneeze. The contents of his nose sprayed the air and spilled down his face. For an instant he felt withered by shame, and then he snatched back the hand that was flinching from finding a handkerchief. "We've got that in common at least," he said and, having wiped his face on the contract, used it to blow his nose. He crumpled the pages and shied them at a waste bin as he backed away from all the faces he'd provoked into showing emotion. "Don't forget honour," he said, shutting the door on the sight of them.

Had he placated his tormentor in some way? The only sound that met him outside the building was a rustle of unseen litter. "This is my car for anyone who'd like to know," he shouted, and drove home. He could think of nowhere he wanted to go except bed.

A phone was ringing as he let himself into the house, which no doubt persisted in smelling of cats. When he realised the phone was upstairs he dashed to unlock the flat and seize the receiver. "Goldman," he said as clearly as his head allowed.

"Tell us it didn't happen."

"Lezly. You'd rather it didn't, you're saying. You want to make real films."

"Why would we be saying any crap like that? We want to make films people see."

"I think we've just done that, haven't we?" Goldman said loud enough to be heard in the street, where a song seemed to have insinuated itself into a riot of children released from school:

"You've finished making things look good,
And all you made was trouble.
You might as well have given up
And lived among the rubble..."

"What do you know about it?" Goldman snarled, and was about to assure Lezly that wasn't aimed at her when she retorted, "Everything. The clients faxed us."

"And told us what exactly?" Goldman said, feeling as though he was adding a line to the song.

"They'll pay the contract minimum but they won't let any of the films be shown. Vanç rang to see if he could change their mind and got the feeling you'd offended them somehow."

"I did my best. Forget them. I'd rather work with people more like us. Can you keep some news to yourselves till it breaks?"

"Let's find out."

"It looks as if I'll be directing Stephanie's next feature. You know I'll want you all involved. Forgive me, I ought to have told her you came with the deal."

"We'll need to discuss it."

"We will," Goldman said and pushed himself to his feet by replacing the receiver. The tuneless ballad felt like fog growing solid in his head. Sprinting hotly to the window, he dragged the sash up. Schoolchildren were dodging traffic and scattering litter. The song had trailed off, but for a moment Goldman thought a windblown assortment of papers was a bony figure crawling into an alley. Then he caught sight of Ruth.

She saw him, and her cheerful preoccupied march missed a step while she waved. Goldman was still at the window when she dumped her bag of papers on the creaky sofa. "You're home early," she said.

"Would you rather I weren't here?"

"What on earth makes you ask that?" She took his blazing face in her cool hands.

"You're in a strange mood," she said. "Aren't we celebrating?"

"Because I'm directing Stephanie's next film we can if you like, but today's lot don't want what we made for them."

"Oh, Jonathan." He saw her consider enquiring about it and put her questions on hold, instead hugging him and then, with some urgency, rather more than hugging. "We've still got us," she said.

"I don't think you want that much of me just now. I come with a cold, you'll have noticed."

"It's part of you. I expect I'll have caught whatever I'm going to catch."

He didn't feel equal to an argument or, worse, the postponement of one. He led her into the bedroom and, having undressed her as lingeringly as she liked, struggled free of his own humid clothes. The hint of ribs above the wider rest of her left him feeling hot and flabby by comparison, but little else. He knelt between her legs and tried to think of words to murmur while caressing her, but had made little headway along either line when she said "What can you hear?"

"You," he said desperately, dealing her a kiss that felt close to a sneeze. He thought he was safe to mumble another response under cover of it, but Ruth twisted her head aside, crying "What did you say?"

"Nothing."

"You didn't touch who?"

"Nobody," Goldman pleaded, not loud enough to blot out the repetition of the song beneath the window of the next room:

"Just tell her everything you did
Was only for your art.
You didn't take your actress out
And hope she was a tart..."

"I didn't and she isn't," he blustered. "Christ, can't you hear that, Ruth?"

"I've heard enough, I think," she said, drawing her legs together and away from him as if they might be needed to support her face, which had grown heavy and slack. "Maybe you were right after all."

"I am. You have to see I am." When she gazed sadly at him he demanded "How?"

"I think I'd rather you weren't here."

"Anything else you want to do to me?" he screamed, lurching into the next room to crane his top half out of the window. A gang of children jeered at him, and one improved on pointing at him by lobbing a plastic bottle in his direction. Its empty clatter failed to distract him from the song that was persisting somewhere up the street. He slammed the window and stumbled into the bedroom. "I wasn't talking about you just now," he tried to assure Ruth.

"Oh, I don't believe you've done that for a while."

"I haven't time for this," he muttered, pulling on his clothes and their clamminess. "I'm going to find—I'm going to." His inability to explain tethered him to Ruth, though she wasn't looking at him. "All right, goodbye," he blurted and ran downstairs.

The night air might have relieved the heat that made him smell like a tomcat, but he'd hardly set about chasing the unseen singer when he began to feel marinated in sweat. He was sure he knew where his tormentor was bound. Sprinting back to his car, he drove to the tunnel.

All the way through it he kept hearing the singer, though the words were indistinguishable amid the hubbub of the rush hour. Sometimes he thought the voice was in one or other of the vehicles surrounding him, and sometimes on his car radio, though that was switched off. When he emerged from the tunnel the voice fled towards the river, as he knew it would.

He still hadn't glimpsed the singer by the time he reached the warehouses. He parked in front of the derelict building nearest to Stephanie Maple's apartment and was straggling feebly out of his seat belt when a Mercedes drew up outside her block. He didn't know whether to greet her or hide as she was ushered out of the car by a tall wiry muscular man some years younger than her or Goldman. When she caught sight of him he raised a hand and followed it up. "Stephanie," he succeeded in croaking. "Not here for you just now, but looking forward to directing you again."

The man frowned at him as though at an especially unwelcome beggar, and at first the actress only frowned. "Jonathan?" she said. "When would that be?"

"Whenever your next film goes into production. The one about the bad guys living here. The one you want me for."

"As an assistant if I can fix it. I don't know if you'd be directing me."

It was still work, Goldman tried to tell himself, but couldn't help wondering if he might have been hired to direct if he'd accepted whatever had been offered at their last encounter. That seemed as remote and unreal as the future she had just snatched out of reach. He was holding in a shiver that felt like a threat of losing all control when she said "Are you worse, Jonathan? You ought to go home."

"Wherever that is."

She looked as if she hadn't quite heard something, possibly not him. It didn't prevent her from letting herself and her companion into the apartments—if anything, it sped her on her way. Goldman watched the lobby grow deserted and then dark while a song provided a soundtrack:

"It shouldn't matter where you live,
So crawl back in your hole.
It doesn't matter who you are.
You're just another soul..."

"Let's see what kind you are," Goldman croaked, and blundered across the parking area that was patterned with bones—with white lines. Under the scrawny floodlights that iced the concrete his car looked abandoned, exhausted of colour. A gathering of shadows fluttered underfoot, eager to drag him down to join them. They helped his legs feel depleted as he staggered to the nearest disused warehouse and peered through a window.

The song was somewhere in the stony dark. It sounded hushed now, almost trapped. "You aren't getting away from me this time," Goldman whispered. The warehouse doors were locked, but he hauled himself up into the glassless aperture and, with an effort that left him sodden and shivering, through.

He lowered himself on his wasted arms and leaned against damp brick while he tried to regather himself. The song had withered into silence, but he could just distinguish a tattered bony shape cowering in the far corner of the vast dark space, and heard the rustling of whatever it used for a bed. When he felt able to manage without the support of the wall he picked his way across the stone floor, avoiding chunks of rubble and drained bottles. Once he almost tripped over a squashed can that stank of lager. Nevertheless he kept his attention on the restless tenant of the dark.

The material in which the figure was attired was dismayingly tattered, he thought, or was that its nest? Surely none of the tremulous fragments could be part of the figure itself. Goldman faltered as he heard the wail of a police car, and as that receded, a last breath of song:

"There was a time when sirens Didn't give you an alarm..."

Something with a mouth or at least a gaping cavity in it wobbled up to greet him, then fell back with a papery sound. At once the figure was indistinguishable from its bed and then not there in any form.

Goldman flattened a hand against the rough chill wall and stooped unsteadily to peer at the items that constituted the bed. They were crumpled pages, thousands of them. He had to wobble lower to lift one to his face. In the glow from the city across the window, he could just make out that he was holding a song sheet. Every page he groped for and let drop was one, but he was unable to read any of the words.

When he tired of letting pages fall back on the mound he followed the last of them down. From so much bending and unbending he felt dizzy and hollow, robbed of substance, scarcely present. He just needed to lie down until he regained himself, he thought. He curled up in the nest, which seemed to have readied a hollow for him, and took a page in each hand as he closed his eyes. He settled into himself and the dark, thinking of Ruth, the Phoenix Pictures team, Stephanie Maple, Mr. Teshagihara and his acolytes. When he began to sing, at first it was only to himself.

The Retrospective

"The Retrospective grew from the idea of the museum in an unfamiliar town. It feels to me somewhat like my tribute to Thomas Ligotti."—Ramsey Campbell, afterword to the story in Dark Terrors 6, October, 2002

"The Retrospective felt rather like a tribute to the great Thomas Ligotti, though I'm certain he would handle the notion quite differently. Because of a misunderstanding the last three words were omitted from its original publication and replaced with an ellipsis, an effect I dislike as much as M. R. James did..."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the 2003 reissue of Told By The Dead

Written in: 2001
First published in Dark Terrors 6, 2002
Also published in: Told By The Dead

Trent had no idea how long he was unable to think for rage. The guard kept out of sight while she announced the unscheduled stop, and didn't reappear until the trainload of passengers had crowded onto the narrow platform. As the train dragged itself away into a tunnel simulated by elderly trees and the low March afternoon sky that was plastered with layers of darkness, she poked her head out of the rearmost window to announce that the next train should be due in an hour. The resentful mutters of the crowd only aggravated Trent's frustration. He needed a leisurely evening and, if he could manage it for a change, a night's sleep in preparation for a working breakfast. If he'd known the journey would be broken, he could have reread his paperwork instead of contemplating scenery he couldn't even remember. No doubt the next train would already be laden with commuters—he doubted it would give him space to work. His skull was beginning to feel shrivelled and hollow when it occurred to him that if he caught a later train he would both ensure himself a seat and have time to drop in on his parents. When had he last been home to see them? All at once he felt so guilty that he preferred not to look anyone in the face as he excused his slow way to the ticket office.

It was closed—a board lent it the appearance of a frame divested of a photograph—but flanked by a timetable. Stoneby to London, Stoneby to London... There were trains on the hour, like the striking of a clock. He emerged from the short wooden passage into the somewhat less gloomy street, only to falter. Where was the sweet shop whose window used to exhibit dozens of glass-stoppered jars full of colours he could taste? Where was the toyshop fronted by a headlong model train that had never stopped for the travellers paralysed on the platform? What had happened to the bakery displaying tiered white cakes elaborate as Gothic steeples, and the bridal shop next door, where the headless figures in their pale dresses had made him think of Anne Boleyn? Now the street was overrun with the same fast-food eateries and immature clothes shops that surrounded him whenever he left his present apartment, and he couldn't recall how much change he'd seen on his last visit, whenever that had been. He felt suddenly so desperate to be somewhere more like home that he almost didn't wait for twin green men to pipe up and usher him across the road.

The short cut was still there, in a sense. Instead of separating the toyshop from the wedding dresses, it squeezed between a window occupied by a regiment of boots and a hamburger outlet dogged by plastic cartons. Once he was in the alley the clamour of traffic relented, but the narrow passage through featureless discoloured concrete made him feel walled in by the unfamiliar. Then the concrete gave way to russet bricks and released him into a street he knew.

At least, it conformed to his memory until he looked closer. The building opposite, which had begun life as a music hall, had ceased to be a cinema. A pair of letters clung to the whitish border of the rusty iron marquee, two letters N so insecure they were on the way to being Zs. He was striving to remember if the cinema had been shut last time he'd seen it when he noticed that the boards on either side of the lobby contained posters too small for the frames. The neighbouring buildings were boarded up. As he crossed the deserted street, the posters grew legible. MEMORIES OF STONEBY, the amateurish printing said.

The two wide steps beneath the marquee were cracked and chipped and stained. The glass of the ticket booth in the middle of the marble door was too blackened to see through. Behind the booth the doors into the auditorium stood ajar. Uncertain what the gap was showing him, he ventured to peer in.

At first the dimness yielded up no more than a strip of carpet framed by floorboards just as grubby, and then he thought someone absolutely motionless was watching him from the dark. The watcher was roped off from him—the several indistinct figures were. He assumed they represented elements of local history: there was certainly something familiar about them. That impression, and the blurred faces with their dully glinting eyes, might have transfixed him if he hadn't remembered that he was supposed to be seeing his parents. He left the echo of his footsteps dwindling in the lobby and hurried around the side of the museum.

Where the alley crossed another he turned left along the rear of the building. In the high wall to his right a series of solid wooden gates led to backyards, the third of which belonged to his old house. As a child he'd used the gate as a short cut to the cinema, clutching a coin in his fist, which had smelled of metal whenever he'd raised it to his face in the crowded restless dark. His parents had never bolted the gate until he was home again, but now the only effect of his trying the latch was to rouse a clatter of claws and the snarling of a neighbour's dog that sounded either muzzled or gagged with food, and so he made for the street his old house faced.

The sunless sky was bringing on a twilight murky as an unlit room. He could have taken the street for an aisle between two blocks of dimness so lacking in features they might have been identical. Presumably any children who lived in the terrace were home from school by now, though he couldn't see the flicker of a single television in the windows draped with dusk, while the breadwinners had yet to return. Trent picked his way over the broken upheaved slabs of the pavement, supporting himself on the roof of a lone parked car until it shifted rustily under his hand, to his parents' front gate.

The small plot of a garden was a mass of weeds that had spilled across the short path. He couldn't feel it underfoot as he tramped to the door, which was the colour of the oncoming dark. He was fumbling in his pocket and then with the catches of his briefcase when he realised he would hardly have brought his old keys with him. He rang the doorbell, or at least pressed the askew pallid button that set off a muffled rattle somewhere in the house.

For the duration of more breaths than he could recall taking, there was no response. He was about to revive the noise, though he found it somehow distressing, when he heard footsteps shuffling down the hall. Their slowness made it sound as long as it had seemed in his childhood, so that he had the odd notion that whoever opened the door would tower over him.

It was his mother, and smaller than ever—wrinkled and whitish as a figure composed of dough that had been left to collect dust, a wad of it on top of and behind her head. She wore a tweed coat over a garment he took to be a nightdress, which exposed only her prominent ankles above a pair of unmatched slippers. Her head wavered upwards as the corners of her lips did. Once all these had steadied she murmured "Is it you, Nigel? Are you back again?"

"I thought it was past time I was."

"It's always too long." She shuffled in a tight circle to present her stooped back to him before calling "Guess who it is, Walter."

"Hess looking for a place to hide," Trent's father responded from some depth of the house.

"No, not old red-nosed Rudolph. Someone a bit younger and a bit more English."

"The Queen come to tea."

"He'll never change, will he?" Trent's mother muttered and raised what was left of her voice. "It's the boy. It's Nigel."

"About time. Let's see what he's managed to make of himself."

She made a gesture like a desultory grab at something in the air above her left shoulder, apparently to beckon Trent along the hall. "Be quick with the door, there's a good boy. We don't want the chill roosting in our old bones."

As soon as the door shut behind him he couldn't distinguish whether the stairs that narrowed the hall by half were carpeted only with dimness. He trudged after his mother past a door that seemed barely sketched on the crawling murk and, more immediately than he expected, another. His mother opened a third, beyond which was the kitchen, he recalled rather than saw. It smelled of damp he hoped was mostly tea. By straining his senses he was just able to discern his father seated in some of the dark. "Shall we have the light on?" Trent suggested.

"Can't you see? Thought you were supposed to be the young one round here." After a pause his father said "Come back for bunny, have you?"

Trent couldn't recall ever having owned a rabbit, toy or otherwise, yet the question seemed capable of reviving some aspect of his childhood. He was feeling surrounded by entirely too much darkness when his mother said "Now, Walter, don't be teasing" and clicked the switch.

The naked dusty bulb seemed to draw the contents of the room inwards—the blackened stove and stained metal sink, the venerable shelves and cabinets and cupboards Trent's father had built, the glossy pallid walls. The old man was sunk in an armchair, the least appropriate of an assortment of seats surrounding the round table decorated with crumbs and unwashed plates. His pear-shaped variously reddish face appeared to have been given over to producing fat to merge with the rest of him. He used both shaky inflated hands to close the lapels of his faded dressing gown over his pendulous chest cobwebbed with grey hairs. "You've got your light," he said, "so take your place."

Lowering himself onto a chair that had once been straight, Trent lost sight of the entrance to the alley—of the impression that it was the only aspect of the yard the window managed to illuminate. "Will I make you some tea?" his mother said.

She wasn't asking him to predict the future, he reassured himself. "So long as you're both having some as well."

"Not much else to do these days."

"It won't be that bad really, will it?" Trent said, forcing a guilty laugh. "Aren't you still seeing..."

"What are we seeing?" his father prompted with some force.

"Your friends," Trent said, having discovered that he couldn't recall a single name. "They can't all have moved away."

"Nobody moves any longer."

Trent didn't know whether to take that as a veiled rebuke. "So what have you two been doing with yourselves lately?"

"Late's the word."

"Nigel's here now," Trent's mother said, perhaps relevantly, over the descending hollow drumroll of the kettle she was filling from the tap.

More time than was reasonable seemed to have passed since he'd entered the house. He was restraining himself from glancing even surreptitiously at his watch when his father quivered an impatient hand at him. "So what are you up to now?"

"He means your work."

"Same as always."

Trent hoped that would suffice until he was able to reclaim his memory from the darkness that had gathered in his skull, but his parents' stares were as blank as his mind. "And what's that?" his mother said.

He felt as though her forgetfulness had seized him. Desperate to be reminded what his briefcase contained, he nevertheless used reaching for it as a chance to glimpse his watch. The next train was due in less than half an hour. As Trent scrabbled at the catches of the briefcase, his father said "New buildings, isn't it? That's what you put up."

"Plan," Trent said, clutching the briefcase on his lap. "I draw them."

"Of course you do," said his mother. "That's what you always wanted."

It was partly so as not to feel minimised that Trent declared "I wouldn't want to be responsible for some of the changes in town."

"Then don't be."

"You won't see much else changing round here," Trent's mother said.

"Didn't anyone object?"

"You have to let the world move on," she said. "Leave it to the young ones."

Trent wasn't sure if he was included in that or only wanted to be. "How long have we had a museum?"

His father's eyes grew so blank Trent could have fancied they weren't in use. "Since I remember."

"No, that's not right," Trent objected as gently as his nerves permitted. "It was a cinema and before that a theatre. You took me to a show there once."

"Did we?" A glint surfaced in his mother's eyes. "We used to like shows, didn't we, Walter? Shows and dancing. Didn't we go on all night sometimes and they wondered where we'd got to?"

Her husband shook his head once slowly, whether to enliven memories or deny their existence Trent couldn't tell. "The show you took me to," he insisted, "I remember someone dancing with a stick. And there was a lady comedian, or maybe not a lady but dressed up."

Perhaps it was the strain of excavating the recollection that made it seem both lurid and encased in darkness—the outsize figure prancing sluggishly about the stage and turning towards him a sly greasy smile as crimson as a wound, the ponderous slap on the boards of feet that sounded unshod, the onslaughts of laughter that followed comments Trent found so incomprehensible he feared they were about him, the shadow that kept swelling on whatever backdrop the performer had, an effect suggesting that the figure was about to grow yet more gigantic. Surely some or preferably most of that was a childhood nightmare rather than a memory. "Was there some tea?" Trent blurted.

At first it seemed his mother's eyes were past seeing through their own blankness. "In the show, do you mean?"

"Here." When that fell short of her he said more urgently "Now."

"Why, you should have reminded me," she protested and stood up. How long had she been seated opposite him? He was so anxious to remember that he didn't immediately grasp what she was doing. "Mother, don't," he nearly screamed, flinging himself off his chair.

"No rush. It isn't anything like ready." She took her hand out of the kettle on the stove—he wasn't sure if he glimpsed steam trailing from her fingers as she replaced the lid. "We haven't got much longer, have we?' she said. "We mustn't keep you from your duties."

"You won't do that again, will you?"

"What's that, son?"

He was dismayed to think she might already have forgotten. "You won't put yourself in danger."

"There's nothing we'd call that round here," his father said.

"You'll look after each other, won't you? I really ought to catch the next train. I'll be back to see you again soon, I promise, and next time it'll be longer."

"It will."

His parents said that not quite in chorus, apparently competing at slowness. "Till next time, then," he said and shook his father's hand before hugging his mother. Both felt disconcertingly cold and unyielding, as if the appearance of each had hardened into a carapace. He gripped the handle of his briefcase while he strove to twist the rusty key in the back door. "I'll go my old way, shall I? It's quicker."

When nobody answered he hauled open the door, which felt unhinged. Cobwebbed weeds sprawled over the doorstep into the kitchen at once. Weedy mounds of earth or rubble had overwhelmed the yard and the path. He picked his way to the gate and with an effort turned his head, but nobody was following to close the gate: his mother was still at her post by the stove, his father was deep in the armchair. He had to use both hands to wrench the bolt out of its socket, and almost forgot to retrieve his briefcase as he stumbled into the alley. The passage was unwelcomingly dark, not least because the light from the house failed to reach it—no, because the kitchen was unlit. He dragged the gate shut and took time to engage the latch before heading for the rear of the museum.

Damp must be stiffening his limbs. He hoped it was in the air, not in his parents' house. Was it affecting his vision as well? When he slogged to the end of the alley the street appeared to be composed of little but darkness, except for the museum. The doors to the old auditorium were further ajar, and as he crossed the road Trent saw figures miming in the dimness. He hadn't time to identify their faces before panting down the alley where brick was ousted by concrete.

Figures sat in the stark restaurants and modelled clothes in windows. Otherwise the street was deserted except for a man who dashed into the station too fast for Trent to see his face. The man let fly a wordless plea and waved his briefcase as he sprinted through the booking hall. Trent had just begun to precipitate himself across the road when he heard the slam of a carriage door. He staggered ahead of his breath onto the platform in time to see the last light of a train vanish into the trees, which looked more like a tunnel than ever.

His skull felt frail with rage again. Once he regained the ability to move he stumped to glower at the timetable next to the boarded-up office. His fiercest glare was unable to change the wait into less than an hour. He marched up and down a few times, but each end of the platform met him with increasing darkness. He had to keep moving to ward off a chill stiffness. He trudged into the street and frowned about him.

The fast-food outlets didn't appeal to him, neither their impersonal refreshments nor the way all the diners faced the street as though to watch him, not that doing so lent them any animation. He couldn't even see anyone eating. Ignoring the raw red childishly-sketched men, he lurched across the road into the alley.

He oughtn't to go to his parents. So instant a return might well confuse them, and just now his own mind felt more than sufficiently unfocused. The only light, however tentative, in the next street came from the museum. He crossed the roadway, which was as lightless as the low sky, and climbed the faint steps.

Was the ticket booth lit? A patch of the blackened glass had been rubbed relatively clear from within. He was fumbling for money to plant on the sill under the gap at the foot of the window when he managed to discern that the figure in the booth was made of wax. While it resembled the middle-aged woman who had occupied the booth when the building was a cinema, it ought to look years—no, decades—older. Its left grey-cardiganed arm was raised to indicate the auditorium. He was unable to judge its expression for the gloom inside the booth. Tramping to the doors, he pushed them wide.

That seemed only to darken the auditorium, but he felt the need to keep on the move before his eyes had quite adjusted. The apparently sourceless twilight put him in mind of the glow doled out by the candle that used to stand in an encrusted saucer on the table by his childhood bed. As he advanced under the enormous unseen roof, he thought he was walking on the same carpet that had led into the cinema and indeed the theatre. He was abreast of the first of the figures on either side of the aisle before he recognised them.

He'd forgotten they were sisters, the two women who had run the bakery and the adjacent bridal shop. Had they really been twins? They were playing bridesmaids in identical white ankle-length dresses—whitish, rather, and trimmed with dust. Presumably it was muslin as well as dust that gloved their hands, which were pointing with all their digits along the aisle. The dull glints of their grimy eyes appeared to spy sidelong on him. He'd taken only a few steps when he stumbled to a halt and peered about him.

The next exhibits were disconcerting enough. No doubt the toyshop owner was meant to be introducing his model railway, but he looked as if he was crouching sideways to grab whatever sought refuge in the miniature tunnel. Opposite him the sweetshop man was enticing children to his counter, which was heaped with sweets powdered grey, by performing on a sugar whistle not entirely distinguishable from his glimmering teeth. Trent hadn't time to ascertain what was odd about the children's wide round eyes, because he was growing aware of the extent of the museum.

Surely it must be a trick of the unreliable illumination, but the more he gazed around him, the further the dimness populated with unmoving figures seemed to stretch. If it actually extended so far ahead and to both sides, it would encompass at least the whole of the street that contained his parents' house. He wavered forward a couple of paces, which only encouraged figures to solidify out of that part of the murk. He swivelled as quickly as he was able and stalked out of the museum.

The echoes of his footsteps pursued him across the lobby like mocking applause. He could hear no other sound, and couldn't tell whether he was being watched from the ticket booth. He found his way down the marble steps and along the front of the museum. In a few seconds he was sidling crabwise along it in order to differentiate the alley from the unlit façade. He wandered further than he should have, and made his way back more slowly. Before long he was groping with his free hand at the wall as he ranged back and forth, but it was no use. There was no alley, just unbroken brick.

He was floundering in search of a crossroads, from which there surely had to be a route to his old house, when he realised he might as well be blind. He glanced back, praying wordlessly for any relief from the dark. There was only the glow from the museum lobby. It seemed as feeble as the candle flame had grown in the moment before it guttered into smoke, and so remote he thought his stiff limbs might be past carrying him to it. When he retreated towards it, at first he seemed not to be moving at all.

More time passed than he could grasp before he felt sure the light was closer. Later still he managed to distinguish the outstretched fingertips of his free hand. He clung to his briefcase as though it might be snatched from him. He was abreast of the lobby, and preparing to abandon its glow for the alley that led to the station, when he thought he heard a whisper from inside the museum. "Are you looking for us?"

It was either a whisper, or so distant that it might as well be one. "We're in here, son," it said, and its companion added "You'll have to come to us."

"Mother?" It was unquestionably her voice, however faint. He almost tripped over the steps as he sent himself into the lobby. For a moment, entangled in the clapping of his footsteps on the marble, he thought he heard a large but muted sound, as of the surreptitious arrangement of a crowd. He blundered to the doors and peered into the auditorium.

Under the roof, which might well have been an extension of the low ponderous black sky, the aisle and its guardians were at least as dim as ever. Had things changed, or had he failed to notice details earlier? The bridal sisters were licking their lips, and he wasn't sure if they were dressed as bridesmaids or baked into giant tiered cakes from which they were trying to struggle free. Both of the toyshop owner's hands looked eager to seize the arrested train if it should try to reach the safety of the tunnel, and the bulging eyes of the children crowded around the man with the sugar whistle —were those sweets? Trent might have retreated if his mother's voice hadn't spoken to him. "That's it, son. Don't leave us this time."

"Have a thought for us. Don't start us wondering where you are again. We're past coming to find you."

"Where are you? I can't see."

"Just carry on straight," his parents' voices took it in turns to murmur.

He faltered before lurching between the first exhibits. Beyond them matters could hardly be said to improve. He did his best not to see too much of the milkman holding the reins of a horse while a cow followed the cart, but the man's left eye seemed large enough for the horse, the right for the cow. Opposite him stood a rag and bone collector whose trade was apparent from the companion that hung onto his arm, and Trent was almost glad of the flickering dimness. "How much further?" he cried in a voice that the place shrank almost to nothing.

"No more than you can walk at your age."

Trent hung onto the impression that his father sounded closer than before and hugged his briefcase while he made his legs carry him past a policeman who'd removed his helmet to reveal a bald-ridged head as pointed as a chrysalis, a priest whose smooth face was balanced on a collar of the same paleness as and no thicker than a child's wrist, a window cleaner with scrawny legs folded like a grasshopper's, a bus conductor choked by his tie that was caught in his ticket machine while at the front of the otherwise deserted vehicle the driver displayed exactly the same would-be comical strangled face and askew swollen tongue... They were nightmares, Trent told himself: some he remembered having suffered as a child, and the rest he was afraid to remember in case they grew clearer. "I still can't see you," he all but wailed.

"Down here, son."

Did they mean ahead? He hoped he wasn't being told to use any of the side aisles, not least because they seemed capable of demonstrating that the place was even vaster than he feared. The sights they contained were more elaborate too. Off to the right was a brass band, not marching but frozen in the act of tiptoeing towards him: though all the players had lowered their instruments, their mouths were perfectly round. In the dimness to his left, and scarcely more luminous, was a reddish bonfire surrounded by figures that wore charred masks, unless those were their faces, and beyond that was a street party where children sat at trestle tables strewn with food and grimaced in imitation of the distorted versions of their faces borne by deflating balloons they held on strings... Trent twisted his stiff body around in case some form of reassurance was to be found behind him, but the exit to the lobby was so distant he could have mistaken it for the last of a flame. He half closed his eyes to blot out the sights he had to pass, only to find that made the shadows of the exhibits and the darkness into which the shadows trailed loom closer, as if the dimness was on the point of being finally extinguished. He was suddenly aware that if the building had still been a theatre, the aisle would have brought him to the stage by now. "Where are you?" he called but was afraid to raise his voice. "Can't you speak?"

"Right here."

His eyes sprang so wide they felt fitted into their sockets. His parents weren't just close, they were behind him. He turned with difficulty and saw why he'd strayed past them. His mother was wearing a top hat and tails and had finished twirling a cane that resembled a lengthening of one knobbly finger; his father was bulging out of a shabby flowered dress that failed to conceal several sections of a pinkish bra. They'd dressed up to cure Trent of his nightmare about the theatre performance, he remembered, but they had only brought it into his waking hours. He backed away from it—from their waxen faces greyish with down, their smiles as fixed as their eyes. His legs collided with an object that folded them up, and he tottered sideways to sit helplessly on it. "That's it, son," his mother succeeded in murmuring.

"That's your place," his father said with a last shifting of his lips.

Trent glared downwards and saw he was trapped by a school desk barely large enough to accommodate him. On either side of him sat motionless children as furred with grey as their desks, even their eyes. Between him and his parents a teacher in a gown and mortarboard was standing not quite still and sneering at him. "Mr Bunnie," Trent gasped, remembering how the teacher had always responded to being addressed by his name as though it was an insult. Then, in a moment of clarity that felt like a beacon in the dark, he realised he had some defence. "This isn't me," he tried to say calmly but firmly. "This is."

His fingers were almost too unmanageable to deal with the briefcase. He levered at the rusty metal buttons with his thumbs until at last the catches flew open and the contents spilled across the desk. For a breath, if he had any, Trent couldn't see them in the dimness, and then he made out that they were half a dozen infantile crayon drawings of houses. "I've done more than that," he struggled to protest, "I am more," but his mouth had finished working. He managed only to raise his head, and never knew which was worse: his paralysis, or his parents' doting smiles, or the sneer that the teacher's face seemed to have widened to encompass—the sneer that had always meant that once a child was inside the school gates, his parents could no longer protect him. It might have been an eternity before the failure of the dimness or of Trent's eyes brought the dark.

All For Sale

"As for All for Sale, a street market did indeed spring up overnight around the first hotel where the family and I stayed in Turkey, and a swarthy hi-fi dealer in Tottenham Court Road once palpated my tits and declared 'You are nice.' Everything can be material, you see."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in the 2003 reissue of Told By The Dead

Written in: 2001
First published in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 13, 2002
Also published in: Told By The Dead

Once they were outside the Mediterranean Nights Barry could hear the girl's every word, starting with "What were you trying to tell me about a plane?"

"Just I, you know, noticed you on it."

"As I said if you heard, I saw you."

"I know. I mean, I did hear, just about." While he gazed at rather than into her dark moonlit eyes that might be glinting with eagerness for him to risk more, he made himself blurt "I hoped I'd see you again."

"Well, now you have." She raised her small face an inch closer to his and formed her pink lips into a prominent smile he couldn't quite take as an invitation to a kiss. Not long after his silence grew intolerable, unrelieved by the hushing of the waves that failed to distract him from the way the huge blurred scarcely muffled rhythm of the disco seemed determined to keep his heartbeat up to speed, she said "So you're called Baz."

"That's only what my friends call me, the guys I was with, I mean. I don't know if you saw them on the plane as well."

"I told you, I saw you."

Her gentle emphasis on the last word encouraged him to admit "I'm Barry really."

"Hello, Barry really," she said and held out a hand. "I'm Janet."

He wiped his hand on his trousers, but they were as clammy from dancing. Her grasp proved to be cool and firm. "So are you staying as long as us?" she said, having let go of him.

"Two weeks. It's our first time abroad."

"There must be worse places to get experience," she said and caught most of a yawn behind her hand as she stretched, pointing her breasts at him through her short thin black dress. "Well, I'm danced out. This girl's for bed."

He could think of plenty of responses, but none he dared utter. He was turning his attention to the jittering of neon on the water when Janet said "You could walk me back if you liked."

As her escort, should he take her hand or at least her arm or even slip his around her slim waist? He didn't feel confident enough along the seafront, where the signs of the clubs turned the faces of the noisy crowds outside into lurid unstable carnival masks. "We're up here," Janet eventually said.

The narrow crooked street also led uphill to his and Paul's and Derek's apartment. Once the pulsating neon and the throbbing competitive rhythms of the discos fell behind, Janet began resting her fingers on his bare arm at each erratically canted bend. He thought of laying a hand over hers, but suspected that would only make her aware of his feverish heat fuelled by alcohol. He became conscious of tasting of it, and was wondering what he could possibly offer her when she clutched at his wrist. "What's that?" she whispered.

He'd thought the trestle table propped against the rough white wall of one of the rudimentary houses that constricted the dim street was heaped with refuse until the heap lifted itself on one arm. Apparently the table served as a bed for an undernourished man wearing not even very many rags. He clawed his long hair aside to display a face rather too close to the skull beneath and thrust out the other hand. "He just wants money," Barry guessed aloud, and in case Janet assumed that was intended as a cue to her, declared "I've got some."

He didn't think he had much. Bony fingers snatched the notes and coins spider-like. At once, too fast for Barry to distinguish how, the man huddled back into resembling waste. "You didn't have to give him all that," Janet murmured as they hurried to the next bend. "You'll be seeing more like him."

Barry feared she thought he'd been trying to impress her with his generosity, which he supposed he might have been. "We like to share what we've got, don't we, us Yorkshire folk."

Before he'd finished speaking he saw that she could think he was making a crude play for her along with emphasising her trace of an accent more than she might like. Her silence gave his thoughts time to grow hot and arid as the night while he trudged beside her up a steep few hundred yards—indeed, overtook her before she said "This is as far as I go."

She was opening her small black spangled handbag outside a door lit by a plastic rectangle that might as well have been a sliver of the moon. "I'm just up the road," he told her.

Did that sound like yet another unintentional suggestion? All she said was "Maybe I'll see you in the market."

"Which one's that?"

She gazed so long into the depths of her bag that he was starting to feel she thought his ignorance unworthy of an answer when she said "What are you going to think of me now."

He had to treat it as a question. "Well, I know we've only—"

"Denise and San have got the keys. I didn't realise I'd drunk that much. Back we go."

She was at the first corner before he'd finished saying "Shall I come with you?"

"No need."

"I will, though."

"Suit yourself," she said and quickened her pace.

He felt virtuous for not abandoning her to pass the man on the table by herself. In fact that stretch was as deserted as the rest of the slippery uneven variously sloping route. The seafront was still crowded, and she had to struggle past a haphazard queue outside the Mediterranean Nights. "I won't be long," she told him.

She was. Once he felt he'd waited longer than enough he tried to follow her, but the swarthy doorman who'd been happy to readmit her showed no such enthusiasm on Barry's behalf. Even if he'd had the money, Barry told himself, he wouldn't have paid to get back in. He supposed he could have said that Paul and Derek would vouch for him—that was assuming they weren't in an especially humorous mood—but he couldn't be bothered arguing with the doorman. If Janet's friends had persuaded her to have another drink or two, or she'd met someone else, that had to be fine with him.

He did his best to look content as he tramped back along the seafront, and was trudging uphill before he indulged in muttering to himself. He fell silent as he passed Janet's lodgings, the Summer Breeze Apartments, on the way to swaying around several jagged unlit bends that hindered his arrival at his own quarters. Some amusement was to be derived from coaxing the key to find the lock of the street door and from reeling up the concrete stairs, two steps up, one back down. Further drunken fumbling was involved in admitting himself to the apartment, where most of the contents of his and Paul's and Derek's cases had yet to fight for space in the wardrobe and the bathroom. At the end of an interlude in the latter, more protracted than conclusive, he lurched through the room containing his friends' beds to the couch in the kitchen area. Without too many curses he succeeded in unfolding the couch and, having fallen over and onto it, dragging a sheet across himself.

Perhaps all he could hear in the street below the window were clubbers returning to their apartments, but they sounded more like a stealthy crowd that wasn't about to go away. He was thinking, if no more than that, of making for the balcony to look when the slam of the street door sent Paul's and Derek's voices up from the muted hubbub. Soon his friends fell into their room, switching on lights at random. "He's here. He's in bed," Paul announced.

"Thought you'd pulled some babe," Derek protested.

"She didn't have her key," Barry roused himself to attempt to pronounce. "You didn't see her coming back, then."

"You could have brought her up here as long as you let us know," Paul said.

"Put a notice on the door or something," said Derek.

"Next time," Barry told them, not that he thought there was much of a chance. Still, he could dream, or perhaps he could only sleep. He hadn't the energy to ask what was happening outside. The murmur from the street and the blundering of his friends about the apartment receded, bearing his awareness, which he was happy to relinquish.

Snoring wakened him—at first, only his own. The refrain was taken up by Derek, who was lying on his back, while Paul gave tongue into a pillow. The chorus was by no means equal to the noise from the street. Unable to make sense of it, Barry dragged the floor-length windows apart and groped between them into unwelcome sunlight. Leaning over the rudimentary concrete balustrade, he blinked his vision into focus. The street had disappeared.

Or rather, its surface had. From bend to bend it was hidden by the awnings of market stalls and by the crowd the stalls had drawn. Barry supported himself on his elbows, though the heat of the concrete was only just bearable, until he succeeded in dredging up some thoughts. His mouth was dry and yet oily with reminiscences of alcohol, his skull felt baked too thin, but shouldn't he wander down in case Janet was hoping to encounter him? Mightn't she have waited, not realising he'd given away the contents of his pocket, for him to rejoin her in the Mediterranean Nights? He picked his way to the bathroom and, having made space for it, drank as much water as he could stomach, then showered and dressed. "I'll be in the market," he said, receiving a mumble from one of his friends and an emphatic snore from the other.

In the lobby the owner of the apartments was crammed into a shabby armchair overlooked by a warren of compartments, some lodging keys, behind the reception counter. He wore a flower-bed of a shirt too large even for him, which framed enough chest hair to cover his bald head. He opened his eyes half an inch and used a forearm to wipe his heavily ruled brow as Barry took out his traveller's cheques. "You want pay?" the owner said.

"Please."

"How much you pay?"

"No, we paid in England. My friend Derek had to show you the voucher when we checked in, remember." When the man only scowled at the beads of sweat his tufted forearm had collected, Barry tried to simplify the point. "The paper said we paid."

"Now you pay for things go smash. Nothing smash, money back."

"Derek's in charge of booking and stuff like that. You'll need to speak to him," Barry said, knowing that with a hangover Derek would be even more combative than usual. "He's the man in charge."

"So why I talk to you?"

Barry pointed at the sign beside the pigeonholes: TRAVVLER'S' CHEKS CACHED. "It says you give money."

For a breath that threatened to pop his shirt buttons the man seemed inclined to misunderstand, and then he thrust a ballpoint bandaged with several thicknesses of inky plaster across the counter. "You put name."

Barry signed a cheque for a hundred pounds as quickly as possible—the pen felt unpleasantly clammy—and handed over both, together with his passport. After the merest blink at Barry's signature, the owner ran his gaze up and down him between several glances at the photograph. At last he leaned back, heaving his stomach high with his thighs, to unlock a drawer and count out a handful of large grubby notes. "You pay me nothing," he complained.

Presumably he meant there was no commission. Barry shoved the notes into his shirt pocket—they felt clammier than the pen had—and was holding out his hand when the man dropped the passport in the drawer. "What you want give me?" the owner said, leering at the hand.

I need my passport."

"I keep now," the owner said and locked the drawer. "You want more pay, you come me."

"I don't think so," Barry told him, but made for the street. Further argument could wait until Paul and Derek were there to join in—all right, and why not, to support him.

As he opened the door he was overwhelmed by heat that competed with the light for fierceness, by the sullen roar of the fire that was the crowd, by the smell of hot wallets, which were all the table nearest the apartments sold. Its immediate neighbour was devoted to leather goods too. The stalls were packed so close together that once he sidled between them he couldn't see the sign above the door—the Summit Apartments, though they were well short of the top of the hill.

Most of the crowd was making its sluggish way upwards, unlike him. Whenever he glanced about for possible souvenirs or presents, and often when he didn't, stallholders launched themselves and whatever English they had at him. "Good price," they persisted. "Special for you." Beyond the corner was a clump of stalls blue with denim, and past that a stretch of trademarks, each of them almost as wide as the T-shirts and other clothes that bore them. Which stalls were likely to appeal to Janet? That was assuming she was even out of bed. He wasn't sure how either of them would have reacted to the other in sight of the next expanse of tables, which were bristling with phallic statues and orgiastic with couples, not to mention more than couples, carved from stone. He dodged the sellers as the hot crowd pressed around him, and struggled to the lower bend.

Had it brought him back to Janet's lodgings? He was trying to see past stalls heaped with electrical goods when a stall-holder, or surely an assistant, younger than himself stepped in front of him. "What you look?"

"Summer Breeze."

The boy made circles with his hands above the stall as if to conjure Barry's needs into view. "Say other."

Barry's head was so full of heat and light and clamour that he could think of nothing else. "Summer Breeze," he heard himself reiterate.

The boy's thin intense face gave up its frown. "Briefs," he said with a gesture of lowering his own and presumably his shorts as well.

"Breeze." Barry jabbed a finger at the building the stall hid, then waved one limp-wristed hand. "Wind," he said in case that could possibly help.

"Here."

As Barry grew aware that the exchange of gestures had made the nearest members of the crowd openly suspicious, he saw the boy pick up a pocket fan and switch it on. "No, that's not it," he said.

"You try," the boy insisted, thrusting it at him.

"No, it's all ow." Barry meant to wave away the offer, but the whirling blades caught his forefinger. "Watch out, you clumsy bugger," he cried.

The boy turned off the fan, which had developed an angry rattling buzz, and peered at it. "You break. You pay."

"Don't be daft," Barry mumbled, sucking his finger, which tasted like a coin. "Your fault, so forget it."

He'd hardly presented his back to the stall when the boy raised his voice. "Pay now. Pay," he called, and other words that Barry didn't comprehend.

Barry saw a scowl spread like an infection through the crowd, who seemed united in obstructing him. He was willing the commotion to attract Janet and her friends—anyone who would understand him—when the crowd parted downhill. Two policemen were heading for him.

They wore khaki shirts and shorts, and pistols in holsters on their right hips. Their dark moist faces bore identical black moustaches. "What is trouble?" the larger and if possible even less jovial officer said.

"He cut me," Barry blurted, displaying his injured finger, and at once felt guilty. "I'm sure it was an accident, but now he wants me to pay."

"You listen."

It was only when the policeman confined himself to glowering that Barry grasped he was required to observe the interview with the youth, which involved much gesturing besides contributions from nearby vendors and members of the crowd. The conference appeared to be reaching agreement, by no means in his favour, when Barry tried to head it off. "I'll pay something if that'll quiet things down. It oughtn't to be much."

The policeman who'd addressed him brushed a thumb and forefinger over his moustache, and Barry had a nervous urge to giggle at the notion that the man was checking the hair hadn't come unglued. He stared at Barry as if suspicious of his thoughts before growling "You go other place. No trouble."

"Thanks," Barry said, though his unpopularity was as clear from the policeman's face as from every other he risked observing. To retreat uphill to take refuge with his friends he would have had to struggle through hostility that looked capable of growing yet more solid. He swung around faster than his parched unstable skull appreciated to dodge and sidle and excuse himself down to the next bend, where he saw light through a shop. Once he was out of the back entrance he should be able to find his way to the rear of the Summit Apartments.

He launched himself between two stalls piled with footwear and into the building, only to waver to a halt as darkness pressed itself like coins onto his eyes. Outlines had only started to grow visible as he headed for the daylight, so that he was halfway through the interior before he realised where he was: not in a shop but in somebody's home. Nevertheless the contents of the trestle tables were unquestionably for sale, a jumble of bedclothes, icons, cutlery, a religious tome with dislocated pages, dresses, spanners and other tools, toys including a life-size baby that the dimness rendered indistinguishable from a real one... He couldn't judge how many people were crouched in gloomy corners of the single room; of the one face he managed to discern, he saw only eyes and teeth. Their dull hungry gleam prompted him to fumble the topmost note off his wad and plant it between the baby's restless feet as he made for the open at a stumbling run. He barely glimpsed all the denizens of the room flinging themselves at the cash.

He'd emerged into more of the market. Only the space just outside the door was clear. Stallholders and their few potential customers swivelled their heads on scrawny necks to watch him. They looked as uninviting as the tables, which were strewn with goods like a rummage sale. Here were clothes he and his friends might have packed to slouch in, here were the contents of several bathrooms—shaving kits, deodorants, even unwrapped bars of soap. The stares he was receiving didn't encourage him to dawdle. He set off as fast up the narrow tortuous dusty street as his hung-over legs would bear.

He hoped any rear entrance to the Summit Apartments would be both accessible and open. Though there were alleys between the streets, all were blocked by stalls or vans or refuse. He kept catching sight of the crowd, not including anyone who'd witnessed his difference with the youth. He might have considered dodging through a house to reach his street, but the old people dressed like shadows who were sitting in every open doorway looked worse than inhospitable. At least there weren't many more stalls ahead.

The next offered an assortment of electrical goods: cameras, camcorders and battery chargers, a couple of personal stereos, whose rhythmic whispers reminded him that before he'd gone to university and after he'd left it as well, his parents had often complained the stereos weren't personal enough. Suddenly he yearned to be home and starting work at the computer warehouse, the best job he'd been able to sell himself to, or even not having come away on holiday with his old friends from school. He glanced past the stall into an alley and saw them.

"Paul," he shouted, "Derek," as their heads bobbed downhill, borne by the sluggish crowd. They'd looked preoccupied, perhaps with finding him. He would have used the alley if the bulk of a van hadn't been parked mere inches short of both walls. "I'm here," he yelled, digging the heels of his hands into his chin and his fingertips into the bridge of his nose. "Over here," he pleaded at the top of his voice, and Paul turned towards him.

He would have seen Barry if he'd raised his eyes. Having surveyed the crowd between himself and the alley, he said something to Derek that caused him to glance about before vanishing downhill. The next moment, as Barry sucked in a breath that almost blinded him with the whiteness of the houses, Paul had gone too.

Barry bellowed their names and waved until his finger sprinkled the wall with a Morse phrase in blood. None of this was any use. Members of the crowd scowled along the alley at him while the vendors around him glared at him as if he was somehow giving them away. As he fell silent, the personal stereos renewed their bid for audibility. Wasn't the one at the front of the stall playing his favourite album? He could have taken it for the stereo he'd left in the apartment. He reached for the headphones, but the stall-holder, whose leathery face seemed to have been shrivelled in the course of producing an unkempt greyish beard, tapped his arm with a jagged fingernail. "Buy, you listen," he said.

Barry had no idea what he was being told, and suddenly no wish to linger. He might have enough of a problem at the apartments, since he hadn't brought a key with him. Best to save his energy in case he needed to persuade the owner to admit him to his room, he thought as he toiled past the final stall. It was heaped with suitcases, three of which reminded him of his and Paul's and Derek's. Of course there must be many like them, which was why he'd wrapped the handle of his case in bright green tape. Indeed, a greenish fragment adhered to the handle of the case that resembled his so much.

As he leaned forward to confirm what he could hardly believe, the stall-holder stepped in front of him. He wore a sack-like garment that hid none of the muscles and veins of his arms. His small dark thoroughly hairy face appeared to have been sun-dried almost to the bone, revealing a few haphazard blackened teeth. His eyes weren't much less pale and cracked and blank than the wall behind him. "You want?" he said.

"Where'd you get these?"

"Very cheap. Not much use."

The man was staring so hard at him he could have intended to deny Barry had spoken. Barry was about to repeat himself louder when he heard a faint sound above the awning, and raised his unsteady head to see the owner of the Summit Apartments watching him with a loose lopsided smile from an upper window. "What do you know about it?" Barry shouted.

If the man responded, it wasn't to him. He addressed at least a sentence to the stall-holder, whose gaze remained fixed on Barry while growing even blanker. Barry was about to retreat downhill in search of his friends when he noticed that the vendors he'd encountered in the lesser market had been drawn by the argument or, to judge by their purposeful lack of expression, by whatever the man at the window had said. "All right. Forget it. I will," Barry lied and moved away from them.

At first he only walked. He'd reached the first alley that led to the topmost section of the main market when the owner of the Summit Apartments blocked the far end. Sandalled footsteps clattered after Barry, who almost lost the remains of his balance as he twisted to see the vendors filling the width of the street. An understated trail of blood led through the dust to him. He sprinted then, but so did his pursuers with a clacking of their sandals, and the owner of the apartments managed to arrive at the next alley as he did. Above it there were only houses that scarcely looked entitled to the name, with rubbish piled against their closed doors, their windows either shuttered or boarded up. A few dizzy panting hundred yards took him beyond them to the top of the hill.

Two policemen were smoking on it. Though he saw nothing to hold their attention, they had their backs to him. Beyond the hill there was very little to the landscape, as if it had put all its effort into the tourist area. It was the colour of sun-bleached bone, and scattered with rubble and the occasional building, more like a chunk of rock with holes in. A few trees seemed hardly to have found the energy to raise themselves, let alone grow green. Closer to the hill, several goats waited to be fed or slaughtered. Barry was vaguely aware of all this as he hurried to the policemen. "Can you help?" he gasped.

They turned to bristle their moustaches at him. It didn't matter that they were the policemen he'd encountered earlier, he told himself, nor did their sharing a fat amateur cigarette. "All my stuff is in the market," he said. "I know who took it, and not just mine either."

The officer who'd previously spoken to him held up one large weathered palm. Barry kept going, since the gesture was directed at his pursuers. "You come," the man urged him.

Barry had almost reached him when the policemen moved apart, revealing a stout post, a larger version of those to which the goats were tethered. He saw the other officer nod at the small crowd—more than Barry had noticed were behind him. As the realisation swung him around, his hands were captured, handcuffed against his spine and hauled up so that the chain could be attached to a rusty hook on the post. "What are you doing?" Barry felt incredulous enough to waste time asking before he began to shout, partly in the hope that there were tourists close enough to hear him. "Not me. I haven't done anything. It was him from the Summit. It was them. Don't let them get away."

The stallholders from the cheapest region of the market were wandering downhill, leaving the owner of the apartments together with three other people as huge and glistening. The only woman looked pained by Barry's protests or at least the noise of them. The policemen deftly emptied his pockets, and while the man who'd spoken to him in the market pocketed his cash, the other folded the traveller's cheques in half and stuffed them in Barry's mouth. Barry could emit no more than a choked gurgle past the taste of cardboard as the Summit man waddled up to squeeze his chest in both hands and tweak his nipples. "You nice," he told Barry as he made way for the others to palpate Barry's shrinking genitals and in the woman's case to emit a motherly sound at his injured finger before sucking it so hard he felt the nail pull away from the quick. All this done, the four began to wave obese wads of money at the policemen and at one another. Barry was struggling both to spit out the gag and to disbelieve what was taking place when he saw three girls appear where the houses gave way to rubble.

The girl in the middle was Janet. Presumably she hadn't been to bed, since she was wearing the same clothes and supporting or being supported by her friends, or both. They looked as if they couldn't quite make out the events on top of the hill. Barry threw himself from side to side and did his utmost to produce a noise that would sound like an appeal for help, but succeeded only in further gagging himself. He saw Janet blink and let go of one of her friends in order to shade her eyes. For an instant she seemed to recognise him. Then she stumbled backwards and grabbed at her companions. The three of them staggered around as one and swayed giggling downhill.

If he could believe anything now, he wanted to think she hadn't really seen him or had failed to understand. He watched the bidding come to an end, and felt as though it concerned someone other than himself or who had ceased to be. The woman plodded to scrutinise him afresh, pinching his face between a fat clammy finger and thumb that drove the gag deeper into his mouth. "Will do," she said, separating her wad into halves that the policemen stuffed into their pockets.

While she lumbered downhill the owner of the apartments handed Barry's passport to the policeman who had never spoken to him, and who clanked open a hulk of a lighter to melt it. The last flaming scrap curled up in the dust as the woman reappeared in a dilapidated truck. The policemen lifted Barry off the post and slung him into the back of the vehicle and slammed the tailgate.

The last he saw of them was their ironic dual salute as the truck jolted away. Sweat and insects swarmed over him while the animal smell of his predecessor occupied his nostrils and the traveller's cheques turned to pulp in his mouth as he was driven into the pitiless voracious land.

2002

Fear The Dead

"I was asked to write a new tale for an anthology of stories about fear. I still have some I haven't told yet. I've published a few recently that touch on the afterlife. We must hope they're fiction."—Ramsey Campbell, Introduction to the story in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 15, 2003.

First published in The Fear Within, 2002
Also published in: Just Behind You

Someone else he didn't think he'd ever seen before leaned down as if to let him count all her wrinkles. "I wish I'd had the chance to say goodbye to my grandmama, Jonathan."

Another lady dressed in at least as much black and holding her wineglass askew parted her pale lips, which looked as though they had once been stitched together. "Now you know she's at peace."

As he remembered how his grandmother's cheek had felt like a cold crumpled wad of paper he had to kiss, the winner of the wrinkle competition said "What a brave little soul. He's a credit to his mother."

"And his father."

"Careful or you'll drip."

The stitched lady straightened up her glass. "We don't want stains on your lovely carpet, do we, Jonathan? They don't make them like that any more."

He thought the elaborate carpet felt like the rest of the house—furtively chill and damp. "I can just hear her saying that, old Ire," his father joined him to remark.

"Her friends never called Iris that," the stitched mouth objected. "Oh, whatever's wrong, you poor little fellow?"

While Jonathan struggled to think of a reply that wouldn't be the truth, his mother hurried over to confront his father. "Are you upsetting him, Lawrence?"

"Only saying I could hear your mother pricing the contents of the house. Half of it Jonno wasn't supposed to touch," he confided to the wrinkled ladies. "You must have felt like you were living in a museum, did you, Jonno?"

Jonathan was yet more afraid to speak. The wineglass slouched again as its lady crooked her other thin arm around his shoulders and murmured "Don't worry, your daddy wasn't really hearing her. She's gone to Jesus and she'll be talking to him."

The mention of Jesus appeared to draw the priest, who smelled rather like an unlit candle wrapped in linen. He hoisted his tumbler of orange juice to acknowledge Jonathan's. "That's the right road. That's what real men drink."

"Is my grandma really talking to Jesus now?"

"I shouldn't be at all surprised, but it won't do any harm to pray she is."

"How long do you think she'll be?" Jonathan pleaded.

"That's one of the things God's keeping as a surprise for us. We won't know till we see her again."

"The father means till we're with Jesus too," Jonathan's mother made haste to say.

"Isn't she supposed to be there for ever?"

"If you keep your faith up," the priest said with a smile that was less than wholly aimed at Jonathan, "I'm sure she will be. You know Jesus has time for everyone."

How could Jesus deal with all the dead? God was meant to be able to see everyone at once, and perhaps his son had inherited the trick, but that wasn't the same as talking to them. If Jonathan's grandmother thought she didn't have Jesus's full attention, Jonathan could imagine her stalking off in search of someone who would have to notice her. He might have put some of this into words if the priest hadn't moved away, leaving Jonathan's parents to argue. "What are you trying to make Jonathan think of my mother?"

"Whatever's the truth, Essie."

"You didn't stay around to see it."

"Jonno knows why, don't you, Jonno? It's nobody's fault Ire and I didn't get on. I expect there are people you don't with."

"Maybe it was up to you to make the effort, Lawrence, considering it was her house."

"Well, now it's yours, and I don't feel any more welcome."

"I don't know how you'd expect me to change that."

"It's sounding like time I absented myself."

Jonathan thought he might leave it at that, having loaded his voice with dignity, but then his father swayed at him as though its weight had unbalanced him. "I'm sorry this had to be our day this week, Jonno. I'll take you somewhere better next weekend."

Jonathan watched his father's untypically sombre back view merge with the blackness of the crowd, and then he had to undergo a succession of pats on the head and kisses that felt like dried fruit brushing his cheek as mourners took their leave of his mother. Before long there was only Trudy, who also taught at the college. She ran her small hand several times up and down his mother's hefty arm. "You need to talk, I can tell."

"I could bear to," his mother admitted, and gave him a smile beneath a frown. "Don't bother helping clear up, Jonathan. You've had a long day and made us proud of you. I should go to bed."

He never understood why people said they should do things when they meant him. "I'm hungry," he said, not least in case he might be, and covered a plate with some of the remains of the buffet before sitting on a chair that protested like all his grandmother's furniture. When he'd managed to clear almost half of the plate, his mother intervened. "Don't stuff yourself for the sake of it or you won't be able to sleep."

That was something else to dread. He could only climb the stairs that were wider than his arms could stretch, and too dim under the yellowish chandelier, and creaked one by one as if they were playing a funeral tune. Until now he hadn't minded that the bathroom, which was almost big enough to be public and just as whitely tiled, echoed all his noises as if someone thinner than himself was hiding in it. He rushed through a token version of everything he had to do and fled next door to his bedroom.

Why did it need to be so big? It was at least twice the size of his room in the house where he'd lived with his parents until his grandmother had to be looked after at night—sometimes she'd prayed without seeming to breathe, and sometimes she'd wanted his mother to remember everything they'd done together and agree there had never been any bad times. Jonathan tried to feel grateful for the room, though it shrank his bed to a cot and his desk to a toddler's surrounded at a distance by furniture so gloomy—dressing-table, wardrobe, chest of drawers—he imagined it was waiting for him to misbehave. The books his grandmother had given him because she'd thought them suitable failed to welcome him; they just helped darken the room. The only one he could bring to mind concerned some children who made everyone believe an old lady was a witch, and it was too late for them to be sorry when she killed herself and couldn't go to heaven. He struggled to forget it as he inched under the bedclothes without pulling them free of the mattress, but already knew what the story brought back to him.

"Never speak ill of the dead," his grandmother used to warn him, "or they'll come back and haunt you." She'd gone into worse detail, especially during her last weeks. He would never say anything hurtful about her, and surely he needn't be afraid his mother had wanted him out of the way so that she could. She and Trudy were climbing the stairs now and saying nothing at all.

Trudy placed a moist kiss on top of the one his mother left on his forehead. The women moved to either side of the bed to tighten the sheets over him, then retreated to the door. "Sweet dreams or none at all," Trudy said, resting one black-varnished nail on the light switch. "Do we have the light out, Esther? I expect a big boy like Jonathan must."

"We won't be long. Trudy's staying over. I know," his mother said. "You have the light off and we'll come up and talk in my room."

He was afraid to aggravate her concern for him. "All right," he mumbled and turned his back.

The dark fell on him at once. He made himself wait until their footsteps began imitating one another on the stairs, then he twisted face up and jabbed his fingers together on his chest. What was he expected to say? He'd only started praying when his grandmother had assumed he did and asked him to on her behalf. Every night before he went to sleep he'd implored God not to take her away, but the idea of pleading for her to return terrified him. "Please God take care of my grandma," he muttered as he thought of it. "Please tell her she was the best grandma ever. And the best mum too," he felt compelled to blurt.

Surely that would make up for any criticisms his mother might let drop. She and Trudy were laughing in the kitchen, but that could hardly be about his grandmother. He was unable to think how long it was since he'd heard his mother laugh. He remembered the night his grandmother had emitted a snore so loud it had made him giggle in bed. "Mother?" his mother had called, though she was beside her, and more loudly "Mother?" suggesting that his grandmother had been retreating into the distance of the room. Then there was silence until she'd said "Oh" as if what she was seeing had almost robbed her of breath.

She and Trudy had finished laughing, perhaps because the house made them sound too small and shrill. Now they were lowering their voices as they came upstairs. They weren't scared to be overheard by anyone who'd been up here with him, he told himself: they were showing respect for his grandmother or trying not to waken him. Creaks marked their progress to his mother's room. Her door hadn't quite closed when he heard Trudy murmur "You say whatever you need to, Esther. It's part of dealing with your loss."

He couldn't distinguish what his mother said, even once he dragged himself free of the bedclothes and crouched against the headboard. When he lowered one reluctant foot, it was greeted with a creak by the floor, which felt as chill as his grandmother's face had last time he'd touched her. More than a dozen hasty paces took him through the dimness thick as the musty curtains, past the audience of hulking half-seen furniture, to the door. He inched it ajar and was confronted by his grandmother's room.

Her door was shut. That managed to seem reassuring until he thought of the darkness beyond it, even vaster than the dark behind him. Suppose that as he'd ventured to his door, his grandmother had reached hers with far longer strides of her spidery legs and was pressing her face against an upper panel? He was trying to find his next breath when he heard his mother say "I hate to admit it, but Lawrence was right. She was never happy till you knew how much everything she had was worth."

Jonathan sucked in air so that he could whisper "You were just proud of it, weren't you, grandma? I expect you still are. You should be, because it's so nice."

He was frightened to raise his voice, but equally frightened by the possibility that she was close enough to hear his whisper. He didn't realise he'd flinched from the prospect that her door might jerk open until the floor creaked beneath him. "Is that you, Jonathan?" his mother called.

He hung onto the door while he closed it as swiftly as he could without making a sound, then had to let go and turn to the glimmering slab of his bed. "I didn't hear anything. Have a top up so you sleep as well," he heard Trudy say, and a clink of glass. The creaks of his retreat obscured what the women said next, and once he was huddled in bed he couldn't understand them. "Please God don't let my grandma hear anything bad about her," he began to whisper, interspersed with words to her. "Mum thinks you were the best mum. She's just talking because she's upset like her friend said."

Soon the only word he was aware of uttering was mum. It must have lulled him to sleep, because he was awakened by his name creeping like a draught into his ear. A face was looming almost into his. He shrank across the mattress, dragging the bedclothes free, before he realised that daylight was showing him Trudy. "Shush now," she murmured. "We'll have to do something about those nerves of yours. Get up quietly and get ready and I'll run you to school. Esther's catching up on her sleep."

Once dressed, he found that Trudy had readied a bowl of cereal and some bread and jam, presumably because cookery might rouse his mother. Trudy watched with tentative fondness as he did his duty by the breakfast, then stopped just short of touching him while ushering him out to her car, which had front seats but no rear. Its smallness was a relief from the house, but drew the amusement of dozens of boys on the way to his school. The massive houses split amoeba-like along the route, and the school had undergone even more fission, separating into six unequal buildings that felt like a test the place was setting him. He was halfway through his first term, but the school still overwhelmed him. When Trudy left him at the gates with a wave of her fingertips that bore a kiss, he would have lost himself in the enormous crowded schoolyard if two boys a head taller than himself hadn't stopped him. "She your girlfriend?" said the one with a moustache or grime occupying sections of his upper lip.

"Could be his new ma," said his crony, the left side of whose chin boasted a single black curly hair.

"Gently now, gentlemen." This was Mr Foster, the long-faced English teacher who wore his greying hair in a ponytail. He pinched or massaged the backs of their necks until he'd finished saying "We don't harass our new fellows, do we? Especially when they've just lost a member of the family."

"Never mind touching us," one boy muttered as Mr Foster steered Jonathan away by an elbow to enquire "Are you fit to come back to school, Hastings?"

Being addressed by his surname was yet another aspect of the place Jonathan had still to accept. "I think so, sir," he said.

He'd hoped school would take his mind off his grandmother, but now he felt that anybody there might bring her up. Suppose she proved to be the theme of the morning assembly? Once the pupils had been herded into the main building, however, and the staff had taken their seats onstage in the assembly hall, the headmaster lectured about the football team and how their performance should inspire the other pupils to try harder. Jonathan was trying to keep that in mind when Mr Foster singled him out at the beginning of the English lesson. "Is there anything you'd like to share with us, Hastings?"

"Like what, sir?"

"Such as, I believe you mean. About your bereavement."

"Such as what, sir?" Jonathan wished he didn't feel bound to ask.

"Forgive me if you think I'm prying." The teacher's face had managed to lengthen itself, and looked capable of pouting when Jonathan failed to answer. "Recollect in tranquillity," Mr Foster told himself, and seemed inspired. "That can be your subject for homework, all of you. Write about a loss, whatever it may be."

Could Jonathan's grandmother read what he wrote about her? In at least one way writing was different from talking—it was even harder—but surely it would give him more to say aloud about her. The trouble was that the prospect of writing drove all his thoughts for it out of his head. His skull felt emptied throughout the English lesson and the other classes, interrupted by lunch and larking in the schoolyard, activities that came no nearer reaching him than the questions teachers aimed at him. He assumed they toned down their responses to his uselessness because they knew about his grandmother.

None of the boys he'd made any kind of friends with lived near him. Soon his route home left him alone with the November dark, which he could have imagined the houses were hauling down from the sky. The dark had moved into his grandmother's house. The faltering light of the streetlamp beyond the unreasonably long drive showed him the key in his hand. The jerky shadow of a branch of the tree that hid the house from passers-by clawed at his wrist as he unlocked the front door.

Like his grandmother, it was half as tall again as Jonathan. The dimmest stretch of the glow from the streetlamp twitched underfoot as he sprinted to turn on the jangling chandelier. Its grudging illumination lent him the courage to shut himself in before dashing to switch on the kitchen light. He dropped his schoolbag on the table with a thump that seemed both too loud and dwarfed by the room, and hauled open the refrigerator to pour himself a drink. At once he knew what he could write.

He spread his books across the table and sat on the least creaky chair. "I'm going to say some nice things about you, grandma," he murmured. "I'll read you them when I've finished."

He wished he hadn't thought of that—it made him nervous of the silence around him and behind him. Having ceased its mousy scurrying across the page, the nib emitted a blot like an emphatic full stop. He crossed out the sentence that seemed eager to complete itself. Mr Foster said you had to show your first draft as well as your finished work, though Jonathan's grandmother had kept saying it looked untidy. The idea of her prowling soundlessly behind him to crane over his shoulder made him feel steeped in the lurking chill of the house. "I'll read you what I've written," he said as loudly as he dared.

He wanted to believe she was at least as distant as her room. He raised his voice so that it would be audible up there, and didn't realise it was deafening him to any sounds until he was asked "Have you brought someone home, Jonathan?"

"Just doing my homework," he found the breath to tell his mother as she and Trudy marched along the hall.

"Why, do you have to read it to your class?" She kissed his forehead before stooping to examine his homework while Trudy looked uncertain whether to do either. Eventually his mother straightened up and blinked at his forehead as though she had a mind to take back the kiss. "Well, if that's how you remember it, Jonathan."

"That's how grandma was."

"No need to shout. We're only here." He was hoping she would leave it at that when she said "I'd like to be home when you come in, you know, even if I mightn't give you snacks so close to dinner. Unfortunately I have to earn a living, particularly since my mother's attitudes got to be too much for your father. And by the way, I don't think you need to upset yourself over the fridge. If you can open it she could. Most of the time she wasn't quite as feeble as she liked to pretend."

"Go on, Esther, let it all come out." To Jonathan Trudy said "People have different ways of grieving, and this is how your mother has to. Are you finding yours?"

"I've got to go upstairs now."

"You can work better there, I expect," his mother said. "We'll call you when it's dinner."

He could tell she wanted to believe she hadn't distressed him, while Trudy thought he was off to grieve. Neither was the case. He loaded his schoolbag and climbed into the dimness that hung around the chandelier. Even when he switched on the upstairs light, gloom seemed to cling to the landing and the corridor. He felt as if his grandmother's disapproval had been roused: she used to say you shouldn't have more than one light on at a time. She'd just been trying to save money for her family, he told himself. "Mum only meant she wished she could be more like you, grandma," he muttered. "I expect that means she will be."

His voice faltered as he saw his blurred shadow growing smaller on a lower panel of his grandmother's door. Either he was unaware of shrinking from the notion that she was within arm's reach of the other side or the door was creeping open. The voice that made him see it lurch backwards because he had was his mother's. "Is that Jonathan talking to himself? What's wrong with him?"

"Will it be his way of coping, do you think?"

He should have closed the kitchen door. He shut himself in his room and moved his desk away from the wall so that he could sit facing the room with surely no space for anyone, no matter how thin, to sidle behind him. He didn't need to finish his English homework until the weekend. Instead he applied himself to sums that he was supposed to call arithmetic now that he'd changed schools. He was feeling sure enough of his pencilled answers to commit ink to them when Trudy called "It's waiting for you, Jonathan."

He left his bedroom light on so that it would be there for him, his mother's phrase that finally conveyed some meaning, and hurried to the dining room. His mother was ladling out a lamb casserole as Trudy filled glasses with wine and his with juice while the sideboard and dresser kept their distance from the table yet helped it aggravate the disapproving sombreness. "Did you get much done?" his mother asked him.

"I won't do it about grandma after all."

"I hope that's not because of me." When he failed to think of a safe reply she said "What does your subject have to be?"

"Losing something."

"What else can you say you've lost beside your grandmother? Unless you're intending to tell your teacher how your father absconded."

Jonathan wasn't sure of the last word, but otherwise his thoughts seemed not to be hidden from anyone. "Are you still unhappy about him, Jonathan?" Trudy said, stroking his arm.

"Sometimes."

"Doesn't seeing him every week help?" Having watched until Jonathan repeated his nod, she said "Give it time and maybe there'll be someone extra in your life if that's what you'd like."

Just now he felt he had to concentrate all his liking on his grandmother. "I don't know," he mumbled.

Rather less than a look passed between Trudy and his mother. He could have done without the impression that another secret was at large in the house. Once dinner was finished he would have watched the Tuesday quiz shows with his mother, but their guest had to see a programme she'd told her history students to watch. The documentary about people being tortured by the Inquisition until they believed they were as bad as they were told only sharpened his unease. As soon as the credits began to crawl up the screen he retreated upstairs to talk to God and his grandmother.

He hadn't been in bed long when his mother came to give his forehead a lingering kiss, which she used to say was putting good dreams in. "Not asleep yet? I expect having the light off will help," she said. "Don't be surprised if you hear someone else upstairs."

"Who?" Jonathan gasped, scarcely a word.

"Trudy, of course. She'll be staying."

Since she would hardly be sleeping in his grandmother's old bed, presumably she would share his mother's—had shared it last night too. He wished he'd asked to sleep there instead of alone in the dark. Once his mother left him in it he found a solitary sentence to repeat. "Please God let my grandmother hear just nice things about her."

Shouldn't that settle everything? At last it let him sleep. He lurched awake, anxious not to be confronted by Trudy's face again, but only daylight had stolen into his room. While he was in the bathroom Trudy and his mother collaborated on breakfast before running him to school in his mother's car, which had space for all of them. Outside the school gates, as he leaned forward from the back seat to deliver a kiss he hoped would be too swift for his schoolfellows to see, both women turned to him. Their cheeks brushed together, and they exchanged smiles not unlike shy kisses, magnifying his awkwardness as he stumbled into the yard.

Yesterday's tormentors converged on him. "Found them yet?" said the boy with the tidemarked upper lip.

"What?" Jonathan was distracted enough to wonder.

"They're a what now, are they?" said the boy whose chin flourished a lone hair. "Thought it was a who you lost."

"She died," Jonathan said, hoping that would silence them. "My grandma."

"Was she old?" That sounded sympathetic until the greyish-lipped boy added "Did she smell?"

"Bet she does now," his friend said.

"He was right after all. She'll be a what by now."

"Like the dead cat we found with maggots for eyes."

"Looked like he was laughing about it."

"Those girls didn't laugh much when we threw—"

That was the last Jonathan heard as he dodged almost blindly through the crowd in search of somewhere he could be alone to talk to his grandmother. A smell of something like tobacco drifted out of the toilets, but even if they'd been deserted, how could he have invited her to follow him in there? He sneaked into the main school building by a side door and dashed along the overheated corridor to sit on the hard seat attached to his desk. "They don't know anything about you, grandma," he murmured urgently. "You'll never be like that. They were just making it up."

He couldn't hear her voice, he reassured himself, but remembering was close to hearing. "Never speak ill of the dead or they'll come back and haunt you. They'll come back and show you how ugly you've made them." When the bell shrilled he bruised his knees on the underside of the desk. He reached the hall in time to mingle with the others so that the staff wouldn't realise he'd skulked into the school rather than being healthy in the yard. Throughout the headmaster's address, and intermittently in all the lessons, he kept hearing his grandmother's words and could only respond with last night's prayer. More boys giggled each time he had to mutter. The teachers must be restraining themselves because of his grandmother—he had no idea how he might have responded if they'd spoken rather than merely frowning at him.

Tattered clouds like cobwebs laden with grime raced to meet him as he hurried home. They left the sky behind them no less dark. He let himself into the house and switched on the dimness before venturing upstairs. "You didn't hear anything bad today, did you, grandma?" he whispered at her door. "God wouldn't let you. Please God don't."

There was no sound from her room. If she'd been listening, the floorboards would surely have made her presence as apparent as they were making his. He was suddenly convinced he had been talking to nobody at all—for how long, he didn't know. He grabbed the chilly scalloped brass knob and threw open the door.

The room looked yet more enormous for its emptiness. He could have imagined all the heavy mournful furniture was huddling against the walls. A wedge of murky twilight had managed to slip between the ponderous sombre curtains to emphasise the isolation of the bed, on which a fat faded patchwork quilt was drawn over a flattened stack of pillows. "Aren't you there, grandma?" Jonathan barely said.

Perhaps he glimpsed the shadow of a cloud that was drifting unseen past the window, but the quilt appeared to stir as if something it concealed was trying to take shape and draw breath. He peered into the dimness until he grasped how terrified he was to see. Flinging himself backwards, he dragged the door shut and fled downstairs. "I'm sorry, grandma. I didn't mean to—" he cried, and interrupted himself. "Please God don't let her," he repeated while he spread his schoolbooks across the kitchen table and attempted to work.

He didn't know how his mother might react to his writing about his father. It could wait until the weekend, when Jonathan would be staying with him. The boy chanted his prayer as an accompaniment to copying a map of the world, and fell silent only when he heard Trudy and his mother at the front door.

Their wide smiles were virtually identical. "So how was your day?" Trudy asked.

It seemed safest not to be specific. "Just stuff."

"What did you learn, then?" said his mother.

All he could remember was praying. "More stuff."

"Never mind if you'd rather not tell us." Her smile drained into her face as she remarked to Trudy "I expect we'd hear it all if my mother was doing the asking."

Could his grandmother take that as a criticism? "I'm just..." Jonathan mumbled, and ran upstairs. "See, I said mum wants to be like you," he whispered from the top stair, and repeated his plea to God several times before descending to the kitchen.

"I didn't mean to upset you," his mother assured him. "Eat up your dinner and forget what I said."

He was able to achieve the first requirement and pretend the second was accomplished. Might she refrain from talking about his grandmother for fear of upsetting him? After dinner he finished his geography homework in the kitchen and then watched some of a television programme about how men were the cause of all conflict. He didn't mind if his mother and Trudy thought that included him so long as it drew blame away from his grandmother.

He still had to pray with every breath so as to fall asleep. He wakened in daylight to hear laughter downstairs—the night seemed to have renewed the women somehow. His tormentors didn't come to find him in the schoolyard, and his classmates had tired of giggling when he felt compelled to pray. He couldn't have predicted the question with which his mother greeted him that night. "Jonathan," she said, sitting down at the table to clasp his hands. "Aren't you happy at this school?"

"Why?" he blurted in case that gave him time to think.

"Just tell me. Tell us, Trudy's your friend too. What's disturbing you?"

He could think of nothing his grandmother mightn't be blamed for. It was Trudy who said "Shouldn't you explain..."

"You're right, I've missed a step. Jonathan, your headmaster rang me. He says you keep talking to yourself in class."

Barely in time he saw how to tell something like the truth. "I was just trying to get things right."

"So that's why you were reading out your essay the other night. You'll have to stop doing it at school, though, or you'll have people thinking you're—You'll put them off their own work."

He thought he'd convinced her all was well. He was on his way to bed when he overheard her saying "It's my mother again. Living with her, that's what's made him so nervy, and no wonder."

He dashed into his room and huddled in the bed to pray. He had to stop when he heard Trudy and his mother on the stairs: if his mother overheard him she would think he was mad—she'd almost said so—while explaining his behaviour seemed capable of making the situation even worse. At last his prayers under the bedclothes gave way to sleep and then to muddy daylight that smelled of hot food.

His mother and Trudy insisted on kissing him before he could escape from the car. He hastened through the gates to find his tormentors awaiting him. "How many mothers have you got?" enquired the boy with the grubby upper lip.

His singularly hairy crony imitated his disgusted grin. "Do they both live at your house?"

"Why shouldn't they?" Jonathan was confused enough to ask.

"Bet your grandma wouldn't like it."

"Bet they're glad she's dead."

"Bet they wouldn't want to smell her now, though."

All Jonathan's dismay and bewilderment surged like bile into his mouth. "Maybe you will."

The boys looked as if he'd shocked them by going further than they dared. "What do you reckon you'll do?" the boy with the sole hair spluttered.

"Nothing. You've done it," Jonathan told them and hid in the crowd.

He wasn't going to pray to protect them. He didn't mutter once in class. He mustn't ask his mother about Trudy in case his grandmother might indeed have disapproved of her—in case that made his mother say things he would have to rectify. Instead he could tell her about his day, except that when she and Trudy came home, holding hands just long enough for him to see, she surprised him by asking "Would you like Lawrence to pick you up from school tomorrow?"

"Don't you mind?"

"Why would anyone mind? That way you can spend a long weekend with him to make up for the last one and Trudy and I will sort out the house."

Would that include his grandmother's room? Tonight he had no sense of her presence. If the room was cleared out, mightn't that mean she would stay with Jesus, since she would have nowhere to return to? He thought it best to continue praying once he was in bed. "Please God don't let her hear us saying anything bad about her," he repeated on the way to sleep.

He felt as if he'd hidden the implications of his words from himself until he was back at school. He couldn't see his tormentors when he braved the yard. He left his suitcase full of clothes and other weekend items in the secretary's office and hurried out to search, only to be found by Mr Foster, who was on yard duty. "There's a pensive young face."

"Sorry, sir."

"No need to apologise for thinking." As Jonathan wondered if that was necessarily true, the teacher said "Feeling more at home now?"

"I think so, sir."

"You can expect a respite from the comedy, at any rate."

Jonathan had noticed none. "Which is that, sir?"

"The comedians. The young teasers you encountered earlier in the week. The school will have to do without their routines for a while."

That almost robbed Jonathan of the breath it took to demand "Why?"

"They appear to have taken up slapstick." Mr Foster frowned at himself or at Jonathan's terseness. "They climbed up on a roof they should have known wouldn't support them, not that they ought to have been anywhere near it."

What might they have been fleeing? Jonathan's grandmother would have said they'd brought it on themselves. Having thanked Mr Foster, who seemed to wonder why, he found a gap between two school buildings to hide in. "Please God look after my grandma now. Don't let her hear anything else bad," he added, and "I expect those boys have learned their lesson."

He wouldn't have minded if they had returned to school in time to see his father collect him in the Land Rover. His father had finished work early, having designed enough houses for one week. He'd once said Jonathan's grandmother's house was too big for today and itself, which she'd taken as an insult. "We'll have a lively weekend, shall we?" he said, shaking Jonathan's hand.

Jonathan tried as hard as he could tell his father's lady did. She was called but not spelled Zoh, and kept attempting to make her face even smaller and prettier while she acted girlish with his father or motherly with Jonathan. She and his father took him to restaurants and films and a museum and a game where they had to dodge through a maze and shoot one another with lasers, Zoh emitting a coy reproachful squeal whenever she was hit. Between some of these events he spent time in their apartment, where the rooms were uncluttered and elegantly plain and unobtrusively warm. He was sure they were just the right size, not least his bedroom, but he felt as if the place wasn't quite reaching him. Perhaps it was the other way round, since he couldn't stop wondering what was happening at his grandmother's house.

Wondering overwhelmed his English homework. The harder he struggled to resolve his uncertainty or to write, the more the page and his brain competed at blankness. He had to welcome the sight of half a car on Sunday, though it was only Trudy who had come for him. He even wished he hadn't greeted her with "Where's mum?"

"Making a welcome-home dinner."

Given the looks Trudy was exchanging with Zoh and his father, Jonathan felt all the more anxious to return to his grandmother's. "See you next weekend," he said, dealing his father's hand a shake and disappointing Zoh with one before scrambling into the car.

The fairground neon of the city centre had faded beyond the old and in some cases unbroken lamps standing guard throughout the suburb when Trudy said "Had a good break?"

"What from? I don't need a break from my mum."

"Nor from me either, I hope."

He felt bound to be polite while he tried to think. "No," he mumbled.

"That's good. Esther and I have had a chance to get a few things clearer."

All at once he was certain he knew why they'd wanted him out of the way —knew what he'd failed to realise. "You've been talking about my grandma."

"Among other issues."

"What did you say about her?"

"Me, nothing to speak of."

"What did mum?"

"Quite a flood. Everything she had to. It wasn't all bad."

"How much was?"

"Best if you discuss it together. I expect she'd like to share your memories now."

She mustn't until he'd remembered enough to counteract hers. Why hadn't he written about his grandmother while he'd had the chance? As the car turned along her street he felt like a small animal trapped inside his own head, darting about in search of a way of escape. He would have to flee upstairs and pray his hardest without being heard by his mother, but how long would she leave before coming to find him?

His suitcase dragged his arm down as he followed Trudy to the house. The shadow of a branch clutched at her wrist when she inserted his grandmother's key in the lock. He wished he were seeing his grandmother catch hold of her as the door swung inwards, revealing the dark.

Why was the house unlit if his mother was home? It didn't feel deserted, and her car was in the drive. He hung back until Trudy switched on the chandelier, illuminating a note in his mother's handwriting on the third stair. Just run down the road for ingredients, it said.

So it wasn't his mother he sensed waiting in the house. At once he was sure what to do. His grandmother's condition was Trudy's fault—she'd encouraged his mother to say all she could. Had his mother even finished? Perhaps she might have more and worse to say if Trudy stayed. He used his luggage to push the front door shut and dumped his suitcase in the hall. "Come and see something," he said.

"Is it a surprise?" Trudy said, widening her eyes and raising half her mouth.

"You'll have to say," he told her and turned hastily to the stairs.

The house felt as breathless with anticipation as he was. The creak of stairs counted the seconds and confirmed Trudy was following. The chandelier seemed to lower itself like a huge murkily luminous spider while the door of his grandmother's room held itself still as a trap. On the landing he halted, uncertain whether he'd heard the faintest sound beyond her door—a shuffling that grew thinner, increasingly less suggestive of feet, as it approached. "What is it, Jonathan?" Trudy said.

"Your surprise. Come and look."

On the whole she seemed pleased he'd grabbed her hand. She accompanied him willingly enough, even when he seized the icy knob and flung open his grandmother's door. "You put the light on," he said.

"Of course, if you want me to." Making it clear that she was puzzled but determined, she stepped through the doorway and pressed down the switch with a fingertip. "What am I meant to be seeing, Jonathan? It's just a room."

"Have a better look," he said, though he was tempted to believe her: the room was emptier than last time he'd seen it—the bed had been stripped to its stale piebald mattress. His grandmother wouldn't want to lie on that; perhaps she was hiding in one of the massive wardrobes, though she'd disliked games she considered to be childish. He urged himself into the room and swung around to catch Trudy's hand again. "Let's look in—"

His voice froze in his throat as he saw what was crouched behind her in the dimmest corner of the room. It could almost have been a swollen bunch of sticks, except that it was patched with rags of clothes or skin. Lolling on top of it was an object that looked pinched with chill and peeling with damp and distorted by worse than either. It hadn't much he would have liked to call a mouth or a nose, and was crowned with lumps of dust or hair. He might not have recognised it if his grandmother's eyes hadn't been glaring out of a section like an irregular piece of old toadstool. He hung onto Trudy and nodded at the corner. "There," he whispered.

She kept her gaze on him. "What now, Jonathan?"

"What you wanted. It's behind you, look."

"You mustn't do things like that. Even if you're still upset it isn't very pleasant, is it? You can tell me what's wrong. I'd like you to, it'd make me feel more like family. Just talk."

He saw his grandmother's eyes bulge in the remnant of a face while the rest of her crouched smaller and lower as if she was about to spring. He tried to drag Trudy to confront this—he was growing desperate enough to reach up for her head to twist it round. "I will if you look."

He felt her grow tense and make herself relax. She was beginning to turn her head when the shape in the corner unfolded itself and tottered to its full height. It jerked out a hand with little in the way of fingers, and he thought it was going to fasten on Trudy's shoulder. The next moment the light was gone, and Trudy clutched at him. "Did you—"

He wriggled free and dodged out of the room, snatching the door shut. If Trudy switched the light on she would come face to face with the thing she'd made of his grandmother, and otherwise she would be alone with it in the dark. It was suddenly apparent to him that his grandmother didn't want anyone to see her as she was now, and he wondered what she might do to gain control of the light switch. He was hanging onto the doorknob with both hands when the front door slammed. "I'm back again," his mother called. "Where's everyone?"

"Could you come up?" Trudy responded rather less than steadily. "I'm shut in and I can't seem to find..."

"Where are you? Hold on." Jonathan's mother ran upstairs and halted at the top. "Where's Trudy?" she asked him. "What are you—"

"I'm in here, Esther."

"What on earth do you think you're doing, Jonathan? Let go at once."

He was afraid that if she opened the door she would see his grandmother. She had to prise his fingers off the knob in order to let Trudy out. As Trudy fled onto the landing, he saw that the room was still unlit. "Trudy, I'm sorry," his mother cried. "Tell me what happened."

"Just an attempt to scare me off," Trudy said more or less evenly. "I'm afraid someone doesn't want me here."

"My grandma doesn't. She doesn't like you making mum say bad things about her."

"I think you'd better get ready for bed and stay in it," his mother told him.

The women followed him into the hall and watched him trudge, weighed down by injustice and luggage, to his room. Was Trudy staying? His grandmother wouldn't have to go far to find her, then. The thought failed to lessen his dismay at his grandmother's state. He raced through preparing for bed and took as much refuge in it as he could. Trudy and his mother were murmuring downstairs, largely incomprehensibly. "He'll have to get used to it," he heard his mother say.

Did she mean Trudy or her own criticisms of his grandmother? How much would he have to pray to compensate for whatever she'd said over the weekend? He set about chanting his plea, only to wonder if it was too late. He couldn't bring any other prayers to mind. Before long his mind gave up being awake.

He dreamed Trudy was inciting his mother to say worse and worse—at least, he hoped it was a dream. "That's right, keep pulling me to bits," he seemed to hear his grandmother complain. "Pull some more off me." She'd go to Trudy in the night, he thought, hoping she would. The idea transfixed him with panic. At first he couldn't understand why, even when he floundered awake—and then he realised how much of the fault was his. He'd willed his grandmother to look her worst for Trudy and his tormentors in the schoolyard.

He couldn't deny he was glad that Trudy had crept into his room and was stooping to rouse him. When he blinked his eyes wide, however, it wasn't Trudy's face he saw looming closer in the dimness. What the boys had said about his grandmother had overtaken her. Even if she couldn't see him, she could grope in search of him. He cowered under the bedclothes and tried to pray but could think of no words. Surely the noise he was making would bring his mother, or Trudy would do. Perhaps they were punishing him, because all it attracted was the sensation of less than hands plucking at the bedclothes. The time until dawn felt like for ever, and dawn might only show him what was waiting to be seen.

Eyes End

A collaboration with John B. Ford.
First published in The Evil Entwines, 2002

Once out of Chester, Kennedy stopped as soon as he could and consulted the map. Wales or Yorkshire? Mountains or mountains? He could go faster on the motorways that would take him into Yorkshire, to wherever he would spend the night and take a nap as soon as he'd checked in. Last night in Newark he'd hardly slept for the thundering of trucks past the hotel.

The motorway was full of trucks too, more so than the freeways at home. Of course there was less space in England for everything. The yellowed Cheshire fields stretched away into haze, the concrete hightway shimmered with exhausts and July heat and made him feel less than fully away, especially when he had to overtake vehicles several times the length of his. He kept to the inside lane as much as he could, and so he was able to examine the hitchhiker before drawing level with him.

He never even slowed for hikers back home, and the more he distinguished of this one, the less inclined he was to stop for him: a thin young man wearing dusty clothes and wraparound sunglasses. The glasses were too big for him, for he pushed them high on the bridge of his nose twice as Kennedy sped towards him. Kennedy hardly noticed the second time for staring at the placard the youth was holding.

Perhaps it was just the result of Kennedy's drive fatigue, but the names of hoped-for destinations on hikers placards seemed to have been growing odder. In Norfolk someone had held up a card marked 'Sleeping'; for a confused moment Kennedy had thought he was being accused of doing so. And the next day, on the way to Chester, he'd glimpsed a card for 'Weeping'. All the same, he had to slow in order to convince himself the dusty youth was displaying a sign for somewhere called 'Eyes End', and then it was a mixture of curiosity and guilt at the thought of having raised the hiker's hopes that made him swing the car onto the hard shoulder and wait.

The hiker took a minute or more to walk not even two hundred yards to the car. He seemed to find walking painful. At least this was something Kennedy had in common with him. Watching him grow in the rear-view mirror of his Escort, Kennedy had a sudden urge not to get involved but he hadn't reached a decision when the hiker lurched alongside the car, stuffing the placard under one arm while he removed his glasses to peer at Kennedy as though he hoped to recognise him. Kennedy rolled the window down. "Eyes End," he said.

The hiker made no reply, only peered pink-eyed at him. Having decided he didn't know Kennedy, he seemed bewildered—not because Kennedy had never heard of the place, surely; perhaps by the left hand drive. All at once he limped fast around the car, almost into the path of a truck, and clambered into the passenger seat.

He might at least have asked for a ride, Kennedy thought, or said thank you. Perhaps he was too busy stowing the placard under his feet (there were holes in his shoes, and his feet were dusty) and snatching off his glasses, which he'd replaced on his nose to keep them out of the way. "You'll tell me when you want me to stop," Kennedy said, starting the car.

The motorway curved up towards the sun, which had the sky to itself. He wondered if his passenger disliked motorways or felt uneasy riding in the right-hand seat. The skinny hands with their bitten nails were turning the sunglasses over and over in the grubby denim lap. "Cool it," Kennedy muttered as trucks on either side of him started his adrenaline, and saw that the motorway was about to divide. "I'm taking the left fork," he said.

The bloodshot eyes narrowed. "Yes," said his passenger, sounding anything but hopeful.

At least he could talk in a high harsh voice, but said nothing further. As the motorway widened he narrowed his eyes and leaned forward to peer ahead, hands gripping the sunglasses, until Kennedy feared they would shatter. Junction 12 went by, a concrete ramp leading up to a bright blue route diagram, and the hiker sucked in a breath to mutter something monosyllabic. "Say again?" Kennedy said, turning from the empty motorway to smile faintly at him, and when the youth only slitted his eyes, explained, "I didn't hear you." But the youth was pressing his shoulders into the seat and pointing with one bloodily bitten finger.

"Here," he croaked.

Kennnedy just had time to glimpse a junction sign that looked blurred by the heat before the slip road was on him. Junction 13, it was, but he hadn't been quick enough to read the destination. Pity for the limping youth made him drive onto the ramp. Besides, off the motorway he could park for a nap.

The slip road sloped down quite steeply before it emerged into the open, where the hiker jammed his sunglasses onto his nose. Admittedly there wasn't much to see: colourless fields so blurred by low-lying haze that it was impossible to tell what grew there, fields stretching to the horizon; no sign of the nearby river, which must be higher than the road now. The road led almost straight to the horizon or rather to the edge of the haze, and Kennedy was damned if he'd let the hiker play dumb any longer: for one thing, he needed conversation to keep him awake. "Did you come far?" he said.

The youth looked at him and yet at the same time seemed to look straight through him. Still he offered nothing in the way of amiable conversation, just a barely audible "Yes." For the first time it occurred to Kennedy that the hiker may be some form of UK equivalent to the junkies found in many of the bigger cities back home; it was obvious to him that the youth was in both mental and physical distress—his mind was far from focused on actuality. This made the fact that he had been the one sharp enough to spot and read the junction sign seem quite peculiar.

Kennezy experienced the bizarre thought that perhaps the roles being played out were in fact much the reverse to what they appeared: wasn't it true that he was the one more akin to a desperate walker who had hitched a ride and now been diverted to some alternative destination? Perhaps he had already fallen asleep at the wheel and the hitchhiker was a dream figment, a corresponding image of circumstance which had entered his mind in some disguised form of Death. He looked at the youth's gaunt face, suddenly experiencing the arrival of humour when he pictured it fleshless and hooded inside a black cowl.

The lack of conversation served only to emphasise the hum of the car's engine. Kennedy compared it to the drone of some outdated aircraft; he imagined himself the pilot of a Boeing Flying Fortress which was high above Berlin, and his co-pilot, he was very high and up there with him! That's why they didn't communicate, he understood now—they had to keep total radio silence and not even speak to each other. They had to give their full concentration to the mission. "We've got to concentrate and get these babies to fall on target!" he said to the youth. The hiker nodded and bit his finger nervously.

It was perhaps five minutes later when the youth showed he had enough intelligence to string a sentence together. "It's the next on your left, a very narrow lane." Kennedy was no longer surprised by the youth's assumption that he would be taken all the way to his destination, or by the fact that he now found himself obeying his will and taking the desired turn. The low-lying haze appeared blue-green in colour and also appeared to have thickened; there was an unearthly look about it which caused Kennedy some unaccountable apprehension. "Cloud's pretty thick today, I don't know if we'll be able to go in."

"Do you want to abort the mission?" asked a concerned voice. "Maybe it will be safer if you don't go through with this." Kennedy wasn't sure who had just spoken.

"I'll take her further in but if conditions worsen, we'll have to call a halt."

The lane they travelled along was a single-track road; if Kennedy wanted to turn around he would have to find a wider part. The heat of the sun seemed hotter because of its narrow confinement between the two hawthorn hedges which marked the lane's course. Kennedy yawned as another wave of fatigue swept over his body, infiltrating his brain. He wanted only to get this dangerous mission over and done with; just wanted to do what he had to do, and then return home safely. His anxiety caused him to press down harder on the accelerator pedal of the car... and once more he was propelled back through the years.

The spotlights searched the dark of the Berlin night for him, illuminating the cloud cover just as he entered it; then the big guns fired hopeful shells into the frenzied air and made to claim his life before he claimed the lives of others. Many times he had dispensed death upon this city, yet still he felt for all those seized by helpless panic down on the ground. Thus his anxiety was doubled: he feared not only for himself but for those at his mercy. The cloud was thick but he couldn't turn back now, maybe he still wasn't over the industrial region he'd hoped for, but he'd have to let his deadly cargo loose very soon.

The explosion came without the slightest warning. He felt intense pain in his right leg as fragments of flying metal cut into it. The youth beside him screamed in his high harsh voice, then Kennedy's eyes were focused on the present day once more. The car's windscreen had shattered and fallen away into a million tiny pieces, and through the space it had now vacated Kennedy saw the crunched-up bonnet and the oak tree which had halted his progress. Beside him, he heard the youth groaning in pain and was then able to watch him through blurry eyes as he unbuckled his seatbelt and staggered out of the car. His last vision before consciousness left him was of the youth climbing a stile and limping away across a field—towards the waiting haze. But surely it was only imagination when his clothing appeared to be the apparel of an American pilot, and when the wraparound sunglasses looked more like goggles...

Kennedy felt icy cold when he awoke. Darkness shrouded everything so thickly that not even the outline of the car or the oak tree was visible to his eyes. Despite the numbness of his body, he was still able to move. In fact he was moving, walking through the bitter cold and darkness, as though at some point he had managed to leave the car and somehow walk away in a state of trance. Suddenly he found himself standing in the field just opposite, staring towards the cloud of blue-green haze. It had now taken on a luminous quality to contrast against the dark. Also, the field about him no longer appeared bland, for it was populated throughout by a mass of crimson poppies, all of them standing as stiff and still as upright corpses. A thousand voices spoke simultaneously inside his head:

"Lest you should ever forget!"

As Kennedy walked onwards the haze thickened still more; it drifted towards him and circled around his body like the loving arms of a mother, or maybe those of a murderess intent on slow strangulation. After a while it retreated some little distance, building and reshaping itself; soon it had skilfully moulded into the shape of dome, then purposely it encompassed him within its airy walls. An explosion sounded and Kennedy saw thin streams of blood filtering upwards from the places where each ruddy flower had grown, these now spreading over the walls in the fashion of giant bloodstains.

Another explosion was followed by the sound of pain-filled screams. In synchronisation with this, the surrounding walls of the dome filled with visions of blood-smeared faces, each one gazing outward with accusing eyes of hatred fixed upon him. They began to spin in a vortex of nightmarish sights and sounds, rising upward in the shape of a cyclone which sought to launch him to the stars, or drive him into the ground. But in the fraction of one single second, darkness filled his eyes once more, then absolute silence reigned in his ears.

Kennedy knew he was no longer in the field. He could feel the presence of a dreadful tension which clung to the darkness; it was apparent throughout all the manufactured void of silence about him. It was the prelude to one moment of great terror, a form of terror which was then announced via the sudden wail of an air raid siren. All around him came the sound of running feet and panicked voices. Every voice spoke in German and was filled with fear, but after some seconds developed a more sinister quality, and he began... he began to understand what they were saying.

"You are an old man with blood on your hands!"

"You are an old man with blood on your hands!"

"You are an old man with blood on your hands!"

There was a sound of heavy droning in the sky above; an engine of death and destruction neared its target. He gazed upward through the night, focusing on the spotlights in order to try and locate the mindless murderer in the sky, yet still he could see nothing but the lights reflecting back off the thick cloudbank, that natural barrier referred to by all airmen as eye block, or Eyes End.

Very suddenly, a series of ear-splitting explosions knocked him from his feet, flames sprang up from buildings which before had been shrouded in darkness. And from deep inside Kennedy's lungs came a scream of anguish, it was a scream that had carried on throughout all the years of his life and had never ended. Because on that night back in 1944, he had of course failed to dispense one of the bombs he had carried. Silently it had ticked away through all the years, haunting him from his youth until this very day —the last day of his life. In his mind's eye he sat in a street in Berlin, the dead and dying all around him; his imagination had taken him to that place many times in the past. But now, finally, the last bomb had fallen and exploded. It had detonated in the shape of one vast explosion of guilt and distortion inside Kennedy's head... and it had been fatal.

It was half an hour after the crash when the police patrol car found Kennedy slumped at the wheel of his Escort. Managing to force the buckled door open, the young constable who had just completed his medical training looked for sign of a pulse.

"No luck, sir. His body's still lukewarm but there's no sign of a pulse. Curious thing, though, his cheeks are wet with tears. It looks as though he must have been Weeping right up until he died. What do you think caused him to hit the tree, sir?"

"I don't know," came the reply. "At his age he was most probably Sleeping at the wheel or something."

2003

The Place Of Revelation

First published in 13 Horrors, 2003
Also published in: Just Behind You

At dinner Colin's parents do most of the talking. His mother starts by saying "Sit down," and as soon as he does his father says "Sit up." Auntie Dot lets Colin glimpse a sympathetic grin while Uncle Lucian gives him a secret one, neither of which helps him feel less nervous. They're eating off plates as expensive as the one he broke last time they visited, when his parents acted as if he'd meant to drop it even though the relatives insisted it didn't matter and at least his uncle thought so. "Delicious as always," his mother says when Auntie Dot asks yet again if Colin's food is all right, and his father offers "I expect he's just tired, Dorothy." At least that's an excuse, which Colin might welcome except it prompts his aunt to say "If you've had enough I should scamper off to bye-byes, Colin. For a treat you can leave us the washing up."

Everyone is waiting for him to go to his room. Even though his parents keep saying how well he does in English and how the art mistress said he should take up painting at secondary school, he's expected only to mumble agreement whenever he's told to speak up for himself. For the first time he tries arguing. "I'll do it. I don't mind."

"You've heard what's wanted," his father says in a voice that seems to weigh his mouth down.

"You catch up on your sleep," his mother says more gently, "then you'll be able to enjoy yourself tomorrow."

Beyond her Uncle Lucian is nodding eagerly, but nobody else sees. Everyone watches Colin trudge into the high wide hall. It offers him a light, and there's another above the stairs that smell of their new fat brown carpet, and one more in the upstairs corridor. They only put off the dark. Colin is taking time on each stair until his father lets him hear "Is he getting ready for bed yet?" For fear of having to explain his apprehensiveness he flees to the bathroom.

With its tiles white as a blizzard it's brighter than the hall, but its floral scent makes Colin feel it's only pretending to be a room. As he brushes his teeth the mirror shows him foaming at the mouth as though his nerves have given him a fit. When he heads for his room, the doorway opposite presents him with a view across his parents' bed of the hospital he can't help thinking is a front for the graveyard down the hill. It's lit up as pale as a tombstone, whereas his window that's edged with tendrils of frost is full of nothing but darkness, which he imagines rising massively from the fields to greet the black sky. Even if the curtains shut tight they wouldn't keep out his sense of it, nor does the flimsy furniture that's yellow as the wine they're drinking downstairs. He huddles under the plump quilt and leaves the light on while he listens to the kitchen clatter. All too soon it comes to an end, and he hears someone padding upstairs so softly they might almost not be there at all.

As the door inches open with a faint creak that puts him in mind of the lifting of a lid, he grabs the edge of the quilt and hauls it over his face. "You aren't asleep yet, then," his mother says. "I thought you might have drifted off."

Colin uncovers his face and bumps his shoulders against the bars behind the pillow. "I can't get to sleep, so can I come down?"

"No need for that, Colin. I expect you're trying too hard. Just think of nice times you've had and then you'll go off. You know there's nothing really to stop you."

She's making him feel so alone that he no longer cares if he gives away his secrets. "There is."

"Colin, you're not a baby any more. You didn't act like this when you were. Try not to upset people. Will you do that for us?"

"If you want."

She frowns at his reluctance. "I'm sure it's what you want as well. Just be as thoughtful as I know you are."

Everything she says reminds him how little she knows. She leans down to kiss each of his eyes shut, and as she straightens up, the cord above the bed turns the kisses into darkness with a click. Can he hold onto the feeling long enough to fall asleep? Once he hears the door close he burrows under the quilt and strives to be aware of nothing beyond the bed. He concentrates on the faint scent of the quilt that nestles on his face, he listens to the silence that the pillow and the quilt press against his ears. The weight of the quilt is beginning to feel vague and soft as sleep when the darkness whispers his name. "I'm asleep," he tries complaining, however babyish and stupid it sounds.

"Not yet, Colin," Uncle Lucian says. "Story first. You can't have forgotten."

He hasn't, of course. He remembers every bedtime story since the first, when he didn't know it would lead to the next day's walk. "I thought we'd have finished," he protests.

"Quietly, son. We don't want anyone disturbed, do we? One last story."

Colin wants to stay where he can't see and yet he wants to know. He inches the quilt down from his face. The gap between the curtains has admitted a sliver of moonlight that turns the edges of objects a glimmering white. A sketch of his uncle's face the colour of bone hovers by the bed. His smile glints, and his eyes shine like stars so distant they remind Colin how limitless the dark is. That's one reason why he blurts "Can't we just go wherever it is tomorrow?"

"You need to get ready while you're asleep. You should know that's how it works." As Uncle Lucian leans closer, the light tinges his gaunt face except where it's hollowed out with shadows, and Colin is reminded of the moon looming from behind a cloud. "Wait now, here's an idea," his uncle murmurs. "That ought to help."

Colin realises he would rather not ask "What?"

"Tell the stories back to me. You'll find someone to tell one day, you know. You'll be like me."

The prospect fails to appeal to Colin, who pleads "I'm too tired."

"They'll wake you up. Your mother was saying how good you are at stories. That's thanks to me and mine. Go on before anyone comes up and hears."

A cork pops downstairs, and Colin knows there's little chance of being interrupted. "I don't know what to say."

"I can't tell you that, Colin. They're your stories now. They're part of you. You've got to find your own way to tell them."

As Uncle Lucian's eyes glitter like ice Colin hears himself say "Once..."

"That's the spirit. That's how it has to start."

"Once there was a boy.

"Called Colin. Sorry. You won't hear another breath out of me."

"Once there was a boy who went walking in the country on a day like it was today. The grass in the fields looked like feathers where all the birds in the world had been fighting, and all the fallen leaves were showing their bones. The sun was so low every crumb of frost had its own shadow, and his footprints had shadows in when he looked behind him, and walking felt like breaking little bones under his feet. The day was so cold he kept thinking the clouds were bits of ice that had cracked off the sky and dropped on the edge of the earth. The wind kept scratching his face and pulling the last few leaves off the trees, only if the leaves went back he knew they were birds. It was meant to be the shortest day, but it felt as if time had died because everything was too slippery or too empty for it to get hold of. So he thought he'd done everything there was to do and seen everything there was to see when he saw a hole like a gate through a hedge."

"That's the way." Uncle Lucian's eyes have begun to shine like fragments of the moon. "Make it your story."

"He wasn't sure if there was an old gate or the hedge had grown like one. He didn't know it was one of the places where the world is twisted. All he could see was more hedge at the sides of a bendy path. So he followed it round and round, and it felt like going inside a shell. Then he got dizzy with running to find the middle, because it seemed to take hours and the bends never got any smaller. But just when he was thinking he'd stop and turn back if the spiky hedges let him, he came to where the path led all round a pond that was covered with ice. Only the pond oughtn't to have been so big, all the path he'd run round should have squeezed it little. So he was walking round the pond to see if he could find the trick when the sun showed him the flat white faces everywhere under the ice.

"There were children and parents who'd come searching for them, and old people too. They were everyone the maze had brought to the pond, and they were all calling him. Their eyes were opening as slow as holes in the ice and growing too big, and their mouths were moving like fish mouths out of water, and the wind in the hedge was their cold rattly voice telling him he had to stay for ever, because he couldn't see the path away from the pond—there was just hedge everywhere he looked. Only then he heard his uncle's voice somewhere in it, telling him he had to walk back in all his footprints like a witch dancing backwards and then he'd be able to escape."

This is the part Colin likes least, but his uncle murmurs eagerly "And was he?"

"He thought he never could till he remembered what his footprints looked like. When he turned round he could just see them with the frost creeping to swallow them up. So he started walking back in them, and he heard the ice on the pond start to crack to let all the bodies with the turned-up faces climb out. He saw thin white fingers pushing the edge of the ice up and digging their nails into the frosty path. His footprints led him back through the gap the place had tried to stop him finding in the hedge, but he could see hands flopping out of the pond like frogs. He still had to walk all the way back to the gate like that, and every step he took the hedges tried to catch him, and he heard more ice being pushed up and people crawling after him. It felt like the place had got hold of his middle and his neck and screwed them round so far he'd never be able to walk forward again. He came out of the gate at last, and then he had to walk round the fields till it was nearly dark to get back into walking in an ordinary way so his mother and father wouldn't notice there was something new about him and want to know what he'd been doing."

Colin doesn't mind if that makes his uncle feel at least a little guilty, but Uncle Lucian says "What happens next?"

Colin hears his parents and his aunt forgetting to keep their voices low downstairs. He still can't make out what they're saying, though they must think he's asleep. "The next year he went walking in the woods," he can't avoid admitting.

"What kind of a day would that have been, I wonder?"

"Sunny. Full of birds and squirrels and butterflies. So hot he felt like he was wearing the sun on his head, and the only place he could take it off was the woods, because if he went back to the house his mother and father would say he ought to be out walking. So he'd gone a long way under the trees when he felt them change."

"He could now. Most people wouldn't until it was too late, but he felt..."

"Something had crept up behind him. He was under some trees that put their branches together like hands with hundreds of fingers praying. And when he looked he saw the trees he'd already gone under were exactly the same as the ones he still had to, like he was looking in a mirror except he couldn't see himself in it. So he started to run but as soon as he moved, the half of the tunnel of trees he had to go through began to stretch itself till he couldn't see the far end, and when he looked behind him it had happened there as well."

"He knew what to do this time, didn't he? He hardly even needed to be told."

"He had to go forwards walking backwards and never look to see what was behind him. And as soon as he did he saw the way he'd come start to shrink. Only that wasn't all he saw, because leaves started running up and down the trees, except they weren't leaves. They were insects pretending to be them, or maybe they weren't insects. He could hear them scuttling about behind him, and he was afraid the way he had to go wasn't shrinking, it was growing as much longer as the way he'd come was getting shorter. Then all the scuttling things ran onto the branches over his head, and he thought they'd fall on him if he didn't stop trying to escape. But his body kept moving even though he wished it wouldn't, and he heard a great flapping as if he was in a cave and bats were flying off the roof, and then something landed on his head. It was just the sunlight, and he'd come out of the woods the same place he'd gone in. All the way back he felt he was walking away from the house, and his mother said he'd got a bit of sunstroke."

"He never told her otherwise, did he? He knew most people aren't ready to know what's behind the world."

"That's what his uncle kept telling him."

"He was proud to be chosen, wasn't he? He must have known it's the greatest privilege to be shown the old secrets."

Colin has begun to wish he could stop talking about himself as though he's someone else, but the tales won't let go of him—they've closed around him like the dark. "What was his next adventure?" it whispers with his uncle's moonlit smiling mouth.

"The next year his uncle took him walking in an older wood. Even his mother and father might have noticed there was something wrong with it and told him not to go in far." When his uncle doesn't acknowledge any criticism but only smiles wider and more whitely Colin has to add "There was nothing except sun in the sky, but as soon as you went in the woods you had to step on shadows everywhere, and that was the only way you knew there was still a sun. And the day was so still it felt like the woods were pretending they never breathed, but the shadows kept moving whenever he wasn't looking—he kept nearly seeing very tall ones hide behind the trees. So he wanted to get through the woods as fast as he could, and that's why he ran straight onto the stepping stones when he came to a stream."

Colin would like to run fast through the story too, but his uncle wants to know "How many stones were there again?"

"Ten, and they looked so close together he didn't have to stretch to walk. Only he was on the middle two when he felt them start to move. And when he looked down he saw the stream was really as deep as the sky, and lying on the bottom was a giant made out of rocks and moss that was holding up its arms to him. They were longer than he didn't know how many trees stuck together, and their hands were as big as the roots of an old tree, and he was standing on top of two of the fingers. Then the giant's eyes began to open like boulders rolling about in the mud, and its mouth opened like a cave and sent up a laugh in a bubble that spattered the boy with mud, and the stones he was on started to move apart."

"His uncle was always with him though, wasn't he?"

"The boy couldn't see him," Colin says in case this lets his uncle realise how it felt, and then he knows his uncle already did. "He heard him saying you mustn't look down, because being seen was what woke up the god of the wood. So the boy kept looking straight ahead, though he could see the shadows that weren't shadows crowding behind the trees to wait for him. He could feel how even the water underneath him wanted him to slip on the slimy stones, and how the stones were ready to swim apart so he'd fall between them if he caught the smallest glimpse of them. Then he did, and the one he was standing on sank deep into the water, but he'd jumped on the bank of the stream. The shadows that must have been the bits that were left of people who'd looked down too long let him see his uncle, and they walked to the other side of the woods. Maybe he wouldn't have got there without his uncle, because the shadows kept dancing around them to make them think there was no way between the trees."

"Brave boy, to see all that." Darkness has reclaimed the left side of Uncle Lucian's face; Colin is reminded of a moon that the night is squeezing out of shape. "Don't stop now, Colin," his uncle says. "Remember last year."

This is taking longer than his bedtime stories ever have. Colin feels as if the versions he's reciting may rob him of his whole night's sleep. Downstairs his parents and his aunt sound as if they need to talk for hours yet. "It was here in town," he says accusingly. "It was down in Lower Brichester."

He wants to communicate how betrayed he felt, by the city or his uncle or by both. He'd thought houses and people would keep away the old things, but now he knows that nobody who can't see can help. "It was where the boy's mother and father wouldn't have liked him to go," he says, but that simply makes him feel the way his uncle's stories do, frightened and excited and unable to separate the feelings. "Half the houses were shut up with boards but people were still using them, and there were men and ladies on the corners of the streets waiting for whoever wanted them or stuff they were selling. And in the middle of it all there were railway lines and passages to walk under them. Only the people who lived round there must have felt something, because there was one passage nobody walked through."

"But the boy did."

'A man sitting drinking with his legs in the road told him not to, but he did. His uncle went through another passage and said he'd meet him on the other side. Anyone could have seen something was wrong with the tunnel, because people had dropped needles all over the place except in there. But it looked like it'd just be a minute to walk through, less if you ran. So the boy started to hurry through, only he tried to be quiet because he didn't like how his feet made so much noise he kept thinking someone was following him, except it sounded more like lots of fingers tapping on the bricks behind him. When he managed to be quiet the noise didn't all go away, but he tried to think it was water dripping, because he felt it cold and wet on the top of his head. Then more of it touched the back of his neck, but he didn't want to look round, because the passage was getting darker behind him. He was in the middle of the tunnel when the cold touch landed on his face and made him look."

His uncle's face is barely outlined, but his eyes take on an extra gleam. "And when he looked."

"He saw why the passage was so dark, with all the arms as thin as his poking out of the bricks. They could grow long enough to reach halfway down the passage and grope around till they found him with their fingers that were as wet as worms. Then he couldn't even see them, because the half of the passage he had to walk through was filling up with arms as well, so many he couldn't see out. And all he could do was what his uncle's story had said, stay absolutely still, because if he tried to run the hands would grab him and drag him through the walls into the earth, and he wouldn't even be able to die of how they did it. So he shut his eyes to be as blind as the things with the arms were, that's if there wasn't just one thing behind the walls. And after he nearly forgot how to breathe the hands stopped pawing at his head as if they were feeling how his brain showed him everything about them, maybe even brought them because he'd learned to see the old things. When he opened his eyes the arms were worming back into the walls, but he felt them all around him right to the end of the passage. And when he went outside he couldn't believe in the daylight any more. It was like a picture someone had put up to hide the dark."

"He could believe in his uncle though, couldn't he? He saw his uncle waiting for him and telling him well done. I hope he knew how much his uncle thought of him."

"Maybe."

"Well, now it's another year."

Uncle Lucian's voice is so low, and his face is so nearly invisible, that Colin isn't sure whether his words are meant to be comforting or to warn the boy that there's more. "Another story," Colin mumbles, inviting it or simply giving in.

"I don't think so any more. I think you're too old for that."

Colin doesn't know in what way he feels abandoned as he whispers "Have we finished?"

"Nothing like. Tomorrow, just go and lie down and look up."

"Where?"

'Anywhere you're by yourself."

Colin feels he is now. "Then what?" he pleads.

"You'll see. I can't begin to tell you. See for yourself."

That makes Colin more nervous than his uncle's stories ever did. He's struggling to think how to persuade his uncle to give him at least a hint when he realises he's alone in the darkness. He lies on his back and stares upwards in case that gets whatever has to happen over with, but all he sees are memories of the places his uncle has made him recall. Downstairs his parents and his aunt are still talking, and he attempts to use their voices to keep him with them, but feels as if they're dragging him down into the moonless dark. Then he's been asleep, because they're shutting their doors close to his. After that, whenever he twitches awake it's a little less dark. As soon as he's able to see he sneaks out of bed to avoid his parents and his aunt. Whatever is imminent, having to lie about where he's going would make his nerves feel even more like rusty wire about to snap.

He's as quick and as quiet in the bathroom as he can be. Once he's dressed he rolls up the quilt to lie on and slips out of the house. In the front garden he thinks moonlight has left a crust on the fallen leaves and the grass. Down the hill a train shakes itself awake while the city mutters in its sleep. He turns away and heads for the open country behind the house.

A few crows jab at the earth with their beaks and sail up as if they mean to peck the icy sky. The ground has turned into a single flattened greenish bone exactly as bright as the low vault of dull cloud. Colin walks until the fields bear the houses out of sight. That's as alone as he's likely to be. Flapping the quilt, he spreads it on the frozen ground. He throws himself on top of it and slaps his hands on it in case that starts whatever's meant to happen. He's already so cold he can't keep still.

At first he thinks that's the only reason he's shivering, and then he notices the sky isn't right. He feels as if all the stories he's had to act out have gathered in his head, or the way they've made him see has. That ability is letting him observe how thin the sky is growing, or perhaps it's leaving him unable not to. Is it also attracting whatever's looming down to peer at him from behind the sky? A shiver is drumming his heels on the ground through the quilt when the sky seems to vanish as though it has been clawed apart above him, and he glimpses as much of a face as there's room for—an eye like a sea black as space with a moon for its pupil. It seems indifferent as death and yet it's watching him. An instant of seeing is all he can take before he twists onto his front and presses his face into the quilt as though it's a magic carpet that will transport him home to bed and, better still, unconsciousness.

He digs his fingers into the quilt until he recognises he can't burrow into the earth. He stops for fear of tearing his aunt's quilt and having to explain. He straightens up in a crouch to retrieve the quilt, which he hugs as he stumbles back across the field with his head down. The sky is pretending that it never faltered, but all the way to the house he's afraid it will part to expose more of a face.

While nobody is up yet, Colin senses that his uncle isn't in the house. He tiptoes upstairs to leave the quilt on his bed, and then he sends himself out again. There's no sign of his uncle on the way downhill. Colin dodges onto the path under the trees in case his uncle prefers not to be seen. "Uncle Lucian," he pleads.

"You found me."

He doesn't seem especially pleased, but Colin demands "What did I see?"

"Not much yet. Just as much as your mind could take. It's like our stories, do you understand? Your mind had to tell you a story about what you saw, but in time you won't need it. You'll see what's really there."

"Suppose I don't want to?" Colin blurts. "What's it all for?"

"Would you rather be like my sister and only see what everyone else sees? She was no fun when she was your age, your mother."

"I never had the choice."

"Well, I wouldn't ever have said that to my grandfather. I was nothing but grateful to him."

Though his uncle sounds not merely disappointed but offended, Colin says "Can't I stop now?"

"Everything will know you can see, son. If you don't greet the old things where you find them they'll come to find you."

Colin voices a last hope. "Has it stopped for you?"

"It never will. I'm part of it now. Do you want to see?"

"No."

Presumably Colin's cry offends his uncle, because there's a spidery rustle beyond the trees that conceal the end of the path and then silence. Time passes before Colin dares to venture forward. As he steps from beneath the trees he feels as if the sky has lowered itself towards him like a mask. He's almost blind with resentment of his uncle for making him aware of so much and for leaving him alone, afraid to see even Uncle Lucian. Though it doesn't help, Colin starts kicking the stone with his uncle's name on it and the pair of years ending with this one. When he's exhausted he turns away towards the rest of his life.

Feeling Remains

First published in The Dark, 2003
Also published in: Just Behind You

I'm watching Mrs Hammond's empty house while I try to think of anything interesting about myself to write for my English homework when I see my mother. She's walking down the street with two people in tracksuits, a woman and a boy. I know my mother says you have to see the spirit inside everyone, but any time there are tracksuits in our part of town it means trouble. The other night a gang of girls in them kept jumping on the cars in our street, but by the time the police came and my parents finished discussing whose fault it was the girls behaved like that, they'd gone. I hope my mother's showing the people the way out of our suburb, but she holds the front gate open and the boy in roller boots clumps under the rosy arch. I save my homework on the screen and wait till she unlocks the front door and calls "Jeremy, come and say hello."

I go to the top of the stairs. When she gives me her look that says she trusts me not to disappoint her, I have to go down. "Jane and Brad, I told you about Jeremy. He'll be a friend for you, Brad," she says. "Jane's one of my students, Jeremy."

That needn't mean she's an addict like the women my mother brought home from the refuge where she used to work. I thought Brad was bald and my mother would expect me to be sorry about that, but he's only shaved so he'll have even less hair than his mother. Mine is saying "I should take off your boots in the house, Brad. I expect we can find you some old Christmas slippers of Jeremy's."

Brad makes his mouth thinner, but Jane grabs his shoulder when he starts clumping out of the porch into the hall. "Do what Willa tells you. Act like you deserve to be let in a house like this."

"You'll have to pay for new ones if they're nicked," he tells my mother.

"We promise they'll be safe, don't we, Jeremy? We understand if people who haven't been as lucky as us value what they have. Of course you're making your own luck now, Jane, by coming to night class."

"They should have made me stay at school when I was these ones' ages. The advice centre says I should be able to sue the education."

"Will you look after your new friend, Jeremy, while Jane and I work out what schedule's best for her?"

"I was doing my English."

"I'm certain Brad wishes he had homework. You don't want him and Jane to think we've no time for people who need us."

I can't see why they'd think that or feel entitled either. Brad sits on the doormat and yanks his boots off and jumps up to shove past me and sprint upstairs. "Show him your room, Jeremy," my mother says. "Perhaps he can give you some ideas to write."

At least he isn't wearing any shoes. When he's finished using the toilet without shutting the door or flushing he steps in the bath and the bidet and then the shower stall in the guest room. He looks around my parents' room as if he's memorising everything and runs into mine. I knew he'd head for the computer, but he sticks two fingers up at it when he sees there's only writing on the screen. He holds onto my desk to poke his face at the window. "There's the house your mam said some old twat lived in."

"It's where an old lady used to live."

"Where's she now?"

"Gone."

"Where? She live by herself?" Brad says and starts typing on my keyboard. All the words have four letters, and some of them are spelt right. "Leave it alone," I shout, hoping they can hear me downstairs. "That's for school."

"Your mam said you had to let me do some." He rests a thumb on the power button and watches me nearly get to him before he switches the computer off. He dodges me and runs downstairs yelling "He won't tell me about the old woman and he won't let me go on his pee see."

I switch it back on and wait for it to scan the drives. I'd pray if I knew what to pray to. When the screen shows I haven't lost anything I shut down properly, because my mother's calling "Come and talk to us, Jeremy. We don't hide from our guests."

They're in the front room. Mother and Jane are drinking coffee out of Empowered Woman mugs while Brad wanders about picking things up.

"You'll break that," Jane keeps saying as if she wants him to prove she's right, and he nearly drops the carving of a goddess my father bought at the African craft shop.

"You're supposed to be paying attention to your guest, Jeremy. You're thirteen and he's not even at secondary school."

"He nearly wrecked my computer."

"Things are only things and we shouldn't get attached to them," my mother says, though she doesn't seem too happy with Brad handling her Muslim pictures on the mantelpiece. "People are what matters. Why wouldn't you tell Brad about Mrs Hammond? I'm sure he'd enjoy hearing how you took care of her."

"He likes to know about people," Jane said. "He never knew his dad before the scum went off and left us."

"Tell Brad how you were Mrs Hammond's little helper after Mr Hammond died."

Suddenly Brad's interested. "How'd he die?"

"Fluid retention," my mother tells Jane as if she's the only one that's listening. "His heart gave up."

"Too much booze, you mean? Sounds like a man."

I'm remembering how Mr Hammond's legs swelled up till they were twice as wide—I used to think they were like balloons and the ankles were knots you could untie to let everything out, "I don't think his wife ever recovered from," my mother stops saying, "it took him most of a year. But you did everything you could for her, didn't you, Jeremy?"

Brad is opening and shutting the doors of an icon as if he hopes it'll change into something better than a Greek saint with gold around his head. "Just you listen, you," Jane says. "This is how you're meant to behave. What did he do, Willa?"

My mother opens her eyes wide at me to make me answer and looks disappointed when I can't. "Shopping and housework and just sitting and talking to her," she says.

That was the worst part—listening to her and feeling how afraid she was. It felt as if all the dimness of her house had crawled inside my head and started filling up my chest as well. Maybe the dark was meant to help her stop seeing herself, but I thought it made things worse. I'm willing my mother not to go on about Mrs Hammond, and surely Jane and Brad have to leave soon, because I can smell dinner, lentils again. But my mother says "Our guests are dining with us, Jeremy, and then I said you'd keep Brad with you while Jane and I go to my class."

"I haven't finished my homework."

"You didn't seem too busy when we came along. You seemed to be concentrating on Mrs Hammond's house."

Maybe Brad will be so rude about dinner she won't want him to stay. He stares at his chunk of her lentil loaf and says he wants a burger. Jane isn't too impressed either when she hears how we never eat anything that injures the rainforest or puts us higher up the food chain than anybody else or with additives in. She tells Brad to be grateful and get on with eating, though she doesn't do too much of that herself. When he won't, my mother makes him a sandwich of the ham my father says he needs for a balanced diet, but Brad hasn't finished his first bite when he starts wanting to watch television and not sit at the table. My mother persuades him to take his plate with him and sends me after him without mine. I'm watching him spill crumbs from his plate and his mouth while he plays with the remote control and keeps asking why we've got no sex channels when my father comes in.

He gives Brad the kind of blink he's started giving anyone my mother brings home, the kind that says he's tired and now he'll be more so. She meets him in the hall and just about puts a kiss on his cheek, as if she doesn't want Jane to see. "Jane, this is Leslie," she says, and tells him "Plenty left for you in the oven. We're off to my class now and the boys are staying here."

"There aren't likely to be ructions, are there? Only I've brought home quite a wodge of work."

"I'm certain you're man enough for everything," she says with a wink at Jane. "Are we ready? The boys can wash up."

"You do what Leslie says since they've let you in their nice house," Jane tells Brad.

"What does Jane stand for?" my mother asks her as they walk arm in arm along the hall.

"I don't stand for anything."

"Darn right, and what does your name stand for?"

"Justice Against Naked Exploitation."

"That's what we need. I got all my students to empower their names," my mother tells my father as she leaves.

I wonder if he's thinking they're all women when he comes to frown at me and Brad at the kitchen sink. The second time Brad drops a plate in it to see how much noise it makes if it won't smash, my father hurries to him. "Please, allow me."

Brad flinches out of the way in case he's touched. "Willa said I could watch your telly."

"Then you must, of course," my father says and helps me finish washing up. By then Brad is turning the sound up and down and changing channels as fast as he can. My father goes in the office, where his desk is smaller than my mother's, but soon he opens the door and calls me. "Do you think you might take your friend along to the play area for a while?"

"I didn't want to stay here anyway," Brad shouts and runs out of the house.

"Go with him, Jeremy," my father says with even more of his usual worried look. "He's our responsibility."

I don't see why he has to be, but if I say I'll get a disappointed lecture and a worse one from my mother. I go after Brad as my father shuts himself in the office. Brad's across the road in Mrs Hammond's front garden. "You can't go in there," I tell him.

"You mean you can't, soft twat," he says and dodges round the back.

There's nothing to be afraid of, I try and think. There never really was for Mrs Hammond, so how can there be for me? I don't want Brad doing anything I'll be blamed for not stopping. I hurry down the path with weeds sticking out of all its cracks into the back garden, where the hedge hides me and Brad from the neighbours. He's trying to see into the kitchen. "Dirty cow, was she?" he says.

He means the way the windows look black with grime, though they aren't. He points at the top of the kitchen window, at a gap big enough for him to put his skinny arm through. "Give us a step up."

"You mustn't go inside."

"Give us one or I'll say your dad kept feeling me and that's why I ran off."

"Nobody'd believe you."

His face squashes itself thinner at me, and then he sees a lawnmower lying on its back in the long grass. He tips it up and drags it to the house and wedges the handle under the windowsill. There's a bar under the handle, and he stands one foot on that. "If I fall through the glass I'll say you pushed me," he says.

I'm almost sure nobody will believe him except maybe Jane, but being so close to Mrs Hammond's house is making me nervous. He levers himself up and grabs the top of the sash and plants his other grubby foot on the windowsill. He wobbles as he shoves his arm through the gap, and I wonder whether he'll say I felt him if I hold onto him. Then he twists the catch and the sash rattles down. He steps over and lands with a clang in the sink and pokes his head out of the window. "What are you going to do now, soft twat?"

There's nothing to be afraid of in there except what he might do. I know that's what I'm most afraid of when he jumps down onto the kitchen floor. "Wait," I plead. "I'll come."

I'm not as used to getting into other people's houses as him. I haul myself up to the sill from the bar of the mower and swing one leg through the window to try and stand in the sink. It's further down than I like, and when I drag my other leg over the sash I nearly lose my balance. I feel as if I'm falling into somewhere deep and dark. I manage to grab hold of the taps, and when I'm steady I shut the window and fix the catch. Brad is staring at the windows painted black inside as high as Mrs Hammond could reach. "Mad old bitch then, was she?" he says.

"Just didn't like seeing herself in anything."

"Mad old bitch," he says as though I agreed with him. He stares at the scratches she made all over the metal sink with a fork, and then I have to chase after him into the hall. He touches the switch for the jangly chandelier and leaves it alone in case people see he's in the house. He scowls at the walls—at the patches that look painted with how dark it'll be very soon. "Who got all her pictures?" he says as if it should have been him.

"They weren't pictures, they were mirrors. She took them down."

I remember them lying on their faces on one of her spare beds that was covered with broken glass. Brad's throwing all the doors open. The rooms sound too big and empty, though they've still got furniture that looks fat and sagging out of shape with the dimness the black windows make. "Be a good fire," Brad mutters to himself, but then he runs upstairs.

The bathroom mirrors are smashed in the bath. "Said she was a dirty cow," Brad sniggers, and I can't tell him it was where she was most afraid to see herself. He probably wouldn't listen anyway. He's too busy heading for her room, where I used to hear her begging and praying when I had to let myself into the house with the keys she gave my parents. She wasn't answering the doorbell any more, and she didn't answer when I called up the stairs—maybe she didn't hear me for talking, or maybe she couldn't stop. "That's some sponge that's gone bad," I heard once. "That's a stick with some old rubber round it. That's a claw, I don't know what it belongs to. That's a nasty mask someone's wearing. It's not me. It's not me."

She hadn't smashed the bedroom mirrors then. She'd wedged the wardrobe door open with some shoes to hide the glass on it, and she'd covered up the dressing-table mirror with a dress. Now they're just bare wood that makes me think bits of a coffin have got into the room. "Feels squelchy," Brad says, and I think he's imitating Mrs Hammond somehow till I see he means the carpet under his bare feet. "Nothing worth a turd in here," he complains and runs to push up the painted-over window.

He kneels on the floor and squints through the slit at the backs of the houses across the garden. "Bet they've got stuff we ought to have," he mumbles. As he's getting up he points at the bed. "Is that her?"

I feel as if the dimness is a crawling lump of soot that fills my head. I'm not just afraid to look, I can't even see. Then Brad picks up what he was talking about—Mrs Hammond's photograph album that was shoved under the pillow. A photograph of her being not much older than me falls out and he treads on it while he turns the pages, not caring if he tears them. "It's just her old pictures," I say to make him stop.

I wish I hadn't said it. Surely Mrs Hammond couldn't hear me, but I feel guilty anyway, because it was the album she held onto when she was trying to hide from herself in the bed. "Which one do I look like?" she kept pleading the last time I let myself into the house. "Do I still look like this?" Now Brad picks up the photograph she was talking about and throws it in the album. "Got any matches?" he says.

"I never have any."

"Sad soft twat then, aren't you?" he says and runs downstairs.

I'd leave the album if I didn't think he might come back and use it to set fire to the house. I tuck it under my arm and go after him. When he sidles out of the front door I copy him and shut it so gently it feels as if it's turned into rubber. Brad sneaks out of the gate but waits to mutter "If you say we went in there I'll say you made me go in so you could have a feel of me."

I won't be saying we went in. I'd take Mrs Hammond's album to my room if I didn't have to follow him while he spies on houses. More than once he wants me to keep watch while he prowls into someone's garden or round the back of their house, but I won't do that however many names he calls me. We go through the whole suburb that way in the dark till we come round again to my house.

I let myself in and have to let Brad in as well. I'm glad he goes straight to the television, because it means he doesn't see me putting the album under my bed. I'm hurrying to tell him to turn the television down when mother and Jane come in. "Jane wrote nearly a whole paragraph," my mother tells anyone who's listening, "didn't you, Jane? You'll be wearing a white collar at your factory at this rate, if you even stay. I know you'll do everything you can for your workmates."

Jane doesn't seem to like being talked about so much. "Have you been behaving?" she shouts at Brad over the television. "Get home now and turn that off. You can't take it with you even if it's bigger than ours."

"He hasn't been much trouble, has he, Jeremy?" my father wants me to agree.

"He didn't stop you working."

"Luckier than me, then," Jane tells my father.

Brad switches off the television and sprints to pick his boots up. He's sitting on the doorstep to pull them on when my father says "Excuse me, young man, but could that be our remote control that's slipped into your pocket by mistake?"

"Give it here," Jane yells at Brad, and nearly hits him across the head with it except he ducks. She jabs it at my mother and says "I'm sorry that's all you get for helping."

"You've given me and more importantly yourself a lot more than that." As Jane drags Brad out of the gate my mother calls "Looking forward to next week."

My father makes a noise like humming a question and says "Bedtime for our youngest member unless he wants to finish his homework."

That's all they say till I'm out of the bathroom and in bed, but the silence feels like my mother getting ready to tramp into the office and start. "So the best you can offer one of my students is calling her child a thief."

"Well, hold on, I don't think we can honestly say I quite—"

"Diet's all that's wrong with him, the kind the multinationals won't be happy until everybody's eating. That and wanting to be a man. Couldn't you and Jeremy deal with him for even a couple of hours? His mother has to all the time."

"I wonder if we saw much evidence that she—"

"There's lots of evidence anybody but a man could see that she's as brave as every one of my mature students. They need to be, not having the gender advantage. They work as hard as I do, but perhaps you don't think that's hard enough..."

"Of course I do. I really wish you wouldn't teach at night if it leaves you on edge like this."

"You'd rather we both left all the people we've failed to sink further, would you?"

"I'm not sure you can say it's us who've failed—"

"Our whole class has," my mother cries, and a lot more as well. When my parents come upstairs at last I still can't sleep. My father says we always have to leave our bedroom windows open at night so the central heating doesn't make us vulnerable to all the germs that are developing or being developed. The gap must be letting a wind in my room, because there's a noise under the bed as if something's got hold of Mrs Hammond's album but can't quite open it. I'm not going to look. I'm almost asleep when I hear the fumbling creep away, and then I am.

In the morning my parents aren't speaking much to each other, more at me instead. I'm almost glad to head for the school I have to go to because everyone else is as deserving of an education as I am and it wouldn't be fair to the others to put all the best children together. I don't think I'm one of them even if my dad does, just one of the few that go in uniform. Shaun's been sniffing glue again and starts dancing on his desk, and Cindy keeps screaming at people because she says they're staring at her, till they do to make her scream. Only those aren't the main reasons I can't do my work properly. Even when the teacher gets Shaun and Cindy taken off to the disruption room I can't stop trying to think what to do with Mrs Hammond's album.

I don't want to hear something moving in my room at night again. I never have before even when there was a wind. There's nowhere to put the album except back where I found it—if my parents see it they'll know I sneaked into Mrs Hammond's house. Only we gave her keys to her son after she died even though he hadn't been visiting her, so how can I get back in? I nearly think of asking Brad, though there are plenty of children at my school who'd be the same kind of help. I'll have to climb up to her bedroom window he left open at the bottom if I can carry the album and a ladder across the road without being seen. Maybe I can climb without a ladder. I'm trying to remember the back of her house as I walk home with the homework half the class never bothers doing. By the time I reach my street I'm sure there's a drainpipe close to her window. But there's no drainpipe—there isn't even a house.

All that's left is a huge lump of black smoke squirming every way as if it wants to dodge the water three fire engines are squirting at it. The house has fallen in with just some bricks of the ground floor and half a window left standing. It looks as if the house has been pulled out of shape by the smoke that's black as tonight will be. I'm watching it and feeling Mrs Hammond's nightmare is holding me there when my parents drive up in my mother's car.

When she climbs out her head goes up as if her open mouth is pulling it till her chin points at where the house was. "How on earth has that managed to happen?" she says as if whoever's responsible is listening, and I do my best not to.

"At least Mrs Hammond's gone, thank heaven," says my father.

"The late owner," my mother tells a fireman. "We did think she might cause a fire when there's so little care for the elderly in their own homes, but do you know what actually happened here?"

"The lady who reported it said some boys were seen going in there recently," the fireman says, rubbing some black onto his forehead with the back of his hand.

"That's the least we can expect when child care for single parents is so inadequate."

He gives her quite a look and says "You'll have to excuse me" as he strides off to his engine. Maybe he doesn't realise that leaves my mother with an argument still to have, or maybe that's what he's avoiding. I watch the smoke trying to stand up as if it's desperate to find the shape the house used to be. When my mother says "Come along, Jeremy, we don't stare" I hurry after her.

All the way through our Indian dinner that's mostly rice so we remember how other people have to eat, I'm afraid someone will ask me if the boys were me and Brad. Instead she talks about her students so hard I can tell my father doesn't dare to mention the children at his school. I wonder if she can't let herself believe I got into Mrs Hammond's house, but I think it's more she won't believe Brad did. As soon as all the dinner's eaten my father says to me "I'll see to the washing up and I should be about your homework."

I can't open my window in case the smoke that's left gets in. It feels as if its dark is trying to—I keep feeling its dark has crept behind me. Whenever I look round there's nothing I haven't always seen except Mrs Hammond's album lying under the bed. I push it further under to make sure my parents won't see it, but when I try and concentrate on my homework I can't help seeing bits of the smoke heaving themselves about and turning into the night. As soon as I've finished my work, which isn't much good, I go to the bathroom again and make myself switch off the light and get in bed.

I seem to wake up more often than I sleep, but I suppose I do some of that as well, because I keep thinking something wants to catch hold of me in the dark. I try to stay close to the side of the bed near the window, but that means the dark is behind me. Before I came to bed I must have pushed Mrs Hammond's album too hard, because in the morning I see a picture of her when she was a few years older than me has come out on the far side. It's crumpled up as if someone tried to get hold of it, and most of its yellow has turned black—it looks as if the blackness is turning her into a shape I'd rather not see. I pinch the photograph between my nails and wriggle it into the album and drop the album in my schoolbag.

I just want the only thing that's left of Mrs Hammond's to go somewhere it'll be safe. I'd ask my parents to give it to her son if I wouldn't have to tell them I was keeping it away from Brad—I'd ask where the son lives if they wouldn't make me tell them why I want to know. I can't eat much breakfast for being afraid they'll see the album before I can leave, and my father has to eat what I don't or my mother would tell us how many people could live on it for a week. I try not to look as if I'm carrying anything I shouldn't in my bag when my mother puts her mouth on my forehead and my father shakes my hand before I can run out of the house.

I wonder if I'll have to keep the album away from people, but the girls and boys who might add it to the litter everybody drops at school are after anyone who doesn't look English because the papers say the country's letting too many asylum seekers in. At lunchtime I go upstairs to the library, where I often hide though there aren't many books I want to read or many I don't either. The librarian who's always blinking and patting her foggy hair as if she's making sure nothing has jumped into it off anyone is at the desk. "Hello, er," she says when I start taking out the album. "Did you enjoy it?"

"It's an old lady's photos I wondered if you'd want to have."

"Oh," she says the way people sigh at babies, "er. Is she your grandma?"

I haven't seen either of my grandmothers for years, because my mother argues with them about everything, which she says means they're victims of their class. "She was just a lady who lived near us," I say.

"And how did it come your way, er?"

"She died. She didn't want anything to happen to it," I say and wonder if that's true—I somehow think it is.

"I don't see it as material for us," the librarian says without even looking inside it. "I expect you should give it to a parent or whoever you live with to look after, er."

"Jeremy," I tell her, but she's at her hair again as if I might have brought her more than a book.

There's a history lesson after lunch, and I try to give the album to the teacher. "That's not the kind of history we teach," he says without looking in it, and lifts his top lip with his bottom one as if he'd like to plug his nose up, "even if any of you little charmers wanted to learn." He oughtn't to mean me, and it's so unfair I don't think about the album for the rest of the afternoon. I don't start feeling nervous till I'm halfway home, but when I let myself in there's another reason. My mother's waiting with something to say and a blank face.

The longer she doesn't say it, the worse I think it's going to be. I'm sure I'm being blamed but I don't know for what. I hide in my room and try to work till my father comes home. At first she only sends him up to tell me dinner's ready. She ladles out her carrot casserole before she dumps herself on her chair. "Well, I hope everyone's satisfied," she says to the ceiling.

"It's quite tasty and filling, thank you, dear."

If I were my father I wouldn't have said that. I can tell she wasn't talking about dinner. She makes us wait for her to say "My student Jane's son has been arrested."

"No great surprise, perhaps. What's the offence?"

"Supposedly he was found in a house up the street, and the couple who live next door to it are claiming he robbed them. I don't know how someone his size would be capable of taking everything they say he took."

"Perhaps it was inevitable. You shouldn't blame yourself."

She lets her eyes and then her face down to him. "They're saying they saw him near their house the night before last. Presumably nobody who hasn't had their advantages is allowed near."

I see my father wants to think she's stopped accusing us, but he doesn't dare. "You were taking him to the park, weren't you, Jeremy?" he says.

"I said I would."

If she asks whether I did I'll tell them everything. Maybe that will stop me feeling that it's getting darker inside me than it is yet outside. But all my mother says is "I'm going to Jane's to see what I can do for her. I've no idea when I'll be back."

"I've got my parents' evening at school," my father tells me. "I'll try not to be too late. You won't mind being on your own, will you?"

"There's nothing round here to be scared of," my mother says. "You aren't a woman living by herself."

I know she means most of her students, but I feel as if she's talking about Mrs Hammond. I don't want to remember how being alone in her house filled Mrs Hammond up with fear. I pretend I don't mind being left by myself at night. I keep on trying to pretend once my parents leave.

I spend all the time I can at washing up the dinner things till the window shows me it'll soon be dark. I start watching television, but there's nothing on that can reach inside my head. Running through the channels twice makes me feel I'm trying to be like Brad, and I think how my mother would blame me but not him. I know I ought to be doing my homework, though when so many people at my school don't, sometimes I wonder why I should. My mother would make me feel guilty for wasting my advantages, that's mostly why. There's no reason for me to be scared of going in my room.

I switch on the light and the one on my desk as well before I take my books out of my bag and shut Mrs Hammond's album in it. Even when I turn the computer on I feel there isn't enough light in the room. Outside the window it looks as if the dark is spreading out of the black place where Mrs Hammond used to live. When I start thinking the blackness or something in it wants to get hold of me I pull the curtains together.

For history we have to write what it was like to live in England in the years leading up to the Second World War. I take everything I can find in my schoolbooks and type it on the screen, but it doesn't feel as if it was ever alive. Mrs Hammond would have been about my age at the beginning of the thirties, and I try to think if she told me about them. I can't remember anything she said, but my thoughts seem to start using her voice. I keep thinking I ought to look in her album.

I'm not sure I want to while I'm by myself, even if it helps me do the kind of homework my mother always says I can. I do my best to let the stuff I've copied tell me more to write, but trying makes the inside of my head feel as if it's turning black. I almost type the only thing that's in there, which is "See my pictures", even if it sounds like Mrs Hammond's voice that's left its mouth somewhere. I don't want to hear it. I jump up and pull the album out and put it on my desk.

It falls open, and a photograph tries to stand up. It's the one I found crumpled on the floor, which must be why it's moving, only it looks as if someone's trying to get hold of it without much of a hand. I squash it between the cover and the first cardboardy page, which doesn't have strips cut out of it to hold photographs. I wish I'd shut the album instead, because I don't like the look of any of the photographs at all.

They're in the order of how old Mrs Hammond was. The baby ones are nearly black like fruit that's shrunk—all you can see are little eyes trying to peer out of the blackness. I start hoping they've all gone like that, because the bits of her as a girl that the blackness hasn't covered up look so thin I think it's taken their flesh off. But those aren't as bad as the ones where she's grown up. Maybe the blackness is some kind of mould, because the parts of her it's left white look swollen like toadstools that burst if you poke them. I get as far as a picture of her and Mr Hammond with their eyes staring out of two fat raw white blobs. I shut the album tight, which feels as if I'm not squashing only pictures. I don't want it in my room.

I don't even want it in the house, not when it's keeping Mrs Hammond's voice inside my head. "See the rest," I think she's pleading. "See all of me." I'd leave the album outside and wait till tomorrow to think what to do if I wasn't afraid it might rain. I find three plastic bags in a kitchen cupboard and put the album inside one and the others too. There's a wind, and if I leave the album behind the house my parents may hear the plastic rustling and find out what it is. I hurry out the front instead, across the road.

Half Mrs Hammond's front door is lying on its back beyond some coaly bricks. Bits of burnt wood flake off and grit under my nails when I lift the door enough to slide the album under.

Tomorrow I'll pretend to find the album on my way to school and give it to my parents to pass on to Mrs Hammond's son. I try to imagine her voice being muffled by the door when I drop it, except that's like imagining her trapped in her coffin, not able to see. The wind stirs up the patch where she lived, and the choking smell feels as if the dark is rising up to wall me in. I dash across the road into not enough light, but I'm only at the gate when I hear our phone ringing.

I have to get the key out of my pocket and push it in the lock the right way up and turn it, and all the while I'm afraid the phone will stop or won't. I shut the dark out and run to grab the phone out of its plastic nest on the wall. "Hello?" I call louder than the voice in my head.

"Are you there at last? I was starting to think you were doing a Brad. Don't tell Willa I said that. Were you asleep?"

"Not yet."

"Glad I didn't wake you, then, but time for bed all the same. I'm just in discussion with some colleagues."

I can hear the kind they're having and the other noises of the pub. "Will you be home soon?" I plead.

"Not while you're conscious, I shouldn't think. I do need to relax occasionally, you know. Just get your head on the pillow and before you know it you'll be gone. Willa and her women may have got themselves some strength, but that doesn't have to mean they've taken ours away." I don't think he meant me to hear the last part, or maybe he doesn't care. "See you in the morning, Jeremy," he says.

I ram the phone into its nest and run upstairs to the bathroom. I stay in there till I realise I'm staring at my face in the mirror. That reminds me how Mrs Hammond couldn't look in one. I'm afraid something like her face will wobble up over the edge, trying to see me instead of itself. I'd rather be in my room than think about that, and I dash across the landing.

There's too much of a mirror in my room. I keep my back to it while I undress for bed and hurry to the switch by the door. I turn the light off and on again at once. I've never seen my room so dark. 1 run over to the window and open the curtains without looking at the glass that might as well be a mirror. Either the streetlamp outside Mrs Hammond's garden isn't working—maybe somebody like Brad has broken it—or the blackness from where she lived has caught it somehow, because when I switch the light off it's as dark as it was. It's so dark I'm afraid switching the light back on won't make any difference. But it does, and I leave it on and hide in my bed.

At least I've stopped having thoughts that sound like Mrs Hammond. Maybe it's too light for her, that's if I ever really heard her. I don't mind when it starts getting dark inside my eyelids, since that means I'm falling asleep and I know it's light in the room. Then I'm asleep, and I don't like it, because I'm groping about in a place with no light till I stick my fingers in a toadstool. That feels so bad it jerks my eyes open and me awake.

I'm still in the dark, and my hand feels the same. I hope I've only dreamed I'm awake, but then I feel how I'm lying at the edge of the bed with one arm hanging nearly to the floor. I hear something dragging on the carpet, and there's a tug at my arm. What I thought was a toadstool I'd poked my hand into are fingers holding mine.

My thoughts start talking in Mrs Hammond's voice. There's nothing in my head except them and terror, and I don't even know how much of that is hers. "Touch more of me," I think or hear. "I can't feel like this. This can't be me. It's just all this dark making me worse."

I'm desperate to get free, but I'm afraid if I tear myself loose her hand will come with me, or some of it will. I make myself roll closer to the edge and reach down with my other hand. I touch hers that's holding mine and run my fingers up her arm. "That's it," her voice says in my head. "Find my face."

I think I'd stop living if I did that. The rest is bad enough. Her hand is too big for the arm that feels thinner than its bones used to and made of spongy putty. There's just one thing I can think of to do if my mouth will work. I push my tongue between my lips to open them and oil them. "I can feel you're all right," I say, though my words don't want to leave my mouth. "You're like your favourite photo when you weren't much older than me."

"Am I really?" I think her voice is going away and then I hear it's only sunk. I stop touching her arm and inch back onto the bed and pray she'll let go of my hand before I have to pull it out of her squashy one. But I'm leaning off the edge of the bed as if I may fall instead of creeping out of reach when she says "See me, then" not in my head but in the room and not using much I'd call a voice.

I'm not sure what comes then. Maybe it isn't light even if I can see by it—maybe it's her hope. For however long it takes me to start seeing her I can't breathe. I see her arm first, then how it stretches all the way across the room to the rest of her. She's the lumpy white heap against the wall, because I can just make out a thing on top like a soft balloon with hardly any face. I don't know if she's lost her eyes or if what it's made of has swollen over them.

I feel a tug at my hand. There's a noise like a stuffed wet sack dragging along the wall as she tries to get up and come across the room to let me see her clearer. I wrench myself loose and press my back and my head against the wall above the pillow, and rub my hands together in case any of her has stuck to them. Squeezing my eyes shut doesn't feel safe enough, so I grip my hands over them. In case it helps keep her off I scream.

I'm doing all that when my parents get home. My mother must have picked my father up on the way, because I hear her car and then they both come into the house. "That's never Jeremy, is it?" my father doesn't quite shout.

"I hope you won't try to suggest it's my fault if it is."

They have a competition over who'll be upstairs first, and my father wins. "Whatever's the matter, Jeremy?" he says in his pub voice, and clicks the switch a few times. "Why is it so dark in here?"

I want to be taken out of the room into the light where Mrs Hammond will be afraid to come and see herself. "Too dark," I try to say. When hands take hold of me I scream louder till I'm sure they aren't hers. I keep mine over my eyes as my parents argue while they lead me out. I don't know when I'll dare to open my eyes again, and even if I do I know the darkest place will be inside my head. Maybe Mrs Hammond will wait in there for me to see her. Maybe I'll have to till I'm afraid to see myself, and then I'll be on my way to her place. Maybe till then I won't really know what screaming is.

2004

Direct Line

First published in Postscripts #1, Spring 2004
Also published in: Just Behind You

As Sharpe strode into the passage under the railway he heard a woman talking to herself ahead. Since the last of the lights had been vandalised overnight, the tunnel was flooded with darkness. He wasn't about to be daunted by that or by her, even if she was homeless or mad. As he halved the distance to her, the train he'd just left passed overhead as though the July heat had congealed into an elongated clap of thunder, and he glimpsed her clutching at her face. "No," she cried, high-pitched as her footsteps and their echoes as she fled. An object clattered down the wall to join the rest of the litter. Sharpe was opening his mouth to ask her to retrieve it when he saw it was luminous.

An abandoned hypodermic to which it lent a poisonous green glow distracted him from immediately seeing that it was a mobile phone. Even he recognised that it was expensive, the kind of item his pupils at school boasted about. It weighed less than a tiny skull. When he brought it not too close to his ear, he was greeted by a rush of static that seemed for a moment to be trying to form words. The noise sank into the dark as the phone was extinguished, and he hurried to catch up with its owner. Wastefulness offended him as much as litter.

The tunnel opened onto the road to the school. The road was rowdy with schoolboys, some of whom nudged each other at the sight of him. Had the woman been intimidated by the mass of them? She could have taken refuge in any of dozens of grimy houses split into secretive flats or in one of the alleys strewn with refuse. He was holding up his find as if this might draw her out of hiding when behind him a boy said "Sharpy's got a mobile now. He can't say nothing about ours."

Sharpe swung around to confront the twelve-year-old's unnecessarily small face, which grew smoothly innocent. "Perhaps you saw the lady this belongs to, Lomax. She ran out of there not a minute ago."

The boy's stunted crony Latham peered up from under his brows as though out of a lair. "We thought she must of been raped."

"We looked for who done it and we seen you."

"I was attempting to return the property she dropped. I hope you would have done as much." When this provoked two identical disbelieving stares he said "You were asked to tell me where the lady went."

"Behind them houses like she couldn't wait to have a shit," Lomax said, pointing to the alley Sharpe had just passed.

"No, it was them like she had to piss," said Latham, indicating an alley beyond the exit from the pedestrian tunnel.

Sharpe hadn't time to rebuke the vulgarity, whether it was automatic or deliberate. He sidled down the nearer alley, past bulging waist-high plastic bags torn open by animals or kicked asunder by children. Halfway down he met a transverse alley overlooked by the backs of two streets. There was no sign of the woman, but another at an upper window turned her head to keep an offensively suspicious eye on him. When he called "I've lost property for someone" it neither assuaged her stare nor attracted the owner. He stowed the mobile inside his jacket as he left the alley, ignoring questions and suggestions about where he'd been and why.

Lomax and Latham were even less eager than usual to reach the school. He caught up with them at the entrance to the schoolyard packed with uproar and furtive misdeeds, those that bothered to be furtive. "Did you give it to her, sir?" Lomax enquired.

"Did she like it, sir?" said Latham.

Their untypical enthusiasm made their meaning clear, but he wasn't going to waste time on it. "I shouldn't have expected any sense from the terrible Ls," he said.

He was entering the school when the bell began to clang. He helped herd the scholars to the assembly hall and joined his colleagues on the stage, from which he fixed his stare on his class near the front of the long hot room. The general restlessness lessened as the headmaster marched to his lectern. Mr Thorn let his gaze roam until there was silence, which turned more inert as he addressed the question of self-sacrifice. Soon he was asking five hundred boys to think of items they could live without. He had just cited mobile phones when one rang.

For once it didn't belong to any of the boys, though it was set to the remains of a chorus from the Messiah with a disco beat: "Hal-lel-lu-jah, hal-lel-lu-jah, lu-jah, lu-jah, lu-jah—" As Sharpe glanced along the rank of his colleagues he realised that several were gazing at him. "Excuse me, head," he murmured, "not mine," only to demonstrate something like the opposite by retreating into the wings. He snatched out the mobile and thumbed the key that bore an icon of a vertical receiver. He was about to speak when the phone did so in a woman's voice so impatient it left politeness behind. "Got it?"

Sharpe responded in a whisper, if a loud one. "Yes" was all he said, since it seemed obvious.

"Can you bring it?"

"Where?"

"Usual place." As he concluded she had less language to her than the worst of his pupils she added "It's Sue."

His own terseness was designed to interfere as little as possible with Mr Thorn's speech. "Where again?"

"What?" Even more suspiciously she asked "Is this Janey?"

"If she's the lady who owns the phone she dropped it. Perhaps you could __"

"Wrong number. I don't know any Janey. I'm not Sue either."

Presumably she had run out of denials. A sound like a wind through a bone replaced her voice. He poked the button inscribed with a supine receiver and was putting the mobile away when it rang again. Mr Thorn faltered irritably in the middle of a word. Sharpe jabbed the first button and hissed "Yes?"

At first he heard nothing but static as the green glow of the mobile isolated him in the dimness. When it spoke, the voice was barely distinguishable from the mass of thin sound, and he had to strain to grasp the words. "Give it back."

"That'll be Jane, will it?"

"Give it back."

The shrill voice was so unsteady it seemed close to dissolving into the static. "You need to tell me where you are," he said.

"Don't."

"How else would you suggest I do as you asked?"

"Give it back."

"You may collect it this afternoon if you wish," Sharpe said and quelled the call.

He stayed offstage until Mr Thorn said "Use the day wisely" as usual. The folding seats and then their occupants produced sounds that might have accompanied the collapse of the roof. As Sharpe appended himself to the parade of teachers, the headmaster beckoned him. "Important calls, Kenneth?"

"I think the police may be interested."

Mr Thorn's bland chubby face twitched and underscored its receding hairline. "The more that can be resolved internally the better. We don't want to gain a reputation as a school that has to keep calling the police."

"It isn't any of the boys this time. I've a strong suspicion this belongs to somebody we'd want to keep away from them."

"By all means do so at your earliest convenience."

"I intend to," Sharpe said and applied some dignity to descending from the stage. He thought of entrusting the phone to Mr Thorn or the school secretary until lunchtime, but suppose either of them answered it and sent the owner into hiding? He hadn't time to explain the situation when his class was bound for the classroom. He strode in pursuit so fiercely that some of the boys in the corridor lowered their voices or even made way for him.

Too many of his pupils strewn about the classroom looked ready to be amused by him. It was clear that Lomax spoke for them all by enquiring "Did the woman you was chasing want you, sir?"

"Sit down. Sit down. Sit down now." Once a similar formula quietened them at last Sharpe said "She wants her phone. Who can tell me how to switch it off?"

No other question he had ever asked had brought a fraction of the enthusiasm. When he succeeded in hushing the uproar he gave the mobile to Latham, since the boy and his associate were on the front row. "It's off, sir," Latham said, fingering a button.

"Well done, Latham. Let's see if you can do as well with algebra."

Apparently the comment sounded like a joke. Sharpe returned the unlit mobile to his pocket and talked through the equations he'd chalked on the board after yesterday's last class so that he didn't have to turn his back.

The virtually uniform blankness that confronted him only stiffened when he asked if there was anything that anybody hadn't understood. "Heads down, then," he said wearily and watched them duck to their exercise books like cattle to sparse parched grass.

How could they fail to enjoy mathematics? It enshrined truths that had lasted and would last as long as the universe. It gave shape and stability to life, and everything depended on it. If they couldn't appreciate its beauty, how could they resist its excitement? It was the universal language and a system of belief immune to change. Rather than grow depressed by the sluggish ruminations or the pretence of them all around him, he strolled to look over the shoulder of one of the few budding algebraists. He was watching the solution to an equation appear on the page under small inky fingers—he thought life had no greater satisfaction to offer him—when an insect larger than it had any right to be came to life.

It buzzed silently as it writhed against his chest until he dragged it out to wriggle on his palm. "What have you done to this, Latham?"

"Means someone's trying to get you," Latham said over the general laughter.

"They may continue trying," Sharpe declared and shut the phone inside the teachers' desk, where it struggled on its back before growing dormant. In his hand it had felt unnaturally vigorous, desperate to move, and the possibility that it might recommence crawling about in the desk distracted him more than the other outbursts of restlessness he had to subdue. If the desk had locked he might have left the mobile there instead of taking it to the staffroom.

"That's not like you, Kenneth," the English master said with a flutter of his eyelids. "Expecting a date?"

"Most emphatically not," Sharpe said and covered the phone on the staffroom table with a teaching journal. The mobile had to accompany him to his other morning classes, however. In the last one it seemed to wriggle for an instant in his hand as though unwilling to be abandoned to the desk. He shut the lid and wished he could have nailed it down.

For once he was nearly as eager as his pupils for the lunchtime bell. He buried the mobile in an outer pocket, only to have to rest a hand on it in case any of the pickpockets tried to filch it as he hurried through the school. More boys than he suspected had permission were swaggering or sneaking out of the gates, but he hadn't time to interrogate them. Could Jane—he felt uncomfortable being on first-name terms with her—have trailed him to wait until he left the school? More than once he seemed to glimpse a tattered scrawny form pacing him more or less on all fours behind the houses on the way to the police station. It must be a dog draped in some of the trash it had scavenged.

The police station was at the far end of the street from the railway. Beyond the glass doors of the low concrete block, youths lounged against the enquiries counter while an old couple sat on straight chairs and looked nervously out of place. Two trills of the bell on the counter were required to bring a constable out of the office. "Can you wait a few minutes, sir?" she barely asked Sharpe.

"A lady dropped this."

"I'll get a lost property form," the policewoman said with visible relief, and reappeared with a clipboard. "Your name, sir?"

"Sharpe. Kenneth Sharpe, but I ought to say I think this may belong to one of our local drug dealers. I believe I was called by one of her customers earlier."

The policewoman let the clipboard fall. "Do you wish to make a formal complaint?"

"I don't think I've the evidence to do that. I couldn't identify the caller. I just thought you should be aware what kind of person may be reclaiming the phone."

"You think it's likely they'd come here for it if they're what you say."

One of the youths sniggered, and Sharpe recognised him from years ago: Latham's older and even less virtuous brother. "Not if you told them to come here," Sharpe confined himself to saying. "I thought if they rang, someone might arrange to meet them in plain clothes."

"Have you done much investigating yourself?"

"I'm a teacher," Sharpe said, meaning yes.

"You'll have checked the last number that called you, then."

"I must confess I haven't."

She tapped keys too swiftly for him to follow and raised the mobile to her face. "No last number. It might as well have been nobody."

"The boy I asked to switch it off for me must have done that." Sharpe restrained himself from glaring at Latham's brother and said "Can you really not learn anything?"

"Best if you keep it, sir. You can let us know if something significant comes up. You're at the school down the road, are you? We can always find you there if the lady gets in touch."

Did the policewoman think his find too negligible, or might she even disbelieve him? As he stalked out of the building he heard another snigger and almost swung around in case he caught her sharing the derision. She hadn't called him sir as often as she could have and, besides, he knew that many of the boys used the word as a gibe. Perhaps she had. He strode angrily back to the school, failing to overtake or identify a group of boys emitting smoke that he was almost sure wasn't tobacco, and left the mobile in the office.

The last period of the afternoon returned him to his own class for a geometry lesson. He was feeling close to conveying the beauty of a theorem when the school secretary knocked at the door. "Can you turn this off, Mr Sharpe? I haven't time to keep answering it."

"I thought it had been switched off." About to confront Latham, Sharpe realised the policewoman must have revived the mobile. "Not you, Latham," he nevertheless said and offered the task of killing the phone to the most numerate pupil. "Did you say you took some calls, Miss Dodd?"

"One. I didn't think it could be for you. They just kept saying they wanted something back."

"That will be the lady who lost it. Who can find me her number?"

All the boys began to clamour. It seemed safest to leave the job to the numerate boy, but he looked puzzled. "Says there wasn't anybody."

"Better stick to figures, Jarvis." Of course the woman had withheld her number. Sharpe collected the mobile and held it out to the secretary. "Anything amiss, Miss Dodd?"

She shook her head while the class giggled at his choice of words. She might have convinced him if she hadn't hesitated another second. As soon as the lesson petered out, having failed to recapture the communication he had thought he was establishing with more of the class than usual, he made for the office. "What exactly was the matter, Miss Dodd?"

"I just didn't like the feel of it."

"Which you're saying was?"

"Like it wanted to crawl out of my hand." With a laugh apparently intended as disparaging she added "I expect I was distracted. I nearly dropped it because I thought someone was hiding behind the railings."

She could do with an English lesson, he thought. The railings of the schoolyard were inches apart and less than an inch thick. He took the mobile to his classroom and set about marking homework. As he penned cross after dispiriting cross the green ink put him in mind of the glow that had led him to the phone in the tunnel. He couldn't help growing tense in case the mobile sprang to life, and once he seemed to glimpse a figure watching him between entirely too few railings. Miss Dodd's fancies must have impressed him more than they had any right to. When he glanced up, the street was deserted except for a momentary flurry of movement above a kerbside grid. Without doubt it was an effect of the heat, which also made him mop his forehead.

At least the street was still deserted when he left the school. Whatever his class might be up to was no longer his concern. Could the tunnel under the railway be where Jane met her customers? When he peered down it he saw nothing except litter. A low restless heap several feet long was scraping against a wall in the depths of the gloom.

More passengers than usual in his carriage on the train had mobile phones, unless he was more aware of them. The spectacle of so many people talking to nobody visible made him feel threatened with having to do so. He mustn't allow it to turn him against using the train; his car had been vandalised once at the school, and Mr Thorn's response had been so guarded that Sharpe had felt accused of bringing the place into disrepute. He did his best to ignore the voices all around him while he gazed out at the embankment strewn with litter that twitched and jerked with the passing of the train. He could almost have thought the disturbance was following him.

Most of the litter fell short of his station. The trees shading the streets were too mature for vandals to destroy but surely too slender for anyone to hide behind. He had glanced back only twice by the time he reached his neat two-bedroomed single-bedded house. Usually closing the door behind him felt like being sure of the rest of the day: a simple dinner with half a bottle of wine, the news on the radio, a browse among the comfortable old novels that occupied the spare bedroom, a book to take to bed. Now all this felt brittle with the possibility of an interruption. He planted the mobile on the kitchen table and watched it as he ate, and imagined it stirred furtively more than once before it started to writhe so vigorously it knocked against his plate. As he seized it and jabbed the appropriate button he thought of disguising his voice in case the caller wasn't the owner. Disgust with the situation provoked him to demand "Yes?" Static rushed at him, bearing but almost drowning a voice. "Give it back."

"We've already established I need to know where it should be taken."

The static rose to meet him, and he had the impression, all the more unpleasant because irrational, that the speaker was doing the same. "Give it back."

"Are you incapable of saying anything else?" All at once Sharpe's temper deserted him. "Is it the effect of your drugs?"

There was silence or rather worthlessness for so long that he knew he'd scored a point. At last a thin desiccated aspect of the static pronounced some of "Give it back."

"If you want your property I suggest you contact the police. I have."

Should he have added that? Wouldn't it make her afraid to reveal herself? Perhaps she was too brazen or too befuddled by drugs not to do so. When there was no response beyond a sluggish flurry of noises too shapeless for words, he ended the call. He felt he'd shown enough responsibility for one night, and tried to remember how Jarvis had switched the mobile off. He must have mistaken the formula, because halfway through the triumphal procession from Aida the mobile set about diminishing Handel.

Sharpe grabbed it from the low table it was sharing with Nicholas Nickelby and poked the rampant icon, then the prostrate one. This didn't earn him much of a respite. Verdi's procession was still on the march when the phone recommenced abridging Handel. He jabbed the keys again and thought of flinging the insistent object in the dustbin. Instead he paused the compact disc while he tramped with the phone to his bedroom, the most distant room. He shoved the mobile under both his pillows and leaned on them as if it might give in to his hopes and suffocate.

Not even its ditty did. He heard it several times during the section of the opera he forced himself to appreciate. It persisted throughout the news, after which it refused to let him read so much as an uninterrupted page. Surely the battery must run down soon, but it had lost none of its vim by the time his eyes began to ache. He retrieved the mobile from its lair to bury it under a cushion in the front room and under Nickelby as well.

How often did it ring as he laboured to sleep? He couldn't tell when the tune reduced to idiocy was only in his head. He wished he hadn't let the phone into his bedroom. Once, as he started awake from almost no doze at all, he thought he felt it crawling under the pillows, unless somebody was groping in search of it or something it had left behind was coming to a kind of life. He reared up to seize the light cord, and as he uncovered the sheeted mattress he had the impression of turning over a stone. Was the patch of darkness on the sheet only the shadow of his head? Since no amount of rubbing the mark with the underside of a pillow had any visible result, he lowered his head into the dark.

He dreamed he slept more than he did. In the morning he stumbled down to glare at the phone, mockingly silent now. At least the day allowed him to put enough distance between them and, he hoped, to think how to dispose of his burden. On the train he felt trapped by ringtones, especially by the threat of hearing the one he'd grown to loathe. In the passage from the station he caught up with a trail of spicy smoke that none of his fellow commuters seemed to find worthy of remark. Was one of the boys in the street the culprit? Sharpe's eyes were smarting with his attempts at detection by the time he reached the school.

As he trudged to the assembly hall he met Mr Thorn. "No interruptions today, I trust," the headmaster murmured.

Sharpe thought this worse than unfair, not least because several boys had overheard, but restrained himself to saying "I hope so too."

He was able to continue until early in his first lesson. He thought he'd snagged the imagination of some of the class with the concept of infinity until a phone burst into the theme from a television horror series. "I thought I'd switched it off," Lomax said, less an apology than a complaint that Sharpe couldn't help feeling was aimed at him, especially when the boy added with a fraction of a grin "It's for you, sir."

"Bring it to me."

Once the boy had finished sauntering up to him Sharpe managed to turn the phone off before shutting it in his desk. "Aren't you going to answer it, sir?" Lomax said.

"You may collect it from the office after school. Heads down to your work now. Silence. Heads down."

Sharpe's triumph was rather undermined by Miss Dodd, who looked wary of accepting a mobile from him when he detoured to the office on the way to his next class. He would have welcomed a mid-morning break and a longer one at lunchtime, but he was in charge of the yard. As he watched for misbehaviour and swooped to deal with miscreants, he kept being confused by the heat and his lack of sleep—kept glimpsing movements too large for a spider but otherwise as thin beyond the railings. Of course nothing was there whenever he gave in to the temptation to check.

Before lunchtime was over he knew he was the butt of a joke. In less than an hour three boys with mobiles told him they had a call for him. Their expressions were sullen or bewildered or both, which he put down to slyness if not to drugs. The first two exhausted his patience, and he sent the third to explain himself to the headmaster. Sharpe suspected that the hellish Ls were the instigators of the prank even before Latham's mobile interrupted the elucidation of a theorem in the final lesson. "It was off," Latham objected.

"Exactly like your friend's, no doubt. Do tell us all who's calling."

"Dunno," said Latham, having brought the rudimentary tune to an end. "It's for you, though."

"Unluckily for you I've heard that more than once too often. I'll have the truth this time."

"It is," the boy protested with an aggrieved air. "Maybe it's your dealer. My brother said—"

"All this tomfoolery was his idea, was it? I rather think if anybody's dealer is calling it will be yours. Let me speak to them at once."

"It's not. They never call me. I've not got none."

"Which means you have." With an odd sense of sleepwalking Sharpe darted to wrench the phone from the boy's grasp, only to be met by silence as flat as the earpiece. "Show me the number that rang," he ordered.

Latham dealt a key a resentful poke and displayed a blank screen. "See, I didn't know."

"Go and convince the headmaster of that if you can. The rest of you, heads down."

Should he have taken the boy to Mr Thorn? The class would have degenerated into chaos in his absence. Without order you had nothing, a point that Latham proved by not returning. Presumably he'd stolen home, unless he was meeting his dealer. The thought that Sharpe could be responsible for this lodged like hot ash behind his eyes. He was returning Lomax's phone at the end of the lesson when a thirteen-year-old brought the message that Mr Thorn wanted Mr Sharpe in his office.

"Yes, head."

"I've just had to deal with one of your boys." As if the name might be written there, the headmaster frowned at the papers arranged on his desk before saying "Latham."

"He did come to see you, then. We haven't lost all control."

"That may seem to be the question." Mr Thorn lifted his gaze, which appeared to hope to see more than it did. "He says you accused him of buying drugs in class. I take it you've some proof."

"I didn't quite say that to him, but I certainly wouldn't discount the possibility."

"Best kept to yourself unless there's evidence, Kenneth. And then he says you assaulted him."

"Assaulted, good heavens, I think not." Sharpe had a disconcerting sense of having dreamed the incident or of dreaming now. "I took a phone away from him," he said. "Phones in class are still against the rules, I believe."

"By force."

"No more than necessary. Really none at all."

"Would his classmates agree with you, do you think?" As Sharpe's sense of injustice stopped up his words, Mr Thorn said "I'm hopeful that I've persuaded him to accept your apology on Monday, but it will depend on what his parents choose to do, his guardian, rather. Try and forget about it over the weekend and relax. If you'll forgive my saying so, you seem a little drugged yourself."

He maintained a guardedly sympathetic expression until Sharpe turned away in disgust. By the time Sharpe reached the door Mr Thorn was intent on his paperwork. "Head down," Sharpe muttered, no longer caring if he was heard.

He was being sent home as a wrongdoer, was he? Let the school and the homework he had still to mark survive without him for a few days, then. He ignored all the boys and their activities, however villainous, as he made for the station. If intervening earned him more blame than the culprits, it wasn't worth the risk.

A dog was grubbing among the rubbish in the middle of the passage beneath the railway. He heard its surreptitious feeble movements and saw the dull glint of its eyes, if those weren't hypodermics it was shifting. He didn't need to venture in to confirm how unpleasantly skinny it was.

The train felt like a refuge from it until he remembered he would be surrounded by phones. When he saw a man in the next carriage take a call and look around in quest of someone, Sharpe couldn't help crouching out of view, however irrational that was. Surely the man wasn't shouting after him as Sharpe hurried away from the train.

As soon as he was home he dashed into the front room to discover what the choked sound was. The battery must be low; the mobile wasn't ringing so much as rattling. Even when he leaned on the cushion the ragged noise refused to be suffocated. When the cushion began to twitch as if the phone was struggling to reach him, he left the room and slammed the door.

He couldn't eat much. He couldn't concentrate on music or reading or even the news. It seemed impossible that he could hear the half-dead sound through both the cushion and the door, but wherever he was in the house, he did. Was lack of sleep inflaming his senses? When the words of a Victorian chapter grew as restless on the page as he heard the mobile was, he retreated to bed.

At last his ears gave up straining to listen for activity in the house. In the early hours he awoke and hastened downstairs to return the mobile where he'd found it. He used its glow to search the passage for the owner. It wasn't she, however, who wobbled upright in the gloom, raising a face so withered it was featureless except possibly for eyes and parting tattered greenish lips to mouth "Give it back." As some of a hand groped to catch hold of him he managed actually to waken. He wanted to think he was still asleep, because he heard a whisper somewhere near him.

He had to force himself to extend a hand into the dark. Once the light was on he identified the noise as the death rattle of the mobile. This wasn't reassuring; it sounded far too like a sluggish almost formless repetition of the phrase from his dream. As he struggled to believe he was imagining the similarity, he heard a feeble thumping downstairs—a knocking on a door.

He kicked away the bedclothes and stumbled onto the landing. The sound was in the front room. Something was bumping weakly but persistently against the far side of the door. He ran downstairs and flung the door wide, sweeping the object backwards. At once it began to crawl towards him in the midst of a dim flickering greenish stain that was the only illumination in the room.

He'd had enough. The police could deal with its antics however they liked. He dashed upstairs to drag yesterday's clothes on. Having picked up the mobile between finger and thumb, he dropped it in an outer pocket of his jacket and left the house. He mustn't be fully awake. He was making for the local police station before he remembered it had been closed last year.

The one by the school was the closest, half an hour's walk away. As he tramped in that direction, the houses shrank around their loudness. Beyond some of the open windows sleepless televisions flared, while other rooms were packed with discoloured silhouettes jigging to pile-driver music. Once a car screeched past him, full of boys who looked too young to be out so late and drawing behind it the smoke of a fat shared cigarette. He was glad not to recognise any of the boys, but shouldn't the police be dealing with them? If the absence of the law meant the police station was shut for the night he would leave the mobile outside.

The buildings closest to the railway were derelict but not untenanted. He had the impression that the district was as teeming with life in the heat as a corpse. The intermittent light of a single streetlamp apparently too tall to smash plucked at the rooms beyond the broken windows and brought shapes that might be alive lurching forward, dodging back. It kept spilling into the tunnel and retreating from the dark. Whatever lay in there was almost asleep if not worse; he couldn't judge whether the scrawny form was twitching with the instability of the dimness or with a trace of life. Sharpe didn't know of any other route to the police station from this side of the track. He ran through the passage, almost colliding with the opposite wall in his eagerness to avoid the denizen. He was within inches of the exit when a whisper, or at least the fragments of one, halted him. "Give it back."

Had he really heard it? The mobile in his pocket hadn't rung or stirred. As he faltered at the end of the tunnel he heard footsteps wandering towards him. A woman whom he seemed to recognise was drifting from side to side of the street. He didn't move until he was certain, by which time she was mere yards away. "I believe this belongs to you," he said.

Her eyes glimmered dully with the light across the railway as she turned to look, first at him and then at the mobile. "I've got one," she mumbled.

"You wanted this. You've asked for it often enough."

"I've never."

"Then who's been calling," Sharpe demanded, "if not you?"

An uneasy glint began to surface in her drugged eyes. "She used to. She told me she was shooting up when she was meant to be at school."

"If it's your daughter you're talking about I rather think that's your responsibility." Sharpe was provoked into raising his voice over the approaching screech of wheels. "You can't expect us to keep children at school without the support of their parents."

"You're a teacher, are you? Maybe you're the kind that made her stay away." Just as accusingly the woman said "She called me when she OD'd. She didn't know where she was and I couldn't find her in time."

Sharpe was about to retort to all this when the woman's gaze strayed past him. Her eyes widened and her face sank inwards from the mouth as she staggered backwards. She grew aware of the car full of boys, and her expression changed. Sharpe didn't know whether she tripped on the kerb or deliberately stepped in front of the vehicle. She sprawled in the roadway in time for the front wheels to crush her legs and her head. Her body jerked as the rear wheels caught her, and then she was utterly still.

As the car put on speed Sharpe dashed into the road, then turned away hastily, clapping a hand over his mouth. When he was able to speak without choking he pulled out the mobile and dialled 999. "Woman run over," he gabbled. "Boys on drugs in a car." He gave the location and ended the call and fled into the tunnel.

He was suffering more guilt than he understood. He only knew he didn't want to be linked with the woman's death. The glow from the mobile tinged the walls green and made them quiver nervously as he ran towards the light at the far end. When he glimpsed movement at the foot of the wall midway through the passage, he was able to imagine it was caused by the shaky glimmer. Then the shape produced thin limbs like an awakening spider and floundered towards him. He didn't know whether it seized his ankles with fingernails or needles or the tips of bones. It sounded barely able to produce a whisper that rustled like litter. "Yours now," it said.

Illustration by Oliver James Crowther.

Laid Down

First published in Cemetery Dance #50, 2004
Also published in: Just Behind You

Something wakes him in the dark. He knows not to move or even to open his mouth. If he makes a sound, someone may realise he's there. They may come down to find him, and anyone who does won't be his friend, unlike the dark. He stays on his back and keeps his arms crossed on his chest so that his elbows don't bump against the sides of the box, and tries to identify what roused him.

Traffic passes in the distance, muffled footsteps tramp overhead and climb to an upper room. He's sure they are retreating from the thought of him. Realising that makes him hungrier, and his mouth gapes until he remembers to keep it shut. He may have closed it only just in time; he feels a tickling on his cheek, and a plump object with quite a few legs scuttles across his lips. He's used to the creatures down here; he even wonders how this one would have tasted. So long as he doesn't utter a sound, there's surely no harm in opening his mouth like a trap, and he does.

He wishes he could see if anything worth feeding on has strayed near him. He can hear larger creatures scrabbling inside the cellar walls, but they never venture into his lair. Whenever the door at the top of the stairs is shut the darkness to complete; he might as well be buried in earth. Perhaps a dream lit up too bright in his head and made him wonder where he was—and then he recalls exactly what jarred him awake: the slam of a car door. Just as he grasps this, he hears footsteps approaching the house.

He flattens himself and presses his elbows like wings against his sides and digs his fingertips between his ribs as if all this may help conceal him. When the bell shrills upstairs he can't help jerking so violently that the container shifts and creaks. Surely nobody will answer the bell. It has clamoured three times before defiant footsteps march downstairs. The front door squeals open and a woman says "I was starting to think you weren't in."

"I was getting ready to go out," his mother tells her.

"You couldn't hear me, you mean." When this brings no audible response the intruder says "Can I come in for a few minutes anyway?"

"What for?"

"I haven't met your son yet."

"You wouldn't want to."

"I'm certain I would. He'll be here, won't he?"

His mother's voice takes on the tone that means she knows more than she says. "I'm having some time off from him."

"Could you tell me where he is?"

"He's being looked after, don't you worry. He's not far."

His lips draw back to grimace at the dark before the meddler says "May I come in, then?"

"Why do you need to do that now?"

"I'd appreciate a little chat. I'd like to clear up a few things."

There's a silence that makes the dark feel as breathless as he is. Then his mother says "You won't be hearing anything you haven't heard about already," and leads the invader into the house.

She has raised her voice just enough to warn him she means him. He jams his legs together like a winged insect trying to revert to a larva while he hears too many footsteps overhead. They hurry to the kitchen, and the door slams loud enough to suggest it will block off any sounds he makes. Certainly the women's voices are inaudible, but this simply gives time the consistency of tar. He has barely started to relax when the voices emerge into the hall. "Big house for just the two of you," the trespasser remarks, and then her footsteps halt. "What's down here?"

"Nothing worth your time," his mother says.

"It must be something," says the woman, and the door inches open.

As light crawls down the steps he tenses himself, opening his mouth. Her hand gropes along the wall for the light switch. She will have to descend two steps to reach it. Her silhouette moves forward, and behind it his mother's face turns grimmer than ever, and she lifts her hands to push. She drops them as the woman turns. "It's just a cellar," she says as if she has noticed nothing.

The front door shuts at least twice as hard as the car. Once the vehicle is out of hearing his mother switches on the cellar light and clatters down the steps. "How much more trouble are you going to make for me? She says she's coming back."

He can't see his mother for the glare of the naked bulb. Her voice is at least as harsh, and squeezing his eyes shut doesn't fend it off. "She won't be happy till she's met Dracula," she cries. "I nearly called you that to her."

It isn't his name, and he thinks his mother realises when she declares "I shouldn't call you it at all, should I? It isn't fair to Dracula. Even he wouldn't bite his mother when she was trying to feed him."

He doesn't know if it's the light or her stare he can feel on his face. He cowers away from both until her footfalls leave him. They have departed from the hall by the time his body dares to slacken. It stiffens again as she tramps out of the kitchen so furiously that he knows she's thinking of him. He's too afraid to shut his eyes as she stalks towards him. There's nowhere he can take refuge as she swings an object at him. "If you won't have me," she cries, "you'll have this."

It bruises his lips before he understands that he's meant to open his mouth. He sucks on the nipple, which doesn't writhe away from him as she did. When the bottle is empty she wheels his pram up and down the cellar until the dark takes him.

Breaking Up

"I'd already written one macabre tale about a mobile phone, and then it occurred to me that there could be another. I suspect all this is my mental preparation for owning one of the things."—Ramsey Campbell, Introduction to the story in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 16

First published in Acquainted With The Night, December 2004
Also published in: Just Behind You

As Kerry glanced through the display window at the street that was bony with frozen snow, a mobile rang. "Will that be him?" Harvey said.

At first she wasn't certain it was hers—more than one of the thousands of phones they sold might play that disco tune—and then she realised the sound was muffled by her handbag on the counter. It stayed a little indistinct when she slipped the phone out of the bag. She read the displayed number and terminated the call. "Not him," Harvey said as if she needed to be told.

"Just a customer," she almost said, remembering how Russell had waited for her to be free so that he could ask whether she thought he was too old for a mobile. "Just someone I used to know," she said.

"Never a stalker, is it? Would you like me to stick with you till Jason picks you up?"

"I'm sure he would have rung if he wasn't nearly here."

"I'd be happy to, all the same. Then if he doesn't show up I could run you wherever you like."

She suspected the manager had somewhere that he liked in mind. His hair was dyed a shade too black, and a sunbed and a gym also kept up his appearance, but his jowls were starting to bag his age. "I thought you had someone to go home to," she said.

"Nowt wrong with being friendly as well, is there?"

"I normally am, I think." His voice had taken on some of the edge he used for second warnings to staff, and she didn't want to be alone with that either. She gave her scarf another turn around her throat and tugged her gloves on before picking up her bag. "You lock up," she said. "I'll be fine."

The first thing she saw on stepping outside was her breath. The cold set about making a mask of her face at once. Along both sides of the deserted street the shop windows were dusty with frost, glass cases in an abandoned museum. The pale mounds with which the glittering pavements were heaped seemed to glow from within. A wind from somewhere even colder sent a shiver through her, which lent Harvey an excuse to look concerned as he withdrew the key from the door. "Really, I could—"

"Really, don't." She was about to put some distance between them when her mobile intervened. As soon as she extracted it she was able to say "This is him."

She keyed the phone but didn't speak until Harvey made for the car park, skidding as he reached the alley between the shops and righting himself with a penguinish flap of his arms. She heard his walled-in curse at a second tumble as she said "Where are you?"

"I'm bloody—" Jason paused to reclaim some of his temper. "I was on my way," he complained.

"Aren't you still?"

"Would I be talking to you if I was? You know what I think of these clowns that talk on their phones while they're driving."

"Not the ones that sell them, I hope."

"There ought to be a law that says you have to tell your customers how to use them. You know that's what I think. Save it, all right? I don't need an argument just now."

She could miss Russell's politeness after all. "You still haven't told me where you are."

"Some bloody place in the middle of nowhere. I've come off the road."

"Are you lost, do you mean?"

"Off the side. In a bloody snowdrift and a ditch. I'm waiting for a tow."

"You sound as if you're blaming me."

"I wouldn't have been going so fast if you didn't get in a panic whenever I'm a minute late."

"Hold on, I don't panic. I haven't been panicking now."

"A huff, then. You make me feel I've let you down and it's a major insult even if you don't say anything."

"Well, please don't feel obliged to meet me tonight."

"You're doing it now. I don't know if I can," Jason added less apologetically than she thought the conversation warranted. "I'll let you know what's happening."

"Don't put yourself to any extra trouble. I'm going home."

"I'll call you there, then."

She didn't quite advise him not to bother. She broke the connection and was stowing the phone when it stirred, a vibration muffled by her glove. As the disco melody began to tick she blinked at the digits through the whitish glow with which a streetlamp coated the display. It was Russell's number.

For an instant she was tempted to agree to dinner at a restaurant or a chat over drinks, except that he would end up pleading gently for more, every plea primed with the expectation of refusal. She might have given him the option of leaving a message, but she wanted to deal more decisively with him than she had with Jason. "Kerry," she said, turning along the path between the huddled mounds.

"Russell."

He sounded uncertain, presumably of her response. "I can see that," she told him.

"Can you?"

She took his surprise as a joke not much less feeble than he was making his voice. "On the call display," she explained nonetheless.

"You're up on these things, not like us oldsters. That's why I came to you."

"Haven't you charged your battery?" she said or, if she was honest, hoped. "You're starting to break up."

"Oh, don't say that." His voice surged, hissing and fragmenting in her ear, then subsided. "What would do that? Would the cold?"

"This much might. Why were you calling, Russell? I'm outside and I don't want mine to die on me."

"Mustn't." He might have been talking to himself until he said "I think it's even colder up here."

Kerry's gaze was drawn beyond the shops to the darker streets that climbed increasingly steeply to the glimmering ridge a thousand feet above the town. "Where's that?" she felt required to ask.

"Home."

She had no more idea where he lived than she had let him have about her; she'd found him a little too eager for that information. "Then I should do something about it," she said.

"Oh, will you? I knew you'd still be kind. Anything you feel you can. Just come and see me if you like."

"I'm sorry, Russell, but it's over. You must know that." Kerry hadn't finished when she heard a rattle and a sprinkling of static that put her in mind of a shower of ice. "Are you still there?" she said and, convinced of the opposite, shut the mobile in her handbag.

She'd reached the end of the shops without encountering a solitary person. She might as well have called in sick like several of her colleagues; the shop had hardly seen a customer all week, and none in the last three hours despite staying open late. Kerry heard the distant clatter of a garage door, and somewhere else uphill a woman was shouting to a child or a dog. Whatever the name was, it seemed to shatter on the sharpness of the air. The low moan that had occupied the pauses in Russell's speech must have been the note of Harvey's car as it laboured up into the dark.

Since the pavements of the first road homewards had been turned into slides by children or less wilfully by adults, she kept to the middle of the road. The light of the floppy-capped streetlamps fell short of her path, and it was only by treading gingerly on it that she established which of the blackness was ice. All the windows of the cars parked on both sides of the slope were either encased in frost or spread with the local newspaper, every visible page of which mentioned someone's death. The windows of the staggered houses were hermetically curtained even if dark, and Kerry felt as though the entire town apart from her was hiding from the weather. She'd tramped as far as the lowest crossroad when her phone began to clamour.

Was it wearing out, or had it caught a chill? Once she managed to fumble it out of her bag she was unable to read the faltering digits in the greenish window. She halted on the intersection, pinning down the hour hand of her shadow and a less distinct minute one while she located the key with a clumsy finger. "On the way?" she said.

"I think you are."

Before he spoke she knew he wasn't Jason, from a rush of static like an effort to breathe. "Russell, can you please stop. I'm expecting a call."

"Anyone but me." For as long as it took him to say this he seemed hardly even to be talking to himself. "I wasn't asking what you think," he said.

To begin with he always had; it had been much of his appeal. "Don't you care about that now?" she was disappointed enough to retort.

"Didn't mean that. Don't confuse me," he protested so harshly that his voice grew almost shapeless. "I meant all I want is for us to see each other."

"I told you once, Russell. I'm sorry if it was rude of me not to answer all your messages, but you did leave a lot after I kept telling you I couldn't meet you. And now I've told you it's over."

"Don't say that." His voice sounded close to disintegrating altogether. "Once more is all I ask. You can see me at least."

"Find someone else, Russell. I'm sure you will. You deserve someone more —"

"More my own age?" he said, not so much interrupting as filling the pause. "There's nobody. I only know your number."

Perhaps he'd stored none except hers. Empty roads loomed on both sides of her vision, and she was aware of another at her back. She was making for the street ahead and trying to find words that would be as civil as final when he spoke. "If it's something I said, please say. Just remember I've never met anyone like you."

He'd ended up repeating that too often and too intensely, along with exhorting her not to waste herself on her job or on such of his friends as he'd met, but his insistence on introducing himself as her uncle had been worst of all. It had started as a joke, then turned into a plea for her not just to contradict him but to reassure him that everyone knew he was teasing. Although striving to hearten him exhausted her, she made a last effort. "You will," she said. "You'll meet someone better, you'll see. Now I'm—"

"Never." Before she could tell him not to be silly he said "No time."

"Look, Russell, is something really wrong? Because if there is you should call—"

"I just need you. You're coming. I can hear."

Kerry closed her fingers around the mobile and strained her ears until they ached with more than the temperature. The phone muttered in her fist—she even seemed to feel it wriggling feebly—but she couldn't hear him in any of the houses. He must be pretending to locate her, unless he was deluding himself. When the crushed voice stopped trying to slip through her fingers she returned the mobile to her bag. She quickened her pace uphill, and a whitish figure peered around a hulking gatepost at her. The token face had fallen askew on its way to leaving the head.

At least half a dozen other snowmen were lying in wait as she toiled up the road. She was in danger of feeling surrounded by them and very little else, as if the townsfolk had been replaced with frozen snow. Of course she was simply nervous that the glazed silence might be interrupted by the shrilling of her phone, but the knowledge didn't help. At least there was a pub across the intersection at the top of the slope she was conquering. Even if she didn't go in, its presence would be company for her. The drinkers beyond the lit windows must be keeping their voices down; perhaps just a few would have ventured out of their houses on a night like this. She was sure that she was hearing muted conversation until she stepped onto the level crossroad and saw that ice had transformed the windows into marble slabs. Their light was borrowed from the nearest streetlamp.

Now that she was denied the chance she couldn't avoid realising she would have liked to be among people if she received another call. She could only make for home as fast as was safe. The rest of the route was yet steeper, and she crossed to the pavement, which consisted of giant steps with a railing to help her climb.

Despite her glove, the rail felt like a handful of ice. To her right, lumps of snow had been gouged out of the crests of the hedges for snowballs or by someone's desperate clutch. Beyond the hedges on both sides of the road, pale figures no more shapely than a child's first drawing appeared to mark her progress. She might almost have fancied they were watching her, even those that had least with which to do so. When a phone jangled, she was near to imagining that it related to a dim hunched shape with the sloughed remains of a face. The sound was in the house belonging to the snowman.

She hauled herself past it in a rage at her nerves. It fell silent, and her phone rang.

She snatched it out so furiously that she was barely able to keep hold of it. A few indecipherable scraps of digits like traces of a fossil glimpsed through moss were visible in the window. She poked the key and clapped the mobile to her face. "Who's there?"

"Don't go too fast. Don't hurt yourself."

"I'm not going to." This wasn't enough of a retort or a challenge. "You can't see me," she said in case that made Russell betray he could.

"I don't need to. We've got a rapport, you and I." If that seemed to bring his voice closer, she wasn't about to let it persuade her of anything; he must be holding the mouthpiece against his lips to blur his words so much. Before she could deny his claim he said "We aren't as different as some people like to think."

By people, did he mean her? She shouldn't care; if she kept him talking, perhaps she could locate him. She hung her bag on her left arm and gripped the railing as she forged uphill. "Why are you saying that?" she had to ask.

"We both stayed where our roots are, didn't we? We never sought our future elsewhere."

"I stayed for my parents."

"So did I."

Could they still be alive? Kerry doubted it, given how much older than she'd taken him to be he'd finally owned up to being. "I thought you were going to write some more books about the countryside," she said.

"That was the plan."

"Why, have you given up?"

"I wouldn't be talking to you if I had."

This sounded more like a plea than she welcomed. "You don't need me, Russell. You were writing long before we met."

A whisper of restlessness made her think she'd scored a point until he said "Why did you start going out with me?"

His voice was disintegrating so much that she could hardly detect the tone, never mind the relevance. "Because you asked me," she said and didn't add

"Because you kept asking."

"You took pity on me, you mean. Couldn't you again?"

"No, Russell, because you had class. Can't you have some now?"

"There isn't much to me any more."

"You know that isn't true. You write books people want to read. I've seen them all over the place."

"If we're finished, so are they."

Was he saying anything that came into his head? As she clambered up the next step, through a tree's sparkling shadow that felt like the threat of being buried under an avalanche, she said "I don't believe you mean that. You must have got over me by now. It's been months."

"Is that all? I can't tell."

Was this another bid for sympathy? Presumably it was the transmission rather than his voice that sounded near to shivering to pieces, but it dismayed her. "Russell, if you're truly feeling so bad you ought to call—"

At once the phone was dead as ice. If he'd given up pestering her, she would let that be enough. She fumbled the mobile into her bag and flexed her stiff fingers before entrusting the bag to them. A dozen clutches at the rail, and twice as many paces as there were slippery steps, brought her to her road.

It stretched left, iced with light under three streetlamps partly masked with snow. The scene might have been embedded in the amber of the night sky. Perhaps it was the silence that rendered it unreal as a Christmas card. The house where she lived was part of the emptiness, since the couple on the ground floor had gone abroad for the winter. She would be happy just to switch on the fires and draw the curtains and have nothing else that she absolutely had to do, she vowed, and was heading left when her mobile came to life.

It could have been Jason, but when she succeeded in wielding the phone her voice felt cold and heavy as the spiked caps of the roofs. "Yes," she said.

"Not far now."

Russell's voice made her feel as if his lips were trying to keep their shape against her ear. "So tell me where," she said.

"Up here."

Suppose he was unable to be any more specific and nervous of admitting it? "Just talk as you walk. I'll hear you," she gathered he was saying despite shedding several consonants.

She couldn't leave the situation unresolved. If he needed help, she ought to find out where to send it. She turned away from her house and grasped the uphill railing. "Just talk," he repeated, though the first word almost dissolved into a hiss.

This street was even steeper. She had to keep hold of the rail, though her gloved hand ached with its iciness. At the end of every pace the handbag on her wrist blundered like a blind but affectionate creature against her hip. Beyond their plots of white the houses appeared to be holding themselves still for fear of inundation by the burdens on their roofs. A wind like the essence of the frozen dark groped at her face as though searching for the bones. She licked her stiff lips to release her voice. "What do you want to talk about?"

"Can't you think of anything?"

His voice must be shivering with static, not with panic. "The weather," she said less than wholly as a joke.

"About us. Times we had together." The silence that ensued might have signified exhaustion or a wordless plea until he said "When we went dancing. I did enjoy myself, you know."

It had been the beginning of their end. Once he'd finished shouting above the disco uproar that he was her uncle, he'd set about dancing with a violence that seemed designed to compete with everyone else in the room. She could almost see the thin figure jigging and jerking as if he'd borrowed all the artificial vigour of the strobe light, his sleeves and trousers flapping like flags in a gale. When he'd panted to a standstill he had subsided into a chair and watched her dance, his eyes flickering with resignation that might have concealed a plea. Now she could have hoped he would ask anything other than "Didn't you?"

"I'm remembering. I don't do everything aloud."

"Don't you want to talk about it?"

"I thought it didn't matter what I talk about as long as I keep talking."

"It doesn't," he might have finished saying if his voice hadn't collapsed into a flood of static.

In a moment the phone was lifeless. A wind drifted down from the white ridge that was gnawing the black sky. The gust lingered behind a hedge to disturb a newspaper or a bank of loose snow—something white that whispered, at any rate. As the wind fastened on her, Kerry shivered and nearly dropped the mobile, which had twitched in her hand. That was a preamble to playing the tune she might have heard at the disco with Russell. "I'm here," she told the blank phone.

"I know. You're outside."

The house beyond the gate to her right seemed to advance from the rank, although it was no taller or thinner than any of its neighbours. A few sets of footprints smudged by last week's brief false thaw led to a front door unconcerned with any colour. The house was beetle-browed with icicles, and as far as she could see, it was unlit. "Well, are you going to let me in?" she said.

"Sorry." He sounded worse than that. "If you could find your own way," he said, dropping several consonants.

Kerry fumbled to thumb the key and then to snap her bag shut on the mobile. As she ventured up the path she felt as if the ill-defined prints were directing her course. If he didn't answer the doorbell she would certainly phone for help. She planted one foot on the doorstep bloated with snow and poked the bellpush in the middle of the door. It rattled more than rang, and at once the door swung inwards.

Light fanned along the hall in time to catch the white mass that swelled into her face. Could the house be colder than the street? The enervated glow through the puffy branches of a tree revealed half of the hall, the lower reaches of a staircase, two open doorways with a light switch between them. On her way to the switch a shiver overwhelmed her. She thought this and her glove were hindering her fingers until she saw that the switch wouldn't budge because it was encased in ice.

She was distracted by the notion that the house was somehow less defined than it ought to be. She peered into the rooms on either side of the switch and saw why. The first would be a sitting-room, the second for dining, but the furniture was close to unidentifiable. Though the windows were shut now, they had been open to the blizzard; the rooms and their contents were deep in snow. As she gazed at the dim pallid heaps, which barely referred to the shapes of a chair and a table and sideboard, Russell said "Up here."

She mustn't have switched off her mobile. His muffled voice was more fragmented than ever, and quite devoid of consonants. She wanted to finish whatever needed to be done, and so she hurried upstairs almost fast enough to outdistance a shiver, gripping the banister that felt cold and slippery enough for metal. "Where?" she called.

She gained the upper floor without hearing any answer. All the doors off the landing were open. While the bathroom appeared to be clear of snow, icicles glimmered beneath the taps. Next was a room so cold that its darkness put her in mind of black ice. Around the door she caught sight of the foot of a bed. She was hoping that he didn't plan to entice her in that direction when his crumbling voice said "Not there, here."

That could only apply to one room. As she stepped over the threshold she saw the town draped in pallor under a sky of brass flawed with stars. Russell's desk must overlook the view, but the desk was buried in a snowdrift. All the same, a form was slumped or crouched in the snowbound chair in front of it. Kerry hurried forward, angry as much as dismayed. "Russell, what have you—"

She was falling towards the chair. She regained her footing barely in time not to clutch at the chair and swing it around or worse. Whatever she'd slipped on, it wasn't ice. She blinked at the floor and tried not to believe what she was seeing. It was scattered with paper—with pages. The empty objects scattered among them were bindings, and she recognised the covers. He'd torn up all his books.

Had he done it for her to find? She wasn't going to feel guilty, but her eyes grew wet and unfocused as she leaned over the chair. "Russell, what did you think—"

She almost planted an unwary hand on the object in the chair for support as she began to make it out. She could only assume he'd ensured for some reason that he couldn't sit at his desk. He'd built his version of a snowman, which was near to collapsing. The lump on top contained more holes than a head should, while the body had thawed and refrozen into such contortions it reminded her of a dead spider. The items like pale glistening sticks that appeared to be exposed here and there must be ice. She started to blink before deciding that she'd seen enough. She turned away hastily and picked her way over the waste of paper.

There was only the bedroom now. She was tempted to walk past and out of the house, but she was too anxious for him. She would have worried about anybody in the state of which she'd seen so much evidence. She pushed the door wide and strode into the room. "Russell, I've had—"

She didn't even manage to utter all of that. For a moment—far too brief—she thought he'd wrapped a heavy quilt around him as he sat propped up against the pillows on the bed under the open window. It was snow, which filled his open mouth. His eyes were doughy wads. He looked no thinner than when she'd last seen him—and then she understood that he owed much of his substance to snow. The little she could distinguish of him was naked, and was that a withered icicle protruding from his fist between his legs? She was trying desperately to grasp how recently he must have lost the power of speech when she heard him. "Not that," he said.

Though each word was in shreds, the voice wasn't on her mobile. She didn't know where it was, and so she almost couldn't move. A shudder helped release her, and she staggered out of the frozen room. "Don't go," Russell said.

His voice was emerging from one of the rooms, and not only his voice. She was nearly at the stairs when whatever was behind her touched the back of her neck. Its grasp was so icy that although it almost instantly disintegrated, the feeling of it lingered like a brand. She would have fallen headlong if she hadn't seized the banister. She fled downstairs and along the unlit hall, and heard a whisper at her back that might have been an attempt to speak or the best her pursuer could do in the way of footsteps. She groped at the latch and dragged the door open and slammed it behind her so hard that it dislodged snow from the roof. She skidded along the path and slithered downhill, clinging to the rail, as fast as carelessness would take her. She wasn't out of sight of Russell's house when her mobile rang.

She had to force herself to halt and dig in her handbag, though the sound of any of her friends would be reassuring. She couldn't identify the unfinished digits that appeared to be struggling into view. "Jason," she almost hoped aloud, but the dogged incomplete voice wasn't his. "You tried," it said. "My turn."

2005

The Winner

First published in Taverns Of The Dead, 2005
Also published in: Just Behind You

Until Jessop drove onto the waterfront he thought most of the wind was racing the moonlit clouds. As the Mini left behind the last of the deserted office buildings he saw ships toppling like city blocks seized by an earthquake. Cars were veering away from the entrance to the ferry terminal. Several minutes of clinging grimly to the wheel as the air kept throwing its weight at the car took him to the gates. A Toyota stuffed with wailing children wherever there was space among the luggage met him at the top of the ramp. "Dublin's cancelled," the driver told him in an Ulster accent he had to strain to understand. "Come back in three hours, they're saying."

"I never had my supper," one of her sons complained, and his sister protested "We could have stayed at Uncle's." Jessop retorted inwardly that he could have delayed his journey by a day, but he'd driven too far south to turn back now. He could have flown from London that morning and beaten the weather if he hadn't preferred to be frugal. He sent his windblown thanks after the Toyota and set about looking for a refuge on the dock road. There were pubs in abundance, but no room to park outside them and no sign of any other parking area. He was searching for a hotel where he could linger over a snack, and realising that all the hotels were back beyond the terminal entrance, when he belatedly noticed a pub.

It was at the far end of the street he'd just passed. Enough horns for a brass band accompanied the U-turn he made. He swung into the cramped gap between two terraces of meagre houses that opened directly onto the pavement. Two more uninterrupted lines of dwellings so scrawny that their windows were as narrow as their doors faced each other across two ranks of parked cars, several of which were for sale. Jessop parked outside the Seafarer, under the single unbroken street lamp, and retrieved his briefcase from the back seat before locking the car.

The far end of the street showed him windowless vessels staggering about at anchor. A gust blundered away from the pub, carrying a mutter of voices.

The window of the pub was opaque except for posters plastered against the inside: THEME NIGHT'S, SINGA-LONG'S, QUIZ NIGHT'S. He would rather not be involved in any of those, but perhaps he could find himself a secluded corner in which to work. The lamp and the moon fought over producing shadows of his hand as he pushed open the thick shabby door.

The low wide dim room appeared to be entangled in nets. Certainly the upper air was full of them and smoke. Those under the ceiling trapped rather too much of the yellowish light, while those in the corners resembled overgrown cobwebs. Jessop was telling himself that the place was appealingly quaint when the wind used the door to shove him forward and slammed it behind him.

"Sorry," he called to the barman and the dozen or so drinkers and smokers seated at round tables cast in black iron. Nobody responded except by watching him cross the discoloured wooden floor to the bar. The man behind it, whose small eyes and nose and mouth were crammed into the space left by a large chin, peered at him beneath a beetling stretch of net. "Here's one," he announced.

"Reckon you're right there, cap'n," growled a man who, despite the competition, would have taken any prize for bulkiness.

"You'd have said it if he hadn't, Joe," his barely smaller partner croaked past a hand-rolled cigarette, rattling her bracelets as she patted his arm.

"I'm sorry?" Jessop wondered aloud.

She raised a hand to smooth her shoulder-length red tresses. "We're betting you went for the ferry."

"I hope you've staked a fortune on it, then."

"He means you'd win another, Mary," Joe said. "He wouldn't want you to lose."

"That's so," Jessop said, turning to the barman. "What do you recommend?"

"Nothing till I know you. There's not many tastes we can't please here, mister."

"Jessop," Jessop replied before he grasped that he hadn't been asked a question, and stared hard at the beer-pumps. "Captain's Choice sounds worth a go."

He surveyed the length of the chipped sticky bar while the barman hauled at the creaking pump. A miniature billboard said WIN A VOYAGE IN OUR COMPETTITTION, but there was no sign of a menu. "Do you serve food?" he said.

"I've had no complaints for a while."

"What sort of thing do you do?"

"Try me."

"Would a curry be a possibility? Something along those lines?"

"What do you Southerners think goes in one of them?"

"Anything that's edible," said Jessop, feeling increasingly awkward. "That's the idea of a curry, isn't it? Particularly on board ship, I should think."

"You don't fancy scouse."

"I've never tried it. If that's what's on I will."

"Brave lad," the barman said and thrust a tankard full of brownish liquid at him. "Let's see you get that down you."

Jessop did his best to seem pleased with the inert metallic gulp he took. He was reaching for his wallet until the barman said "Settle when you're going."

"Shall I wait here?"

"For what?" the barman said, then grinned at everyone but Jessop. "For your bowl, you mean. We'll find you where you're sitting."

Jessop didn't doubt it, since nobody made even a token pretence of not watching him carry his briefcase to the only unoccupied corner, which was farthest from the door. As he perched on a ragged leather stool and leaned against the yielding wallpaper under a net elaborated by a spider's web, a woman who might have been more convincingly blonde without the darkness on her upper lip remarked "That'll be a good few hours, I'd say."

"Can't argue with you there, Betty," said her companion, a man with a rat asleep on his chest or a beard, which he raised to point it at Jessop. "Is she right, Jessop?"

"Paul," Jessop offered, though it made him no more comfortable. "A couple, anyway."

"A couple's not a few, Tom," scoffed a man with tattoos of fish and less shapely deep-sea creatures swimming under the cuffs of his shabby brownish pullover.

"What are they else then, Daniel?"

"Don't fall out over me," Jessop said as he might have addressed a pair of schoolchildren. "You could both be right, either could, rather."

Resentment might have been a reason why Daniel jerked one populated thumb at a wiry wizened man topped with a black bobble cap. "He's already Paul. Got another name so we know who's who?"

"None I use."

"Be a love and fish it up for us."

At least it was Mary who asked in these terms, with a hoarseness presumably born of cigarettes. After a pause Jessop heard himself mumble "Desmond."

"Scouse," the barman said – it wasn't clear to whom or even if it was an order. Hoping to keep his head down, Jessop snapped his briefcase open. He was laying out papers on the table when the street door flew wide, admitting only wind. He had to slap the papers down as the barman stalked to the door and heaved a stool against it. Nobody else looked away from Jessop. "Still a student, are you, Des?" Betty said.

He wouldn't have believed he could dislike a name more than the one he'd hidden ever since learning it was his, but the contraction was worse. Des Jessop – it was the kind of name a teacher would hiss with contempt. It made him feel reduced to someone else's notion of him, in danger of becoming insignificant to himself. Meanwhile he was saying "All my life, I hope."

"You want to live off the rest of us till you're dead," Joe somewhat more than assumed.

"I'm saying there'll always be something left to discover. That ought to be true for everyone, I should think."

"We've seen plenty," Daniel grumbled. "We've seen enough."

"Forgive me if I haven't yet."

"No need for that," said Mary. "We aren't forgivers, us."

"Doesn't it make you tired, all that reading?" Betty asked him.

"Just the opposite."

"I never learned nothing from a book," she said once she'd finished scowling over his words. "Never did me any harm either."

"You'd know a couple's not a few if you'd read a bit," said Joe.

"Lay off skitting at my judy," Tom warned him.

For some reason everybody else but Jessop roared with laughter. He felt as if his nervous grin had hooked him by the corners of his mouth. He was wobbling to his feet when the barman called "Don't let them scare you off, Des. They just need their fun."

"I'm only..." Jessop suspected that any term he used would provoke general mirth. "Where's the..."

"The poop's got to be behind you, hasn't it?" Betty said in gleeful triumph.

Until he glanced in that direction he wasn't sure how much of a joke this might be. Almost within arm's length was a door so unmarked he'd taken it for a section of wall. When he pushed it, the reluctant light caught on two faces gouged out of the wood, carvings of such crudeness that the female was distinguishable from her mate only by a mop of hair. Beyond the door was a void that proved to be a corridor once he located a switch dangling from an inch of flex. The luminous rotting pear of a bulb revealed that the short passage led to an exit against which crates of dusty empties were stacked. The barred exit was shaken by a gust of wind and, to his bewilderment, what sounded like a blurred mass of television broadcasts. He hadn't time to investigate. Each wall contained a door carved with the rudiments of a face, and he was turning away from the Gents before the image opposite alerted him that the man's long hair was a patch of black fungus. He touched as little of the door as possible while letting himself into the Gents.

The switch in the passage must control all the lights. Under the scaly ceiling a precarious fluorescent tube twitched out a pallid glow with an incessant series of insect clicks. There was barely enough space in the room for a pair of clogged urinals in which cigarette butts were unravelling and a solitary cubicle opposite a piebald slimy sink. Beneath the urinals the wall was bearded with green mould. High up beside the cubicle a token window was covered by a rusty grille restless with old cobwebs. Jessop kicked open the cubicle door.

A watery sound grew louder – an irregular sloshing he'd attributed to the cistern. He urged himself to the seatless discoloured pedestal. The instant he looked down, only the thought of touching the encrusted scabby walls restrained him from supporting himself against them. Whatever was gaping wide-mouthed at him from the black water, surely it was dead, whether it had been drowned by someone or swum up the plumbing. Surely it was the unstable light, not anticipation of him, that made the whitish throat and pale fat lips appear to work eagerly. He dragged one sleeve over his hand and wrenched at the handle of the rickety cistern. As a rush of opaque water carried the mouth into the depths, Jessop retreated to the first urinal and kept a hand over his nose and mouth while he filled the mouldy china oval to its lower brim.

He dodged out of the fluttering room and was nearly at the door to the bar when he faltered. A confusion of angry voices was moving away from him. A clatter of furniture ended it, and a hoarse voice he identified as Betty's ordered, "Now stay there." He was wishing away the silence as he eased the door open a crack.

The bar seemed emptier than when he'd left it. Two considerable men who'd been seated directly ahead no longer were. The stool hadn't moved from in front of the exit. Could the men be waiting out of sight on either side for him? As he grew furious with his reluctance to know, the barman saw him. "Food's on its way," he announced.

Mary leaned into view, one hand flattening her scalp, to locate Jessop. "Aren't you coming out? This isn't hide and seek."

When embarrassment drove Jessop forward he saw that Daniel had changed seats. He was penned into a corner by the men from the abandoned table, and looked both dishevelled and trapped. "He was trying to see your papers, Des," Betty said.

"Good heavens, I wouldn't have minded. It isn't important."

"It is to us."

As Jessop resumed his corner Tom said, "Got a sweetheart abroad, have you? Was she the lure?"

"His bonnie lies over the ocean," Mary took to have been confirmed, and began to sing.

"No he doesn't," Jessop retorted, but only to himself while he busied himself with his tankard, which had been topped up in his absence. Once the chorus subsided he said guardedly "No, they're over here."

"How many's that?" enquired Joe. "Bit of a ladies' man, are you?"

"A girl in every port," said Tom.

"Not in any really," Jessop said, risking a laugh he hoped was plainly aimed at himself.

"Same with us," Daniel said and gave his fellows an ingratiating look.

The microwave behind the bar rang as if signalling the end of a round, which let Jessop watch the barman load a tray and bring it to him. Once the bowlful of grey stew had finished slopping about, Jessop had to unwrap the fork and spoon from their tattered napkin. He was spooning up a blackened lump when Betty said "What do you make of that then, Des?"

This struck Jessop as the latest of several questions too many. "What would you?"

"Oh, we've had ours. We gobbled it."

"Sup up, Des," Daniel advised. "You'll get plenty of that where you're going."

Was the dish Irish, then? Jessop seemed to have no option other than to raise the dripping lump to his mouth. It was either an unfamiliar vegetable or a piece of meat softened beyond identification, presumably in whatever pot had contained the communal dinner. "Good?" Mary prompted as everyone watched.

"Gum." At least the mouthful allowed him not to answer too distinctly. He swallowed it as whole as an oyster, only to become aware that his performance had invited however many encores it would take to unload the bowl. He was chewing a chunk that needed a good deal of it when Joe declared "If you're not a student I'm saying you're a teacher."

Jessop succeeded at last in downing and retaining the gristly morsel. "Lecturer," he corrected.

"Same thing, isn't it?"

"I wouldn't say quite."

"Still teach, don't you? Still live off them that works, as well."

"Now, Joe," Mary interrupted. "You'll have our new mate not wanting to stay with us."

Jessop could have told her that had happened some time ago. He was considering how much of his portion he could decently leave before seeking another refuge from the gale, and whether he was obliged to be polite any longer, when Tom demanded "So what do you lecture, Des?"

"Students," Jessop might have retorted, but instead displayed the Beethoven score he'd laid out to review in preparation for his introductory lecture. "Music's my territory."

As he dipped his spoon in search of a final mouthful Mary said "How many marks would our singing get?"

"I don't really mark performances. I'm more on the theory side."

Joe's grunt of disdainful vindication wasn't enough for Tom, who said "You've got to be able to say how good it is if you're supposed to be teaching about it."

"Six," Jessop said to be rid of the subject, but it had occupied all the watching eyes. "Seven," he amended. "A good seven. That's out of ten. A lot of professionals would be happy with that."

Betty gave a laugh that apparently expressed why everyone looked amused. "You haven't heard us yet, Des. You've got to hear."

"You start us off, Betty," Daniel urged.

For as long as it took her to begin, Jessop was able to hope he would be subjected only to a chorus. Having lurched to her feet, she expanded her chest, a process that gave him more of a sense of the inequality of her breasts than he welcomed, and commenced her assault on the song. What was she suggesting ought to be done with the drunken sailor? Her diction and her voice, cracked enough for a falsetto, made it impossible to judge. Jessop fed himself a hearty gulp of Captain's Choice in case it rendered him more tolerant as she sat down panting. "Oh," he said hurriedly, "I think—"

"You can't say yet," Daniel objected. "You've got to hear everyone."

Jessop lowered his head, not least to avoid watching Mary. Betty's lopsidedness had begun to resemble an omen. The sound of Mary was enough of an ordeal – her voice even screechier than her friend's, her answer to the question posed by the song even less comprehensible. "There," she said far too eventually. "Who'll be next?"

As Joe stood up with a thump that might have been designed to attract Jessop's attention, he heaped his spoon with a gobbet of scouse to justify his concentration on the bowl. Once the spoonful passed his teeth it became clear that it was too rubbery to be chewed and too expansive to be swallowed. Before Joe had finished growling his first line, Jessop staggered to his feet. He waved his frantic hands on either side of his laden face and stumbled through the doorway to the toilets.

The prospect of revisiting the Gents made him clap a hand over his mouth. When he elbowed the other door open, however, the Ladies looked just as uninviting. A blackened stone sink lay in fragments on the uneven concrete beneath a rusty drooling tap on a twisted greenish pipe. Jessop ran to the first of two cubicles and shouldered the door aside. Beyond it a jagged hole in the glistening concrete showed where a pedestal had been. What was he to make of the substance like a jellyfish sprawling over the entire rim? Before he could be sure what the jittery light was exhibiting, the mass shrank and slithered into the unlit depths. He didn't need the spectacle to make him expel his mouthful into the hole and retreat to the corridor. He was peering desperately about for a patch of wall not too stained to lean against when he heard voices – a renewal of the television sounds beyond the rear exit and, more clearly, a conversation in the bar.

"Are we telling Des yet?"

"Betty's right, we'll have to soon."

"Can't wait to see his face."

"I remember how yours looked, Mary."

It wasn't only their words that froze him – it was that, exhausted perhaps by singing, both voices had given up all disguise. He wouldn't have known they weren't meant to be men except for the names they were still using. If that indicated the kind of bar he'd strayed into, it had never been his kind. He did his best to appear unaware of the situation as, having managed to swallow hard, he ventured into the bar.

More had happened than he knew. Joe had transferred his bulk to the stool that blocked the street door. Jessop pretended he hadn't noticed, only to realise that he should have confined himself to pretending it didn't matter. He attempted this while he stood at the table to gather the score and return it to his briefcase. "Well," he said as casually as his stiffening lips would allow, "I'd better be on my way."

"Not just yet, Des," Joe said, settling more of his weight against the door. "Listen to it."

Jessop didn't know if that referred to the renewed onslaught of the gale or him. "I need something from my car."

"Tell us what and we'll get it for you. You aren't dressed for this kind of night."

Jessop was trying to identify whom he should tell to let him go – the barman was conspicuously intent on wiping glasses – and what tone and phrasing he should use when Daniel said, "You lot singing's put Des off us and his supper."

"Let's hear you then, Des," Joe rather more than invited. "Your turn to sing."

"Yes, go on, Des," Mary shrilled. "We've entertained you, now you can."

Might that be all they required of him? Jessop found himself blurting "I don't know what to perform."

"What we were," Joe said.

Jessop gripped his clammy hands together behind his back and drew a breath he hoped would also keep down the resurgent taste of his bowlful. As he repeated the question about the sailor, his dwarfed voice fled back to him while all the drinkers rocked from side to side, apparently to encourage him. The barman found the glasses he was wiping more momentous than ever. Once Jessop finished wishing it could indeed be early in the morning, if that would put him on the ferry, his voice trailed off. "That's lovely," Betty cried, adjusting her fallen breast. "Go on."

"I can't remember any more. It really isn't my sort of music."

"It will be," Daniel said.

"Take him down to see her," Betty chanted, "and he'll soon be sober."

"Let him hear her sing and then he'll need no drinking," Mary added with something like triumph.

They were only suggesting lyrics, Jessop told himself – perhaps the very ones they'd sung. The thought didn't help him perform while so many eyes were watching him from the dimness that seeped through the nets. He felt as if he'd been lured into a cave where he was unable to see clearly enough to defend himself. All around him the intent bulks were growing visibly restless; Mary was fingering her red tresses as though it might be time to dispense with them. "Come on, Des," Joe said, so that for an instant Jessop felt he was being directed to the exit. "No point not joining in."

"We only get one night," said Tom.

"So we have to fit them all in," Daniel said.

All Jessop knew was that he didn't want to need to understand. A shiver surged up through him, almost wrenching his hands apart. It was robbing him of any remaining control – and then he saw that it could be his last chance. "You're right, Joe," he said and let them see him shiver afresh. "I'm not dressed for it. I'll get changed."

Having held up his briefcase to illustrate his ruse, he was making for the rear door when Mary squealed "No need to be shy, Des. You can in here."

"I'd rather not, thank you," Jessop said with the last grain of authority he could find in himself, and dodged into the corridor.

As soon as the door was shut he stood his briefcase against it. Even if he wanted to abandon the case, it wouldn't hold the door. He tiptoed fast and shakily to the end of the passage and lowered the topmost crate onto his chest. He retraced his steps as fast as silencing the bottles would allow. He planted the crate in the angle under the hinges and took the briefcase down the corridor. He ignored the blurred mutter of televisions beyond the door while he picked up another crate. How many could he use to ensure the route was blocked before anyone decided he'd been out of sight too long? He was returning for a third crate when he heard a fumbling at the doors on both sides of the corridor.

Even worse than the shapeless eagerness was the way the doors were being assaulted in unison, as if by appendages something was reaching out from – where? Beneath him, or outside the pub? Either thought seemed capable of paralysing him. He flung himself out of their range to seize the next crate, the only aspect of his surroundings he felt able to trust to be real. He couldn't venture down the dim corridor past the quivering doors. He rested crate after crate against the wall, and dragged the last one aside with a jangle of glass. Grabbing his briefcase and abandoning stealth, he threw his weight against the metal bar across the door.

It wouldn't budge for rust. He dropped the case and clutched two-handed at the obstruction while he hurled every ounce of himself at it. The bar gave a reluctant gritty clank, only to reveal that a presence as strong as Jessop was on the far side of the door. It was the wind, which slackened enough to let him and the door stagger forward. He blocked the door with one foot as he snatched up the briefcase. Outside was a narrow unlit alley between the backs of houses. Noise and something more palpable floundered at him – the wind, bearing a tangle of voices and music. At the end of the alley, less than twenty feet away, three men were waiting for him.

Wiry Paul was foremost, flanked by Joe and Tom. He'd pulled his bobble hat down to his eyebrows and was flexing his arms like thick stalks in a tide. "You aren't leaving now we've given you a name," he said.

A flare of rage that was mostly panic made Jessop shout "My name's Paul."

"Fight you for it," the other man offered, prancing forward.

"I'm not playing any more games with anyone."

"Then we aren't either. You won."

"Won the moment you stepped through the door," Tom seemed to think Jessop wanted to hear.

Jessop remembered the notice about a competition. It was immediately clear to him that however much he protested, he was about to receive his prize. "You were the quiz," Paul told him as Joe and Tom took an identical swaying pace forward.

Jessop swung around and bolted for the main road. The dark on which the houses turned their backs felt close to solid with the gale and the sounds entangled in it. The uproar was coming from the houses, from televisions and music systems turned up loud. It made him feel outcast, but surely it had to mean there would be help within earshot if he needed to appeal for it. He struggled against the relentless gale towards the distant gap that appeared to mock his efforts by tossing back and forth. He glanced over his shoulder to see Paul and his cronies strolling after him. A car sped past the gap ahead as if to tempt him forward while he strove not to be blown into an alley to his right. Or should he try that route even if it took him farther from the main road? The thought of being lost as well as pursued had carried him beyond the junction when Betty and Mary blocked his view of the road.

They were still wearing dresses that flapped in the wind, but they were more than broad enough to leave him no escape. The gale lifted Mary's tresses and sent them scuttling crabwise at Jessop. "Some of us try to be more like her," Mary growled with a defensiveness close to violence. "Try to find out what'll make her happier."

"Lots have tried," Betty said in much the same tone. "We're just the first that's had her sort on board."

"Shouldn't be surprised if her sisters want to see the world now too."

"She doesn't just take," Betty said more defensively still. "She provides."

Jessop had been backing away throughout this, both from their words and from comprehending them, but he couldn't leave behind the stale upsurge of his dinner. When he reached the junction again he didn't resist the gale. It sent him sidling at a run into the dark until he managed to turn. The houses that walled him in were derelict and boarded up, yet the noise on both sides of him seemed unabated, presumably because the inhabitants of the nearest occupied buildings had turned the volume higher. Why was the passage darkening? He didn't miss the strip of moonlit cloud until he realised it was no longer overhead. At that moment his footsteps took on a note more metallic than echoes between bricks could account for, but his ears had fastened on another sound – a song.

It was high and sweet and not at all human. It seemed capable of doing away with his thoughts, even with his fleeting notion that it could contain all music. Nothing seemed important except following it to its source – certainly not the way the floor tilted abruptly beneath him, throwing him against one wall. Before long he had to leave his briefcase in order to support himself against the metal walls of the corridor. He heard the clientele of the Seafarer tramp after him, and looked back to see the derelict houses rock away beyond Mary and Betty. All this struck him as less than insignificant, except for the chugging of engines that made him anxious to be wherever it wouldn't interfere with the song. Someone opened a hatch for him and showed him how to grasp the uprights of the ladder that led down into the unlit dripping hold. "That's what sailors hear," said another of the crew as Jessop's foot groped downwards, and Jessop wondered if that referred to the vast wallowing beneath him as well as the song. For an instant too brief for the notion to stay in his mind he thought he might already have glimpsed the nature of the songstress. You'd sing like that if you looked like that, came a last thought. It seemed entirely random to him, and he forgot it as the ancient song drew him into the enormous cradle of darkness.

The Announcement

First published in Dark Delicacies, 2005
Also published in: Just Behind You

"This isn't me." As I sprint around the corner of the hotel I shout it louder, but the taxi is already at an intersection. It vanishes along the cross street while I'm sucking in another breath. Three girls find my antics worthy of a titter. I give them an expansive shrug that's meant to be comical, but they've returned to watching half a dozen mute performances by a rock group in the window of a television shop. I'm trudging back to the lobby to ask for directions when a limousine draws up in front of the hotel.

So the taxi could have used that street despite the ban on traffic. Didn't the driver think I merited the exemption? He begrudged me a receipt, as if he didn't believe my journey deserved one or even a taxi. As I scowl at the limousine, a young woman in a severely grey suit climbs out and hurries to open the door for a puffed-up bantam the colour of rust in a T-shirt and jeans. "Mr Rigg won't need you till tomorrow when he's signing," she tells the chauffeur.

I make for her charge as if his name has reeled me in. "Excuse me, are you Bill Rigg? Are you staying at this hotel?"

His crumpled T-shirt answers my first question. It's printed with the cover of The Koran Encryption, his impossibly best-selling novel. He's showing me his mottled face with its mouth pressed as straight as his frown when the limousine cruises away and his minder darts to intervene. "Mr Rigg has finished for today," she informs me. "He'll be reading from his book again tomorrow morning and signing them at Texts."

"I know that." In case I sounded interested I add "I'm a writer. I've been reading at the festival as well."

Rigg unclenches his face to put on a quizzical look, but his features stay too close together. "Should we know you?"

"Joseph Nicholas Brady." Since this earns no recognition, I name my novel. "The Absolutely True and Indisputably Verifiable Facts about the Universe!"

Rigg scratches his flat shaven pate. "Where'd you get those?"

That's part of the point, as I tried to explain to my audience on the folding chairs in the barely coloured windowless room. The book is a satire on novels that claim to be based on secret history, and all the sources cited in the footnotes derive from my name: Harold Phelan, Jody Lane, Seb Holland, Sally Joiner, Leonard Parr, Neil Boole, Jeannie Charles, Ellen Spencer, Sephirah Hardy, Jess Loman, Phyllis Adler, Joan Bradley, Ned Sloane... Someone accused me of cynicism, and because she was clutching a copy of Rigg's wretched thousand-pager I asked whether she would rather believe that all the Islamic elements in art are the code of a conspiracy that's poised to rule the world. By then I'd lost my temper with the voice that had muttered throughout my reading. At first I'd thought it was one of my six listeners, and then I'd grasped that it was seeping through the wall. Now I realise that it sounded like Rigg's voice. Before I can demand where he was performing, the young woman says "Shall we go inside? You don't want to be mobbed by fans this late."

Her advice isn't directed at me, but I won't have them knowing how I've been treated. I'll sit in the bar until they go to their rooms. I'm about to lead the way when Rigg's small eyes peer at me. "Aren't you in the Grand? Sounded like you weren't expecting me to be."

I won't lie in my writing, and I shouldn't even to him, but it costs me an effort to admit "I'm in the Rest."

"The car took us there first by mistake," the young woman laughs, then renders her grin sympathetic. "We're picking up the bill. His publishers."

Mine didn't offer, nor did they provide any copies of my book. "You might want to keep an eye on his publicity this weekend," I tell her, more to display my professionalism than because I care. "I don't think the folk who are running this festival know what publicity means."

While she appreciates my concern or pretends to, Rigg can't be bothered. "Shouldn't need it if you're any good. Sold out tonight and I am tomorrow."

His speech is as perfunctory as his prose. Comparing his carelessness to the pains I take to choose my words makes my head throb. I'm struggling to compose some witticism on the theme of not wanting to sell out when he turns his back. "I'm off to watch myself on telly," he declares, striding at the automatic doors as though he'll butt them if they don't give way to him.

The young woman blinks at me. "Will you be all right now?"

"I don't know where my hotel is from here."

"It isn't far. Shall I call a taxi for you?"

"Just tell me. I'll endeavour not to get mobbed."

She returns her phone to her gilded handbag and hastens to the corner of the building, where she points past the televisions. "Straight along for a few blocks. You'll be ready for bed."

For a moment I indulge in fancying she means this as an invitation, but she's gazing at me to ensure I obey her directions. When I reach the window full of screens I glance back. She hasn't lingered, and I suspect she's bound for Rigg's bed. I stare at the multiplication of yet another prancing rock group in case it's ousted by his image. I wouldn't be able to hear what he says, not that I want to. I almost succeed in thinking that he must be hard up for an audience if he has to watch himself.

As I tramp along the empty street the shop fronts dwindle and grow shabby. After ten minutes most of them are shuttered with metal if they aren't disused. On the block at the end of which I see a sign stuttering above my hotel, a betting shop nestles against an arcade of fruit machines between Sensuous Couples, whose grille has been adorned with a cartoon of an erupting penis, and a wine shop with returns in its doorway, not all of them smashed. Next to my accommodation a second-hand shop is called Hi Its Fi, a clump of words that makes me grind my teeth. Has someone left a television switched on behind the shutter? Can that be Rigg's muffled voice? I'm close to resting my ear against the rusty weatherbeaten metal slats when I lurch away in a rage to my hotel.

The sign has lost the bulk of its first syllable. All that flickers whenever it manages to summon up the energy is T ELLER'S REST. The grimy splintered glass of the narrow awning blurs it as I push open the rather less than wholly transparent door, scraping the already ragged brownish carpet of the rudimentary lobby. The stained reception counter is unattended except for a vacuum cleaner slouching beneath the pigeonholes, one of which protrudes a message slip that looks aged yellow by the dim illumination leaking from under the cornices. A placard propped against the extravagantly scratched door of the solitary lift says OUt oF OARdER. So is the slogan, I'd comment if there was anyone to hear. Instead I make for the boxed-in stairs that are partly covered by a trampled blackened carpet and toil up to my room.

Though it's only two floors distant, I'm sweating by the time I reach it. The impressions of landscapes that are presumably intended to relieve the monotony of the sombre corridor look half melted by the central heating that's taking on the August mugginess. When I unlock my door, which is featurelessly pink except for a red 8 dangling from its lower screw, the stark room the colour of old bone seems to have stored up more than its share of the heat. The grubby gamboge curtains have drifted together on their sagging wire. I drag them apart, but the dwarfish double-glazed window opaque with condensation won't budge. I snarl at it and at the room in general, especially the token furniture, which gives me the feeling that it was hurriedly assembled and then crammed into one corner of an attic along with me. I snarl loudest at the midget television perched on a bracket opposite my frayed pillow, because I'm unable to resist switching it on in search of Rigg.

It comes to life with an explosion of noise that makes me desperate to mute it. I poke several buttons on the remote control before I succeed in gagging the set, which is showing a film with dialogue in sentences apparently too short to find space for grammar. The next channel shows a rock group I'm happy to have hushed, and the third brings me Rigg in conversation with a literary critic who surely ought to know better. Perhaps she does. I may never find out, because I can't restore the sound.

I do my best to fancy that his face is red not just with the raw colour but with shame, although his expression is insufferably smug. When I've finished bruising my thumb on the buttons I manage to refrain from flinging the control at him. I extinguish the television and strew the faded bedspread with my clothes on the way to the cupboard that does duty as a toilet and bathroom.

The shower curtain has ripped free of half its hooks. The water from the clogged shower head keeps faltering and spurting afresh, either much hotter or much colder. As I prance about the narrow bath to avoid the worst excesses of the shower I hear a muffled voice that I have to tell myself isn't commenting on my antics. I flounder out of the bath and grab the single ragged towel from the precariously askew rail beside the cracked sink. As the water finishes giggling in the plughole, I realise that the mutter is in one of the adjoining rooms. While I can't distinguish any of its words, I recognise Rigg's voice.

I'm still wielding the meagre towel as I march into the bedroom. I kneel in the subsiding middle of the bed and press my ear against the damp wall, then squeeze between the wardrobe and the equally shaky dressing table to listen over there. It must be tiredness that leaves me incapable of deciding which side is playing host to Rigg, unless both are. I stand in the cramped gap between the bed and the dressing-table, one drawer of which protrudes several stubborn inches, and shout "Can you turn that down, please" twice.

At first there's no response. When I halve the request and double my volume, it earns me sleepy protests and thumps on both walls while Rigg's harangue continues as incomprehensibly as ever. I snatch the phone from its hiding place behind one curtain and poke the zero, which ought to call Reception as well as summing Rigg up. The phone is so dead that I could imagine I'm hearing his voice through the receiver.

I slam it back on the windowsill and struggle into my clammy clothes. Shoving the key on its cumbersome bludgeon into a hip pocket, I dash into the corridor, only for Rigg's voice to disappear as if the thick gloom has engulfed it. I won't be tricked. As soon as I stick my head inside the room I can hear him mumbling on. I bang the door shut and run along the humid corridor to the equally windowless stairs. "Hello?" I shout as I come in sight of the reception counter. "Is someone here, please?"

I'm about to summarise this more loudly when I grasp that Rigg's voice is outside the hotel. Although its words stay indistinct, the timbre makes its source clear, not least because I saw one near the building where I gave my talk. It's a speaker van. What is it saying? Rigg must be broadcasting his presence at the behest of the festival organisers or at least encouraged by them. More to the point, why is the van loitering outside the hotel? How late is it allowed to keep its racket up? I need my sleep. I drag the door over the scraped carpet and pounce out of the hotel.

The van isn't as close as I thought, which is why its message stays unclear. It's beyond a concrete flyover a hundred yards away in the opposite direction from the one that brought me here. As I strain my ears its engine starts with a protracted rasp that sounds insulting, and the voice recedes. I head for the lobby, and then I halt as though I've been grabbed by the shoulders, which hunch up. I'm almost certain that Rigg said my name.

What comment has he recorded about me? Or is he in the vehicle, not watching television after all? Whatever he goes on to say, it's as unintelligible as his previous spiel. I won't be able to sleep while the van could be wandering the streets and undermining any reputation I may have. Perhaps I didn't really hear my name, but I have to know. I step off the patch of light outside the hotel and run to the flyover.

It's four lanes wide and supported by massive concrete pillars. They're sprayed with crude letters that barely form words and with less than words —initials and drawings primitive enough for a cave. Beyond the pillars directly ahead, a street illuminated by fewer lights than there are lamps is packed with dilapidated shops boarded up for the night if not for longer. At the end of the first block I glimpse tail-lights swinging left and trailing Rigg's blurred voice.

As I sprint from beneath the flyover I notice the street isn't deserted. The shadows between those streetlamps that aren't broken contain women, each of whom murmurs as I pass. I don't need to catch their words to know what they're offering, and I hurry past without responding. I'm nearly at the junction when a less circumspect woman dressed in a small amount of leather steps in front of me. "What are you after, love?"

"Them," I pant, jabbing my hands in front of me. "I'm after them."

She inflates her chest with a taut creak. She must think I had this in mind, because she says "Just these?"

"Not that. None of that," I gasp as I stumble around her. "Him."

"If you're one of that bunch you're up the wrong end."

I gather she's speculating about my sexual tastes, since her colleagues add their ribald thoughts. "I'm not talking about that," I protest. "Can't you hear?"

"We've been hearing you fine. You sound pretty desperate to me."

I haven't time for this, not least because her loose words are obscuring phrases I can almost identify along the street. "What did it say just then?"

"Watch who you're calling an it, love. Show some respect or we'll have to sort you out."

"You're the ones who ought to be showing respect, and a few other people as well." I shouldn't let myself be provoked, because now I'm blotting out the harangue of the van. It couldn't actually have said "He'd send anyone asleep, dopey sod," but what would have sounded like that? I grimace at the women to fend them off as I dash after the van.

It's several hundred yards away and moving just a little faster than I'm able to maintain. At least I can't see anyone ahead to hinder me. All the properties I'm passing are featureless with boards, as far as I can tell by the twitching light of the occasional unvandalised streetlamp. I assume they're shops, although they've shed any names they had. The rear lights of the van blaze between them like a threat of arson, so that I imagine them burning like paper; I could be tempted to dream that they're stacks of copies of Rigg's book. I don't know whether to race after the vehicle in case I can somehow overtake it or to stand still, because the clatter of my footsteps prevents me from distinguishing so much as a syllable. I'm hardly aware of stumbling to a halt as if this may arrest the van. Of course it doesn't, nor does yelling "What did you say?"

"What you say?"

For a moment I think there's an echo, so distorted that it's well-nigh incoherent. Then an object I took to have been abandoned in a bin bag that's sprawled across an unlit doorway pokes its aggrieved head up. "Not me," I tell it. "Never mind me. What did you just hear?"

"You, you daft bugger. What's the idea waking a man up? You've got no right. You're nobody."

"That's who I am." I'm nearly distracted enough to lean down and bellow this into the unsteady face, because I'm less certain than I want to be that I couldn't have heard Rigg mumble in the distance "Piss on Brady and all his silly slop." Can he be driving the vehicle and broadcasting such stuff? Is he drunk or on drugs or both? The occupant of the doorway struggles to rise but falls back with the clink of a bottle. I've already wasted too much time on him. As I turn my back I realise that the van is nowhere to be seen.

Rigg is all too audible, but I can't be sure of his words. "Here he is"? "See the shabby slob"? I bolt to the end of the shops and glimpse the inflamed lights as they veer around a curve. The street they're following is crowded with houses flush with the pavements, which ought to mean that the ranting of the van will waken some of the householders. I hope it does—they'll want to silence it as much as I do—but as I run past the houses I observe that most of the windows are broken. If I'm not mistaken in the unrelieved darkness, many of the housefronts are blackened by fire. At least if the properties are empty, nobody will hear Rigg's comments about me. I arrive panting at the curve in the road and falter to a standstill. I can't see or hear the van.

"Good riddance," I gasp. It isn't loud—I need to regain my breath—but it prompts a response. "Is that you?"

The whisper is trickling through one or more of several fist-sized holes in the downstairs window of a house as dark as sleep. Since the answer to the question is obviously no, I'm drawing breath to say at least that when the whisperer adds "Don't make such a row. We don't want anybody hearing you."

"You're not the only one who doesn't," I'm stung to retort. The next whisper is only just discernible. "Is that him?"

A series of thumps and mutters apparently signifies somebody's attempts to reach the window. As I set about stealing away, an eye and the corresponding section of an unkempt head waver up to the lowest hole in the glass. The eye is considerably duller than the glint of a syringe on the littered floor. "No," the owner of the eye decides after the first of several pauses. "That's not him."

For an instant I'm absurdly glad that's settled, and then Rigg's voice revives. It's further blurred by distance, so that I'm uncertain whether he said "Needle Brady". Is he musing—making verbal notes—or issuing instructions? I'm so distracted that I hardly know what I'm saying, let alone to whom. "That's got to bother you as well," I appeal to the silhouette at the window. "Not just me."

"You are, pal."

The response sounds retarded by menace. As I catch sight of the glint again I'm aware what kind of needle I may be in danger from. It's one more reason why I shouldn't linger, but I hope the couple or however many are lurking in the unlit room don't imagine that their hostility has driven me away as I pursue my tormentor's voice.

The next road across the street I'm on is more than twice as wide. Pairs of tall houses intervene their gardens between the pavement and themselves. The left-hand stretch leads into the town centre, towards which the van is receding. Its roof flares orange beneath each concrete streetlamp. Perhaps it's the spaciousness that lets me grasp Rigg's words despite the additional distance. "Prod His Lordship. Enjoy his headache."

Why is nobody except me objecting to him? We must be surrounded by an audience, since the houses are split into flats. "I'll prod you when I get hold of you," I shout and then devote my energy to catching up. I've barely put on speed when a window rattles open at the top of a house ahead. "Stop the noise," a man bellows. "People want to sleep."

"I'm trying to stop it," I roar. "Why don't you help?"

"I'll give you some help all right if you don't shut up."

He must be half asleep to be making so little sense. "Call the police," I urge. "It can't be legal at this time of night."

"What I'll do to you if you don't bugger off won't be for sure. Go home and get yourself some help."

I'm tempted to remain until he admits to hearing Rigg and undertakes to send for the authorities, but I'm too infuriated by Rigg's latest comments. "Brady's been on," he announces. "He's done. I heard him read. Snored all along, I did, me." I dodge into the middle of the road and dash in pursuit of the van, waving my arms as if I'm imitating each reappearance of my shadow and bawling less than words in an attempt to drown out the speaker. "Irony, he says he does," it continues. "All hype. He's a liar. He's a con. He does dire joyless horrid hellish crap."

Rigg's words are beginning to sound like some kind of code. "Posh and oily and sly is all," he adds as windows overlooking the street emit protests that, grotesquely, seem to be aimed at me. I'm closer than the vehicle, that's why, but I'm starting to feel far too much like a scapegoat when a lone walker appears halfway between me and the van.

She has been exercising her dog in a park at the end of the houses. I slow down so as not to alarm her while she ambles towards me, and point beyond her with both hands, a gesture I don't mean to appear quite so beseeching.

"You've been hearing that, haven't you?" I ask loud enough for the tenants of the flats to catch.

The hem of the light from a streetlamp slides over her pale pudgy face and seems to tug her copiously lipsticked mouth into a smile. "Have you as well? Oh good."

I mustn't let her shrillness deter me. "Did you hear what it said?"

"Of course," she says and simpers. "Didn't you?"

As she advances, kneeing her long black dress at every step, I see that she isn't walking a dog but yanking a misshapen bag on a leash. "I believe so," I concentrate on saying.

"Tell me and I'll tell you if I think you're right."

I clench my fists at Rigg's latest pronouncements and at forcing myself to repeat them. "He's alone. Poor old Brady's a horny bachelor and he's all alone. No bride and no children. Only in his brain."

"Oh, that's sad," the woman says and drags the bag onwards, scraping the pavement with a thin brown object that protrudes from the zip. "Is that you?"

"It's meant to be. He doesn't know anything worth knowing. Shall I tell you what his last book was? A quiz book. How New A Man Are You, it was called. That's how opportunistic he is, do you see?"

She looks determined not to give in to bewilderment. "Just let the ones who care about you talk to you," she advises. "You only have to find them and then they'll always be there for you. My gran and grandpa are."

I'm about to enquire why she thinks this relevant to anything I've said when I notice that the gateway through which she emerged leads not to a park but to a graveyard. The scrawny item dangling from her bag must be a withered bunch of flowers, but I'm not anxious to check. For once I'm relieved to hear sounds in the distance, shouts and the smashing of glass. Perhaps the van has encountered a mob. "You'll have to excuse me," I tell the woman and retreat to the opposite pavement to be out of her reach.

More glass shatters as I cross the intersection with the graveyard on the corner. I won't deny hoping that it's a window of the van. Perhaps it's a bottle, since Rigg isn't daunted. Indeed, he sounds enlivened and determined that his message shall be clear. "Please do Brady, lads," he says. "Be physical. Nail him, bloody droner."

An unamplified voice responds, just loud enough for me to hear. "Carry on, boss."

"He's nearby. He's behind. Slippery Joe Brady. He's a real prince, he is. No, he's an arsehole. Bash him, boys. Reshape his head."

For as long as it takes Rigg to say all this I'm unable to move, and then I understand why his voice is growing louder. The van has turned and is coming back towards me. It's surrounded by voices that seem wordless with distance if not brutishness. He's bringing the mob.

I twist around in search of allies. There's no sign of the woman, not that appealing to her would have been much if any use, and all the windows of the flats are shut. I might try making an uproar to goad somebody to call the law, except that the road opposite the graveyard leads to a brighter thoroughfare. That's the business district, and surely where I'm most likely to find police.

I'm too intent on fleeing to observe when the houses give way to larger buildings. They're offices and banks, emblems of prosperity, locked up like safes. They make me feel cast out and ignored, not least because Rigg's monologue is gathering speed towards the junction. "Jab his eyes in. Slash his nose. Bop his ears. Pierce his scalp. Pop his balls. No loss, I'd say. I hope he dies."

I've staggered just a few more gasping paces when it and its attendant shouts spill into the road behind me. Its companions are still doing without language. My shadow is flung flat in the middle of the street like a victim about to be kicked insensible, but a backward glance shows me only the headlamps that have caught me in their spotlight. "I'll shred his papers," Rigg is saying. "I'll sprain his head. He'll yell. He's a jelly. He's a drip. I hope he perishes."

He's repeating himself. He's running out of words. I'd confront him with the limits of his vocabulary if he didn't have his thugs with him—and then his turns of phrase grow clear to me at last. He wouldn't talk like that; I've heard him talk. He's stolen my technique. His messages are built out of the letters of my name.

He'd have no style without me. He'd be nothing, and I swing around to shout it. The lights blind me, but I can hear the gang around them. Perhaps I won't take him on just now after all. To my left I see an alley that leads to a building that looks somehow familiar. Can I have strayed back to the hotel? Even that would be welcome. No sooner do I think it than I've dodged into the alley and am sprinting for the light at the end.

"Hold on, Brady," Rigg booms, and then all I can hear are my breaths trapped between the close walls. I keep nearly falling against the walls as I run. As the dazzle of the headlamps drains from my eyes, the dimness of the alley settles on them. They seem unable to determine how light it is when I stagger out of the alley, but there's no mistaking where I am. Opposite me is the building where I gave my talk, and to my left is a speaker van.

I barely hesitate. Somebody has abandoned a bottle in the doorway of the venue. I wish I had a drink, but I've no time. I glance about the street that looks flat as a stage set under the relentless lights, and then I pull out the hotel key on its heavy club. If other people can break glass, so can I for a purpose. At the very least the van is a refuge. I smash the driver's window with a single blow and pick fragments out of the door, then I unlock it and climb in.

I can no longer hear Rigg and his chosen audience. Ah, silence. The streets are so quiet he might never have been there. It's past time I was heard. Having come this far, I'm sure I'll be able to start the vehicle. Shall I abscond? No chance, as he'd say in idle pride. I can handle any shyness in heroic prose. If we have a shouting match in the street I'll have more to say and better, so long as the speaker operates. I locate the switch and press it, and hear my own breath filling the street. Shall I be horribly acerbic or rely on blarney? Slander idol Bill or deploy balance? Any dross will erode solid personal calibre. Soldier on, Brady. Besides, choice is no hindrance. I'll respond dryly. Nevertheless for an unpleasant moment I'm at a loss for words, and then I know where to start. I tug the microphone closer and say "This isn't me."

The Decorations

First published as the chapbook The Decorations as part of the Alpenhouse Apparitions imprint, 2005

"Here they are at last," David's grandmother cried, and her face lit up: green from the luminous plastic holly that bordered the front door and then, as she took a plump step to hug David's mother, red with the glow from the costume of the Santa in the sleigh beneath the window. "Was the traffic that bad, Jane?"

"I still don't drive, Mummy. One of the trains was held up and we missed a connection."

"You want to get yourself another man. Never mind, you'll always have Davy," his grandmother panted as she waddled to embrace him.

Her clasp was even fatter than last time. It smelled of clothes he thought could be as old as she was, and of perfume that didn't quite disguise a further staleness he was afraid was her. His embarrassment was aggravated by a car that slowed outside the house, though the driver was only admiring the Christmas display. When his grandmother abruptly released him he thought she'd noticed his reaction, but she was peering at the sleigh. "Has he got down?" she whispered.

David understood before his mother seemed to. He retreated along the path between the flower-beds full of grass to squint past the lights that flashed MERRY CHRISTMAS above the bedroom windows. The second Santa was still perched on the roof; a wind set the illuminated figure rocking back and forth as if with silent laughter. "He's there," David said.

"I expect he has to be in lots of places at once."

Now that he was nearly eight, David knew that his father had always been Santa. Before he could say as much, his grandmother plodded to gaze at the roof. "Do you like him?"

"I like coming to see all your Christmas things."

"I'm not so fond of him. He looks too empty for my liking." As the figure shifted in another wind she shouted "You stay up there where you belong. Never mind thinking of jumping on us."

David's grandfather hurried out to her, his slippers flapping on his thin feet, his reduced face wincing. "Come inside, Dora. You'll have the neighbours looking."

"I don't care about the fat old thing," she said loud enough to be heard on the roof and tramped into the house. "You can take your mummy's case up, can't you, David? You're a big strong boy now."

He enjoyed hauling the wheeled suitcase on its leash – it was like having a dog he could talk to, sometimes not only in his head – but bumping the luggage upstairs risked snagging the already threadbare carpet, and so his mother supported the burden. "I'll just unpack quickly," she told him. "Go down and see if anyone needs help."

He used the frilly toilet in the equally pink bathroom and lingered until his mother asked if he was all right. He was trying to stay clear of the argument he could just hear through the salmon carpet. As he ventured downstairs his grandmother pounced on some remark so muted it was almost silent. "You do better, then. Let's see you cook."

He could smell the subject of the disagreement. Once he'd finished setting the table from the tray with which his grandfather sent him out of the kitchen, he and his mother saw it too: a casserole encrusted with gravy and containing a shrivelled lump of beef. Potatoes roasted close to impenetrability came with it, and green beans from which someone had tried to scrape the worst of the charring. "It's not as bad as it looks, is it?" David's grandmother said through her first mouthful. "I expect it's like having a barbecue, Davy."

"I don't know," he confessed, never having had one.

"They've no idea, these men, have they, Jane? They don't have to keep dinner waiting for people. I expect your hubby's the same."

"Was, but can we not talk about him?"

"He's learned his lesson, then. No call to make that face at me, Tom. I'm only saying Davy's father – Oh, you've split up, Jane, haven't you. Sorry about my big fat trap. Sorry Davy too."

"Just eat what you want," his grandfather advised him, "and then you'd best be scampering off to bed so Santa can make his deliveries."

"We all want to be tucked up before he's on the move," said his grandmother before remembering to smile.

Santa had gone away like David's father, and David was too old to miss either of them. He managed to breach the carapace of a second potato and chewed several forkfuls of dried-up beef, but the burned remains of beans defeated him. All the same, he thanked his grandmother as he stood up. "There's a good boy," she said rather too loudly, as if interceding with someone on his behalf. "Do your best to go to sleep."

That sounded like an inexplicit warning, and was one of the elements that kept him awake in his bedroom, which was no larger than his room in the flat he'd moved to with his mother. Despite their heaviness, the curtains admitted a repetitive flicker from the letters ERR above the window, and a buzz that suggested an insect was hovering over the bed. He could just hear voices downstairs, which gave him the impression that they didn't want him to know what they were saying. He was most troubled by a hollow creaking that reminded him of someone in a rocking chair, but overhead. The Santa figure must be swaying in the wind, not doing its best to heave itself free. David was too old for stories: while real ones didn't always stay true, that wasn't an excuse to make any up. Still, he was glad to hear his mother and her parents coming upstairs at last, lowering their voices to compensate. He heard doors shutting for the night, and then a nervous question from his grandmother through the wall between their rooms. "What's he doing? Is he loose?"

"If he falls, he falls," his grandfather said barely audibly, "and good riddance to him if he's getting on your nerves. For pity's sake come to bed."

David tried not to find this more disturbing than the notion that his parents had shared one. Rather than hear the mattress sag under the weight his grandmother had put on, he tugged the quilt over his head. His grasp must have slackened when he drifted off to sleep, because he was roused by a voice. It was outside the house but too close to the window.

It was his grandfather's. David was disconcerted by the notion that the old man had clambered onto the roof until he realised his grandfather was calling out of the adjacent window. "What do you think you're doing, Dora? Come in before you catch your death."

"I'm seeing he's stayed where he's meant to be," David's grandmother responded from below. "Yes, you know I'm talking about you, don't you. Never mind pretending you didn't nod."

"Get in for the Lord's sake," his grandfather urged, underlining his words with a rumble of the sash. David heard him pad across the room and as rapidly if more stealthily down the stairs. A bated argument grew increasingly stifled as it ascended to the bedroom. David had refrained from looking out of the window for fear of embarrassing his grandparents, but now he was nervous that his mother would be drawn to find out what was happening. He mustn't go to her; he had to be a man, as she kept telling him, and not one like his father, who ran off to women because there was so little to him. In time the muttering beyond the wall subsided, and David was alone with the insistence of electricity and the restlessness on the roof.

When he opened his eyes the curtains had acquired a hem of daylight. It was Christmas Day. Last year he'd run downstairs to handle all the packages addressed to him under the tree and guess at their contents, but now he was wary of encountering his grandparents by himself in case he betrayed he was concealing their secret. As he lay hoping that his grandmother had slept off her condition, he heard his mother in the kitchen. "Let me make breakfast, Mummy. It can be a little extra present for you."

He didn't venture down until she called him. "Here's the Christmas boy," his grandmother shouted as if he was responsible for the occasion, and dealt him such a hug that he struggled within himself. "Eat up or you won't grow."

Her onslaught had dislodged a taste of last night's food. He did his best to bury it under his breakfast, then volunteered to wash up the plates and utensils and dry them as well. Before he finished she was crying "Hurry up so we can see what Santa's brought. I'm as excited as you, Davy."

He hoped she was only making these remarks on his behalf, not somehow growing younger than he was. In the front room his grandfather distributed the presents while the bulbs on the tree flashed patterns that made David think of secret messages. His grandparents had wrapped him up puzzle books and tales of heroic boys, his mother's gifts to him were games for his home computer. "Thank you," he said, sometimes dutifully.

It was the last computer game that prompted his grandmother to ask "Who are you thanking?" At once, as if she feared she'd spoiled the day for him, she added "I expect he's listening."

"Nobody's listening," his grandfather objected. "Nobody's there."

"Don't say things like that, Tom, not in front of Davy."

"That isn't necessary, Mummy. You know the truth, don't you, David? Tell your grandmother."

"Santa's just a fairy tale," David said, although it felt like robbing a younger child of an illusion. "Really people have to save up to buy presents."

"He had to know when we've so much less coming in this Christmas," said his mother. "You see how good he's being. I believe he's taken it better than I did."

"I'm sorry if I upset you, Davy."

"You didn't," David said, not least because his grandmother's eyes looked dangerously moist. "I'm sorry if I upset you."

Her face was already quivering as if there was too much of it to hold still. When she shook her head her cheeks wobbled like a whitish rubber mask that was about to fall loose. He didn't know whether she meant to answer him or had strayed onto another subject as she peered towards the window. "There's nothing to him at all then, is there? He's just an empty old shell. Can't we get him down now?"

"Better wait till the new year," David's grandfather said, and with sudden bitterness "We don't want any more bad luck."

Her faded sunken armchair creaked with relief as she levered herself to her feet. "Where are you going?" her husband protested and limped after her, out of the front door. He murmured at her while she stared up at the roof. At least she didn't shout, but she began to talk not much less quietly as she returned to the house. "I don't like him moving about with nothing inside him," she said before she appeared to recollect David's presence. "Maybe he's like one of those beans with a worm inside, Davy, that used to jig about all the time."

While David didn't understand and was unsure he wanted to, his mother's hasty intervention wasn't reassuring either. "Shall we play some games? What would you like to play, Mummy?"

"What do you call it. Lollopy. The one with all the little houses. Too little for any big fat things to climb on. Lollopy."

"Monopoly."

"Lollopy," David's grandmother maintained, only to continue "I don't want to play that. Too many sums. What's your favourite, Davy?"

Monopoly was, but he didn't want to add to all the tensions that he sensed rather than comprehended. "Whatever yours is."

"Ludo," she cried and clapped her hands. "I'd play it every Sunday with your granny and grandpa when I was Davy's age, Jane."

He wondered if she wasn't just remembering but behaving as she used to. She pleaded to be allowed to move her counters whenever she failed to throw a six, and kept trying to move more than she threw. David would have let her win, but his grandfather persisted in reminding her that she had to cast the precise amount to guide her counters home. After several games in which his grandmother squinted with increasingly less comical suspicion at her opponents' moves, David's mother said "Who'd like to go out for a walk?"

Apparently everyone did, which meant they couldn't go fast or far. David felt out of place compared with the boys he saw riding their Christmas bicycles or brandishing their Christmas weapons. Beneath a sky frosty with cloud, all the decorations in the duplicated streets looked deadened by the pale sunlight, though they were still among the very few elements that distinguished one squat boxy house from another. "They're not as good as ours, are they?" his grandmother kept remarking when she wasn't frowning at the roofs. "He's not there either," he heard her mutter more than once, and as her house came in sight "See, he didn't follow us. We'd have heard him."

She was saying that nothing had moved or could move, David tried to think, but he was nervous of returning to the house. The preparation of Christmas dinner proved to be reason enough. "Too many women in this kitchen," his mother was told when she offered to help, but his grandmother had to be reminded to turn the oven on, and she made to take the turkey out too soon more than once. Between these incidents she disagreed with her husband and her daughter about various memories of theirs while David tried to stay low in a book of mazes he had to trace with a pencil. At dinner he could tell that his mother was willing him to clean his plate so as not to distress his grandmother. He did his best, and struggled to ignore pangs of indigestion as he washed up, and then as his grandmother kept talking about if not to every television programme her husband put on. "Not very Christmassy," she commented on all of them, and followed the remark with at least a glance towards the curtained window. Waiting for her to say worse, and his impression that his mother and grandfather were too, kept clenching David's stomach well before his mother declared "I think it's time someone was in bed."

As his grandmother's lips searched for an expression he wondered if she assumed that her daughter meant her. "I'm going," he said and had to be called back to be hugged and kissed and wished happy Christmas thrice.

He used the toilet, having pulled the chain to cover up his noises, and huddled in bed. He had a sense of hiding behind the scenes, the way he'd waited offstage at school to perform a line about Jesus last year, when his parents had held hands at the sight of him. The flickers and the buzzing that the bedroom curtains failed to exclude could have been stage effects, while over the mumbling of the television downstairs he heard sounds of imminent drama. At least there was no creaking on the roof. He did his best to remember last Christmas as a sharp stale taste of this one continued its antics inside him, until the memories blurred into the beginnings of a dream and let him sleep.

Movements above his head wakened him. Something soft but determined was groping at the window – a wind so vigorous that its onslaughts made the light from the sign flare like a fire someone was breathing on. The wind must be swinging the bulbs closer to his window. He hadn't time to wonder how dangerous that might be, because the creaking overhead was different: more prolonged, more purposeful. He was mostly nervous that his grandmother would hear, but there was no sign of awareness in the next room, and silence downstairs. He pressed the quilt around his ears, and then he heard sounds too loud for it to fend off – a hollow slithering followed by a thump at the window, and another. Whatever was outside seemed eager to break the glass.

David scrambled onto all fours and backed away until the quilt slipped off his body, but then he had to reach out to part the curtains at arms' length. He might have screamed if a taste hadn't choked him. Two eyes as dead as pebbles were level with his. They didn't blink, but sputtered as if they were trying to come to a kind of life, as did the rest of the swollen face. Worse still, the nose and mouth surrounded by a dirty whitish fungus of beard were above the eyes. The inversion lent the unnecessarily crimson lips a clown's ambiguous grimace.

The mask dealt the window another blundering thump before a savage gust of wind seized the puffed-up figure. As the face sailed away from the glass, it was extinguished as though the wind had blown it out. David heard wires rip loose and saw the shape fly like a greyish vaguely human balloon over the garden wall to land on its back in the road.

It sounded as if someone had thrown away a used plastic bottle or an empty hamburger carton. Was the noise enough to bring his grandmother to her window? He wasn't sure if he would prefer not to be alone to see the grinning object flounder and begin to edge towards the house. As it twitched several inches he regretted ever having tipped an insect over to watch it struggle on its back. Then another squall of wind took possession of the dim figure, sweeping it leftwards out of sight along the middle of the road. David heard a car speed across an intersection, its progress hardly interrupted by a hollow thump and a crunch that made him think of a beetle crushed underfoot.

Once the engine dwindled into silence, nothing moved on the roads except the wind. David let the curtains fall together and slipped under the quilt. The drama had ended, even if some of its lighting effects were still operating outside the window. He didn't dream, and wakened late, remembering at once that there was nothing on the roof to worry his grandmother. Only how would she react to the absence?

He stole to the bathroom and then retreated to his bedroom. The muffled conversations downstairs felt like a pretence that all was well until his grandmother called "What are you doing up there?"

She meant David. He knew that when she warned him that his breakfast would go cold. She sounded untroubled, but for how long? "Eat up all the lovely food your mother's made," she cried, and he complied for fear of letting her suspect he was nervous, even when his stomach threatened to throw his efforts back at him. As he downed the last mouthful she said "I do believe that's the biggest breakfast I've ever had in my life. I think we all need a walk."

David swallowed too soon in order to blurt "I've got to wash up."

"What a good boy he is to his poor old granny. Don't worry, we'll wait for you. We won't run away and leave you," she said and stared at her husband for sighing.

David took all the time he could over each plate and utensil. He was considering feigning illness if that would keep his grandmother inside the house when he saw the door at the end of the back garden start to shake as if someone was fumbling at it. The grass shivered too, and he would have except for seeing why it did. "It'll be too windy to go for a walk," he told his grandmother. "It's like Grandad said, you'll catch cold."

His mouth stayed open as he realised his mistake, but that wasn't the connection she made. "How windy is it?" she said, standing up with a groan to tramp along the hall. "What's it going to do to that empty old thing?"

David couldn't look away from the quivering expanse of grass while he heard her open the front door and step onto the path. His shoulders rose as if he fancied they could block his ears, but even sticking his fingers in mightn't have deafened him to her cry. "He's got down. Where's he hidden himself?"

David turned to find his mother rubbing her forehead as though to erase her thoughts. His grandfather had lifted his hands towards his wife, but they drooped beneath an invisible weight. David's grandmother was pivoting around and around on the path, and David was reminded of ballet classes until he saw her dismayed face. He felt that all the adults were performing, as adults so often seemed compelled to do, and that he ought to stop them if he could. "It fell down," he called. "It blew away."

His grandmother pirouetted to a clumsy halt and peered along the hall at him. "Why didn't you say? What are you trying to do?"

"Don't stand out there, Dora," his grandfather protested. "You can see he only wants—"

"Never mind what Davy wants. It can be what I want for a change. It's meant to be my Christmas too. Where is he, Davy? Show me if you think you know so much."

Her voice was growing louder and more petulant. David felt as if he'd been given the job of rescuing his mother and his grandfather from further embarrassment or argument. He dodged past them and the stranded sleigh to run to the end of the path. "It went along there," he said, pointing. "A car ran it over."

"You didn't say that before. Are you just saying so I won't be frightened?"

Until that moment he hadn't grasped how much she was. He strained his gaze at the intersection, but it looked as deserted as the rest of the street. "Show me where," she urged.

Might there be some trace? David was beginning to wish he hadn't spoken. He couldn't use her pace as an excuse for delay; she was waddling so fast to the intersection that her entire body wobbled. He ran into the middle of the crossroads, but there was no sign of last night's accident. He was even more disconcerted to realise that she was so frightened she hadn't even warned him to be careful on the road. He straightened up and swung around to look for fragments, and saw the remains heaped at the foot of a garden wall.

Someone must have tidied them into the side road. Most of the body was a shattered pile of red and white, but the head and half the left shoulder formed a single item propped on top. David was about to point around the corner when the object shifted. Still grinning, it toppled sideways as if the vanished neck had snapped. The wind was moving it, he told himself, but he wasn't sure that his grandmother ought to see. Before he could think how to prevent her, she followed his gaze. "It is him," she cried. "Someone else mustn't have liked him."

David was reaching to grab her hand and lead her away when the head shifted again. It tilted awry with a slowness that made its grin appear increasingly mocking, and slithered off the rest of the debris to inch along the pavement, scraping like a skull. "He's coming for me," David's grandmother babbled. "There's something inside him. It's the worm."

David's mother was hurrying along the street ahead of his grandfather. Before they could join his grandmother, the grinning object skittered at her. She recoiled a step, and then she lurched to trample her tormentor to bits. "That'll stop you laughing," she cried as the eyes shattered. "It's all right now, Davy. He's gone."

Was the pretence of acting on his behalf aimed at him or at the others? They seemed to accept it when at last she finished stamping and let them usher her back to the house, unless they were pretending as well. Though the adults had reverted to behaving as they were supposed to, it was too sudden. It felt like a performance they were staging to reassure him.

He must be expected to take part. He had to, or he wouldn't be a man. He pretended not to want to go home, and did his best to simulate enjoyment of the television programmes and the games that the others were anxious his grandmother should like. He feigned an appetite when the remnants of Christmas dinner were revived, accompanied by vegetables that his mother succeeded in rescuing from his grandmother's ambitions for them.

While the day had felt far too protracted, he would have preferred it to take more time over growing dark. The wind had dropped, but not so much that he didn't have to struggle to ignore how his grandmother's eyes fluttered whenever a window shook. He made for bed as soon as he thought he wouldn't be drawing attention to his earliness. "That's right, Davy, we all need our sleep," his grandmother said as if he might be denying them theirs. He suffered another round of happy Christmases and hugs that felt more strenuous than last night's, and then he fled to his room.

The night was still except for the occasional car that slowed outside the house – not, David had to remember, because there was anything on the roof. When he switched off the light the room took on a surreptitious flicker, as if his surroundings were nervous. Surely he had no reason to be, although he could have imagined that the irritable buzz was adding an edge to the voices downstairs. He hid under the quilt and pretended he was about to sleep until the sham overtook him.

A change in the lighting roused him. He was pushing the quilt away from his face so as to greet the day that would take him home when he noticed that the illumination was too fitful to be sunlight. As it glared under the curtains again he heard uncoordinated movement through the window. The wind must have returned to play with the lit sign. He was hoping that it wouldn't awaken his grandmother, or that she would at least know what was really there, when he realised with a shock that paralysed his breath how wrong he was. He hadn't heard the wind. The clumsy noises outside were more solid and more localised. Light stained the wall above his bed, and an object blundered as if it was limbless against the front door.

If this hadn't robbed David of the ability to move, the thought of his grandmother's reaction would have. It was even worse than the prospect of looking himself. He hadn't succeeded in breathing when he heard her say "Who's that? Has he come back?"

David would have blocked his ears if he had been capable of lifting his fists from beside him. He must have breathed, but he was otherwise helpless. The pause in the next room was almost as ominous as the sounds that brought it to an end: the rumble of the window, another series of light but impatient thumps at the front door, his grandmother's loose unsteady voice. "He's here for me. He's all lit up, his eyes are. The worm's put him back together. I should have squashed the worm."

"Stop wandering, for God's sake," said David's grandfather. "I can't take much more of this, I'm telling you."

"Look how he's been put back together," she said with such a mixture of dismay and pleading that David was terrified it would compel him to obey. Instead his panic wakened him.

He was lying inert, his thoughts as tangled as the quilt, when he heard his grandmother insist "He was there."

"Just get back in bed," his grandfather told her.

David didn't know how long he lay waiting for her to shut the window. After that there seemed to be nothing to hear once her bed acknowledged her with an outburst of creaking. He stayed uneasily alert until he managed to think of a way to make sense of events: he'd overheard her in his sleep and had dreamed the rest. Having resolved this let him feel manly enough to regain his slumber.

This time daylight found him. It seemed to render the night irrelevant, at least to him. He wasn't sure about his grandmother, who looked uncertain of something. She insisted on cooking breakfast, rather more than aided by her husband. Once David and his mother had done their duty by their portions it was time to call a taxi. David manhandled the suitcase downstairs by himself and wheeled it to the car, past the decorations that appeared dusty with sunlight. His grandparents hugged him at the gate, and his grandmother repeated the gesture as if she'd already forgotten it. "Come and see us again soon," she said without too much conviction, perhaps because she was distracted by glancing along the street and at the roof.

David thought he saw his chance to demonstrate how much of a man he was. "It wasn't there, Granny. It was just a dream."

Her face quivered, and her eyes. "What was, Davy? What are you talking about?"

He had a sudden awful sense of having miscalculated, but all he could do was answer. "There wasn't anything out here last night."

Her mouth was too nervous to hold onto a smile that might have been triumphant. "You heard him as well."

"No," David protested, but his mother grabbed his arm. "That's enough," she said in a tone he'd never heard her use before. "We'll miss the train. Look after each other," she blurted at her parents, and shoved David into the taxi. All the way through the streets full of lifeless decorations, and for some time on the train, she had no more to say to him than "Just leave me alone for a while."

He thought she blamed him for frightening his grandmother. He remembered that two months later, when his grandmother died. At the funeral he imagined how heavy the box with her inside it must be on the shoulders of the four gloomy men. He succeeded in withholding his guilty tears, since his grandfather left crying to David's mother. When David tried to sprinkle earth on the coffin in the hole, a fierce wind carried off his handful as if his grandmother had blown it away with an angry breath. Eventually all the cars paraded back to the house that was only his grandfather's now, where a crowd of people David hadn't met before ate the sandwiches his mother had made and kept telling him how grown-up he was. He felt required to pretend, and wished his mother hadn't taken two days off from working at the nursery so that they could stay overnight. Once the guests left he felt more isolated still. His grandfather broke one of many silences by saying "You look as if you'd like to ask a question, Davy. Don't be shy."

David wasn't sure he wanted to be heard, but he had to be polite and answer. "What happened to Granny?"

"People change when they get old, son. You'll find that out, well, you have. She was still your grandmother really."

Too much of this was more ominous than reassuring. David was loath to ask how she'd died, and almost to say, "I meant where's she gone."

"I can't tell you that, son. All of us are going to have to wait and see."

Perhaps David's mother sensed this was the opposite of comforting, for she said "I think it's like turning into a butterfly, David. Our body's just the chrysalis we leave behind."

He had to affect to be happy with that, despite the memory it threatened to revive, because he was afraid he might otherwise hear worse. He apparently convinced his mother, who turned to his grandfather. "I wish I'd seen Mummy one last time."

"She looked like a doll."

"No, while she was alive."

"I don't think you'd have liked it, Jane. Try and remember her how she used to be and I will. You will, won't you, Davy?"

David didn't want to imagine the consequences of giving or even thinking the wrong answer. "I'll try," he said.

This appeared to be less than was expected of him. He was desperate to change the subject, but all he could think of was how bare the house seemed without its Christmas finery. Rather than say so he enquired, "Where do all the decorations go?"

"They've gone as well, son. They were always Dora's."

David was beginning to feel that nothing was safe to ask or say. He could tell that the adults wanted him to leave them alone to talk. At least they oughtn't to be arguing, not like his parents used to as soon as he was out of the way, making him think that the low hostile remarks he could never quite hear were blaming him for the trouble with the marriage. At least he wouldn't be distracted by the buzzing and the insistent light while he tried to sleep or hear. The wind helped blur the voices below him, so that although he gathered that they were agreeing, he only suspected they were discussing him. Were they saying how he'd scared his grandmother to death? "I'm sorry," he kept whispering like a prayer, which belatedly lulled him to sleep.

A siren wakened him – an ambulance. The pair of notes might have been crying "Davy" through the streets. He wondered if an ambulance had carried off his grandmother. The braying faded into the distance, leaving silence except for the wind. His mother and his grandfather must be in their beds, unless they had decided David was sufficiently grown-up to be left by himself in the house. He hoped not, because the wind sounded like a loose voice repeating his name. The noises on the stairs might be doing so as well, except that they were shuffling footsteps or, as he was able to make out before long, rather less than footsteps. Another sound was approaching. It was indeed a version of his name, pronounced by an exhalation that was just about a voice, by no means entirely like his grandmother's but too much so. It and the slow determined unformed paces halted outside his room.

He couldn't cry out for his mother, not because he wouldn't be a man but for fear of drawing attention to himself. He was offstage, he tried to think. He only had to listen, he needn't see more than the lurid light that flared across the carpet. Then his visitor set about opening the door.

It made a good deal of locating the doorknob, and attempting to take hold of it, and fumbling to turn it, so that David had far more time than he wanted to imagine what was there. If his grandmother had gone away, had whatever remained come to find him? Was something of her still inside her to move it, or was that a worm? The door shuddered and edged open, admitting a grotesquely festive glow, and David tried to shut his eyes. But he was even more afraid not to see the shape that floundered into the room.

He saw at once that she'd become what she was afraid of. She was draped with a necklace of fairy lights, and two guttering bulbs had taken the place of her eyes. Dim green light spilled like slimy water down her cheeks. She wore a long white dress, if the vague pale mass wasn't part of her, for her face looked inflated to hollowness, close to bursting. Perhaps that was why her mouth was stretched so wide, but her grin was terrified. He had a sudden dreadful thought that both she and the worm were inside the shape.

It blundered forward and then fell against the door. Either it had very little control of its movements or it intended to trap him in the room. It lurched at him as if it was as helpless as he was, and David sprawled out of bed. He grabbed one of his shoes from the floor and hurled it at the swollen flickering mass. It was only a doll, he thought, because the grin didn't falter. Perhaps it was less than a doll, since it vanished like a bubble. As his shoe struck the door the room went dark.

He might almost have believed that nothing had been there if he hadn't heard more than his shoe drop to the floor. When he tore the curtains open he saw fairy lights strewn across the carpet. They weren't what he was certain he'd heard slithering into some part of the room. All the same, once he'd put on his shoes he trampled the bulbs into fragments, and then he fell to his hands and knees. He was still crawling about the floor when his mother hurried in and peered unhappily at him. "Help me find it," he pleaded. "We've got to kill the worm."

Just Behind You

First published in Poe's Progeny, 2005
Also published in: Just Behind You

"Here they are at last," David's grandmother cried, and her face lit up: green from the luminous plastic holly that bordered the front door and then, as she took a plump step to hug David's mother, red with the glow from the costume of the Santa in the sleigh beneath the window. "Was the traffic that bad, Jane?"

"I still don't drive, Mummy. One of the trains was held up and we missed a connection."

"You want to get yourself another man. Never mind, you'll always have Davy," his grandmother panted as she waddled to embrace him.

Her clasp was even fatter than last time. It smelled of clothes he thought could be as old as she was, and of perfume that didn't quite disguise a further staleness he was afraid was her. His embarrassment was aggravated by a car that slowed outside the house, though the driver was only admiring the Christmas display. When his grandmother abruptly released him he thought she'd noticed his reaction, but she was peering at the sleigh. "Has he got down?" she whispered.

David understood before his mother seemed to. He retreated along the path between the flower-beds full of grass to squint past the lights that flashed MERRY CHRISTMAS above the bedroom windows. The second Santa was still perched on the roof; a wind set the illuminated figure rocking back and forth as if with silent laughter. "He's there," David said.

"I expect he has to be in lots of places at once."

Now that he was nearly eight, David knew that his father had always been Santa. Before he could say as much, his grandmother plodded to gaze at the roof. "Do you like him?"

"I like coming to see all your Christmas things."

"I'm not so fond of him. He looks too empty for my liking." As the figure shifted in another wind she shouted "You stay up there where you belong. Never mind thinking of jumping on us."

David's grandfather hurried out to her, his slippers flapping on his thin feet, his reduced face wincing. "Come inside, Dora. You'll have the neighbours looking."

"I don't care about the fat old thing," she said loud enough to be heard on the roof and tramped into the house. "You can take your mummy's case up, can't you, David? You're a big strong boy now."

He enjoyed hauling the wheeled suitcase on its leash – it was like having a dog he could talk to, sometimes not only in his head – but bumping the luggage upstairs risked snagging the already threadbare carpet, and so his mother supported the burden. "I'll just unpack quickly," she told him. "Go down and see if anyone needs help."

He used the frilly toilet in the equally pink bathroom and lingered until his mother asked if he was all right. He was trying to stay clear of the argument he could just hear through the salmon carpet. As he ventured downstairs his grandmother pounced on some remark so muted it was almost silent. "You do better, then. Let's see you cook."

He could smell the subject of the disagreement. Once he'd finished setting the table from the tray with which his grandfather sent him out of the kitchen, he and his mother saw it too: a casserole encrusted with gravy and containing a shrivelled lump of beef. Potatoes roasted close to impenetrability came with it, and green beans from which someone had tried to scrape the worst of the charring. "It's not as bad as it looks, is it?" David's grandmother said through her first mouthful. "I expect it's like having a barbecue, Davy."

"I don't know," he confessed, never having had one.

"They've no idea, these men, have they, Jane? They don't have to keep dinner waiting for people. I expect your hubby's the same."

"Was, but can we not talk about him?"

"He's learned his lesson, then. No call to make that face at me, Tom. I'm only saying Davy's father – Oh, you've split up, Jane, haven't you. Sorry about my big fat trap. Sorry Davy too."

"Just eat what you want," his grandfather advised him, "and then you'd best be scampering off to bed so Santa can make his deliveries."

"We all want to be tucked up before he's on the move," said his grandmother before remembering to smile.

Santa had gone away like David's father, and David was too old to miss either of them. He managed to breach the carapace of a second potato and chewed several forkfuls of dried-up beef, but the burned remains of beans defeated him. All the same, he thanked his grandmother as he stood up. "There's a good boy," she said rather too loudly, as if interceding with someone on his behalf. "Do your best to go to sleep."

That sounded like an inexplicit warning, and was one of the elements that kept him awake in his bedroom, which was no larger than his room in the flat he'd moved to with his mother. Despite their heaviness, the curtains admitted a repetitive flicker from the letters ERR above the window, and a buzz that suggested an insect was hovering over the bed. He could just hear voices downstairs, which gave him the impression that they didn't want him to know what they were saying. He was most troubled by a hollow creaking that reminded him of someone in a rocking chair, but overhead. The Santa figure must be swaying in the wind, not doing its best to heave itself free. David was too old for stories: while real ones didn't always stay true, that wasn't an excuse to make any up. Still, he was glad to hear his mother and her parents coming upstairs at last, lowering their voices to compensate. He heard doors shutting for the night, and then a nervous question from his grandmother through the wall between their rooms. "What's he doing? Is he loose?"

"If he falls, he falls," his grandfather said barely audibly, "and good riddance to him if he's getting on your nerves. For pity's sake come to bed."

David tried not to find this more disturbing than the notion that his parents had shared one. Rather than hear the mattress sag under the weight his grandmother had put on, he tugged the quilt over his head. His grasp must have slackened when he drifted off to sleep, because he was roused by a voice. It was outside the house but too close to the window.

It was his grandfather's. David was disconcerted by the notion that the old man had clambered onto the roof until he realised his grandfather was calling out of the adjacent window. "What do you think you're doing, Dora? Come in before you catch your death."

"I'm seeing he's stayed where he's meant to be," David's grandmother responded from below. "Yes, you know I'm talking about you, don't you. Never mind pretending you didn't nod."

"Get in for the Lord's sake," his grandfather urged, underlining his words with a rumble of the sash. David heard him pad across the room and as rapidly if more stealthily down the stairs. A bated argument grew increasingly stifled as it ascended to the bedroom. David had refrained from looking out of the window for fear of embarrassing his grandparents, but now he was nervous that his mother would be drawn to find out what was happening. He mustn't go to her; he had to be a man, as she kept telling him, and not one like his father, who ran off to women because there was so little to him. In time the muttering beyond the wall subsided, and David was alone with the insistence of electricity and the restlessness on the roof.

When he opened his eyes the curtains had acquired a hem of daylight. It was Christmas Day. Last year he'd run downstairs to handle all the packages addressed to him under the tree and guess at their contents, but now he was wary of encountering his grandparents by himself in case he betrayed he was concealing their secret. As he lay hoping that his grandmother had slept off her condition, he heard his mother in the kitchen. "Let me make breakfast, Mummy. It can be a little extra present for you."

He didn't venture down until she called him. "Here's the Christmas boy," his grandmother shouted as if he was responsible for the occasion, and dealt him such a hug that he struggled within himself. "Eat up or you won't grow."

Her onslaught had dislodged a taste of last night's food. He did his best to bury it under his breakfast, then volunteered to wash up the plates and utensils and dry them as well. Before he finished she was crying "Hurry up so we can see what Santa's brought. I'm as excited as you, Davy."

He hoped she was only making these remarks on his behalf, not somehow growing younger than he was. In the front room his grandfather distributed the presents while the bulbs on the tree flashed patterns that made David think of secret messages. His grandparents had wrapped him up puzzle books and tales of heroic boys, his mother's gifts to him were games for his home computer. "Thank you," he said, sometimes dutifully.

It was the last computer game that prompted his grandmother to ask "Who are you thanking?" At once, as if she feared she'd spoiled the day for him,

she added "I expect he's listening."

"Nobody's listening," his grandfather objected. "Nobody's there."

"Don't say things like that, Tom, not in front of Davy."

"That isn't necessary, Mummy. You know the truth, don't you, David? Tell your grandmother."

"Santa's just a fairy tale," David said, although it felt like robbing a younger child of an illusion. "Really people have to save up to buy presents."

"He had to know when we've so much less coming in this Christmas," said his mother. "You see how good he's being. I believe he's taken it better than I did."

"I'm sorry if I upset you, Davy."

"You didn't," David said, not least because his grandmother's eyes looked dangerously moist. "I'm sorry if I upset you."

Her face was already quivering as if there was too much of it to hold still. When she shook her head her cheeks wobbled like a whitish rubber mask that was about to fall loose. He didn't know whether she meant to answer him or had strayed onto another subject as she peered towards the window. "There's nothing to him at all then, is there? He's just an empty old shell. Can't we get him down now?"

"Better wait till the new year," David's grandfather said, and with sudden bitterness "We don't want any more bad luck."

Her faded sunken armchair creaked with relief as she levered herself to her feet. "Where are you going?" her husband protested and limped after her, out of the front door. He murmured at her while she stared up at the roof. At least she didn't shout, but she began to talk not much less quietly as she returned to the house. "I don't like him moving about with nothing inside him," she said before she appeared to recollect David's presence. "Maybe he's like one of those beans with a worm inside, Davy, that used to jig about all the time."

While David didn't understand and was unsure he wanted to, his mother's hasty intervention wasn't reassuring either. "Shall we play some games? What would you like to play, Mummy?"

"What do you call it. Lollopy. The one with all the little houses. Too little for any big fat things to climb on. Lollopy."

"Monopoly."

"Lollopy," David's grandmother maintained, only to continue "I don't want to play that. Too many sums. What's your favourite, Davy?"

Monopoly was, but he didn't want to add to all the tensions that he sensed rather than comprehended. "Whatever yours is."

"Ludo," she cried and clapped her hands. "I'd play it every Sunday with your granny and grandpa when I was Davy's age, Jane."

He wondered if she wasn't just remembering but behaving as she used to. She pleaded to be allowed to move her counters whenever she failed to throw a six, and kept trying to move more than she threw. David would have let her win, but his grandfather persisted in reminding her that she had to cast the precise amount to guide her counters home. After several games in which his grandmother squinted with increasingly less comical suspicion at her opponents' moves, David's mother said "Who'd like to go out for a walk?"

Apparently everyone did, which meant they couldn't go fast or far. David felt out of place compared with the boys he saw riding their Christmas bicycles or brandishing their Christmas weapons. Beneath a sky frosty with cloud, all the decorations in the duplicated streets looked deadened by the pale sunlight, though they were still among the very few elements that distinguished one squat boxy house from another. "They're not as good as ours, are they?" his grandmother kept remarking when she wasn't frowning at the roofs. "He's not there either," he heard her mutter more than once, and as her house came in sight "See, he didn't follow us. We'd have heard him."

She was saying that nothing had moved or could move, David tried to think, but he was nervous of returning to the house. The preparation of Christmas dinner proved to be reason enough. "Too many women in this kitchen," his mother was told when she offered to help, but his grandmother had to be reminded to turn the oven on, and she made to take the turkey out too soon more than once. Between these incidents she disagreed with her husband and her daughter about various memories of theirs while David tried to stay low in a book of mazes he had to trace with a pencil. At dinner he could tell that his mother was willing him to clean his plate so as not to distress his grandmother. He did his best, and struggled to ignore pangs of indigestion as he washed up, and then as his grandmother kept talking about if not to every television programme her husband put on. "Not very Christmassy," she commented on all of them, and followed the remark with at least a glance towards the curtained window. Waiting for her to say worse, and his impression that his mother and grandfather were too, kept clenching David's stomach well before his mother declared "I think it's time someone was in bed."

As his grandmother's lips searched for an expression he wondered if she assumed that her daughter meant her. "I'm going," he said and had to be called back to be hugged and kissed and wished happy Christmas thrice.

He used the toilet, having pulled the chain to cover up his noises, and huddled in bed. He had a sense of hiding behind the scenes, the way he'd waited offstage at school to perform a line about Jesus last year, when his parents had held hands at the sight of him. The flickers and the buzzing that the bedroom curtains failed to exclude could have been stage effects, while over the mumbling of the television downstairs he heard sounds of imminent drama. At least there was no creaking on the roof. He did his best to remember last Christmas as a sharp stale taste of this one continued its antics inside him, until the memories blurred into the beginnings of a dream and let him sleep.

Movements above his head wakened him. Something soft but determined was groping at the window – a wind so vigorous that its onslaughts made the light from the sign flare like a fire someone was breathing on. The wind must be swinging the bulbs closer to his window. He hadn't time to wonder how dangerous that might be, because the creaking overhead was different: more prolonged, more purposeful. He was mostly nervous that his grandmother would hear, but there was no sign of awareness in the next room, and silence downstairs. He pressed the quilt around his ears, and then he heard sounds too loud for it to fend off – a hollow slithering followed by a thump at the window, and another. Whatever was outside seemed eager to break the glass.

David scrambled onto all fours and backed away until the quilt slipped off his body, but then he had to reach out to part the curtains at arms' length. He might have screamed if a taste hadn't choked him. Two eyes as dead as pebbles were level with his. They didn't blink, but sputtered as if they were trying to come to a kind of life, as did the rest of the swollen face. Worse still, the nose and mouth surrounded by a dirty whitish fungus of beard were above the eyes. The inversion lent the unnecessarily crimson lips a clown's ambiguous grimace.

The mask dealt the window another blundering thump before a savage gust of wind seized the puffed-up figure. As the face sailed away from the glass, it was extinguished as though the wind had blown it out. David heard wires rip loose and saw the shape fly like a greyish vaguely human balloon over the garden wall to land on its back in the road.

It sounded as if someone had thrown away a used plastic bottle or an empty hamburger carton. Was the noise enough to bring his grandmother to her window? He wasn't sure if he would prefer not to be alone to see the grinning object flounder and begin to edge towards the house. As it twitched several inches he regretted ever having tipped an insect over to watch it struggle on its back. Then another squall of wind took possession of the dim figure, sweeping it leftwards out of sight along the middle of the road. David heard a car speed across an intersection, its progress hardly interrupted by a hollow thump and a crunch that made him think of a beetle crushed underfoot.

Once the engine dwindled into silence, nothing moved on the roads except the wind. David let the curtains fall together and slipped under the quilt. The drama had ended, even if some of its lighting effects were still operating outside the window. He didn't dream, and wakened late, remembering at once that there was nothing on the roof to worry his grandmother. Only how would she react to the absence?

He stole to the bathroom and then retreated to his bedroom. The muffled conversations downstairs felt like a pretence that all was well until his grandmother called "What are you doing up there?"

She meant David. He knew that when she warned him that his breakfast would go cold. She sounded untroubled, but for how long? "Eat up all the lovely food your mother's made," she cried, and he complied for fear of letting her suspect he was nervous, even when his stomach threatened to throw his efforts back at him. As he downed the last mouthful she said "I do believe that's the biggest breakfast I've ever had in my life. I think we all need a walk."

David swallowed too soon in order to blurt "I've got to wash up."

"What a good boy he is to his poor old granny. Don't worry, we'll wait for you. We won't run away and leave you," she said and stared at her husband for sighing.

David took all the time he could over each plate and utensil. He was considering feigning illness if that would keep his grandmother inside the house when he saw the door at the end of the back garden start to shake as if someone was fumbling at it. The grass shivered too, and he would have except for seeing why it did. "It'll be too windy to go for a walk," he told his grandmother. "It's like Grandad said, you'll catch cold."

His mouth stayed open as he realised his mistake, but that wasn't the connection she made. "How windy is it?" she said, standing up with a groan to tramp along the hall. "What's it going to do to that empty old thing?"

David couldn't look away from the quivering expanse of grass while he heard her open the front door and step onto the path. His shoulders rose as if he fancied they could block his ears, but even sticking his fingers in mightn't have deafened him to her cry. "He's got down. Where's he hidden himself?"

David turned to find his mother rubbing her forehead as though to erase her thoughts. His grandfather had lifted his hands towards his wife, but they drooped beneath an invisible weight. David's grandmother was pivoting around and around on the path, and David was reminded of ballet classes until he saw her dismayed face. He felt that all the adults were performing, as adults so often seemed compelled to do, and that he ought to stop them if he could. "It fell down," he called. "It blew away."

His grandmother pirouetted to a clumsy halt and peered along the hall at him. "Why didn't you say? What are you trying to do?"

"Don't stand out there, Dora," his grandfather protested. "You can see he only wants—"

"Never mind what Davy wants. It can be what I want for a change. It's meant to be my Christmas too. Where is he, Davy? Show me if you think you know so much."

Her voice was growing louder and more petulant. David felt as if he'd been given the job of rescuing his mother and his grandfather from further embarrassment or argument. He dodged past them and the stranded sleigh to run to the end of the path. "It went along there," he said, pointing. "A car ran it over."

"You didn't say that before. Are you just saying so I won't be frightened?"

Until that moment he hadn't grasped how much she was. He strained his gaze at the intersection, but it looked as deserted as the rest of the street. "Show me where," she urged.

Might there be some trace? David was beginning to wish he hadn't spoken. He couldn't use her pace as an excuse for delay; she was waddling so fast to the intersection that her entire body wobbled. He ran into the middle of the crossroads, but there was no sign of last night's accident. He was even more disconcerted to realise that she was so frightened she hadn't even warned him to be careful on the road. He straightened up and swung around to look for fragments, and saw the remains heaped at the foot of a garden wall.

Someone must have tidied them into the side road. Most of the body was a shattered pile of red and white, but the head and half the left shoulder formed a single item propped on top. David was about to point around the corner when the object shifted. Still grinning, it toppled sideways as if the vanished neck had snapped. The wind was moving it, he told himself, but he wasn't sure that his grandmother ought to see. Before he could think how to prevent her, she followed his gaze. "It is him," she cried. "Someone else mustn't have liked him."

David was reaching to grab her hand and lead her away when the head shifted again. It tilted awry with a slowness that made its grin appear increasingly mocking, and slithered off the rest of the debris to inch along the pavement, scraping like a skull. "He's coming for me," David's grandmother babbled. "There's something inside him. It's the worm."

David's mother was hurrying along the street ahead of his grandfather. Before they could join his grandmother, the grinning object skittered at her. She recoiled a step, and then she lurched to trample her tormentor to bits. "That'll stop you laughing," she cried as the eyes shattered. "It's all right now, Davy. He's gone."

Was the pretence of acting on his behalf aimed at him or at the others? They seemed to accept it when at last she finished stamping and let them usher her back to the house, unless they were pretending as well. Though the adults had reverted to behaving as they were supposed to, it was too sudden. It felt like a performance they were staging to reassure him.

He must be expected to take part. He had to, or he wouldn't be a man. He pretended not to want to go home, and did his best to simulate enjoyment of the television programmes and the games that the others were anxious his grandmother should like. He feigned an appetite when the remnants of Christmas dinner were revived, accompanied by vegetables that his mother succeeded in rescuing from his grandmother's ambitions for them.

While the day had felt far too protracted, he would have preferred it to take more time over growing dark. The wind had dropped, but not so much that he didn't have to struggle to ignore how his grandmother's eyes fluttered whenever a window shook. He made for bed as soon as he thought he wouldn't be drawing attention to his earliness. "That's right, Davy, we all need our sleep," his grandmother said as if he might be denying them theirs. He suffered another round of happy Christmases and hugs that felt more strenuous than last night's, and then he fled to his room.

The night was still except for the occasional car that slowed outside the house – not, David had to remember, because there was anything on the roof. When he switched off the light the room took on a surreptitious flicker, as if his surroundings were nervous. Surely he had no reason to be, although he could have imagined that the irritable buzz was adding an edge to the voices downstairs. He hid under the quilt and pretended he was about to sleep until the sham overtook him.

A change in the lighting roused him. He was pushing the quilt away from his face so as to greet the day that would take him home when he noticed that the illumination was too fitful to be sunlight. As it glared under the curtains again he heard uncoordinated movement through the window. The wind must have returned to play with the lit sign. He was hoping that it wouldn't awaken his grandmother, or that she would at least know what was really there, when he realised with a shock that paralysed his breath how wrong he was. He hadn't heard the wind. The clumsy noises outside were more solid and more localised. Light stained the wall above his bed, and an object blundered as if it was limbless against the front door.

If this hadn't robbed David of the ability to move, the thought of his grandmother's reaction would have. It was even worse than the prospect of looking himself. He hadn't succeeded in breathing when he heard her say "Who's that? Has he come back?"

David would have blocked his ears if he had been capable of lifting his fists from beside him. He must have breathed, but he was otherwise helpless. The pause in the next room was almost as ominous as the sounds that brought it to an end: the rumble of the window, another series of light but impatient thumps at the front door, his grandmother's loose unsteady voice. "He's here for me. He's all lit up, his eyes are. The worm's put him back together. I should have squashed the worm."

"Stop wandering, for God's sake," said David's grandfather. "I can't take much more of this, I'm telling you."

"Look how he's been put back together," she said with such a mixture of dismay and pleading that David was terrified it would compel him to obey. Instead his panic wakened him.

He was lying inert, his thoughts as tangled as the quilt, when he heard his grandmother insist "He was there."

"Just get back in bed," his grandfather told her.

David didn't know how long he lay waiting for her to shut the window. After that there seemed to be nothing to hear once her bed acknowledged her with an outburst of creaking. He stayed uneasily alert until he managed to think of a way to make sense of events: he'd overheard her in his sleep and had dreamed the rest. Having resolved this let him feel manly enough to regain his slumber.

This time daylight found him. It seemed to render the night irrelevant, at least to him. He wasn't sure about his grandmother, who looked uncertain of something. She insisted on cooking breakfast, rather more than aided by her husband. Once David and his mother had done their duty by their portions it was time to call a taxi. David manhandled the suitcase downstairs by himself and wheeled it to the car, past the decorations that appeared dusty with sunlight. His grandparents hugged him at the gate, and his grandmother repeated the gesture as if she'd already forgotten it. "Come and see us again soon," she said without too much conviction, perhaps because she was distracted by glancing along the street and at the roof.

David thought he saw his chance to demonstrate how much of a man he was. "It wasn't there, Granny. It was just a dream."

Her face quivered, and her eyes. "What was, Davy? What are you talking about?"

He had a sudden awful sense of having miscalculated, but all he could do was answer. "There wasn't anything out here last night."

Her mouth was too nervous to hold onto a smile that might have been triumphant. "You heard him as well."

"No," David protested, but his mother grabbed his arm. "That's enough," she said in a tone he'd never heard her use before. "We'll miss the train. Look after each other," she blurted at her parents, and shoved David into the taxi. All the way through the streets full of lifeless decorations, and for some time on the train, she had no more to say to him than "Just leave me alone for a while."

He thought she blamed him for frightening his grandmother. He remembered that two months later, when his grandmother died. At the funeral he imagined how heavy the box with her inside it must be on the shoulders of the four gloomy men. He succeeded in withholding his guilty tears, since his grandfather left crying to David's mother. When David tried to sprinkle earth on the coffin in the hole, a fierce wind carried off his handful as if his grandmother had blown it away with an angry breath. Eventually all the cars paraded back to the house that was only his grandfather's now, where a crowd of people David hadn't met before ate the sandwiches his mother had made and kept telling him how grown-up he was. He felt required to pretend, and wished his mother hadn't taken two days off from working at the nursery so that they could stay overnight. Once the guests left he felt more isolated still. His grandfather broke one of many silences by saying "You look as if you'd like to ask a question, Davy. Don't be shy."

David wasn't sure he wanted to be heard, but he had to be polite and answer. "What happened to Granny?"

"People change when they get old, son. You'll find that out, well, you have. She was still your grandmother really."

Too much of this was more ominous than reassuring. David was loath to ask how she'd died, and almost to say, "I meant where's she gone."

"I can't tell you that, son. All of us are going to have to wait and see."

Perhaps David's mother sensed this was the opposite of comforting, for she said "I think it's like turning into a butterfly, David. Our body's just the chrysalis we leave behind."

He had to affect to be happy with that, despite the memory it threatened to revive, because he was afraid he might otherwise hear worse. He apparently convinced his mother, who turned to his grandfather. "I wish I'd seen Mummy one last time."

"She looked like a doll."

"No, while she was alive."

"I don't think you'd have liked it, Jane. Try and remember her how she used to be and I will. You will, won't you, Davy?"

David didn't want to imagine the consequences of giving or even thinking the wrong answer. "I'll try," he said.

This appeared to be less than was expected of him. He was desperate to change the subject, but all he could think of was how bare the house seemed without its Christmas finery. Rather than say so he enquired, "Where do all the decorations go?"

"They've gone as well, son. They were always Dora's."

David was beginning to feel that nothing was safe to ask or say. He could tell that the adults wanted him to leave them alone to talk. At least they oughtn't to be arguing, not like his parents used to as soon as he was out of the way, making him think that the low hostile remarks he could never quite hear were blaming him for the trouble with the marriage. At least he wouldn't be distracted by the buzzing and the insistent light while he tried to sleep or hear. The wind helped blur the voices below him, so that although he gathered that they were agreeing, he only suspected they were discussing him. Were they saying how he'd scared his grandmother to death? "I'm sorry," he kept whispering like a prayer, which belatedly lulled him to sleep.

A siren wakened him – an ambulance. The pair of notes might have been crying "Davy" through the streets. He wondered if an ambulance had carried off his grandmother. The braying faded into the distance, leaving silence except for the wind. His mother and his grandfather must be in their beds, unless they had decided David was sufficiently grown-up to be left by himself in the house. He hoped not, because the wind sounded like a loose voice repeating his name. The noises on the stairs might be doing so as well, except that they were shuffling footsteps or, as he was able to make out before long, rather less than footsteps. Another sound was approaching. It was indeed a version of his name, pronounced by an exhalation that was just about a voice, by no means entirely like his grandmother's but too much so. It and the slow determined unformed paces halted outside his room.

He couldn't cry out for his mother, not because he wouldn't be a man but for fear of drawing attention to himself. He was offstage, he tried to think. He only had to listen, he needn't see more than the lurid light that flared across the carpet. Then his visitor set about opening the door.

It made a good deal of locating the doorknob, and attempting to take hold of it, and fumbling to turn it, so that David had far more time than he wanted to imagine what was there. If his grandmother had gone away, had whatever remained come to find him? Was something of her still inside her to move it, or was that a worm? The door shuddered and edged open, admitting a grotesquely festive glow, and David tried to shut his eyes. But he was even more afraid not to see the shape that floundered into the room.

He saw at once that she'd become what she was afraid of. She was draped with a necklace of fairy lights, and two guttering bulbs had taken the place of her eyes. Dim green light spilled like slimy water down her cheeks. She wore a long white dress, if the vague pale mass wasn't part of her, for her face looked inflated to hollowness, close to bursting. Perhaps that was why her mouth was stretched so wide, but her grin was terrified. He had a sudden dreadful thought that both she and the worm were inside the shape.

It blundered forward and then fell against the door. Either it had very little control of its movements or it intended to trap him in the room. It lurched at him as if it was as helpless as he was, and David sprawled out of bed. He grabbed one of his shoes from the floor and hurled it at the swollen flickering mass. It was only a doll, he thought, because the grin didn't falter. Perhaps it was less than a doll, since it vanished like a bubble. As his shoe struck the door the room went dark.

He might almost have believed that nothing had been there if he hadn't heard more than his shoe drop to the floor. When he tore the curtains open he saw fairy lights strewn across the carpet. They weren't what he was certain he'd heard slithering into some part of the room. All the same, once he'd put on his shoes he trampled the bulbs into fragments, and then he fell to his hands and knees. He was still crawling about the floor when his mother hurried in and peered unhappily at him. "Help me find it," he pleaded. "We've got to kill the worm."

Unblinking

First published in Lost On The Darkside, 2005
Also published in: Just Behind You

Dignam wasn't sure if the essays he was marking defeated him or the gaze of his neighbour did. Now that the postwoman had delivered to both sides of the road, the man was regarding him across it with what looked unreasonably like accusation. With its unyielding stare and its fixed resentful grimace, Dignam could almost have taken the face for a mask somebody had hung inside the window opposite. It felt as hostile as all the essays he'd graded so far—as their insistence that mental illness could be a gift. He wandered downstairs to see that the post was even less rewarding than he'd assumed: a credit card had sent him the same invitation twice. He was about to bin the duplicate unopened when he realised it was addressed to his neighbour.

His name was Brady, then. How likely was he to welcome the item? Dignam was tempted to throw it away, but it didn't belong to him. He let himself out onto the short path piebald with March frost and fringed with icy spikes of grass. The glazed road was crunchy with frozen winged seeds from Brady's sprawling sycamore. As Dignam stepped between the crumbling stone gateposts under the tree, the man thumped on his window. "Wait there," he shouted and backed into dimness.

Dignam ambled down a path so overgrown it was indistinguishable from the abandoned garden to the front door, which was as scaly as the rest of the exterior. Beside it thick off-white curtains hung inert as paint against the entire interior of a bay window spotted with many rains. He'd started to think Brady had been distracted from claiming his mail when rapid footsteps clumped downstairs and the door was wrenched open with a vicious creak. "I said I was coming," Brady declared, having barely lowered his loose voice.

What had kept him? Not combing his spectacularly uneven greyish hair, nor getting dressed, since he was almost certainly wearing only a dressing-gown stained with egg and toothpaste. This close, his whitish wrinkled puffed-up face more than ever resembled a mask through which his glittering bloodshot eyes peered suspiciously at Dignam. "This is yours," Dignam said. "She delivered it to me by mistake."

"What is it?"

"Just an invitation to take out a credit card, as though there isn't already enough plastic in the world."

"And how would you know how many I've got of those?"

"I've no idea. I meant generally, of course. Me, I've got all I can cope with."

Brady thrust out a hand that involved a smell of stale cloth and turned over the envelope to scrutinise the blank expanse of orange paper before examining the front afresh. OPEN AT ONCE! THIS COULD CHANGE YOUR LIFE! red letters in blue outlines exhorted beneath his address. "Steamed it open, did you?" he enquired.

"Most decidedly not. Why should you—

There's where," Brady scoffed, poking a chewed cracked fingernail under the flap. "And you gave yourself away knowing what's inside."

"That's because I received the identical mailing."

"Identical, was it? Had my name on too?"

"Except for that and of course the address. I really must assure you—"

"I'll bet you must." Brady ripped open the envelope and squinted at the picture of a credit card, then stuffed the wad of paper into a dangling pocket. "Teacher, that right?"

"Actually I'm—"

"Don't tell me. A university teacher."

"A lecturer, yes. How did you know?"

"If you don't want everyone knowing you shouldn't let them see you marking papers and thinking what you're thinking about the girls that wrote them."

"They aren't only girls. Plenty of men as well."

Brady looked worse than vindicated. "I think I'll ask you to excuse me," Dignam said, feeling close to trapped by the man's view of him.

He was almost at the pavement when a stout middle-aged woman tramped by. "Watch out for that one, Mrs Vernon," Brady shouted. "Reads other people's letters. He'll be in our houses next."

The woman frowned at Dignam and increased her speed. "Mr Brady," he called for her to overhear, "if you spread that sort of tale I'll be forced to take action."

"Got my name now, have you? I'll be seeing about yours. Get off my property right now with your threats or it'll be me that brings the police."

"I haven't time to argue," Dignam said before he crossed the road to escape the shadow of the tree, a gloom that felt too much like Brady's notion of him. As the man's door shut with a victorious slam, Dignam saw the woman peering back at him while she hurried past the variously bushy gardens to the shop on the corner of the main road. An impulse to head off any rumours sent him after her.

Apart from the counter, the small shop was crammed with shelves laden with groceries. "Here's a newcomer," said the shopkeeper, a woman shorter by a head than Mrs Vernon but compensatively broader.

"Sorry," Dignam felt bound to respond, having passed the shop on his way to work for years. "Just a paper today."

As he made for the counter Mrs Vernon moved aside a little too far for politeness. He rested a hand on the nearest newspaper. "Excuse me, Mrs Vernon, we haven't been introduced ..."

Her sharp face drew into itself as her lips pressed themselves almost colourless before demanding "Where did you get my name?

"I heard it just now, if you recall."

"Listening outside, were you? I don't like that, Mrs Timms."

As the shopkeeper opened her pudgy hands in front of her to accept this, Dignam protested "When our friend shouted after you, I meant, of course."

"If you're talking about Mr Brady," Mrs Vernon said, "you didn't sound very friendly."

"Neighbour, then. Would you say he can be a little odd?"

"I wouldn't, and I'm sure you wouldn't either, Mrs Timms."

"I expect you'd rather not speak ill of a customer. He's certainly got an odd idea of me. All I did was take him some post I'd received by mistake."

"Who are you to say he's not right upstairs?" Mrs Vernon apparently saw reason to object. "You're not a doctor."

"I am of psychology, actually. I lecture on it at the university."

"That's no doctor, that's a teacher. How many nutters have you met?

"Not a great number. If you put it like that," Dignam said in some rebuke, "none."

"Takes one to know one or think someone else is, more like."

Perhaps a cloud had masked the sun, but the growing darkness felt as if his brain was shrinking out of reach of light. "All I wanted to establish was that Mr Brady was mistaken to say I'd tampered with his letter."

"Sounds like everyone's mistaken except you."

"So you won't be going near his house," Mrs Timms advised.

What else had the women been saying about him? As he turned away with as much dignity as he could gather, there seemed to be far too much clutter between him and the door, and in his brain too. "Aren't you buying?" Mrs Timms said.

"I don't think I've laid claim to anything, have I?" He indicated the counter with one upturned hand, only to discover that print from the newspaper he'd leaned on had transferred itself to his palm. MADAM was the solitary word above a report about a brothel, and the latter portion was reversed like an illiterate tattoo on his skin. He slapped a pound coin on the counter hard enough for the shopkeeper to recoil with a timidity he thought melodramatic. "Here's your money. Keep your wares," he said and marched out of the shop.

The clang of the bell above the door spiked the back of his skull. After the dimness the sunlight felt strident too. He closed his eyes to let the flattened sharp-edged world regain some perspective until he realised he must appear to be loitering to overhear what the women said about him. They were silent, having seen him eavesdropping. He narrowed his eyes and stumbled along the road that seemed at best only vaguely imagined. As he widened them to demonstrate how harshly it was present, he wondered if during the entire confrontation Brady could really not have blinked once.

He wasn't doing so now. When Dignam resumed his seat at the desk he was met by a glare as unyielding as the sun that squinted through the branches of the sycamore. "Hope they sting," he muttered, blinking fast, and snatched the next essay off the heap. He recognised Hannah's generously flowing script, and was greeting it with a secret smile until his gaze snagged on the phrase he least hoped to encounter.

She thought schizophrenics had privileged perceptions too, did she? If she was so enamoured of his colleague's ideas, perhaps she should go to bed with Roger Douglas instead of with him. The unworthiness of the idea made Dignam nervous of betraying it to the watcher over the road, an absurd fear but nonetheless one reason why he lowered his head. Many schizophrenics display insights far beyond the average... While it is dangerous to regard mental states as contagious, they can sometimes be shared in part by an observer... It requires unusual strength of mind to live with unmedicated schizophrenia... Did Hannah mean to experience it or to be connected with a sufferer? Dignam had taken some satisfaction in inking his query alongside the text when he saw that the next sentence made it clear she'd meant suffering oneself. Too late, he thought, and glanced up to see why the light was flickering.

Brady had retreated from view, but a silent white explosion glared out of the depths of the room—the flash of a bulb. He was photographing Dignam, who heaved his window open as Mrs Vernon passed the house, her coat flapping in a wind. "Watch out for your friend with the camera," he called when she peered nervously towards the rattle of the sash. "Lord knows what he'll do with us now he's taken us."

She didn't look at Brady, despite the finger Dignam stretched forth. She fled onwards as though he'd made an improper approach. While the slam of his window was aimed at Brady, it only spurred her faster. He ducked to Hannah's essay in several kinds of rage. When the light flickered again he felt not merely spied upon but found out. "She's a mature student," he muttered. "She can choose for herself."

Did he imagine Brady could hear? He crouched to give the man a shot or several of his scalp, only to be bring himself too close to the page to read it no matter how hard he stared. Why was he wasting time? He had plenty of essays to mark in his office on the campus, and it was wholly irrational of him not to want to encounter Roger Douglas. He shoved himself away from the desk and twisted to sit with his back to the window as a preamble to quitting the house.

The route to the university led past the corner shop. Any other was absurdly devious. He might have had a word with the proprietor, but she was talking to a bulky man who frowned through the window at Dignam. Did that mean they were discussing him? "Off to work, Mrs Timms," he called, which made her blink.

Five minutes' stroll, but now two minutes' striding, took him along the seasick pavement of the potholed main road to the traffic lights. On his right a hill was piled with concrete tenements whose balconies always reminded him of battlements, though he suspected that he would have felt most beleaguered by living too close to his neighbours; doing so as a student had often brought him within screaming distance of a breakdown. To his left the cross street grew immediately more civilised as it met the campus, and he promised himself that his mind would. There was really no need to look behind him as he crossed the road. It was having a respite from traffic, and certainly nobody was following him.

He hadn't expected the campus to be so busy on a Saturday. Most of the students were bound for the library, though a few small groups were heading for the pub that faced it. Also on that course was a solitary woman in a dark grey suit, whom he would have taken for a lecturer except for her beacon of red hair. Even tied back so severely, it was unmistakably Hannah's. She was too distant for him to hail without drawing more attention than he wanted. As she stepped delicately into the pub, he told himself that he deserved a drink.

The moment he crossed the threshold, dimness and uproar fell on him. Although the room was at least twice the size of Mrs Timms' shop, the crowd made it feel even smaller. Blinking let him locate Hannah at the bar. He'd taken a pace towards her when he saw she was talking to Roger Douglas.

Surely they resembled a couple only because they were younger then Dignam, but he would have dodged out of the pub if the other lecturer hadn't caught sight of him. Douglas raised his long lean tanned face, pointing his satyr's beard at him. "Look how psychology brings us all together," he remarked to Hannah.

Hannah turned to recognise Dignam. A smile widened her eyes and then her deceptively prim lips. "Oh, Dr Dignam. I didn't see you were here."

"He wasn't, were you, Terry? He was just behind you."

"Hardly just," Dignam said, having lifted a hand to acknowledge them both.

"So long as we are to our students, hey?"

"I can't imagine why you'd think I wouldn't be. May I buy you whatever you're having, Miss Martin? Just an orange, right you are. I shouldn't think that pint will take you long, Roger. Let me come to the rescue."

Dignam felt expansive and in control once he'd succeeded in coaxing the barmaid over. As she levered out his pint he noticed the book on the bar in front of Douglas: Visions of Schizophrenia. "Do you always carry your own book with you? I suppose you feel you need to advertise yourself."

"That's our student's copy that she liked enough to buy."

Dignam was swallowing a rusty mouthful of beer to keep down several retorts, by no means solely aimed at Douglas, when his colleague said "Didn't you have a book in mind once yourself? Will Hannah have a chance to read that too before she leaves us?"

"I'd want to base it on observation. Perhaps I'm less anxious to make a name."

"There's plenty of observation in my book. You should try not just skimming it sometime."

"Observation of yourself when you were taking drugs, you mean."

"Exactly, when I was trying every psychotropic I could lay my hands on, and let me tell you they didn't always look like my hands. No point in being anything but honest, would you agree, Hannah? Nothing good comes of repression."

Dignam was able to hope Douglas had made her uncomfortable until she said "I admired how you didn't hold back."

"Perhaps I shouldn't, then." Dignam saw her face try not to stiffen, though he had no intention of exposing their relationship. "I believe I may have hit upon the subject of my book," he said.

"Do we get to hear?" Douglas urged.

"I've come into contact with a sufferer."

"If you'll accept a word of advice, don't think of them that way. Look on them as an opportunity to share perceptions you might never have otherwise."

"Privileged perceptions, you mean," Dignam said and couldn't resist staring at Hannah.

"They're the ones. Treat yourself to some while you've the chance. They were what you wanted to consult me about, weren't they, Hannah? Forgive me if I don't call you Miss Martin. I like to think of my students as friends."

"I'm sure Miss Martin should be in no doubt as to my regard for her." Shouting this over the hubbub of the bar made Dignam feel walled in by his language. He drained his remaining third of a pint as an excuse to say "I'll see you at my Monday lecture then, Miss Martin."

"If not before, who knows?" Douglas used a finger and thumb to wipe froth from his moustache, a gesture that reminded Dignam of a villain in a melodrama. "Off to continue your observations, Terry?"

"I imagine that should be the case."

Either Dignam left the pub too energetically or his vision had inured itself to the dimness, because he was confronted by an all-embracing glare. Pressing his eyes shut, even with fingers as well as lids, only trapped it. "Are you okay?" someone asked, and he had to insist that he was. Once he was able to distinguish that nobody was spying on him, or at least no longer, he ran across the campus to his office.

There were essays on his desk, but nothing to contain them. While he searched for a carrier, footsteps advanced and hesitated and executed some further movement in the corridor. Their owner must be inspecting pictures on the walls, not deliberately staying out of sight or threatening to appear, but the noises made it harder for Dignam to be sure how empty the room was. His rummaging sent dust like the remnants of chalked words into the lethargically inclined sunlight. The essays weren't so urgent that they couldn't wait, and he was suddenly anxious to be home. No doubt this was how it felt to have an idea for a book, an idea that was eager to reach the page.

Words were scrambling over one another in his head as he emerged into the deserted corridor. In under five minutes he was running past the corner shop. He rammed the key into his lock and sprinted upstairs, to be confronted by the man across the road. The unblinking eyes seemed to tug the expressionless face to meet him, unless his own movement brought it closer. He was resisting the temptation to raise a hand in an ironic greeting when he saw that his palm was still imprinted with a word.

Had Hannah and his rival seen it? He licked the other hand and rubbed the pair together as he sat at the desk, until he began to see himself as Brady must see him, washing himself like an animal or worse. He grabbed a pad out of the desk drawer and seized the nearest pen, the red. A spies on B because he believes A to be spying on him. A's paranoia narrows the focus of his mind to B or A. Paranoia is a form of focusing that excludes insight and any sense of everything that lies outside the focus. As a substitute for this lack the paranoid mind derives delusions from the subject on which it is focused...

Was this an opening paragraph? It felt more like notes for several or even for a number of chapters. Hannah's unfaithful ideas seemed to be interfering with the clarity he'd thought he was bringing home, and he reached to turn the scattered pages of her essay blank side up. Then his smeared hand faltered. Hadn't he tidied them before leaving the house? Had he failed to notice that he'd left the window raised almost an inch?

His head jerked up, not quite in time to be able to confirm he'd glimpsed a mocking grin across the road. Could someone really have entered the house and opened the window to provide an explanation for any disturbance? The mere thought appeared to send Brady into hiding. When the man thrust his head out of the front door, Dignam wondered if he might be on his way to protest his innocence. Instead Brady stalked along the road, the plastic jackets of three library books glinting dully under his arm. Why should Dignam still feel watched? He frowned at Brady's house and then couldn't stop. A face was peering at him from the gloomy depths of the upstairs room.

He had to lean close enough to the window to coat it with his breath before he understood that he was glimpsing a photograph on the wall. Indeed, there were several, yet he increasingly felt as if he was staring into a mirror. He sat and waited for the sun to crawl far enough to light upon the faces that weren't really watching him. "You're touched all right," he said, though Brady wasn't there to be told. All the faces were so enlarged that they resembled indistinct ghosts, but they weren't quite blurred enough for Dignam not to recognise at least a dozen versions of his own face.

Brady must have developed them while the subject was out of the house. He hadn't shot them all that morning, however. How long had he been spying unobserved? The question troubled Dignam even more than the pictures did. He craned out of the window to no satisfactory effect, then went for a closer look. Before he reached the end of his path the faces had sunk out of view. As he resolved to work while he kept watch for Brady, he saw what the tree had prevented him from noticing. A bunch of keys was dangling from Brady's front door.

Had he left them as a temptation? It seemed more important that it would take him at least an hour to walk to the nearest library and back. Dignam crossed the road and walked once backwards around the sycamore while pretending not to ascertain that he wasn't being watched from any of the houses, and then he strode to Brady's door. The keys were hanging from a mortise lock. He turned that key, then with a deft twist of the rusty Yale admitted himself to the house. In another second the lumbering door shut behind him.

He wished he hadn't been so swift. Before he was embraced by darkness he'd glimpsed a hall papered with newsprint and a millipede fleeing over a ragged tufted brown carpet to huddle, legs and antennae twitching, at the foot of stairs bare except for discoloured splotches. The house smelled of rot and old paper, and was thick with the lack of clarity he thought only ignorance could bring. He was groping to ease the door ajar when his eyes began to take hold of the dimness. He locked the mortise and advanced along the hall. His first pace felt as if it was sinking into turf or earth. The sound of his next told him why and perhaps explained the underlying rotten odour. He was treading on sycamore seeds that a wind or Brady must have brought into the house. The noise and the sensation put him in mind of trampling insects, one reason why he hurried to the first internal door. Though the pallid plastic doorknob felt sticky as a second-hand lollipop, he turned it back and forth. The door was locked.

He didn't need to open doors to see. Enough illumination seeped through the grubby fanlight above the front door. Any insects in the hall were either lying low among the scattered seeds or dead. At least half a dozen sycamore shoots were growing on or between the uncovered floorboards, but Dignam's attention fastened on the walls. Hardly an inch of them was visible for the newspapers tacked to them and overrun with red ink. A marker pen, if not several, had been used to ring words and link them with lines, some the length of the hall.

"And" was one of the emphasised words; in fact, quite a few. And, and, and, and, and, and, and, and... They felt like threats of a never-ending process. No sense was to be gained from the newspaper photographs either. A man's pointing finger was linked to a woman's hand several yards away, while another wavering line lassoed both a war memorial and the chimney of a mansion. Dignam was trying to imagine a connection when he remembered why he was there: for a closer examination of the pictures of him and then for whatever course of action suggested itself.

A single contact with the banister was enough. The wood was as sticky as the doorknob. He followed his vague jerking shadow to the upper storey, where the dimness felt like the stale smell rendered visible. Only the hollow clatter of his footsteps made it clear that the floor was uncarpeted. He wasn't surprised the front bedroom was locked, but finding that none of the keys fitted threw him.

He crouched to peer through the keyhole. Beyond a dishevelled bed he was just able to identify his own window pinched microscopic, a sight that made his brain feel shrunken. He lurched to his feet and backed across the landing to take a run at the door. Just in time he realised Brady would suspect him. As he shook himself intelligent he elbowed the bathroom door, which swung wide.

A toilet roll squatted on the toilet lid, and the cardboard tubes from perhaps a hundred used rolls were heaped on the cistern. Three seedlings and a sycamore as tall as his waist were rooted in earth several inches deep in the cracked white metal bath. Another stunted infant tree stood in a sink full of earth. He hardly knew why he darted forward to close his fists around all the leaves and crush them to sticky pulp. As he turned away he saw his guiltily gleeful face in the smeary speckled mirror. He started as though he'd caught sight of an intruder. His movement was enough to dislodge a cardboard tube from the top of the pile. Immediately, like lemmings that had found a leader, the rest toppled off the cistern.

He felt as if something had gripped his mouth with claws to manipulate it into one or more of several competing expressions. He couldn't judge from the mirror whether he was grinning or grimacing, unless he was about to be overtaken by quite another look. He stooped to pick up a tube in each hand, then balanced another pair on top of them on the cistern, and a third. He was restoring two more to the pile when the whole array sprawled across the tattered linoleum.

How long had he been in the house? Since he hadn't checked when he'd entered, his watch was useless. He abandoned his asinine task and charged downstairs, then up again to shut the bathroom door. The dimness clung to his mind as he raced down a second time and fumbled the key into the mortise lock. He almost slammed the door behind him, closing it stealthily instead. He thrust the key into the lock and twisted it so hard he bruised his fingers. In no more time than it took him to remember to breathe he was hastening across the road in a flurry of sycamore seeds. He was almost at his gate when Brady turned the corner by the shop.

Could he have seen? All of Dignam was desperate to hide—all except his mind. It kept him leaning nonchalantly on a gatepost while he sorted through remarks. "You read a lot, I see." "Fond of words, Mr Brady?" "I hope you didn't write in those books like you—" His fear that he might utter one or more of these spurred him to blurt "Back from the library, then?"

He thought the unrelenting stare was meant to convict him of fatuousness until Brady demanded "Who told you I was there?"

Too late Dignam realised the man was empty-handed. "I saw you taking your books."

"Better taking them than medicine." Brady smirked without moderating his stare. "Keeping an eye on me, are you? You'll need both and a friend's as well."

"Simply being neighbourly," Dignam said and was suddenly afraid that his face was betraying his escapade, a notion that threatened to distort his lips. "It does no harm to look out for others."

"I'll be looking out for you, that's for sure. Any more observations or am I dismissed?"

Surely he couldn't have been eavesdropping in the dimness of the pub. "Please don't allow me to detain you," Dignam said.

"Don't kid yourself you can stop me."

Dignam thought he'd said the opposite. He was sending a silent gasp of relief after the man's back when he remembered that Brady was about to find the keys. Before Dignam could let him do so by himself, Brady spun around. "Made me forget these, did you?" he yelled past the tree.

"I rather think you did it unaided."

Dignam only spoke, but Brady heard him. "And how did you know?" he shouted louder still.

"You told me."

The silence gave him time to understand that Brady hadn't quite before the man bellowed "What's your next trick going to be? Breaking in to see what you can lecture about? Poison me while you're at it, why don't you."

"Don't talk rot," Dignam shouted for any neighbours to hear and strode to his door. He heard Brady's keys rattle as he took out his own. It seemed crucial that he should be at his window by the time Brady went upstairs. He sprinted for his desk as the door slammed like a lid. A seed crunched underfoot as he reached the stairs. His hand must be sticky, not the banister. He sat panting in his not entirely stable chair and tidied the pages of Hannah's essay, then forgot them as he leaned across them. The room that faced him was empty of faces. The sun showed him a blank wall.

He was staring at the wall as if this might force the images to develop from it when the door let Brady in, and a kitchen chair. He planted it close to the window and sat forward on it, folding his arms, fastening his gaze like twin cameras on his neighbour. Of course he was pretending that he hadn't dashed up to the room before Dignam had reached his. He had needed only to throw the photographs out of sight on the floor. Dignam stood and stretched, but couldn't see them. He felt as if Brady's gaze was weighing him back into the chair to deal with Hannah's thoughts.

Here was the Roger Douglas concept that enraged him most of all: that insanity was somehow magical. She had found more similarities—the ritualistic use of objects, the ambition to alter reality by the power of the mind, the way witches had once been regarded and the mentally ill often were now, a resemblance leading to Dignam's suggestion that before long the insane would be viewed as soothsayers or visionaries. If people were sufficiently irrational to depend on astrology, he often said, why not go to the extreme? She clearly hadn't appreciated his irony. Her conclusion felt like a belated attempt to placate him, and overall the essay seemed designed to mediate between him and Douglas. He was squeezing the red pen so viciously it creaked between his fingers when the phone rang on the corner of his desk.

As he lifted the receiver his gaze couldn't avoid Brady's. He had to rid himself of a grotesque fancy that the man had somehow made the phone go off. "Terry Dignam," he said.

"Terry? Terry," she repeated as if testing her entitlement to use the name. "It's Hannah."

"I gathered that."

"I just wanted to ask if you meant what you said."

"I generally do. It's a peculiarity of mine. Something in particular?"

"I thought you might be saying it so Roger didn't realise, well, you know. Aren't you coming to me for dinner tomorrow?"

"I don't think that's going to be possible," Dignam said, holding Brady's gaze.

"Oh."

The syllable was laden with so much disappointment and self-doubt and accusation that he felt compelled to say "I suppose you could do it here if you liked."

"Only if you want me to."

"I thought I'd made it clear I shouldn't have suggested it otherwise."

"You'll need to tell me where to find you."

"I was about to," he said, and did. He hung up the receiver before informing Brady "You've got what you asked for. There'll be someone else to keep an eye on you."

With an effort he lowered his gaze to the essay. 50%, he scribbled in the margin. Some of your ideas will bear developing—decide which. He looked up in something like triumph to confront an empty room, and was irrational enough to feel relieved until he grasped where Brady might be. The thought seemed to lodge like an infection in his bladder. He waddled wide-legged to the bathroom and drained himself, then returned to his desk. Brady was awaiting him.

His face was an unreadable mask. Even his eyes failed to react to his subject, who felt as if their scrutiny was puppeting him across the room to sit at his desk like a miscreant under the gaze of a teacher. Brady couldn't know that Dignam had been in his house. If Dignam hadn't, the man would believe that he had, but what did that mean? It made Dignam feel embedded in Brady's view of him. He hunched over the next essay, only for a reference to privileged perceptions to swell into his vision as though it had been freshly penned. He shoved the pages aside to concentrate on his own work, his notes, his book. The subject sits at a window, he scrawled, which didn't help him deal with the glare he sensed on top of his brain or in it—didn't reduce his awareness of it or give it meaning. He raised his head and met it. If it came to a contest, sanity must win.

He strove to put everything he knew about himself into his eyes. He continued when they began to sting, because it would seem feeble of him to be first to blink. The first time he was forced to, he pinched his thighs between his nails. His leg was aching in too many places to count by the time he observed that night was falling. When he glanced down at the page he couldn't read his own words.

How long did he propose to sit at the window? He was holding Brady still, but that wasn't necessary; the man would never be able to steal into the house. Dignam took the cramp in his guts for hunger. "Time for some of us to eat," he muttered. "Just make sure it's not poisoned."

He was unhappy to find that he couldn't eat much. Half the omelette he made to use up milk he scraped into the bin. He still had several bottles too many from trying to moderate his coffee intake and woo sleep. He finished one and bore another into the front room in case it would soothe the cramp in his innards while he allowed himself some television. There was nothing on the many channels to engage his mind: simplistic quizzes, violence whose lack of apparent effect struck him as close to psychotic, comedy shows accompanied by laughter so inappropriate it seemed crazed. While he gazed at the screen, was Brady gazing at the house? The possibility made his mind feel cramped. As soon as watching had tired him enough he stumbled up to bed.

He didn't recall closing his study door, but he resisted the temptation to peer around it to see if his neighbour was spying, which demonstrated how sane he was, as if he needed proof. Once he was in bed he set about forgetting his tormentor. He shouldn't have given the man a thought; by the time he ceased to feel his eyes he couldn't tell how much of the dark consisted of Brady's fancies about him. Certainly it helped Brady come into the room.

At first he only stared at Dignam and leaned close to show that his eyes were lidless, and then he began to shake his huge wild head. Dignam assumed this expressed disapproval until seeds and insects rained on him. He wasn't sure which dropped into his helplessly gaping mouth as Brady towered over him. The man's head was pressed against the ceiling now; some of the twigs sprouting from his cranium bent with a thin creak and snapped off. He reached up with arms longer than the room was wide and plucked a handful of shoots off the cracked scaly expanse of his forehead. He clamped Dignam's eyes open with two fingers of the other hand before planting the shoots between his victim's lips. With a flabby cry that made him feel less in control of his mouth than ever, Dignam jerked awake. Brady was above him, a looming shape more solid than the dark.

Dignam's gasp felt like taking back his cry. It seemed to suck the contents of his mouth deeper into him. He recoiled against the bars above the pillow, and the metal clashed against the wall as he flung out a hand for the light cord. For a moment his fingers felt entangled by twigs, and then he succeeded in tugging the light on.

He was alone in the room. There were no seeds or insects on or around the bed. Nevertheless he felt poisoned by the dream, which he sensed hovering like the man's oppressive presence, waiting to resume its shape. What stale taste was lingering in Dignam's mouth? When he floundered to the bathroom, gargling seemed to emphasise the taste. He threw his study door open to see if Brady was watching in triumph.

A streetlamp cast a net of shadow from the tree over the house opposite—too much shadow for Dignam to be anything like certain if the window was deserted. Poking his head forth didn't resolve the question. His eyes stung, and a taste like indigestion filled his mouth. He slammed the window and hurried downstairs, wiping his hand on his pyjamas between clutches at the stair banister.

Two could play at the game Brady had wished on him. He drank half a bottle of milk and eased the metal cap off another, then found the seed that someone had tracked into the hall. He rubbed it between his hands, staining his palms, and crumbled the fragments with his nails into a powder he could sprinkle in the milk. He restored the cap and shook the bottle until it looked full of nothing but innocent milk. Having pulled on a jacket and trousers over his pyjamas, he hid the bottle inside his jacket as he left the house.

What did he intend to do? If Brady was watching, only to remind him he was also being watched. Dignam was beneath the sycamore, whose shadow felt as though innumerable seeds were poised to fall on him, before he could be sure Brady's window was unmanned. He strode as quickly as silence permitted to the man's front door. "Milko," he said under his breath. "Special Sunday delivery for Brady." He set the bottle on the step with a clunk far more muted than his heartbeat and allowed his uncontrollable grin to lead him back across the road.

He couldn't sleep now. He had to watch. He almost slammed the front door in his eagerness to dash upstairs and resume his post at the desk. He hadn't missed anything; the bottle was still on the doorstep. Its glimmer put him in mind of a headstone too shrunken by distance to move him. What had he done? Nothing fatal, certainly—nothing as poisonous as Brady's effect on him. Perhaps Brady would see that it was best to call a truce once he understood worse could befall him.

Soon Dignam's eyes felt charred by the dark and by watching. More than once the bottle reared up like a pallid larva or executed a jig from willingness to be discovered. "Gargoyle," he called, "gargoyle," but that failed to summon his adversary. In time the streetlamp grew redundant and eventually, without his noticing, dead. At some point he realised he was visible, and snatched an essay off the heap, not that he could make sense of the words just now. They seemed to underline his view of the house opposite, to suggest only that mattered. Once Brady opened the front door, he was all that did.

He didn't see the milk at first. He advanced to the gate and frowned up and down the street. As he turned back to the house Dignam saw him stiffen. He marched to grab the bottle and tear off the cap before swinging around to display how he was emptying the milk over the wild lawn strewn with seeds. In a few seconds he was at the window, holding up the bottle as evidence.

Evidence of what? He hadn't drunk from it, and he'd thrown away the contents. It would be monstrously unfair of him to accuse a neighbour of poisoning him. If he planned to sit there like a dairy advertisement, that was no reason for Dignam to indulge him. Dignam marked the essays almost faster than he could breathe— confused thinking, too much identification with your subject, too closely observed for objectivity, too narrowly focused —and swept the heap aside to work on his book. The solitary sentence on the topmost page brought him back to Brady, who hadn't moved or blinked.

How long was Dignam going to let himself be held there? Usually on Sundays he bought a paper to read in the pub on the campus, but suppose Brady took some crazed revenge while his neighbour was away? For once Dignam would have to patronise the corner shop.

He hadn't reached his gate when Brady emerged, flourishing the bottle. "Didn't kill me yet," he shouted. "Have another go."

"Take it as a warning," Dignam responded barely aloud. As he hurried to the shop he glanced back at every other step to ensure Brady wasn't sneaking towards his house. Had the man mouthed something or gestured to make three youths who were loitering outside the shop snigger at Dignam? A furious glance that screwed an ache into Dignam's neck found Brady turning away to speak to a girl in her teens or younger. As she followed Brady up the path Dignam wondered "Is someone up to no good with that child?"

"Dirty bugger," one youth snarled. The others muttered viciously .is Dignam dodged into the shop.

Mrs Vernon and the shopkeeper were waiting for him. "Had a bad night, did you?" Mrs Vernon said.

He felt as if Brady's obsession with him had turned into a plague. "What makes you say that?" he demanded.

"Anybody would, the way you're dressed." He looked down at himself as a preamble to sarcasm and saw the pyjama cuffs protruding from his trousers, the pyjama collar sprawling forth from his jacket. As he gaped in search of words, Mrs Timms enquired "What were you saying outside?"

"Your friend Mr Brady has just taken a young girl inside his house."

"That'll be his granddaughter. She visits him on Sundays." Dignam retreated to the door and surveyed the deserted streets. "Where did those boys go? Have you any idea where they live?"

"Which were those?" said Mrs Timms, and her customer added less gently "We thought you were talking to yourself."

Why were they trying to confuse him? If it was what Brady wanted, let him take the consequences. Dignam bought a newspaper and ran home. Suppose Brady had arranged the diversion to distract him? As soon as he'd secured the door he hunted for telltale seeds and did his best to ascertain whether the banister or any of the doorknobs was stickier than it ought to be.

The news in the paper seemed to belong to a world that had become detached from him. At the end of every sentence, and before long of every phrase, his eyes twitched up to focus on the house across the road. The afternoon, though not the paper, was half finished by the time Brady let the girl out. Dignam sprinted to his gate as Brady sent her on her way with not too much of a hug or a kiss. "Excuse me," Dignam called. "You may want to watch out for some young boys round here."

"Hurry home, Jane." Once she had picked up speed the man said "Maybe that's your kind of thing. It won't do for me."

"I didn't mean it like that."

"Then how do you know what I mean?"

"I'm trying to warn you in case you're in danger," Dignam's unwieldy mouth managed to pronounce. "Some people can get queer notions in their heads."

"You'd be the last person I'd need to tell me, Mr Dignam."

"Where did you get my name?"

"I know everything worth knowing about you, believe me." If his stare was meant to convey this, Dignam was equal to it. His eyes had only begun to sting when Brady turned his back. "It's Doctor, so there's something you don't know for a start," Dignam said, but he'd blinked. As Brady shut his door Dignam slammed his and ran to his desk.

Sorting paper kept him busy: the news, the essays, the seed of his book. Soon he was beyond telling which was which. Was he watching out for Brady or hoping the youths would teach him manners? Perhaps they were waiting for the dark that sprouted branches against Brady's house. When a solitary figure disentangled itself from the shadows, he thought it was Brady bound for revenge. Once his peeled eyes recognised Hannah he strove to remember why she was there. Of course, she was anxious to learn what he thought of her essay and her.

Perhaps she would assume he was out, since the room was unlit. She met his eyes, however, as she ventured up the path, a plastic bag swinging from each hand. Now he remembered she had undertaken to provide dinner. The prospect kept him at his desk until she'd rung the doorbell twice, at which point he raced down to enquire "Would you mind telling me where you just got those?"

She looked puzzled and a little hurt. "I didn't just get them anywhere. I brought them from home."

"I'm going to watch you prepare the meal, am I?"

"It's made. All we need is a microwave. I know you've got one."

"Which of my neighbours have you been talking to?"

"None of them. I've never even seen one."

"Well, now you have," he said, jabbing all his fingers at the face among the flattened branches.

She gave it rather too perfunctory a look. "Can I come in now, do you think? It's chilly out here."

He was about to say he was too busy for dinner when he wondered if she might report back to Roger Douglas. If his rival heard that Dignam had been behaving oddly, what might he be capable of saying to their colleagues? "Come in by all means," Dignam said loud enough to be heard across the road. "I've nothing to hide."

Once he'd slammed the door behind her Hannah didn't move towards the kitchen until he led the way. He clawed at the light switch and twisted a chair backwards to sit on while he observed her putting the first carton in the microwave. This done, she was so ill at ease that nobody could blame him for enquiring "What's wrong?"

"Have you only just got up?"

"I've been too busy to get dressed. Do you want me to change?"

"You needn't. I've seen worse." Apparently this was a timid joke, perhaps intended to nerve her to say "Busy marking, would that have been?"

"Marking and working on the book I'm not supposed to be up to writing."

"I've never said that and I wouldn't. I know you have it in you." This was plainly the start of the process of asking "Did you finish your marking?"

"Shilly-shally, Hannah, shilly-shally."

"I'm not sure I..."

"That's your problem. Try believing in yourself enough to say what you mean. Have I marked your essay? Yes."

"Am I allowed to hear what you thought?"

"It seems to me you're in two minds. Decide which one you're sticking to."

"Can't I take the best from each?"

"They aren't compatible. By the time I'd finished trying to make sense of your essay my head was splitting in half. You're meant to be writing about madness, not driving people mad."

He thought he might have said too much until some of it silenced her. The hush emphasised how little he was eating. Weren't there seeds in the vegetable curry she served as the first course? He did his best to pick forkfuls nowhere near them, which left most of the contents of his plate untouched. "I'm saving myself," he said and felt the choice of words tug at his lips.

At least the silence let him hear any noises in the street. Before he'd finished hacking spicy chicken off its bones and sifting the rice with his fork, he had dashed into the front room twice. The second time Hannah followed, letting him retreat to the kitchen ahead of her and dump most of his plateful in the bin. Did she suspect? He could think of no other reason for her to replenish his plate. "I know you're worried about work," the said, "but it won't help to starve yourself, will it? Anyway, I don't know anyone who thinks you're past it except you."

How many lies were packed into that? "Don't delude yourself you know what I think," he said, and more slyly "I can enjoy your dinner by watching you eat."

She laid her utensils to rest among the bones. "I made it for you."

Suppose she'd eaten precisely enough not to poison herself? He consigned the remains to the bin and stacked the plates in the sink with a clatter that felt as if sections of his skull were grating together. It suddenly seemed crucial that Hannah shouldn't think he was behaving unusually in any way, lest she tell someone at the university. "I hope that doesn't mean you're leaving," he made himself say.

"Not if you don't want me to."

"You know what I want," he said and unzipped his trousers to demonstrate there was no misunderstanding.

Did she stiffen so that she wouldn't recoil? "Not down here, Terry," she protested.

"Indeed not. Up is best."

As he ensured that she preceded him upstairs, his extension raised itself from flopping against his trousers to sway in her direction. From the landing he glimpsed Brady at the window. If he discharged his task with Hannah in the office chair he could keep an eye out for the youths, but she had already switched on the light in the bedroom. When she sat on the edge of the bed he pushed her as flat as the tousled quilt permitted and eased her skirt up.

Her black briefs were slippery silk, which he felt squeaking beneath his nails until those caught in the filigreed edge. He pulled the briefs down far enough that he could insert himself in Hannah as he clambered onto her. At first he wasn't sure if her moans denoted pleasure or discomfort or simply determination to improve her grades, and then he wondered if they were meant to deafen him to sounds outside the house. He was reaching to lean a hand on her mouth and if necessary her nose as well when he heard shouts and a smash of glass across the road.

Dragging himself out of Hannah was more of a release than he was prepared for. Spurts of solidified dimness preceded him into the study. The sensations this entailed were far more remote than the sight of Brady at the window. The man hadn't moved, and there was no sign of the youths. Dignam wiped himself on a sheet of paper, which he flung into the bin as he resumed his seat. He was peering in search of broken glass when Hannah arrived behind him. "Terry," she pleaded, "what are you trying to do?"

He wasn't so easily distracted; he wouldn't even blink. "Are you asking me to believe you don't know?"

"I can't stay if you're going to behave like this."

"Then that solves a good few problems. I'll see you tomorrow in class."

Why was she loitering? She was about to ask for her essay, of course. "Tomorrow," he repeated so loud that it widened his eyes. He didn't let them shrink until he saw her on the stretch of pavement he was able to keep in view without losing sight of Brady.

Once she lost shape and vanished from the rim of his vision he felt as if there had never been anyone except himself in the house.

Whatever the sound of breaking glass had signified, it appeared not to have affected Brady. He was staring at Dignam as if his entire being was concentrated in his eyes, but Dignam was equal to him. He wouldn't move or blink until his subject did. If Brady refused to heed his warning, he would bring whatever happened on himself. The gang weren't likely to kill him, after all. He hadn't made Dignam act out Brady's view of him. He never had.

In time Dignam's eyes drooped, and his head. He stretched his eyes wide until they felt on the edge of sprouting from their holes. He roused himself by pinching his thighs and eventually his penis with his nails. He wanted to think his opponent was having to resort to worse, but there wasn't a hint of movement over the road. How could the man sit so inert and never blink? A stealthy dawn had separated the topmost branches from the sky before Dignam was certain something was wrong.

He began to gesture wildly at the figure across the road. He tried to find the grin that had overtaken his face in the other house, and rocked his head from side to side and popped his eyes. When this had no effect he held up the hand that had borrowed a word from i he newspaper in the corner shop and stabbed a finger at it. Next he climbed on the desk, trampling the papers, to wave his penis at his tormentor. None of this earned him a reaction. Brady wasn't just still, he was lifeless. Something—surely only his mental condition—must have frightened him to death.

In a moment that felt like stepping over the brink of a nightmare Dignam remembered everything he'd done: the milk, the youths. He leapt off the desk, jarring his ankles, and floundered out of the room. He ought to have checked that Hannah hadn't left the front door unlocked for anyone to sneak in, but it was fastened now. He closed it behind him as gently as his shivering fingers could manage and limped down the path.

Could he still be performing Brady's fantasies about him? What if the man had used the photographs to manipulate him? Just as witches had to let their victims know they were supposed to be under a spell, so Brady had ensured he saw the photographs. Or perhaps the seeds crunching underfoot were the key to it all; perhaps they spread Brady's influence. Dignam was so busy sorting out the truth that he was well across the road before twinges in his penis alerted him that it was exposed to the night air. He was stowing it away when with an outraged shout Brady sprang to his feet and vanished from the window.

What kind of a trick did he think he'd been playing? Dignam folded his arms and challenged the front door. He heard a disarrayed clatter of footsteps at the top of the stairs, and then the noises tumbled over one another. They were brought to an end by a weighty thud in the hall, followed by utter silence.

A nervous grin distorted his mouth as he limped on tiptoe to the door and hauled up the rusty flap of the letterbox. He knelt among the seeds and ducked to the metal slot, and had to lever his eyes wide with fingers and thumbs before he could believe what he was seeing. Brady was upside down, his body on the stairs, his head at an excessive angle in the hall. His accusing glare looked strengthened by its inversion, and seemed to require no effort at all.

Dignam met it as if he might still outstare it, and then he shut the flap and staggered to his feet and fled along the path. How long would Brady take to be discovered? Dignam wanted to be present so that whoever found the corpse would see him at his window and know he couldn't have been responsible. He leaned his elbows on the desk and gripped his head with both hands to keep his eyes trained on the house opposite. The deserted window appeared to be pretending Brady wasn't still obsessed with him. Suppose the man never closed his eyes again, or it no longer mattered if he did, since Dignam's last sight of them was embedded in his mind? The sun was helping parch his own eyes when he realised how he was putting himself at risk. He might be suspected if he behaved unusually in any way —if he didn't go to work.

He grabbed the trampled mass of papers from his desk and stuffed them into a carrier bag he found in the kitchen. At his gate he glanced at Brady's house while pretending to collect seeds, but could see no faces, neither Brady's nor his own. "Just off to work, Mrs Timms," he called into the shop. The stained carrier blundered against him as he limped to the crossroads, where the traffic lights drilled colours into his skull with a piercing buzz. Layers of grey matter piled up on the hill, but he succeeded in leaving their ossification behind as he made his swaying way across the campus. Although it was scattered with students, none of them was heading for his lecture. He was about to demand an explanation when he realised he was late.

This was no reason for Roger Douglas to have taken the podium, and why was Hannah on the front row? She gazed up at Douglas as he said "My experience—"

"My course isn't about yours, Dr Drugless." Dignam limped to the podium amid a rustling he mistook for general excitement until he traced it to the carrier bag. "Sorry, that's the last thing I should call you, isn't it? Thanks for filling in for me. You can stop now."

Douglas grasped himself by the beard or held up a mask. "Are you sure you're, you'll forgive me, but are you up to this?"

"I could ask what you think you're up to. I believe Miss Martin thinks I'm still competent to teach, don't you, Miss Martin? And I'm sure you speak for all your fellow students."

They were certainly all gazing at him in the same way. It couldn't be pity; it must be sympathy—they were on his side. "Thank you, Roger," he said, indicating the auditorium with a hand like a blurred sign.

Douglas stepped down reluctantly but lingered at the back of the room. If he'd decided he could learn from his colleague, perhaps there was hope for him. Dignam emptied the carrier onto the lectern, only to find that the pages were stuck together by vegetable matter. He mustn't let the sight claw at his guts; once the stuff dried he would be able to separate the essays. "So we've been talking about experience, have we?" he said, fixing his gaze on the heaps of faces. "Let's talk about mine, then. My experience..."

How could he tell them about Brady? Even mentioning the man would betray he'd watched him. The thought made everything feel turned upside down like the eyes he could see on the stairs. "My experience," he said he didn't know how many times while eyes stared at him. Most of them weren't Brady's, unless they all were. When had Douglas sneaked out of the room?

No doubt he was bringing someone else to observe the lecture. Dignam had to demonstrate that he still had plenty to offer, but how? "My experience," he said, and his gaze lit upon his own handwriting. At once he knew both what his opening sentence should be and how he could regain control of the lecture. "A man sits in a room," he said in triumph.

It appeared to mean less to his students than to him. He lowered himself into a chair on the podium and, having tugged his sleeves over his pyjama cuffs, leaned forward to compose the precarious stacks of heads with his gaze. "I'm not going to tell you my experience, I'm going to let you observe it for yourselves," he said. "Observe what distinguishes me from a man with a mental problem. Don't look away until you have."

Some of them must have seen almost at once. Others, not only Hannah, apparently found it harder. He wouldn't relax until everyone had finished the assignment. When refusing to blink began to take away his sight, his innards shrank into him, but soon his inability to see whether he was being watched felt more like peace. He heard people leave the auditorium, and others come in, and voices murmuring. He had to be grateful that they were so anxious not to disturb him. When the voices converged on him and hands helped him up, he was content to be led to rest now that he'd carried out the task he was paid for. A solitary thought was enough for him. He need see nothing that he didn't want to see so long as he never blinked.

Skeleton Woods

First published in Corpse Blossoms, 2005
Also published in: Just Behind You

They were never called that, but they seem to be now. When I manage to drag the warped sash high enough for me to lean over my old bedroom windowsill, I'm almost certain as I squint at the wooden arch daubed with moonlight that Skelton has acquired an extra letter. Under the moon the urban dell resembles a web that has caught the luminous worm of the stream. The woods look smaller than I remember, and even more secretive, no doubt because the trees have grown since I last took in the view. That's why the closest branches appear to be reaching for my attention until I back away and slam the window.

It's time to leave. I've seen all there is to see, which is virtually nothing. Every item of furniture has gone, even the lampshades and carpets. They were so faded they wouldn't have helped sell the house, but the stark rooms under the naked dusty bulbs feel stripped of all their memories. I switch off the lights on the upper floor and hurry past the rattling echoes of my footsteps in the darkened rooms as empty as my skull. Only the hall light remains to be extinguished, and I open the front door first so as not to feel trapped in the damp stale gloom. I jab the switch and am heading down the passage that has yielded its drab colours to the moonlight when I'm reminded of trying to escape before our mother could issue her instructions. "Watch out for Tim," she would tell me. "Don't let him get in any trouble, Philip."

At first I was proud to be trusted to take care of my younger brother—and I'm overwhelmed by such a flood of memories that I have to grip the scaly doorframe for support. I remember wheeling him in his pram through the woods, which our mother believed was safer than pushing him through the streets—old houses on our side of the railway, a cheap new estate beyond—that enclosed the reserve. I wasn't meant to take him in the tunnel that led the footpath and the stream underneath the railway, but of course I did, talking to him in a voice overgrown with a giant one that amused him. Once he graduated to a buggy I made him promise not to tell our mother if he ever wanted to go through the tunnel again, and now I realise I was teaching him to be surreptitious with me as well. I'm even more responsible for events I don't want to remember.

The worst of it is that we didn't need to deceive her. She walked me to school over one or the other bridge across the railway, but once I started taking Tim she encouraged us to use the tunnel; it would keep us clear of the children from the estate, at least until we reached the only local school. Relying on me let her work longer at the hospital, and soon she could afford to buy me a bicycle. In two years this passed to Tim, which seemed fair to me; it and its upsized replacement had been second-hand when I was given them for Christmas. But he didn't take long to see that it gave him the chance not to do as I told him.

Wasn't our mother to blame? People weren't supposed to cycle in the woods, but she thought the route was safer for us than the roads or even the pavements. "Just be careful of the old folk," was her only warning. Tim was too intent on leaving me behind to bother about them or anyone else on the footpath. I gave up shouting "Wait for me on the other side," because it simply provoked him to race faster through the tunnel and out of sight, leaving behind a mocking laugh that seemed to scuttle all over the glistening bricks in the dimness. If the stream was low he might cycle along it, storing up ripples that sounded as though a dweller in the mud was sniggering.

Was the water already tainted by then? Tim was about that age when he began to call the place Skeleton Woods. That needn't mean anything, but I'm so enraged by the rest of my memories that I slam the door behind me and tramp out of the wild garden. I want to see how the woods have grown.

The entrance is directly across the road. Four-year-old Tim used to call them our garden. Whenever he said anything that delighted her, such as that, our mother would clap her hands and sigh. The memory slips away, because I can't see the letter that was added to the name carved on the arch. It must have been the shadow of a twig. "Skelton Woods," I repeat as I stare at the thin arch until it appears to be exuding moonlit clouds. I shake my head to dislodge the impression and step onto the path beneath the arch.

Trees close over the path as it slopes down to the stream. It's ribbed with steps and imprinted with shadows like traces of roots about to break through the earth. Where it levels out, the shadows merge into a mass of blackness, solid except for the glimmer of fallen leaves. As I pad down the steps, something clatters fast between the trees across the stream. Since nobody could be so thin, I imagine it was a squirrel. I try to drive off any other lurkers by adding weight to my tread as I reach the foot of the slope.

It isn't as dark as it looked from above. Leaves colourless as scraps of paper glow among the shadows on the path and hide a secret pattern in the dimness. The November trees have fastened their claws in the sky, so that I could fancy they're bringing the luminous clouds to a standstill. Apart from the whisper of the milky stream, the woods seem as fixed as a memory. I stride along the path, through the tangles of shadows. Perhaps I'll find Tim's and my den. I found it one Saturday while I was cycling by myself. He was watching television programmes for children younger than he was. If I'd changed the channel his screams would have given our mother one of her headaches. Besides, she'd said "Let him have his favourite, Philip. You used to like that show." I didn't want to be reminded, and tried to be an explorer several times my age as I cycled onto one of the side paths that led deeper into the woods. A cluster of bushes at the intersection put me in mind of a jungle hut. There was just one way in, so low I had to crawl, but the interior could have accommodated at least a dozen tribesmen, while the green ceiling was high enough for someone taller than me to stand up. As a man walking beside the stream wondered why his dog was straining to reach the bushes, I realised I could watch and not be detected. Even better, the entrance to my hideout wasn't visible from either path.

I thought of hiding there from Tim, and then I realised I could make him do my bidding. I told him I had a secret that he would never learn unless he promised not to leave me behind again. I had to threaten to tell our mother that he'd been disobeying before he would promise. He knew she would accuse him of resembling our father or, worse still, the woman he'd gone off somewhere with that we mustn't name. Even so, he had to be coaxed to walk. I didn't want our bicycles to betray our presence.

As soon as he saw a woman on the path by the stream he began to call "You can't see us. We're here." How wise of me was it to persuade him just to make noises at people instead? Once he discovered that if he dragged a stick across the slender trunks of the bushes nobody could identify the bony rattling, he would play for hours. Now I wonder when he decided that it sounded like a skeleton.

He was already calling the dell Skeleton Woods. Our mother applauded and told him to carry on being himself. When he did in the schoolyard I saw his classmates laughing at him. "He thinks they're called Skeleton Woods."

"They are," Tim protested, clenching his fists and his small thin face smaller. "There are skeletons in them."

"There's never," one girl scoffed.

"Go when it's dark and you'll see."

"What'll we see? You making a face like that? Doesn't scare us."

"They live in the trees and they'll jump on you. When you hear the clicky noise that's them laughing, it's their teeth. And you'll see their shadows and think they're just bits of trees till they grab you and make you into bones like them. That's how it works, there was only one at first and it caught people and made them stay down there with it."

I couldn't judge whether his audience was impressed by all this or by how his eyes had glazed as if he was gazing inwards at the scenes he was describing. I was simply glad our mother wasn't there to deliver his biggest round of applause. Did he mean to frighten his classmates out of the woods? He had the opposite effect. Before long we heard children in the woods at night, giggling and whispering, sometimes crying out and running away. Perhaps they were fleeing the screams, not knowing they were Tim's response to not being allowed to go out after dark. "You're all I've got," our mother said, presumably including me.

He managed to content himself with daylight once he found it offered victims. I remember how his features widened with delight when he saw from our hideout two of his classmates who were venturing along the path, not nervously enough for him. He rattled the bushes and watched the girls shriek and stare about and dash away, and then he dodged out of hiding and ran after them, shouting "The skeletons want you. They'll be waiting for you."

A man out walking from the old people's home that overlooked the woods pointed his stick at him. "Don't stir things up, son. You don't know what you're doing."

Tim stared at him as the girls were surrounded by their own cries in the tunnel. "You'll be one soon," he said and ran off, leaving the old man to lean on his shaky stick.

I can't locate the den. I've forgotten which side path it was closest to, and all the clumps of bushes by the main one are the wrong shape, just crouching huddles full of gaps. I mightn't be able to recognise how it's grown, if it has even survived. I lower myself onto a bench that's too damp for me to rest my hands on and fumble a bottle of water out of my quilted coat. As I drain the bottle the pale rushes bordering the path finger the dim air with their fattened tips, though I can't hear the ripples that must be stirring the fleshless stalks. I could almost imagine that the stream is keeping some activity to itself.

How much was the water to blame? Hardly anyone seemed to give it a thought except Tim. Of course we may have been the only ones who saw the dog. There was gossip about a leak from a medical factory, but that was beyond the horizon, past an underground section of the stream. By then I was too worried about Tim to take much notice of the rumour. He was thirteen and using drugs.

At first I hoped that someone else had started hiding in our den. More than once I'd found the stubs of scrawny cigarettes under the bushes, on the carpet of fallen leaves that lent the interior a special secret glow. When I asked Tim about them he stared at me. Silence was his new response to much that he was asked, either to do or to answer. Our mother had been unable to keep him in at night for at least a year, and was reduced to sending me after him while she tried to relax with a bottle of wine. "Don't let anything happen to him," she would plead. "He's still your little brother."

He didn't seem like it to me. I thought he was determined to act older than I was, to do things I wouldn't dare. I knew it the night I trailed him to the den and saw greyness drifting out of the bushes. I tried to believe it was mist until I smelled it, which made my head swim. I dodged around the bushes and crawled underneath, bruising my elbows as twigs scraped my back. I lurched upright to see Tim suck most of the last inch of a thin cigarette to ash, then lick the remains and his fingers before dropping the blackened scrap. "What do you think you're doing?" I gasped.

When this was met with a wordless stare I stood up as straight as the branches overhead would allow and leaned over Tim, who was squatting cross-legged. "Where did you get that?" I tried demanding.

"Want some?"

"I don't, and you certainly shouldn't. Don't ever do it again."

This time his silence didn't hold. "You're not my dad. I'll do what 1 like."

"Suppose I tell mother? What'll you do then?"

He glared at me so fiercely that even in the dimness I could see his eyes were red. "Go on, tell her. Like I care."

We both knew I wouldn't, and I wished I hadn't threatened to. "Why are you doing it at all? Don't you know what it can do to you?

"Helps me is what." Before I was goaded to ask the obvious question, he answered it. "See things."

I attempted to laugh, though it made me feel like one of the scoffers in the schoolyard years earlier. "What things?"

"Like him."

Tim stared at the leafy canopy above me, which gave a loud creak. The next moment something clawed so viciously at my scalp it might have been eager to reach my brain. I ducked but managed not to cry out as I glimpsed a thin shape crouching on top of the branches. In an instant I couldn't distinguish it. I must have mistaken part of the tree above the bushes for a figure after I'd stood up too far and scratched myself on a twig. Its raggedly perforated head could only be a bird's nest. "There's nothing. You're just making yourself see things," I said.

His mouth twisted smaller as if locking up a secret, but then he spoke. "That's all you know. It makes them come."

"No, it made me," I said, feeling clever. I felt less so once I followed him out of the den and was unable to locate the nest I'd thought was a head or even the branches I'd taken for limbs. Apparently the incident satisfied him in some way, because he headed home, which meant I had to worry that our mother would notice his condition. I was relieved when he made for his room without speaking and shut himself in with his headphones. I was even able to convince our mother that he had only been out for a walk.

After that I had to chase him most nights, always in the woods. He found it easier than ever to outdistance me on the latest of my old bicycles while I cycled warily along the twisted flickering paths. Sometimes he would linger in the tunnel to leave pungent smoke waiting for me in the dark. I never overtook him before he finished what he'd brought, until the night I almost collided with him as I put on speed out of the tunnel. He was so immobile that I grew even more afraid for him. "What's wrong?" I cried.

"Shut up. I'm looking."

When I peered past him I was reassured to see there was something to look at: a more or less Alsatian dog that was drinking from the edge of the stream. At first I thought Tim was fascinated by the way the glimmering ripples crowded back across the water to splash the dog's muzzle as though impatient to be swallowed. Then the animal raised its head and turned it slowly to survey the woods in an entirely uncanine fashion. I found I couldn't breathe until it finished and plunged its entire face into the stream for another drink. I wanted to intervene somehow, but I hadn't moved when the dog backed away and trotted along the path, swinging its head from side to side with great deliberation. "It's the water," Tim whispered.

"Well, don't you try," I said more loudly, feeling too much like our mother.

"Who's going to stop me?"

"It's poisoned, don't you realise? Do you want to kill yourself?"

"Maybe."

Though I didn't believe him, his saying it dismayed me. I was wondering if I would have to fight him to keep him from drinking the water, and how I would explain any injuries to our mother, when he cycled off at speed. I almost screamed at him to wait until I realised from the way he was peering about that he wanted to observe the dog's behaviour. I would have helped him find it if it kept him clear of the stream. I cycled after him as fast as I dared, but there was no sign of the animal, either on the main route or on the paths that wound under the trees, not to mention those that crossed the stream. Eventually Tim scowled at me as if I'd chased the dog away, and then he sped home.

Neither of us had anything to tell our mother. I hid from her questions in my room and gazed from my window at the furtive obscure movements of the woods. What was ranging about under the trees as if searching for prey? Was it the dog? If I captured it I could take it to someone for examination, and then they would warn everyone about the water. I could save Tim.

The next day was Saturday. While our mother took him shopping for new shoes to replace a pair he'd trodden holes in, I found a length of old clothesline in the back yard and hurried down to the woods. I walked every path, some of them more than once at least, but couldn't see or hear the dog. I was trudging back to the tunnel when I heard something less than footsteps descending a side path towards me. Once I saw that the cause of the thin relentless sound was the stick an old man was clutching, I had to cover a nervous laugh.

He grabbed the back of a bench overgrown with initials so as to poke his stick at me. "You'll never catch them with a rope." Politeness required me to ask "What?"

He hobbled around the bench, pivoting on his gnarled fist, and lowered himself to sit. "Dray's the name. Yours?" I felt as if I was being set a test. "Philip."

As he lifted his long face his neck stretched so thin that it looked barely capable of supporting his pale puffy head. "Weren't you the lad that was going on about skeletons?"

"That was my brother." In defence of Tim I added "He was just making up stories."

"You don't make things like that up."

I couldn't tell if this was a statement or a warning. "Why not?"

"They're underneath everything. They're under us now. Don't they teach you anything at school any more?"

I managed not to resent this, because I thought I could impress him. "You mean fossils and all that? I know about those."

"Well, give him a trophy. I'll bet you don't know nothing wants to be dead. It wants to be more alive, just in another way. Some things get together and help each other to be. And telling stories like that does."

By now I was lost. I wasn't even sure if he meant Tim's stories or this one. As I tried to make out what his face would have looked like with less of a profusion of flesh he said "So what were you chasing after?"

"Have you seen a dog? I think it's drugged."

"Good God, things just keep getting worse. Who did it? You or your brother?"

"We wouldn't ever," I protested loud enough to send some eavesdropper and its lanky shadow scuttling away behind the bushes. "It's the stream. Some kind of drug has got into it."

Did I imagine that I could call on him to deal with this because he was an adult? I didn't want to trouble my mother. His response wasn't encouraging, however. "That's all it needs."

I was too nervous for politeness now. "What are you talking about?"

"If it's like that on the surface it'll reach down. There are things that haven't even been alive yet. It'll dredge up worse."

I was more than sorry to have asked. I would have retreated except for the need to learn "So did you see the dog?"

"I didn't, son. I've seen nothing you'd like to see." I was afraid he might expand on this until he said "I used to live round here, you know. It's all changed. I can't even find my home."

"You still live here, honestly. Keep looking and you'll find it." I couldn't take him—I was already responsible for Tim. I hurried away, and when I returned through the tunnel Mr Dray had gone. I never found the dog either, just as I haven't found the den, and now I wonder if that's on the far side of the tunnel.

I mustn't be nervous of going through. There never was a reason. I push myself up off the bench and do my best to stride along the path, which has begun to resemble a trail of mist. Has it always followed the course of the stream so closely? Except for the substance I could imagine they're identical. The water glows as whitely as the sky that trickles between the entangled branches, so that I feel in danger of forgetting which is reflecting which. I'm almost glad when the darkness grows more solid between the trees ahead.

It's the railway embankment. For a few yards I can distinguish the glistening outlines of bricks arched over the stream and the path, and then there appears to be blackness for hundreds of feet, leading to the huddle of tree-trunks framed by the end of the tunnel. I don't need to see in order to walk through, even if the path is slippery with mud. The trouble is rather that as I pick my way I'm more able to discern it than I ought to be. It's as though the stream is carrying the moonlight through the tunnel, but if the water's luminous that might be worse. Can I really see ripples settling into stillness beside me in the middle of the tunnel before they come back to life some yards further on? How can any of this be possible? I'm halted by the notion that something is about to rear up out of the stagnant stretch of water, unless the water itself is preparing to leap at me. That's the kind of thing Tim would have imagined, and perhaps Mr Dray as well. The thought releases me, and I flounder and skid to the end of the tunnel.

The bare trees open out to the sky above the stream. Between the branches that overtop the banks of the valley, a very few windows are lit. I can tell by their smallness that they belong to the new houses, and now I remember another time I did. It was the night I found Tim with a girl in our den.

He'd stopped smoking, as far as I could establish, which only aggravated my unease. What might he be doing to himself now? He often didn't speak for hours, and avoided me whenever he could. Although I disliked resenting how his state didn't affect his school-work, mine was suffering from my anxiety for him. Perhaps our mother was aware of some of this, because eventually she asked "Is everything all right between you two?"

We were sitting in the kitchen with the fluorescent tube glaring down at the remains of that night's burgers from the Turkish fish and chip shop. Tim barely even shrugged, but I thought the twitch of his shoulders looked nervous. The best I could manage and try to believe in was "We're still us."

"I hope so." She let her gaze trail over me and then Tim as she drained another glass of wine from the box. "I see enough bad things at work. I don't want to come home to them."

When Tim sat up out of his crouch I was afraid his interest had been caught too well. Was he thinking there were better things to see and how to do so? Suppose he hinted or more than implied as much? My head was throbbing with the search for some remark that would forestall his when he shoved his chair backwards. "I'm going out," he muttered.

"Oh, where are you going now? What did I say?"

All at once I'd had enough—too much to be careful any longer. "That's right, Tim, where are you going? Why don't you say for once?

He didn't bother looking at either of us. "I told you, out," he said and almost immediately was.

As the front door slammed I dashed into the front room, nearly tripping over his computer magazines strewn beside an armchair, and saw him making for the woods. Once his head dropped below the brink of the path I picked up a wineglass from the couch in front of the television and carried it to the kitchen. Perhaps I hoped the gesture would satisfy my mother in some way, but she was waiting with a question. "Do you think it's a girl?"

"I don't know," I said and tried to concentrate on clearing the table. I dealt with the washing-up as swiftly as I could, striving not to let her glimpse my concern for Tim. At least he wasn't cycling, and so I hoped he hadn't gone too far for me to find him. "I'll go out for a bit," I said.

"A bit of what, Philip?" Her smile couldn't keep up its slyness or even its shape. "Why don't you find yourself a girl too? I wouldn't mind."

I hurried out as much to escape her insistence as to discover the reason for Tim's eagerness. I'd followed the path beside the stream so frequently that by now it felt like a connection in my brain. I tried just to walk and ignore the surroundings. I tiptoed through the tunnel, and as I left the scrabbling of echoes behind I saw lit windows above the trees. They let me feel less apprehensive until I heard Tim's voice.

I don't know how far I'd walked—perhaps farther from the tunnel than I have now. I sit on a bench anyway and close my eyes so as not to watch the stream groping at the darkness with its reeds, because it feels as though they're reaching to snag my mind. At first it seemed that the bony tangles of branches were muttering. "I made them up," Tim was saying. "Skeletons are for kids."

I'd begun to wonder if he was talking to himself when a voice so high it reminded me of how mine still leapt an octave said "So why do you still call them Skeleton Woods?"

"That's what they are. The skeletons are everything that's here. Ordinary people just see them. When you know that's all they are you can start to see the rest. You're not just a skeleton, are you? Neither is this place."

I hoped the silence denoted boredom, but then the girl spoke. I heard admiration and apprehensive eagerness. "What do you see?"

I couldn't stand any more. I shouted into the bushes "Never mind what. Why are you seeing things, Tim? What have you been doing to yourself now?"

I thought I'd shocked him into some kind of awareness until they both laughed. "Is that him?" the girl said.

"That's him all right. Big fat Phil. Phil the mummy's boy. Doesn't dare do anything she wouldn't like him to, or maybe that's what he wants her to think. Wonder what he does to himself when he's in his room with nobody to see."

"Nothing," I shouted and tried to part the branches, but they were as immovable as ribs, between which the darkness allowed me no view. "I can see you," I lied. "Stop that now."

I heard a kiss that suggested the darkness had developed soft wet flesh. Once his mouth was free Tim said "He's mad because he thinks this is his place."

"I found it," I declared and dealt the roots a kick that shook the bushes, rattling twig after twig.

"It was here first. You didn't make it anything."

"I thought I made it ours."

"Well, it isn't any more," Tim said and scrambled out so fast I thought he was going to attack my ankles like a dog. "So piss off and play somewhere else."

"I'm not playing, you are." Perhaps that was his worst betrayal, to dismiss my concern like that. "He's always made things up," I called into the bushes. "They're just like the stories he used to tell when he started school. He likes people thinking he's got more imagination than them, that's all. It's rubbish, everything he told you. There were never skeletons here and there aren't now."

By now Tim was on his feet. He brought his face so close to mine I saw his eyes glitter like coal. "You'll see," he said.

"Keep people like that out of there in future."

When I heard his companion crawling towards us I retreated alongside the stream; I didn't want a confrontation with anyone else. I lingered at a bend in the path long enough to watch the two of them vanish into the dark towards the new houses. I considered following them to learn what else they did, but I felt I'd done enough for one night. I was in bed before I wondered what exactly Tim had meant by "You'll see."

Did he plan to make me if I wasn't careful? I didn't want to think so. Perhaps he was trying to work on my nerves by passing me drinks at dinner —glasses of water from the tap. At first I told him I could fetch them myself, and then not to bother, and eventually just not to. Once I knocked over a glass he'd insisted on filling, and our mother burst into tears. He took that as an excuse to leave, and by the time I'd calmed her down and assured her that nothing was really wrong I couldn't find him when I went out to check on him.

We were at a new school now. Tim had taken to its size at once, and soon to the ways the girls were also bigger. At least it didn't involve passing through the woods. Instead I tailed him along the edge of the new estate. Sometimes he lost me, but after the night I caught him with the girl in the den I succeeded in observing him several times with one, presumably the same girl. In the schoolyard he had to share her with her giggling friends, but I saw them walk to school together more than once. The last time I overtook them and was able to watch them arguing. When they noticed me the disagreement grew fiercer, and they hurried off before I could hear what they were saying. It must have come to an unpleasant end, because when I asked Tim that night why he was walking home alone he gave me a look bordering on hatred. "Because I am," he said.

I wasn't sure this meant he'd finished with the girl. Whenever he went out at night I couldn't find him, even if I was cycling while he was on foot. Eventually I couldn't stand it, and waited for him outside the front door after dinner. "What are you up to now?" I murmured.

"Only one way to find out. Still want to see?"

"You aren't frightening me, Tim. There's nothing to be frightened of."

"Come on then, if you can keep up," he said so fiercely I felt his words condense like mist on my face.

When he dodged I thought he meant to run into the woods. Instead he hurried around the side of the house, and I was afraid he'd brought something too close to home. He was only collecting his bicycle. As I sprinted across the yard to mine our mother cried from somewhere inside the house "Can't you stay in with me for once?"

Tim glared at me as if I was to blame, and then he cycled fast around the building. I was about to follow when I realised that in the confusion, if indeed he was confused, he'd taken my latest bicycle and left its predecessor. For years that one had been too small for me, but I mustn't let him elude me. I squatted on it as best I could and wobbled alongside the house towards the woods.

I nearly lost my balance as the front wheel jerked downwards beneath the arch, Descending the steps felt like cycling over a giant's ribcage almost buried in the earth. Even when I reached the level path I couldn't help veering back and forth on it. Twigs clawed at my splayed knees while tree-trunks lurched at me as if they were bent on clubbing my skull. I might have abandoned the chase if I hadn't been able to hear Tim.

I heard my bicycle rattling along the path before it set up echoes in the tunnel. I could have imagined they'd barely ceased when I arrived at the downturned mouth. As soon as I rode in, the clacking of my pedals was multiplied by chattering in the blackness. No wonder I was so distracted that halfway through I strayed off the slippery path into the shallow water. I almost sprawled headlong on the path as I dragged the bicycle free of the stream. "Tim," I yelled furiously, but the only response was my own voice.

I righted the bicycle and pedalled awkwardly out of the tunnel. Even once I emerged from beneath the twitching of faint ripples on the bricks, I felt as though the stream was clinging to my feet and ankles. I did my best to shake off the chill as it seeped up through me while I tried to speed along the path. Then my flailing legs snatched both feet off the pedals, and as I struggled to regain control the machine toppled over.

At least I didn't fall on the hard path or in the water. I ended up with one leg under the bicycle on the damp grassy bank of the stream. As the clicking of the rear wheel wound down I saw that I was opposite the den. I was almost certain that I'd heard another noise—a stealthy creak among the bushes. I opened my mouth to shout at Tim, but instead I lifted the bicycle and used it to lever myself to my feet before laying it down again. I could be as sly as Tim if I had to be. I tiptoed swiftly onto the side path and dropped to all fours on the grass. Crawling into the den, I felt as if I'd won a game of hide and seek. "Tim," I said triumphantly, and looked up.

I couldn't see much, either despite or because of the pallor of the fallen leaves, but I knew at once that the figure craning down towards me wasn't Tim. For an instant I thought it was Mr Dray— thought I heard the scraping of his stick over the scattered twigs. His condition must have worsened, since he had more than one stick now; indeed, he sounded built out of them. He creaked and rattled closer, so that I glimpsed dimness through more than one gap in the looming mass of his head, and I scrabbled backwards out of the den.

I was floundering to my feet when I heard a commotion among the bushes. Whatever was in there sounded impatient to claw its way out, unless the figure Tim had cobbled together from bits of the woods in an attempt to impress me had collapsed against the branches. By the time I managed to conclude the latter, I'd staggered away from the den. "It didn't work," I called, and then I saw his bicycle lying beside the stream—my bicycle, that was.

Where was the one I'd ridden? How far had I blundered before I could stop? All that seemed to matter was that Tim had to be nearby. I sensed that I was being watched. "Tim," I called and heard a surreptitious movement somewhere close. It wasn't among the huddles of bushes or in the gloomy labyrinth of trees; it was just the whisper of ripples around two small whitish rocks in the middle of the stream. In the moonlight they looked more than weathered. They looked—I searched for the word and grew dizzy with alarm as it came to me—scuffed. They were the toes of a pair of trainers, which led my gaze to the faint shape of a body in the stream.

"Tim," I cried and ran to the edge. The water was coated with moonlight, which virtually blotted out the figure lying on its back. I threw myself flat on the soaked grass and reached for its hands, but I couldn't find them in the unexpected depths. I was confused by an impression that the face was somehow wrong, though I couldn't distinguish its features, until I realised it must be upside down. I rolled up my sleeves and plunged my hands deeper but still found nothing to grasp. In desperation I lurched forward on the bank to immerse my arms all the way to the shoulders, and my head sank underwater.

A face rose to meet mine, but it wasn't Tim's face. It was too large, and luminous with moonlight or of itself. Its eroded piebald features reminded me of the moon too, except that they were blurred by an excess of flesh. I had a sudden suffocating notion that the figure I'd glimpsed in the den had swum or drifted to find me while putting on flesh. A drowned voice seemed to fill my ears. "Now you'll see," I thought it said. I was terrified that whatever the shape had for hands were about to seize mine and drag me into the impossible depths. I snatched my arms clear of the water and dug my fingers into the earth to haul myself away from the stream.

As I staggered to my feet and stumbled backwards onto the path I noticed that the objects poking up from the stream were only rocks whitened by lichen, and that's all I want to remember just now. Why did I come down here? I grip the bench, which feels spongy as a fungus, and stand up. When I hauled my face out of the water my surroundings appeared to have grown brighter—as bright as they've become. That's because my vision is feasting on the moonlight, and wasn't it then? All that matters is that there was nothing under the water or anywhere else, then or now. I simply want to leave because I've no reason to be here. I'm beginning to find the place oppressive, even the scent that looms out of the shadows. I plant one hand over my mouth and nose as I tramp along the twisting path.

The scent seeps between my fingers. It puts me in mind of an old woman's perfume in which she has doused her entire body to disguise the smell of burgeoning flesh. It's threatening to make me dizzy, which is why I'm confused by a movement in or on the stream. Either the insect was skimming the surface before I was aware of it or it has emerged from the water. It must be a kind of dragonfly, even if it's white as ice, with wings like traceries of crystal. It glides in my direction, and I lean towards it. So does a growth at the edge of the stream, a flower like puckered white lips on a stick. The plump wrinkled lips gape wide and close around the fly, and I seem to hear the faint fragile crunch of its wings as the swollen stem works throatily Then I dash away along the path for fear of hearing the lips speak.

The scent keeps up with me. Perhaps it belongs to the flowers that pout at me alongside the stream, or perhaps the spiders in their cut-glass webs that span the bushes are exuding it. As I try not to watch, the spiders blossom, their luminous white bodies efflorescing with filaments and scaly petals while every leg twitches its web in such unison it might be a message. A chalky bird flaps out of a tree, and I hope I may be able to look at it instead, until I realise that although it's flying away above the stream, it's growing no smaller in my eyes, which has to mean that it's expanding with each beat of its wings. The trees are flexing their branches, drawing white flesh down from the bloated sky, slipping it on like fat gloves. I try to ignore the sight of the glowing tree-trunks as they writhe and gesture me towards them. I have to run in that direction, but only to pass them. I'll be safe as long as I stay on the path. Surely I'm not really feeling it stir like a cocoon about to crack open. At least nothing to either side of it can reach me if I keep to the middle—and then I hear something that can. There are footsteps ahead, around a bend in the path.

They're heavy and deliberate. They're coming for me. I know that before a voice calls my name. I stare about wildly, but there's nowhere to hide; even the shade under the trees is as bright as the clouds. Besides, I don't think I could bear treading on the restless white pelt that was the grass, never mind approaching the bushes that crouch forward to peer at me from beneath their pallid swollen convoluted fleshy scalps. I spin around again and almost fall against a tree, which is still trying to lure me with sinuous movements, although I can see it's old and cracked and scabby. Then the voice calls out again, too close. "Philip. Philip Dray," it insists, and the speaker strides into view.

For as long as he stands gazing at me I'm sure he's a total stranger. When he takes another step I realise that, despite the uniform, he's Tim. The recognition seems to bare everything at me—the litter caught in the broken trees, the avalanches of household rubbish on the slopes below the new estate, the objects like long whitish flattened glistening fingers under the bushes, a rusty bicycle in the stream. Perhaps the clump of splintered bushes beside us is the den, its branches charred, the ground beneath it glittering with syringes and glass. Is all this the skeleton? If that's the case, I don't want to know about it; I'd even rather listen to Tim. "Come on, old fellow," he says. "Let's get you home."

I'm not about to tell him I've forgotten where it is. I wait for him to take my arm and lead me along the path. I need some distraction from everything I won't look at, and so I say "How's mother?"

He doesn't answer until we're past the bend and I see the steps up to the road. "It all got too much for her, Phil," he says and seems to wonder if he should say any more. "She's gone. It was a long time ago.

I don't think his gaze is accusing me. It looks more like suppressed pity, but I don't want either. As he ushers me far enough to see his police car at the top of the steps I retort "You were the one who took drugs, you know. I don't care how you've changed."

He turns his eyes away from me. I don't know what they're withholding, and I'd rather not. I focus my attention on the path, and then I grin to myself so fiercely I can feel it hiding from him under my face. I'm looking at our shadows, and I see what he can't have noticed. At last I understand the real name of the place. He's holding me by the gap between the bones of my arm.

2006

Passing Through Peacehaven

"Lord, it's so long since I wrote Passing Through Peacehaven—2006—that I don't recall much about its genesis. It was certainly suggested by overhearing announcements at a railway station, the kind of everyday occurrence that I may have taken for granted for most of my life until it suddenly turns around in my mind to display an unexpected side. Ideas are everywhere!"—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 23

Written in: 2006
First published in Portents, February 2011

"Wait," Marsden shouted as he floundered off his seat. His vision was so overcast with sleep that it was little better than opaque, but so far as he could see through the carriages the entire train was deserted. "Terminate" was the only word he retained from the announcement that had wakened him. He blundered to the nearest door and leaned on the window to slide it further open while he groped beyond it for the handle. The door swung wide so readily that he almost sprawled on the platform. In staggering dangerously backwards to compensate he slammed the door, which seemed to be the driver's cue. The train was heading into the night before Marsden realised he had never seen the station in his life.

"Wait," he cried, but it was mostly a cough as the smell of some October fire caught in his throat. His eyes felt blackened by smoke and stung when he blinked, so that he could barely see where he was going as he lurched after the train. He succeeded in clearing his vision just in time to glimpse distance or a bend in the track extinguish the last light of the train like an ember. He panted coughing to a halt and stared red-eyed around him.

Two signs named the station Peacehaven. The grudging glow of half a dozen lamps that put him in mind of streetlights in an old photograph illuminated stretches of both platforms but seemed shy of the interior of the enclosed bridge that led across the pair of tracks. A brick wall twice his height extended into the dark beyond the ends of the platform he was on.

The exit from the station was on the far side of the tracks, through a passage where he could just distinguish a pay phone in the gloom. Above the wall of that platform, and at some distance, towered an object that he wasted seconds in identifying as a factory chimney. He should be looking for the times of any trains to Manchester, but the timetable among the vintage posters alongside the platform was blackened by more than the dark. As he squinted at it, someone spoke behind him.

It was the voice that had wakened him. Apart from an apology for a delay, the message was a blur. "I can't hear much at the best of times," Marsden grumbled. At least the station hadn't closed for the night, and a timetable on the other platform was beside a lamp. He made for the bridge and climbed the wooden stairs to the elevated corridor, where narrow grimy windows above head height and criss-crossed by wire mesh admitted virtually no illumination. He needn't shuffle through the dark; his mobile phone could light the way. He reached in his overcoat pocket, and dug deeper to find extra emptiness.

Marjorie wouldn't have approved of the words that escaped his lips. He wasn't fond of them himself, especially when he heard them from children in the street. He and Marjorie would have done their best to keep their grandchildren innocent of such language and of a good deal else that was in vogue, but they would need to have had a son or daughter first. He ran out of curses as he trudged back across the bridge, which felt narrowed by darkness piled against the walls. The platform was utterly bare. Did he remember hearing or perhaps only feeling the faintest thump as he'd left his seat? There was no doubt that he'd left the mobile on the train.

He was repeating himself when he wondered if he could be heard. His outburst helped the passage to muffle the announcer's unctuous voice, which apparently had information about a signal failure. Marsden wasn't going to feel like one. He marched out of darkness into dimness, which lightened somewhat as he reached the platform.

Had vandals tried to set fire to the timetable? A blackened corner was peeling away from the bricks. Marsden pushed his watch higher on his wizened wrist until the strap took hold. Theoretically the last train—for Bury and Oldham and Manchester—was due in less than twenty minutes. "What's the hold-up again? Say it clearly this time," Marsden invited not quite at the top of his voice. When there was no response he made for the phone on the wall.

Was it opposite some kind of memorial? No, the plaque was a ticket window boarded up behind cracked glass. Surely the gap beneath the window couldn't be occupied by a cobweb, since the place was staffed. He stood with his back to the exit from the station and fumbled coins into the slot beside the receiver before groping for the dial that he could barely see in the glimmer from the platform.

"Ray and Marjorie Marsden must be engaged elsewhere. Please don't let us wonder who you were or when you tried to contact us or where we can return the compliment..." His answering message had amused them when he recorded it—at least, Marjorie had made the face that meant she appreciated his wit—but now it left him feeling more alone than he liked. "Are you there?" he asked the tape. "You'll have gone up, will you? You'll have gone up, of course. Just to let you know I'm stranded by an unexpected change of trains. If you play me back don't worry, I'll be home as soon as practicable. Oh, and the specialist couldn't find anything wrong. I know, you'll say it shows I can hear when I want to. Not true, and shall I tell you why? I'd give a lot to hear you at this very moment. Never mind. I will soon."

Even saying so much in so many words earned him no response, and yet he didn't feel unheard. His audience could be the station announcer, who was presumably beyond one of the doors that faced each other across the corridor, although neither betrayed the faintest trace of light. "I nearly didn't say I love you," he added in a murmur that sounded trapped inside his skull. "Mind you, you'll know that, won't you? If you don't after all these years you never will. I suppose that had better be it for now as long as you're fast asleep."

He still felt overheard. Once he'd hung up he yielded to a ridiculous urge to poke his head out of the corridor. The platforms were deserted, and the tracks led to unrelieved darkness. He might as well learn where he'd ended up while there was no sign of a train. "Just stepping outside," he informed anyone who should know.

The corridor didn't seem long enough to contain so much blackness. He only just managed to refrain from rubbing his eyes as he emerged onto an unpromising road. The front of the station gave it no light, but the pavements on either side of the cracked weedy tarmac were visibly uneven. Beyond high railings across the road the grounds of the factory bristled with tall grass, which appeared to shift, although he couldn't feel a wind. Here and there a flagstone showed pale through the vegetation. A sign beside the open gates had to do with motors or motor components, and Marsden was considering a closer look to pass the time when the announcer spoke again. "Going to attract effect" might have been part of the proclamation, and all that Marsden was able to catch.

Some delay must be owing to a track defect, of course. Much of the voice had ended up as echoes beyond the railings or simply dissipated in the night, but he also blamed its tone for confusing him. It had grown so oily that it sounded more like a parody of a priest than any kind of railway official. Marsden tramped into the passage and knocked on the door beside the ticket window. "Will you repeat that, please?"

If this sounded like an invitation to an argument, it wasn't taken up. He found the doorknob, which felt flaky with age, but the door refused to budge. He rubbed his finger and thumb together as he crossed to the other door, which tottered open at his knock, revealing only a storeroom. It was scattered with brushes and mops, or rather their remains, just distinguishable in the meagre light through a window so nearly opaque that on the platform he'd mistaken it for an empty poster frame. Vandals must have been in the room; the dimness smelled as ashen as it looked, while the tangles of sticks that would once have been handles seemed blackened by more than the dark. That was all he managed to discern before the voice spoke to him.

Was the fellow too close to the microphone? If he was trying to be clearer, it achieved the opposite. Of course nobody was next to alive; a train was the next to arrive. "Speak clearly, not up," Marsden shouted as he slammed the door and hurried to the bridge, where he did his best to maintain his pace by keeping to the middle of the passage. If an object or objects were being dragged somewhere behind him, he wanted to see what was happening. He clumped breathlessly down the stairs and limped onto the platform. How could he have thought the windows were poster frames? There was one on either side of the exit, and although both rooms were unlit, a figure was peering through the window of the office.

Or was it a shadow? It was thin and black enough. There was no light inside the room to cast it, and yet it must be a shadow, since it had nothing for a face. Marsden was still trying to identify its source when he noticed that the door he'd slammed was wide open. It had felt unsteady on its hinges, and at least he had an explanation for the dragging sound he'd heard. He set about laughing at his own unease, and then the laugh snagged in his throat like another cough. The silhouette was no longer pressed against the window.

Had it left traces of its shape on the discoloured glass? As he paced back and forth, trying either to confirm or shake off the impression, he felt like an animal trapped in a cage and watched by spectators. He'd met with no success by the time the voice that might belong to the owner of the shadow had more to say. "Where's the party?" Marsden was provoked to mutter. "What's departing?" he demanded several times as loud. "It's supposed to arrive first," he pointed out, glaring along the tracks at the unrelieved night. The few words he'd managed to recognise or at least to guess had sounded oilier than ever, close to a joke. Why couldn't the fellow simply come and tell him what to expect? Was he amusing himself by spying on the solitary passenger? "Yes, you've got a customer," Marsden declared. "He's the chap who has to stand out here in the cold because you can't be bothered to provide a waiting-room."

The complaint left him more aware of the storeroom, so that he could have imagined he was being observed from there too. He would much rather fancy his return home to the bed that he hoped Marjorie was keeping warm for him. As he hugged himself to fend off the late October chill he wasn't too far from experiencing how her arms would feel when she turned in her sleep to embrace him. He couldn't help wishing that the tape had brought him her voice.

The only one he was likely to hear was the announcer's, and he needed to ensure he did. He lowered himself onto a bench opposite the exit and planted his hands on his knees. Though the seat felt unwelcomingly moist if not actually rotten, he concentrated on staying alert for the next message. His ears were throbbing with the strain, and his skin felt as if his sense of being watched were gathering on it, by the time his attention was rewarded.

Was someone clinking glasses? Had the staff found an excuse to celebrate? Marsden had begun to wonder if they were deriding his predicament when he identified the noise of bricks knocking together. The factory was more dilapidated than he'd been able to make out, then, and there was movement in the rubble. Perhaps an animal was at large—more than one, by the sound of it—or else people were up to no good. Suppose they were the vandals who'd tried to set fire to the station? Would the announcer deign to emerge from hiding if they or others like them trespassed on railway property, or was he capable of leaving his solitary customer to deal with them? Marsden could hear nothing now except his own heart, amplified by his concentration if not pumped up by stress. He wasn't sure if he glimpsed surreptitious movement at the exit, where he could easily imagine that the dark was growing crowded; indeed, the passage was so nearly lightless that any number of intruders might sneak into it unseen. He was gripping his knees and crouching forward like a competitor at the start of some pensioners' event while he strained to see whether anyone was sidling through the gloom when his heart jumped, and he did.

The voice was louder than ever, and its meaning more blurred. Even the odd relatively clear phrase amid the magnified mumbling left much to be desired. Marsden could have thought he was being warned about some further decay and informed that he had a hearing problem. The latter comment must refer to engineering, but wasn't this unreasonable too? How many hindrances was the train going to encounter? The reports of its progress were beginning to seem little better than jokes. But here was a final one, however inefficiently pronounced. It meant that the train was imminent, not that anything would shortly be alive.

Perhaps the man was slurring his words from drunkenness, and the clinking had indeed been glass, unless the contrivance of equality had reached such a pitch that the station was obliged to employ an announcer with a speech impediment. On that basis Marsden might seek a job as a telephone operator, but he and Marjorie were resigned to leaving the world to the young and aggressive. He peered along the railway, where the view stayed as black as the depths of the corridor opposite. All that his strained senses brought him besides a charred smell and a crawling of the skin was, eventually, another message.

"You won't be burying this old man," he retorted under his clogged breath. While the announcement must have referred to the train to Bury and Oldham, the voice had resembled a priest's more than ever. "And where's this train that's supposed to be arriving?" he demanded loud enough to rouse an echo in the exit corridor.

The next message was no answer. Presumably he was being told that unattended luggage would be removed without warning, but since he had no luggage, what was the point? Couldn't the fellow see him? Perhaps some legislation allowed him to be blind as well as largely incomprehensible. Still, here were another few words Marsden understood, even if he couldn't grasp where passengers were being told to change. "What was that?" he shouted, but the announcer hadn't finished. His tone was so ecclesiastical that for the space of an exaggerated heartbeat Marsden fancied he was being offered some kind of service, and then he recognised the phrase. It was "out of service".

He sucked in a breath that he had to replace once he'd finished coughing. "What's out?" he spluttered. "Where's my train?"

The only reply was an echo, all the more derisive for sounding more like "Where's my Ray?" He levered himself to his feet, muttering an impolite word at having somehow blackened the knee of his trousers, and hobbled to the bridge. An arthritic pang set him staggering like an old drunk, but he succeeded in gaining the top of the stairs without recourse to the banisters. He preferred to keep to the middle of the bridge, especially along the passage over the tracks. It was too easy to imagine that the darkness beneath the obscured windows was peopled with supine figures. Surely the humped mounds consisted simply of litter, despite the marks on a window about halfway along, five elongated trails that might have been left by a sooty hand as its owner tried to haul his body up. That afternoon Marsden had given a few coins to a woman lying in a railway underpass, but he hoped not to encounter anyone of the kind just now. He faltered and then stumbled fast to the end of the passage, mumbling "No change" as he clattered down to the platform.

"Here's your customer," he said at several times the volume, "and what are you going to do about it?" The question trailed away, however, and not only because the office was so thoroughly unlit from within. The imprint on the window had silenced him. He might still have taken it for a shadow if it weren't so incomplete. Just the top half of a face with holes for eyes was recognisable, and the bones of a pair of hands.

Some grimy vandal must have been trying to see into the room. Of course the marks weren't on the inside of the glass, or if they were, that was no reason to think that the figure at the window had stood in the same place. Nevertheless Marsden wasn't anxious to look closer, although he'd managed to distinguish nothing in the office. He made for the door with all the confidence he could summon up.

The storeroom distracted him. Even if his stinging eyes had adjusted to the dimness, he couldn't understand how he'd failed to see that the room was more than untidy. It was full of burned sticks and bits of stick, some of which were thin as twigs. One charred tangle that, to judge by the blackened lump at the nearer end, consisted partly of a mop or brush came close to blocking the door. When he lurched to shut away the sight the edge of the door caught the object, and he glimpsed it crumbling into restless fragments before the slam resounded through the passage. He limped to the office door and, having rapped on a scaly panel, shouted "Will you come and tell me to my face what's happening?"

As far as he could determine, silence was the answer. He could have fancied that the station and its surroundings were eager for his next outburst. "You're meant to make yourself plain," he yelled. "I couldn't understand half of what you said."

If he was hoping to provoke a response, it didn't work. Had he offended the man? "I need to know where I'm going," he insisted. "I don't think that's unreasonable, do you?"

Perhaps the fellow thought he could behave as he liked while he was in charge. Perhaps he felt too important to descend to meeting the public, an attitude that would explain his tone of voice. Or might he not be on the premises? If he was beyond the door, what could he expect to gain by lying low? Surely not even the worst employee would act that way—and then Marsden wondered if he'd strayed on the truth. Suppose it wasn't a railway employee who was skulking in the office?

The kind of person who'd tried to set fire to the station would certainly be amused by Marsden's plight and think it even more of a joke to confuse him. Perhaps the indistinctness of the announcements was the result of suppressed mirth. Marsden shouldn't waste any more time if the information was false. He hurried to the phone and glared at the dim wall, which didn't bear a single notice.

No doubt vandals had removed any advertisements for taxis. At least the phone wasn't disabled. He fumbled the receiver off its hook and leaned almost close enough to kiss the blackened dial as he clawed at an enquiry number. He could have thought his hearing had improved when the bell began to ring; it sounded close as the next room. The voice it roused was keeping its distance, however. "Can you speak up?" Marsden urged.

"Where are you calling, please?"

This was sharp enough for a warning. Presumably the speaker was ensuring he was heard. "Peacehaven," Marsden said. "Taxis."

"Where is that, please?"

"Peacehaven," Marsden pronounced loud enough for it to grow blurred against his ear before he realised that he wasn't being asked to repeat the name. "Somewhere near Manchester."

In the pause that ensued he might have heard movement outside the passage. His hectic pulse obscured the noise, which must have been the tall grass scraping in a wind, even if he couldn't feel it. He was relieved when the voice returned until he grasped its message. "Not listed," it said.

"Forgive me, I wasn't asking for Peacehaven Taxis. Any cab firm here will do."

"There is no listing."

Was the fellow pleased to say so? He sounded as smug as the worst sort of priest. "The nearest one, then," Marsden persisted. "I think that might be—"

"There are no listings for Peacehaven."

"No, that can't be right. I'm in it. I'm at the railway station. You must have a number for that at least."

"There is none."

Marsden was aware of the dark all around him and how many unheard lurkers it could hide. "Is there anything more I can do for you?" the voice said.

It sounded so fulsome that Marsden was convinced he was being mocked. "You've done quite enough," he blurted and slammed the receiver on its hook.

He could try another enquiry number, or might he call the police? What could he say that would bring them to his aid yet avoid seeming as pathetic as he was determined not to feel? There was one voice he yearned to hear in the midst of all the darkness, but the chance of this at so late an hour seemed little better than infinitesimal. Nevertheless he was groping for change and for the receiver. He scrabbled at the slot with coins and dragged the indistinct holes around the dial. The bell measured the seconds and at last made way for a human voice. It was his own. "Ray and Marjorie Marsden must be engaged elsewhere . . ."

"I am. I wish you weren't," he murmured and felt all the more helpless for failing to interrupt his mechanical self. Then his distant muffled voice fell silent, and Marjorie said "Who is it?"

"It's me, love."

"Is that Ray?" She sounded sleepy enough not to know. "I can hardly hear you," she protested. "Where have you gone?"

"You'd wonder." He was straining to hear another sound besides her voice —a noise that might have been the shuffling of feet in rubble. "I'm stuck somewhere," he said. "I'll be late. I can't say how late."

"Did you call before?"

"That was me. Didn't you get me?"

"The tape must be stuck like you. I'll need to get a new one."

"Not a new husband, I hope." He wouldn't have minded being rewarded with the laugh he'd lived with for the best part of fifty years, even though the joke felt as old as him, but perhaps she was wearied by the hour. "Anyway," he said, "if you didn't hear me last time I'll sign off the same way, which as if you didn't know—"

"What was that?"

For too many seconds he wasn't sure. He'd been talking over it, and then she had. Surely it had said that a train was about to arrive; indeed, wasn't the noise he'd mistaken for thin footsteps the distant clicking of wheels? "It's here now," he tried to tell her through a fit of coughing. By the time he was able to speak clearer, the train might have pulled in. Dropping the receiver on the hook, he dashed for the platform. He hadn't reached it when he heard a scraping behind him.

The storeroom was open again, but that wasn't enough in itself to delay him. His eyes had grown all too equal to the gloom in the passage, so that he was just able to discern marks on the floor, leading from outside the station to the room. Could someone not be bothered to pick up their dirty feet? The trails looked as if several objects had been dragged into the room. He didn't believe they had just been left; that wasn't why they made him uneasy. He had to squint to see that they were blurred by more than the dark. Whatever had left them—not anybody shuffling along, he hoped, when their feet would have been worse than thin—had crumbled in transit, scattering fragments along the route. He thought he could smell the charred evidence, and swallowed in order not to recommence coughing, suddenly fearful of being heard. What was he afraid of? Was he growing senile? Thank heaven Marjorie wasn't there to see him. The only reason for haste was that he had a train to catch. He tramped out of the passage and might have maintained his defiant pace all the way to the bridge if a shape hadn't reared up at the window of the storeroom.

Was the object that surmounted it the misshapen head of a mop? He couldn't distinguish much through the grimy pane, but the idea was almost reassuring until he acknowledged that somebody would still have had to lift up the scrawny excuse for a figure. It hadn't simply risen or been raised, however. A process that the grime couldn't entirely obscure was continuing to take place. The silhouette—the blackened form, rather—was taking on more substance, though it remained alarmingly emaciated. It was putting itself back together.

The spectacle was so nightmarishly fascinating that Marsden might have been unable to stir except for the clatter of wheels along the tracks. He staggered around to see dim lights a few hundred yards short of the station. "Stop," he coughed, terrified that the driver mightn't notice him and speed straight through. Waving his arms wildly, he sprinted for the bridge.

He'd panted up the stairs and was blundering along the middle of the wooden corridor when he thought he heard a noise besides the approach of the train. Was he desperate to hear it or afraid to? He might have tried to persist in mistaking it for wind in the grass if it weren't so close. He did his utmost to fix his shaky gaze on the far end of the corridor as he fled past shadow after crouching shadow. He almost plunged headlong down the further stairs, and only a grab at the slippery discoloured banister saved him. As he dashed onto the platform he saw that both doors in the passage out of the station were open. The sight brought him even closer to panic, and he began to wave his shivering arms once more as he tottered to the edge of the platform. "Don't leave me here," he cried.

The squeal of brakes seemed to slice through the dark. The engine blotted out the view across the tracks, and then a carriage sped past him. Another followed, but the third was slower. Its last door halted almost in front of him. Though the train was by no means the newest he'd ridden that day, and far from the cleanest, it seemed the next thing to paradise. He clutched the rusty handle and heaved the door open and clambered aboard. "You can go now. Go," he pleaded.

Who was the driver waiting for? Did he think the noises on the bridge were promising more passengers? There was such a volume of eager shuffling and scraping that Marsden almost wished his ears would fail him. He hauled at the door, which some obstruction had wedged open. He was practically deaf with his frantic heartbeat by the time the door gave, slamming with such force that it seemed to be echoed in another carriage. At once the train jerked forward, flinging him onto the nearest musty seat. He was attempting to recover his breath when the announcer spoke.

Was a window open in the carriage? The voice sounded close enough to be on the train, yet no more comprehensible. It was no longer simply unctuous; it could have been mocking a priest out of distaste for the vocation. Its only recognisable words were "train now departing", except that the first one was more like Ray—perhaps not just on this occasion, Marsden thought he recalled. He craned towards the window and was able to glimpse that both doors in the exit corridor were shut. Before he had time to ponder any of this, if indeed he wanted to, the train veered off the main line.

"Where are you taking me?" he blurted, but all too soon he knew. The train was heading for the property behind the station, a turn of events celebrated by a short announcement. There was no question that the speaker was on board, though the blurring of the words left Marsden unsure if they were "Ray is shortly alive." The swerve of the train had thrown open the doors between the carriages, allowing him to hear a chorused hiss that might have signified resentment or have been an enthusiastic "Yes" or, possibly even worse, the collapse of many burned objects into the ash he could smell. As the train sped through a gateway in the railings, he read the name on the sign: not Peacehaven Motors at all, or anything to do with cars. Perhaps the route was only a diversion, he tried to think, or a short tour. Perhaps whoever was on the train just wanted somebody to visit the neglected memorials and the crematorium.

2007

Digging Deep

First published in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 18, 2007
Also published in: Just Behind You

It must have been quite a nightmare. It was apparently enough to make Coe drag the quilt around him, since he feels more than a sheeted mattress beneath him, and to leave a sense of suffocating helplessness, of being worse than alone in the dark. He isn't helpless. Even if his fit of rage blotted out his senses, it must have persuaded the family. They've brought him home. There wasn't a quilt on his hospital bed.

Who's in the house with him? Perhaps they all are, to impress on him how much they care about him, but he knows how recently they started. There was barely space for all of them around his bed in the private room. Whenever they thought he was asleep some of them would begin whispering. He's sure he overheard plans for his funeral. Now they appear to have left him by himself, and yet he feels hemmed in. Is the dark oppressing him? He has never seen it so dark.

It doesn't feel like his bedroom. He has always been able to distinguish the familiar surroundings when any of his fears jerked him awake. He could think that someone—his daughter Simone or son Daniel, most likely—has denied him light to pay him back for having spent too much of their legacy on the private room. However much he widens his eyes, they remain coated with blackness. He parts his dry lips to call someone to open the curtains, and then his tongue retreats behind his teeth. He should deal with the bedclothes first. Nobody ought to see him laid out as if he's awaiting examination. In the throes of the nightmare he has pulled the entire quilt under him.

He grasps a handful and plants his other hand against the padded headboard to lift his body while he snatches the quilt from beneath him. That's the plan, but he's unable to take hold of the material. It's more slippery than it ought to be, and doesn't budge. Did his last bout of rage leave him so enfeebled, or is his weight pinning down the quilt? He stretches out his arms to find the edges, and his knuckles bump into cushions on both sides of him. But they aren't cushions, they're walls.

He's in some kind of outsize cot. The walls must be cutting off the light. Presumably the idea is to prevent him from rolling out of bed. He's furious at being treated like this, especially when he wasn't consulted. He flings up his hands to grab the tops of the walls and heave himself up to shout for whoever's in the house, and his fingertips collide with a padded surface.

The sides of the cot must bend inwards at the top, that's all. His trembling hands have flinched and bruised his sunken cheeks, but he lifts them. His elbows are still pressed against the bottom of the container when his hands blunder against an obstruction above his face. It's plump and slippery, and scrabbling at it only loosens his nails from the quick. His knees rear up, knocking together before they bump into the obstacle, and then his feet deal it a few shaky kicks. Far too soon his fury is exhausted, and he lies inert as though the blackness is earth that's weighing on him. It isn't far removed. His family cared about him even less than he suspected. They've consigned him to his last and worst fear.

Can't this be another nightmare? How can it make sense? However prematurely eager Simone's husband may have been to sign the death certificate, Daniel would have had to be less than professional too. Could he have saved on the embalming and had the funeral at once? At least he has dressed his father in a suit, but the pockets feel empty as death.

Coe can't be sure until he tries them all. His quivering fists are clenched next to his face, but he forces them open and gropes over his ribs. His inside breast pocket is flat as a card, and so are the others in the jacket. When he fumbles at his trousers pockets he's dismayed to find how thin he is—so scrawny that he's afraid the protrusion on his right hip is a broken bone. But it's in the pocket, and in his haste to carry it to his face he almost shies it out of reach. Somebody cared after all. He pokes at the keypad, and before his heart has time to beat, the mobile phone lights up.

He could almost wish the glow it sheds were dimmer. It shows him how closely he's boxed in by the quilted surface. It's less than a hand's breadth from his shoulders, and when he tilts his face up to judge the extent of his prison the pudgy lid bumps his forehead. Around the phone the silky padding glimmers green, while farther down the box it's whitish like another species of mould, and beyond his feet it's black as soil. He lets his head sink onto the pillow that's the entire floor and does his desperate best to be aware of nothing but the mobile. It's his lifeline, and he needn't panic because he can't remember a single number. The phone will remember for him.

His knuckles dig into the underside of the lid as he holds the mobile away from his face. It's still too close; the digits merge into a watery blur. He only has to locate the key for the stored numbers, and he jabs it hard enough to bruise his fingertip. The symbol that appears in the illuminated window looks shapeless as a blob of mud, but he knows it represents an address book. He pokes the topmost left-hand key of the numeric pad, although he has begun to regret making Daniel number one, and holds the mobile against his ear.

There's silence except for a hiss of static that sounds too much like a trickle of earth. Though his prison seems oppressively hot, he shivers at the possibility that he may be too far underground for the phone to work. He wriggles onto his side to bring the mobile a few inches closer to the surface, but before his shoulder is anything like vertical it thumps the lid. As he strives to maintain his position, the distant phone starts to ring.

It continues when he risks sinking back, but that's all. He's close to pleading, although he doesn't know with whom, by the time the shrill insistent pulse is interrupted. The voice isn't Daniel's. It's entirely anonymous, and informs Coe that the person he's calling isn't available. It confirms Daniel's number in a different voice that sounds less than human, an assemblage of digits pronounced by a computer, and invites him to leave a message.

"It's your father. That's right, I'm alive. You've buried me alive. Are you there? Can you hear me? Answer the phone, you—Just answer. Tell me that you're coming. Ring when you get this. Come and let me out. Come now."

Was it his breath that made the glow flicker? He's desperately tempted to keep talking until this chivvies out a response, but he mustn't waste the battery. He ends the call and thumbs the key next to Daniel's. It's supposed to contact Simone, but it triggers the same recorded voice.

He could almost imagine that it's a cruel joke, even when the voice composed of fragments reads out her number. At first he doesn't speak when the message concludes with a beep, and then he's afraid of losing the connection. "It's me," he babbles. "Yes, your father. Someone was a bit too happy to see me off. Aren't you there either, or are you scared to speak up? Are you all out celebrating? Don't let me spoil the party. Just send someone who can dig me up."

He's growing hysterical. These aren't the sorts of comments he should leave; he can't afford to antagonise his family just now. His unwieldy fingers have already terminated the call—surely the mobile hasn't lost contact by itself. Should he ring his son and daughter back? Alternatively there are friends he could phone, if he can remember their numbers—and then he realises there's only one call he should make. Why did he spend so long in trying to reach his family? He uses a finger to count down the blurred keypad and jabs the ninth key thrice.

He has scarcely lowered the phone to his ear when an operator cuts off the bell. "Emergency," she declares.

Coe can be as fast as that. "Police," he says while she's enquiring which service he requires, but she carries on with her script. "Police," he says louder and harsher.

This earns him a silence that feels stuffed with padding. She can't expect callers who are in danger to be polite, but he's anxious to apologise in case she can hear. Before he can take a breath a male voice says "Gloucestershire Constabulary."

"Can you help me? You may have trouble believing this, but I'm buried alive."

He sounds altogether too contrite. He nearly emits a wild laugh at the idea of seeking the appropriate tone for the situation, but the policeman is asking "What is your name, sir?"

"Alan Coe," says Coe and is pinioned by realising that it must be carved on a stone at least six feet above him.

"And where are you calling from?"

The question seems to emphasise the sickly greenish glimmer of the fattened walls and lid. Does the policeman want the mobile number? That's the answer Coe gives him. "And what is your location, sir?" the voice crackles in his ear.

Coe has the sudden ghastly notion that his children haven't simply rushed the funeral—that for reasons he's afraid to contemplate, they've laid him to rest somewhere other than with his wife. Surely some of the family would have opposed them. "Mercy Hill," he has to believe.

"I didn't catch that, sir."

Is the mobile running out of power? "Mercy Hill," he shouts so loud that the dim glow appears to quiver.

"Whereabouts on Mercy Hill?"

Every question renders his surroundings more substantial, and the replies he has to give are worse. "Down in front of the church," he's barely able to acknowledge. "Eighth row, no, ninth, I think. Left of the avenue."

There's no audible response. The policeman must be typing the details, unless he's writing them down. "How long will you be?" Coe is more than concerned to learn. "I don't know how much air I've got. Not much."

"You're telling us you're buried alive in a graveyard."

Has the policeman raised his voice because the connection is weak? "That's what I said," Coe says as loud.

"I suggest you get off the phone now, sir."

"You haven't told me how soon you can be here."

"You'd better hope we haven't time to be. We've had enough Halloween pranks for one year."

Coe feels faint and breathless, which is dismayingly like suffocation, but he manages to articulate "You think I'm playing a joke."

"I'd use another word for it. I advise you to give it up immediately, and that voice you're putting on as well."

"I'm putting nothing on. Can't you hear I'm deadly serious? You're using up my air, you—Just do your job or let me speak to your superior."

"I warn you, sir, we can trace this call."

"Do so. Come and get me," Coe almost screams, but his voice grows flat. He's haranguing nobody except himself.

Has the connection failed, or did the policeman cut him off? Did he say enough to make them trace him? Perhaps he should switch off the mobile to conserve the battery, but he has no idea whether this would leave the phone impossible to trace. The thought of waiting in the dark without knowing whether help is on the way brings the walls and lid closer to rob him of breath. As he holds the phone at a cramped arm's length to poke the redial button, he sees the greenish light appear to tug the swollen ceiling down. When he snatches the mobile back to his ear the action seems to draw the lid closer still.

An operator responds at once. "Police," he begs as she finishes her first word. "Police."

Has she recognised him? The silence isn't telling. It emits a burst of static so fragmented that he's afraid the connection is breaking up, and then a voice says "Gloucestershire Constabulary."

For a distracted moment he thinks she's the operator. Surely a policewoman will be more sympathetic than her colleague. "It's Alan Coe again," Coe says with all the authority he can summon up. "I promise you this is no joke. They've buried me because they must have thought I'd passed on. I've already called you once but I wasn't informed what's happening. May I assume somebody is on their way?"

How much air has all that taken? He's holding his breath as if this may compensate, although it makes the walls and lid appear to bulge towards him, when the policewoman says in the distance "He's back. I see what you meant about the voice."

"What's wrong with it?" Coe says through his bared teeth, then tries a shout, which sounds flattened by padding. "What's the matter with my voice?"

"He wants to know what's wrong with his voice."

"So you heard me the first time." Perhaps he shouldn't address her as if she's a child, but he's unable to moderate his tone. "What are you saying about my voice?"

"I don't know how old you're trying to sound, but nobody's that old and still alive."

"I'm old enough to be your father, so do as you're told." She either doesn't hear this or ignores it, but he ensures she hears "I'm old enough for them to pass me off as dead."

"And bury you."

"That's what I've already told you and your colleague."

"In a grave."

"On Mercy Hill below the church. Halfway along the ninth row down, to the left of the avenue."

He can almost see the trench and his own hand dropping a fistful of earth into the depths that harboured his wife's coffin. All at once he's intensely aware that it must be under him. He might have wanted to be reunited with her at the end—at least, with her as she was before she stopped recognising him and grew unrecognisable, little more than a skeleton with an infant's mind—but not like this. He remembers the spadefuls of earth piling up on her coffin and realises that now they're on top of him. "And you're expecting us to have it dug up," the policewoman says.

"Can't you do it yourselves?" Since this is hardly the best time to criticise their methods, he adds "Have you got someone?"

"How long do you plan to carry on with this? Do you honestly think you're taking us in?"

"I'm not trying to. For the love of God, it's the truth." Coe's free hand claws at the wall as if this may communicate his plight somehow, and his fingers wince as though they've scratched a blackboard. "Why won't you believe me?" he pleads.

"You really expect us to believe a phone would work down there."

"Yes, because it is."

"I an't hea ou."

The connection is faltering. He nearly accuses her of having wished this on him. "I said it is," he cries.

"Very unny." Yet more distantly she says "Now he's aking it ound a if it's aking up."

Is the light growing unreliable too? For a blink the darkness seems to surge at him—just darkness, not soil spilling into his prison. Or has his consciousness begun to gutter for lack of air? "It is," he gasps. "Tell me they're coming to find me."

"You won't like it if they do."

At least her voice is whole again, and surely his must be. "You still think I'm joking. Why would I joke about something like this at my age, for God's sake? I didn't even know it was Halloween."

"You're saying you don't know what you just said you know."

"Because your colleague told me. I don't know how long I've been here," he realises aloud, and the light dims as if to suggest how much air he may have unconsciously used up.

"Long enough. We'd have to give you full marks for persistence. Are you in a cupboard, by the way? It sounds like one. Your trick nearly worked."

"It's a coffin, God help me. Can't you hear that?" Coe cries and scrapes his nails across the underside of the lid.

Perhaps the squealing is more tangible than audible. He's holding the mobile towards it, but when he returns the phone to his ear the policewoman says "I've heard all I want to, I think."

"Are you still calling me a liar?" He should have demanded to speak to whoever's in charge. He's about to do so when a thought ambushes him. "If you really think I am," he blurts, "why are you talking to me?"

At once he knows. However demeaning it is to be taken for a criminal, that's unimportant if they're locating him. He'll talk for as long as she needs to keep him talking. He's opening his mouth to rant when he hears a man say "No joy, I'm afraid. Can't trace it."

If Coe is too far underground, how is he able to phone? The policewoman brings him to the edge of panic. "Count yourself lucky," she tells him, "and don't dare play a trick like this again. Don't you realise you may be tying up a line while someone genuinely needs our help?"

He mustn't let her go. He's terrified that if she rings off they won't accept his calls. It doesn't matter what he says so long as it makes the police come for him. Before she has finished lecturing him he shouts "Don't you speak to me like that, you stupid cow."

"I'm war ing ou, ir—"

"Do the work we're paying you to do, and that means the whole shiftless lot of you. You're too fond of finding excuses not to help the public, you damned lazy swine." He's no longer shouting just to be heard. "You weren't much help with my wife, were you? You were worse than useless when she was wandering the streets not knowing where she was. And you were a joke when she started chasing me round the house because she'd forgotten who I was and thought I'd broken in. That's right, you're the bloody joke, not me. She nearly killed me with a kitchen knife. Now get on with your job for a change, you pathetic wretched—"

Without bothering to flicker the light goes out, and he hears nothing but death in his ear. He clutches the mobile and shakes it and pokes blindly at the keys, none of which brings him a sound except for the lifeless clacking of plastic or provides the least relief from the unutterable blackness. At last he's overcome by exhaustion or despair or both. His arms drop to his sides, and the phone slips out of his hand.

Perhaps it's the lack of air, but he feels as if he may soon be resigned to lying where he is. Shutting his eyes takes him closer to sleep. The surface beneath him is comfortable enough, after all. He could fancy he's in bed, or is that mere fancy? Can't he have dreamed he wakened in his coffin and everything that followed? Why, he has managed to drag the quilt under himself, which is how the nightmare began. He's vowing that it won't recur when a huge buzzing insect crawls against his hand.

He jerks away from it, and his scalp collides with the headboard, which is too plump. The insect isn't only buzzing, it's glowing feebly. It's the mobile, which has regained sufficient energy to vibrate. As he grabs it, the decaying light seems to fatten the interior of the coffin. He jabs the key to take the call and fumbles the mobile against his ear. "Hello?" he pleads.

"Coming."

It's barely a voice. It sounds as unnatural as the numbers in the answering messages did, and at least as close to falling to bits. Surely that's the fault of the connection. Before he can speak again the darkness caves in on him, and he's holding an inert lump of plastic against his ear.

There's a sound, however. It's muffled but growing more audible. He prays that he's recognising it, and then he's sure he does. Someone is digging towards him.

"I'm here," he cries and claps a bony hand against his withered lips. He shouldn't waste whatever air is left, especially when he's beginning to feel it's as scarce as light down here. It seems unlikely that he would even have been heard. Why is he wishing he'd kept silent? He listens breathlessly to the scraping in the earth. How did the rescuers manage to dig down so far without his noticing? The activity inches closer—the sound of the shifting of earth—and all at once he's frantically jabbing at the keypad in the blackness. Any response from the world overhead might be welcome, any voice other than the one that called him. The digging is beneath him.

Peep

First published in Postscripts #10, Spring 2007

I'm labouring up the steepest section of the hill above the promenade when the twins run ahead. At least we're past the main road by the railway station. "Don't cross—" I shout or rather gasp.

Perhaps each of them thinks or pretends to think I'm addressing the other, because they don't slow down until they reach the first side street and dodge around the corner.

"Stay there," I pant. They're already out of sight, having crouched below the garden wall. I wonder if they're angry with me by association with their parents, since Geraldine wasn't bought a kite to replace the one she trampled to bits when yesterday's weather let her down. They did appear to relish watching teenage drivers speed along the promenade for at least a few minutes, which may mean they aren't punishing me for their boredom. In any case I ought to join in the game. "Where are those children?" I wonder as loudly as my climb leaves breath for. "Where can they be?"

I seem to glimpse an answering movement beyond a bush at the far end of the wall. No doubt a bird is hiding in the foliage, since the twins pop their heads up much closer. Their small plump eight-year-old faces are gleeful, but there's no need for me to feel they're sharing a joke only with each other. Then Geraldine cries "Peep."

Like a chick coming out of its shell, as Auntie Beryl used to say. I can do without remembering what else she said, but where has Geraldine learned this trick? Despite the August sunshine, a wind across the bay traces my backbone with a shiver. Before questioning Geraldine I should usher the children across the junction, and as I plod to the corner I wheeze, "Hold my __"

There's no traffic up here. Nevertheless I'm dismayed that the twins dash across the side street and the next one to the road that begins on the summit, opposite the Catholic church with its green skullcap and giant hatpin of a cross. They stop outside my house, where they could be enjoying the view of the bay planted with turbines to farm the wind. Though I follow as fast as I'm able, Gerald is dealing the marble bellpush a series of pokes by the time I step onto the mossy path. Catching my breath makes me sound harsh as I ask "Geraldine, who taught you that game?"

She giggles, and so does Gerald. "The old woman," he says.

I'm about to pursue this when Paula opens my front door. "Don't say that," she rebukes him.

Her face reddens, emphasising how her cropped hair has done the reverse. It's even paler by comparison with the twins' mops, so that I wonder if they're to blame. Before I can put my reluctant question, Gerald greets the aromas from the kitchen by demanding, "What's for dinner?"

"We've made you lots of good things while you've been looking after grandpa."

The twins don't think much of at least some of this, although I presume the reference to me was intended to make them feel grownup. They push past their mother and race into the lounge, jangling all the ornaments. "Careful," Paula calls less forcefully than I would prefer. "Share," she adds as I follow her to the kitchen, where she murmurs, "What game were you quizzing them about?"

"You used to play it with babies. I'm not saying you. People did." I have a sudden image of Beryl thrusting her white face over the side of my cot, though if that ever happened, surely I wouldn't remember. "Peep," I explain and demonstrate by covering my eyes before raising my face above my hand.

Paula's husband Bertie glances up from vigorously stirring vegetables in the wok he and Paula brought with them. "And what was your issue with that?"

Surely I misunderstood Gerald, which can be cleared up later. "Your two were playing it," I say. "A bit babyish at their age, do you think?"

"Good Lord, they're only children. Let them have their fun till they have to get serious like the rest of us," he says and cocks his head towards a squabble over television channels. "Any chance you could restore some balance in there? Everything's under control in here."

I'm perfectly capable of cooking a decent meal. I've had to be since Jo died. I feel as if I'm being told where to go and how to act in my own house. Still, I should help my remaining family, and so I bustle to the lounge, where the instant disappearance of a channel leaves the impression that a face dropped out of sight as I entered. Gerald has captured the remote control and is riffling through broadcasts. "Stop that now," I urge. "Settle on something."

They haven't even sat on the furniture. They're bouncing from chair to chair by way of the equally venerable sofa in their fight over the control. "I think someone older had better take charge," I say and hold out my hand until Gerald flings the control beside me on the sofa. The disagreement appears to be over two indistinguishably similar programmes in which vaguely Oriental cartoon animals batter one another with multicoloured explosions and other garish displays of power. I propose watching real animals and offer a show set in a zoo for endangered species, but the response makes me feel like a member of one. My suggestion of alternating scenes from each chosen programme brings agreement, though only on dismissing the idea, and Geraldine capitulates to watching her brother's choice.

The onscreen clamour gives me no chance to repeat my question. When I try to sneak the volume down, the objections are deafening. I don't want Paula and her husband to conclude I'm useless—I mustn't give them any excuse to visit even less often—and so I hold my peace, if there can be said to be any in the room. The cartoon is still going off when we're summoned to dinner.

I do my best to act as I feel expected to behave. I consume every grain and shoot and chunk of my meal, however much it reminds me of the cartoon. When my example falls short of the twins I'm compelled to encourage them aloud—"Have a bit more or you won't get any bigger" and "That's lovely, just try it" and in some desperation "Eat up, it's good for you." Perhaps they're sick of hearing about healthy food at home. I feel clownishly false and even more observed than I did over the television. I'm quite relieved when the plates are scraped clean and consigned to the dishwasher.

I'd hoped the twins might have grown up sufficiently since Christmas to be prepared to go to bed before the adults, but apparently holidays rule, and the table is cleared for one of the games Gerald has insisted on bringing.

Players take turns to insert plastic sticks in the base of a casket, and the loser is the one whose stick releases the lid and the contents, a wagging head that I suppose is meant to be a clown's, given its whiteness and shock of red hair and enlarged eyes and wide grin just as fixed. I almost knock the game to the floor when one of my shaky attempts to take care lets out the gleeful head, and then I have to feign amusement for the children's sake. At first I'm glad when Gerald is prevailed upon to let his sister choose a game.

It's Monopoly. I think only its potential length daunts me until the children's behaviour reminds me how my aunt would play. They sulk whenever a move goes against them and crow if one fails to benefit their twin, whereas Beryl would change any move she didn't like and say "Oh, let me have it" or simply watch to see whether anyone noticed. "Peep," she would say and lower her hand in front of her eyes if she caught us watching. My parents pretended that she didn't cheat, and so I kept quiet, even though she was more than alert to anyone else's mistakes.

Eventually I try conceding tonight's game in the hope the other adults will, but it seems Paula's husband is too much of a stockbroker to relinquish even toy money. The late hour enlivens the twins or at any rate makes them more active, celebrating favourable moves by bouncing on the chairs. "Careful of my poor old furniture," I say, though I'm more dismayed by the reflection of their antics in the mirror that backs the dresser, just the top of one tousled red head or the other springing up among the doubled plates. I'm tired enough to fancy that an unkempt scalp rendered dusty by the glass keeps straying into view even while the twins are still or at least seated. Its owner would be at my back, but since nobody else looks, I won't. Somewhat earlier than midnight Bertie wins the game and sits back satisfied as the twins start sweeping hotels off the board in vexation. "I think someone's ready for bed," I remark.

"You go, then," says Gerald, and his sister giggles in agreement.

"Let grandpa have the bathroom first," says their mother.

Does she honestly believe I was referring to myself? "I won't be long," I promise, not least because I've had enough of mirrors. Having found my toothbrush amid the visiting clutter, I close my eyes while wielding it. "Empty now," I announce on the way to my room. In due course a squabble migrates from the bathroom to the bunks next door and eventually trails into silence. Once I've heard Paula and her husband share the bathroom, which is more than her mother and I ever did, there are just my thoughts to keep me awake.

I don't want to think about the last time I saw Beryl, but I can't help remembering when her playfulness turned unpleasant. It was Christmas Eve, and she'd helped or overseen my mother in making dozens of mince pies, which may have been why my mother was sharper than usual with me. She told me not to touch the pies after she gave me one to taste. I was the twins' age and unable to resist. Halfway through a comedy show full of jokes I didn't understand I sneaked back to the kitchen. I'd taken just one surreptitious bite when I saw Beryl's face leaning around the night outside the window. She was at the door behind me, and I hid the pie in my mouth before turning to her. Her puffy whitish porous face that always put me in mind of dough seemed to widen with a grin that for a moment I imagined was affectionate. "Peep," she said.

Though it sounded almost playful, it was a warning or a threat of worse. Why did it daunt me so much when my offence had been so trivial? Perhaps I was simply aware that my parents had to put up with my mother's sister while wishing she didn't live so close. She always came to us on Christmas Day, and that year I spent it fearing that she might surprise me at some other crime, which made me feel in danger of committing one out of sheer nervousness. "Remember," she said that night, having delivered a doughy kiss that smeared me with lipstick and face powder. "Peep."

Either my parents found this amusing or they felt compelled to pretend. I tried to take refuge in bed and forget about Beryl, and so it seems little has changed in more than sixty years. At least I'm no longer walking to school past her house, apprehensive that she may peer around the spidery net curtains or inch the front door open like a lid. If I didn't see her in the house I grew afraid that she was hiding somewhere else, so that even encountering her in the street felt like a trap she'd set. Surely all this is too childish to bother me now, and when sleep abandons me to daylight I don't immediately know why I'm nervous.

It's the family, of course. I've been wakened by the twins quarrelling outside my room over who should waken me for breakfast. "You both did," I call and hurry to the bathroom to speed through my ablutions. Once the twins have begun to toy with the extravagant remains of their food I risk giving them an excuse to finish. "What shall we do today?" I ask, and meet their expectant gazes by adding, "You used to like the beach."

That's phrased to let them claim to have outgrown it, but Gerald says "I've got no spade or bucket."

"I haven't," Geraldine competes.

"I'm sure replacements can be obtained if you're both going to make me proud to be seen out with you," I say and tell their parents, "I'll be in charge if you've better things to do."

Bertie purses his thin prim lips and raises his pale eyebrows. "Nothing's better than bringing up your children."

I'm not sure how many rebukes this incorporates. Too often the way he and Paula are raising the twins seems designed to reprove how she was brought up. "I know my dad wouldn't have meant it like that," she says. "We could go and look at some properties, Bertie."

"You're thinking of moving closer," I urge.

Her husband seems surprised to have to donate even a word of explanation. "Investments."

"Just say if you don't see enough of us," says Paula.

Since I suspect she isn't speaking for all of them, I revert to silence. Once the twins have been prevailed upon to take turns loading the dishwasher so that nothing is broken, I usher them out of the house. "Be good for grandpa," Paula says, which earns her a husbandly frown. "Text if you need to," he tells them.

I should have thought mobile phones were too expensive for young children to take to the beach. I don't want to begin the outing with an argument, and so I lead them downhill by their impatient hands. I see the scrawny windmills twirling on the bay until we turn down the road that slopes to the beach. If I don't revive my question now I may never have the opportunity or the nerve. "You were going to tell me who taught you that game."

Gerald's small hot sticky hand wriggles in my fist. "What game?"

"You know." I'm not about to release their hands while we're passing a supermarket car park. I raise one shoulder and then the other to peer above them at the twins. "Peep," I remind them.

Once they've had enough of giggling Geraldine splutters, "Mummy said we mustn't say."

"I don't think she quite meant that, do you? I'm sure she won't mind if you just say it to me when I've asked."

"I'll tell if you tell," Gerald informs his sister.

"That's a good idea, then you'll each just have done half. Do it in chorus if you like."

He gives me a derisive look of the kind I've too often seen his father turn on Paula. "I'll tell mummy if you say," he warns Geraldine.

I mustn't cause any more strife. I'm only reviving an issue that will surely go away if it's ignored. I escort the twins into a newsagent's shop hung with buckets and spades and associated paraphernalia, the sole establishment to preserve any sense of the seaside among the pubs and wine bars and charity shops. Once we've agreed on items the twins can bear to own I lead them to the beach.

The expanse of sand at the foot of the slipway from the promenade borders the mouth of the river. Except for us it's deserted, but not for long. The twins are seeing who can dump the most castles on the sand when it starts to grow populated. Bald youths tapestried with tattoos let their bullish dogs roam while children not much older than the twins drink cans of lager or roll some kind of cigarette to share, and boys who are barely teenage if even that race motorcycles along the muddy edge of the water. As the twins begin to argue over who's winning the sandcastle competition I reflect that at least they're behaving better than anybody else in sight. I feel as if I'm directing the thought at someone who's judging them, but nobody is peering over or under the railings on the promenade or out of the apartments across it. Nevertheless I feel overheard in declaring, "I think you've both done very well. I couldn't choose between you."

I've assumed the principle must be to treat them as equally as possible—even their names seem to try—but just now dissatisfaction is all they're sharing. "I'm bored of this," Gerald says and demolishes several of his rickety castles. "I want to swim."

"Have you brought your costumes?"

"They're in our room," says Geraldine. "I want to swim in a pool, not a mucky river."

"We haven't got a pool here anymore. We'd have to go on the train."

"You can take us," Gerald says. "Dad and mum won't mind."

I'm undismayed to give up sitting on the insidiously damp sand or indeed to leave the loudly peopled beach once I've persuaded the twins not to abandon their buckets and spades. I feel as if the children are straining to lug me uphill except when they mime more exhaustion than I can afford to admit. They drop the beach toys in my hall together with a generous bounty of sand on the way to thundering upstairs. After a brief altercation they reappear and I lead them down to the train.

Before it leaves the two-platformed terminus we're joined by half a dozen rudely pubertal drinkers. At least they're at the far end of the carriage, but their uproar might as well not be. They're fondest of a terse all-purpose word. I ignore the performance as an example to the twins, but when they continue giggling I attempt to distract them with a game of I Spy: s for the sea on the bare horizon, though they're so tardy in participating that I let it stand for the next station; f for a field behind a suburban school, even if I'm fleetingly afraid that Gerald will reveal it represents the teenagers' favourite word; c for cars in their thousands occupying a retail park beside a motorway, because surely Geraldine could never have been thinking of the other syllable the drinkers favour; b for the banks that rise up on both sides of the train as it begins to burrow into Birkenhead... I don't mean it for Beryl, but here is her house.

Just one window is visible above the embankment on our side of the carriage: her bedroom window. I don't know if I'm more disturbed by this glimpse of the room where she died or by having forgotten that we would pass the house. Of course it's someone else's room now—I imagine that the house has been converted into flats—and the room has acquired a window box; the reddish tuft that sprouts above the sill must belong to a plant, however dusty it looks. That's all I've time to see through the grimy window before the bridge I used to cross on the way to school blocks the view. Soon a station lets the drinkers loose, and a tunnel conducts us to our stop.

The lift to the street is open at both ends. It shuts them when Geraldine pushes the button, her brother having been promised that he can operate the lift on our return, and then it gapes afresh. Since nobody appears I suspect Gerald, but he's too far from the controls. "Must have been having a yawn,"

I say, and the twins gaze at me as if I'm the cause. No wonder I'm relieved when the doors close and we're hoisted into daylight.

As we turn the corner that brings the swimming pool into view the twins are diverted by a cinema. "I want to see a film," Gerald announces.

"You'll have to make your minds up. I can't be in two places at once. I'm just me."

Once she and her brother have done giggling at some element of this Geraldine says, "Grumpo."

I'm saddened to think she means me, especially since Gerald agrees, until I see it's the title of a film that's showing in the complex. "You need to be twelve to go in."

"No we don't," they duet, and Gerald adds "You can take us."

Because they're so insistent I seek support from the girl in the pay booth, only to be told I'm mistaken. She watches me ask, "What would your parents say?"

"They'd let us," Geraldine assures me, and Gerald says, "We watch fifteens at home."

Wouldn't the girl advise me if the film weren't suitable? I buy tickets and lead the way into a large dark auditorium. We're just in time to see the screen exhort the audience to switch off mobile phones, and I have the twins do so once they've used theirs to light the way along a row in the absence of an usherette. The certificate that precedes the film doesn't tell me why it bears that rating, but that's apparent soon enough. An irascible grandfather embarrasses his offspring with his forgetfulness and the class of his behaviour and especially his language, which even features two appearances of the word I ignored most often on the train. The twins find him hilarious, as do all the children in the cinema except for one that keeps poking its head over the back of a seat several rows ahead. Or is it a child? It doesn't seem to be with anyone, and now it has stopped trying to surprise me with its antics and settles on peering at me over the seat. Just its pale fat face above the nose is visible, crowned and surrounded by an unkempt mass of hair. The flickering of the dimness makes it look eager to jerk up and reveal more of its features, though the light is insufficient to touch off the slightest glimmer in the eyes, which I can't distinguish. At last the oldster in the film saves his children from robbers with a display of martial arts, and his family accepts that he's as loveable as I presume we're expected to have found him. The lights go up as the credits start to climb the screen, and I crane forward for a good look at the child who's been troubling me. It has ducked into hiding, and I sidle past Geraldine to find it. "You're going the wrong way, grandpa," she calls, but neither this nor Gerald's mirth can distract me from the sight of the row, which is deserted.

Members of the audience stare at me as I trudge to the end of the aisle, where words rise up to tower over me, and plod back along the auditorium. By this time it's empty except for the twins and me, and it's ridiculous to fancy that if I glance over my shoulder I'll catch a head in the act of taking cover. "Nothing," I say like Grumpo, if less coarsely, when Gerald asks what I'm looking for. I bustle the twins out of the cinema, and as soon as they revive their phones Gerald's goes off like an alarm.

In a moment Geraldine's restores equality. They read their messages, which consist of less than words, and return their calls. "Hello, mummy," Geraldine says. "We were in a film."

Her brother conveys the information and hands me the mobile. "Dad wants to speak to you."

"Bertie. Forgive me, should we have—"

"I hope you know we came to find you on the beach."

"Gerald didn't say. I do apologise if you—"

"I trust you're bringing them home now. To your house." I don't understand why he thinks the addition is necessary. "I'm afraid we're in trouble," I inform the twins as Geraldine ends her call. I have to be reminded that it's Gerald's turn to control the lift at the railway station. At least our train reaches the platform as we do, and soon it emerges into the open, at which point I recall how close we are to Beryl's house. As the train passes it I turn to look. There's nothing at her window.

The tenant must have moved the window box. It does no good to wonder where the item that I glimpsed is now. I'm nervous enough by the time we arrive at the end of the line and I lead the twins or am led by them uphill. They seem more eager than I feel, perhaps because they've me to blame. I'm fumbling to extract my keys when Paula's husband opens the front door as if it's his. Having given each of us a stare that settles on me, Bertie says "Dinner won't be long."

It sounds so much like a rebuke, and is backed up by so many trespassing smells that I retort, "I could have made it, you know."

"Could you?" Before I can rise to this challenge he adds "Don't you appreciate my cuisine and Paula's?"

"Your children don't seem to all that much," I'm provoked to respond and quote a favourite saying of Jo's. "It isn't seaside without fish and chips."

"I'm afraid we believe in raising them more healthily."

"Do you, Paula? In other words, not how your mother and I treated you?" When she only gazes sadly at me from the kitchen I say, "It can't be very healthy if they hardly touch their food."

"It isn't very healthy for them to hear this kind of thing."

"Find something to watch for a few minutes," her husband tells them. "Maybe your grandfather can choose something suitable."

I feel silenced and dismissed. I follow the children into the lounge and insist on selecting the wildlife show. "I've got to watch as well," I say, even if it sounds like acknowledging a punishment. They greet the announcement of dinner without concealing their relief, although their enthusiasm falls short of the meal itself. When at last they've finished sprinkling cheese on their spaghetti they eat just the sauce, and hardly a leaf of their salad. Though I perform relishing all of mine, I have a sense of being held responsible for their abstinence. I try not to glance at the mirror of the dresser, but whenever I fail there appear to be only the reflections of the family and me.

Once the twins have filled up with chocolate dessert, it's time for games. I vote against reviving the one in which the pallid head pops up, which means that Gerald vetoes his sister's choice of Monopoly. Eventually I remember the games stored in the cupboard under the stairs. The dark shape that rears up beyond the door is my shadow. As I take Snakes and Ladders off the pile I'm reminded of playing it with Paula and her mother, who would smile whenever Paula clapped her hands at having climbed a ladder. I've brought the game into the dining room before I recall playing it with Beryl.

Was it our last game with her? It feels as if it should have been. Every time she cast a losing throw she moved one space ahead of it. "Can't get me," she would taunt the snakes. "You stay away from me, nasty squirmy things." I thought she was forbidding them to gobble her up as if she were one of her snacks between meals, the powdered sponge cakes that she'd grown more and more to resemble. Whenever she avoided a snake by expanding a move she peered at me out of the concealment of her puffed-up face. I felt challenged to react, and eventually I stopped my counter short of a snake. "Can't he count?" my aunt cried at once. "Go in the next box."

Once I'd descended the snake I complained, "Auntie Beryl keeps going where she shouldn't."

"Don't you dare say I can't count. They knew how to teach us when I was at school." This was the start of a diatribe that left her panting and clutching her chest while her face tried on a range of shades of grey. "Look what you've done," my father muttered in my ear while my mother tried to calm her down. When Beryl recaptured her wheezing breath she insisted on finishing the game, staring hard at me every time she was forced to land on a snake. She lost, and glared at me as she said, "Better never do anything wrong, even the tiniest thing. You don't know who'll be watching."

Of course I knew or feared I did. I wish I'd chosen another game to play with Paula and her family. Before long Gerald pretends one of his throws hasn't landed on a snake. "Fair play, now," I exhort, earning a scowl from Gerald and a look from his father that manages to be both disapproving and blank. Perhaps Geraldine misinterprets my comment, because soon she cheats too. "If we aren't going to play properly," I say without regarding anyone, "there's no point to the game." Not addressing somebody specific gives me a sense of including more people than are seated at the table, and no amount of glancing at the mirror can rid me of the impression. I've never been so glad to lose a game. "Will you excuse me?" I blurt as my chair stumbles backwards. "I've had quite a day. Time for bed."

My struggles to sleep only hold me awake. When at last the twins are coaxed up to their room and the adults retreat to theirs, I'm still attempting to fend off the memory of my final visit to my aunt's house. She was ill in bed, so shortly after the game of Snakes and Ladders that I felt responsible. She sent my mother out for cakes, though the remains of several were going stale in a box by her bed. There were crumbs on the coverlet and around her mouth, which looked swollen almost bloodlessly pale. I thought there was too much of her to be able to move until she dug her fingers into the bed and, having quivered into a sitting position that dislodged a musty shawl from her distended shoulders, reached for me. I took her hand as a preamble to begging forgiveness, but her cold spongy grasp felt as if it was on the way to becoming a substance other than flesh, which overwhelmed me with such panic that I couldn't speak. Perhaps she was aware of her overloaded heart, since she fixed me with eyes that were practically buried in her face. "I'll be watching," she said and expelled a breath that sounded close to a word. It was almost too loose to include consonants—it seemed as soft as her hand—but it could have been "Peep." I was terrified that it might also be her last breath, since it had intensified her grip on me. Eventually she drew another rattling breath but gave no sign of relaxing her clutch. Her eyes held me as a time even longer than a nightmare seemed to ooze by before I heard my mother letting herself into the house, when I was able to snatch my hand free and dash for the stairs. In less than a week my aunt was dead.

If I didn't see her again, being afraid to was almost as bad. Now that she was gone I thought she could be anywhere and capable of reading all my thoughts, especially the ones I was ashamed to have. I believed that thinking of her might bring her, perhaps in yet worse a form. I'd gathered that the dead lost weight, but I wasn't anxious to imagine how. Wouldn't it let her move faster? All these fears kept me company at night into my adolescence, when for a while I was even more nervous of seeing her face over the end of my bed. That never happened, but when at last I fall uneasily asleep I wake to see a shock of red hair duck below the footboard.

I'm almost quick enough to disguise my shriek as mirth once I realise that the glimpse included two small heads. "Good God," Bertie shouts from downstairs, "who was that?"

"Only me," I call. "Just a dream."

The twins can't hide their giggles. "No, it was us," cries Geraldine.

At least I've headed them off from greeting me with Beryl's word. Their father and to a lesser extent Paula give me such probing looks over breakfast that I feel bound to regain some credibility as an adult by enquiring "How was your search for investments?"

"Unfinished business," Bertie says.

"We were too busy wondering where you could have got to," Paula says.

"I hope I'm allowed to redeem myself. Where would you two like to go today?"

"Shopping," Geraldine says at once.

"Yes, shopping," Gerald agrees louder.

"Make sure you keep your phones switched on," their father says and frowns at me. "Do you still not own one?"

"There aren't that many people for me to call."

Paula offers to lend me hers, but the handful of unfamiliar technology would just be another cause for concern. At least we don't need to pass my aunt's house—we can take a bus. The twins insist on sitting upstairs to watch the parade of small shops interrupted by derelict properties. Wreaths on a lamppost enshrine a teenage car thief before we cross a bridge into the docks. I won't let the flowers remind me of my aunt, whose house is the best part of a mile away. The heads I see ducking behind the reflection in the window of the back seats belong to children. However little good they're up to, I ignore them, and they remain entirely hidden as we make for the stairs at our stop.

The pedestrian precinct appears to lead to a cathedral on the far side of the foreshortened river. The street enclosed by shops is crowded, largely with young girls pushing their siblings in buggies, if the toddlers aren't their offspring. The twins bypass discount stores on the way to a shopping mall, where the tiled floor slopes up to a food court flanked by clothes shops. Twin marts called Boyz and Girlz face each other across tables occupied by pensioners eking out cups of tea and families demolishing the contents of polystyrene cartons. "I'll be in there," Geraldine declares and runs across to Girlz.

"Wait and we'll come—" I might as well not have commenced, since as I turn to Gerald he dodges into Boyz. "Stay in the shops. Call me when you need me," I shout so loud that a little girl at a table renders her mouth clownish with a mis-aimed cream cake. Geraldine doesn't falter, and I'm not sure if she heard. As she vanishes into the shop beyond the diners I hurry after her brother.

Boyz is full of parents indulging or haranguing their children. When I can't immediately locate Gerald in the noisy aisles I feel convicted of negligence. He's at the rear of the shop, removing fat shoes from boxy alcoves on the wall. "Don't go out whatever you do. I'm just going to see your sister doesn't either," I tell him.

I can't see her in the other shop. I'm sidling between the tables when I grasp that I could have had Gerald phone for me to speak to her. It's just as far to go back now, and so I find my way through an untidy maze of abandoned chairs to Girlz. Any number of those, correctly spelled, are jangling racks of hangers and my nerves while selecting clothes to dispute with their parents, but none of them is Geraldine. I flurry up and down the aisles, back and forth to another catacomb of footwear, but she's nowhere to be seen.

"Geraldine," I plead in the faded voice my exertions have left me. Perhaps it's best that I can't raise it, since she must be in another shop. I didn't actually see her entering this one. As I dash outside I'm seized by a panic that tastes like all the food in the court turned stale. I need to borrow Gerald's mobile, but the thought makes me wonder if the twins could be using their phones to play a game at my expense—to co-ordinate how they'll keep hiding from me. I stare about in a desperate attempt to locate Geraldine, and catch sight of the top of her head in the clothes store next to Girlz.

"Just you stay there," I pant as I flounder through the entrance. It's clear that she's playing a trick, because it's a shop for adults; indeed, all the dresses that flap on racks in the breeze of my haste seem designed for the older woman. She's crouching behind a waist-high cabinet close to the wall. The cabinet quivers a little at my approach, and she stirs as if she's preparing to bolt for some other cover. "That's enough, Geraldine," I say and make, I hope, not too ungentle a grab. My foot catches on an edge of carpet, however, and I sprawl across the cabinet. Before I can regain any balance my fingers lodge in the dusty reddish hair.

Is it a wig on a dummy head? It comes away in my hand, but it isn't all that does. I manage not to distinguish any features of the tattered whitish item that dangles from it, clinging to my fingers until I hurl the tangled mass at the wall. I'm struggling to back away when the head jerks up to confront me with its eyes and the holes into which they've sunk. I shut mine as I thrust myself away from the cabinet, emitting a noise I would never have expected to make other than in the worst dream.

I'm quiet by the time the rescuers arrive to collect their children and me. It turns out that Geraldine was in a fitting room in Girlz. The twins forgot most of their differences so as to take charge, leading me out to a table where there seems to be an insistent smell of stale sponge cake. Nobody appears to have noticed anything wrong in the clothes shop except me. I'm given the front passenger seat in Bertie's car, which makes me feel like an overgrown child or put in a place of shame. The twins used their phones to communicate about me, having heard my cries, and to summon their parents. I gather that I'm especially to blame for refusing the loan of a mobile that would have prevented my losing the children and succumbing to panic.

I do my best to go along with this version of events. I apologise all the way home for being insufficiently advanced and hope the driver will decide this is enough. I help Paula make a salad, and eat up every slice of cold meat at dinner while I struggle to avoid thinking of another food. I let the children raid the cupboard under the stairs for games, although these keep us in the dining room. Sitting with my back to the mirror doesn't convince me we're alone, and perhaps my efforts to behave normally are too evident. I've dropped the dice several times to check that nobody is lurking under the table when Paula suggests an early night for all.

As I lie in bed, striving to fend off thoughts that feel capable of bringing their subject to me in the dark, I hear fragments of an argument. The twins are asleep or at any rate quiet. I'm wondering whether to intervene as diplomatically as possible when Paula's husband says "It's one thing your father being such an old woman—"

"I've told you not to call him that."

"—but today breaks the deal. I won't have him acting like that with my children."

There's more, not least about how they aren't just his, but the disagreements grow more muted, and I'm still hearing what he called me. It makes me feel alone, not only in the bed that's twice the size I need but also in the room. Somehow I sleep, and look for the twins at the foot of the bed when I waken, but perhaps they've been advised to stay away. They're so subdued at breakfast that I'm not entirely surprised when Paula says "Dad, we're truly sorry but we have to go home. I'll come and see you again soon, I promise."

I refrain from asking Bertie whether he'll be returning in search of investments. Once all the suitcases have been wedged into the boot of the Jaguar I give the twins all the kisses they can stand, along with twenty pounds each that feels like buying affection, and deliver a token handshake to Paula's husband before competing with her for the longest hug. As I wave the car downhill while the children's faces dwindle in the rear window, I could imagine that the windmills on the bay are mimicking my gesture. I turn back to the house and am halted by the view into the dining room.

The family didn't clear away their last game. It's Snakes and Ladders, and I could imagine they left it for me to play with a companion. I slam the front door and hurry into the room. I'm not anxious to share the house with the reminder that the game brings. I stoop so fast to pick up the box from the floor that an ache tweaks my spine. As I straighten, it's almost enough to distract me from the sight of my head bobbing up in the mirror.

But it isn't in the mirror, nor is it my head. It's on the far side of the table, though it has left even more of its face elsewhere. It still has eyes, glinting deep in their holes. Perhaps it is indeed here for a game, and if I join in it may eventually tire of playing. I can think of no other way to deal with it. I drop the box and crouch painfully, and once my playmate imitates me I poke my head above the table as it does. "Peep," I cry, though I'm terrified to hear an answer. "Peep."

2008

Double Room

First published in The New Uncanny, 2008

You aren't with us, are you?"

"I'd like to be."

"What's your name?" the other girl said, looking impudently quizzical. "You've seen ours."

He was glad if they assumed he'd been squinting in the dimness of the hotel bar only at the badges pinned above their long slim thighs. Each badge bore the image of a winged young woman dressed in a chain-mail bikini and a virtually transparent robe, an outfit both girls had copied apart from the wings. The sword in her hand indicated their names, Primmy and Barbaria. "Edwin Ferguson," he said.

"That's an old name," Primmy commented.

"You need to be old to know all the tricks."

"I like a good trick, don't you, Primmy? Are you going to show us yours, Edwin?"

However guilty he couldn't help feeling, he thought he might feel worse if he let the opportunity pass. "I only give private performances," he said.

"Is it going to be all for us?" Primmy cried.

Barbaria bent her head and an eyebrow towards her, prompting Ferguson to assure the girls "It's all right, I didn't think you were angels."

"Why not?" Primmy demanded.

He pointed at her badge—at least, he hoped it was clear that was where he was pointing. "No wings."

"Sometimes we are," Barbaria said. "We can be all kinds."

"Depends who we're with."

"I'm looking forward to finding out. What roles you like playing, I mean."

He made the sudden silence the occasion for a sip of Scotch followed by a larger one. "You're looking at them," Barbaria said.

"And they're all you'll be seeing," Primmy said.

He was able to mistake this for a promise until they turned away as a man strolled into the bar. He was at least as old as Ferguson and even stouter, with greying hair that Ferguson thought far too long for his age. Nevertheless the girls stood up eagerly, although Primmy lingered to say "Thanks for the fun."

"Is that all?" When she tried to appear prim instead of primitive Ferguson was provoked to add "Maybe you shouldn't come out in public dressed like that. You might give some people the wrong idea."

"We were at the masquerade."

"You've been doing some of that all right." Loud enough for her to catch he said "And what do you get up to the rest of the time?"

Barbaria turned long enough to inform him "We're social workers."

"Is that what they call it these days?" he might have retorted except for feeling obsolete. As the girls each took the newcomer by an arm Ferguson saw that the man's badge depicted a bronzed bruiser in sandals and loincloth and crown, who was brandishing a blade at a lengthy name Ferguson felt expected to recognise. He drained his Scotch and murmured to the barman "Who's he?"

"One of their writers."

In his sleeveless denim outfit the fellow didn't look much like one, or his age. Was being a writer all it took to have girls hanging on your arms? Perhaps now Ferguson had time to write the book he imagined he contained, the rest would follow. The idea seemed so variously disloyal that he felt his face glow like the light of a brake he'd applied too belatedly to himself, and he hurried not much better than blindly out of the bar.

He hadn't reached the lifts when the lobby grew loudly crowded with people emerging from the conference suite. While a few were fantastically costumed, most struck him as not much less anonymous and awkward than himself. The hotel notice-board identified their event as a Fantasy Weekend, but it didn't mean the kind of fantasy he'd yielded to imagining. At least, it certainly didn't for him.

He kept his back to the mirror in the lift once he'd jabbed the button. On its way the lift opened to admit a view of the second-floor corridor, where badged individuals and their noise and drinks were spilling out of a room. For a moment he wished he were in there, but the room sounded too small for the revellers who were. That was one reason why the wish fell away before the corridor did.

The adjacent lift had just delivered someone to the third floor. Ferguson glimpsed their shadow vanishing around the corner ahead as he made for his room. From the corner he saw the door next to his standing ajar. "Good night," he called as it shut, because the clinically pallid corridor with its equally colourless doors separated by timid abstract pastels felt like losing all sense of himself. His last word was echoed in such a muffled voice that he couldn't be sure of its gender.

Once the lock on his door had given his card the green light he left the card in a slot inside the stubby vestibule to drape the room with indirect lighting. The word flat might have been invented for the accommodation: the boxy wardrobe and dressing-table, the single angular nominally padded chair, the double bed tucking nothingness up tight. Perhaps the midget television might provide some company—distraction, at any rate.

A fat old man with a threadbare grizzly scalp met him in the bathroom. The sight fired up the taste of his Indian dinner, the taste of which rose in a volcanic belch. "Pardon," he said almost as inadvertently, rousing a muffled echo. He wasn't apologising to his reflection; he didn't even watch the old fool mouth the syllables. He lifted the toilet seat and its lid with the toe of his shoe, and the plastic ovals rapped the tiled wall. The small room seemed to have an echo for everything. He dragged his baggy zip down to fumble himself forth, and had hardly started pouring when the noise became a duet. The other performer was in the adjoining bathroom.

Urinating in company always made Ferguson feel like a shy child, and he faltered to a dribble that trailed off to a drip. Was his neighbour suffering from the identical problem? Straining never helped, and the silence aggravated his inhibition just as much. He could only hum to lessen his awareness or pretend it wasn't troubling him. "Let's Do It" always came into his head on these occasions, and he might have added words—one of his rhymes for bees, "People who have finished having pees" or "Women who are down upon their knees", that used to amuse Elizabeth whenever he sang them at random—if his neighbour hadn't joined in.

He still couldn't identify the gender from the voice. His own was shriller than it had any right or need to be. Perhaps his fellow guest was borrowing his solution to the urinary annoyance; they hummed louder once Ferguson did. He squeezed his eyes shut and then managed to relax them, and was rewarded with activity where it mattered. Something had worked for his neighbour as well. The streams dwindled and fell silent simultaneously, and he was shaking himself dry when he heard a clink through the wall.

His neighbour had put a glass down, but it was ridiculous to fancy they'd been using a glassful of water to imitate his sounds. He pulled a tissue out of the box by the sink to blow his nose. As he dropped the wad in the toilet he heard a nasal trumpeting in the adjacent bathroom.

If it sounded very much like his, did it have much leeway to sound different? Hooking the toilet seat with the side of his shoe, he let it drop along with its lid on the pedestal, and was unsurprised to hear an echo through the wall. Both toilets flushed while he turned back to the sink. He had barely started brushing his teeth when the sound was imitated in the other bathroom.

The old wreck in the mirror let his wrinkled mouth hang open, displaying all his front teeth and the gap one had left last month. How could such a tiny noise be audible through the wall? How could his? He decided he'd heard an echo until another bout of brushing was copied beyond the mockingly blank wall. His neighbour must be making the noise in some other way, unless they were attacking their teeth with a savagery that sounded demonic. "Hope they all drop out of your head," Ferguson spluttered and spat in the sink.

The answering spit was fierce enough for an insult. The words that followed were repeated in exactly Ferguson's tone, as far as he could distinguish the qualities of the voice. Was it deliberately muffled? Perhaps the speaker was obscuring it with a hand, hiding their ruined teeth from the other mirror, a notion that prompted Ferguson to blurt "What must you look like?"

Although he thought he'd only muttered it, the question came back through the wall. The idiotic trick must be affecting him more than he realised. "I know how I look," he couldn't help retorting as he wiped foam off his lips. "I think I'm better off not knowing how you do."

He was unable to imagine a sufficiently grotesque costume for them. Perhaps they passed for normal until an event like this weekend's gave them licence not to be, Well before they finished echoing his latest remarks he was sick of the joke, if it could be called one. "Very funny," he responded, wondering why he'd waited for the mimicry to finish. "Thanks for the laugh. Just what I needed. I haven't been so entertained since—"

He didn't know. When the partial sentence came back neutered through the wall, he had the uneasy idea that the imitator was about to complete it for him. It faltered as he had, but he wasn't about to finish it off. He couldn't just blame the clown beyond the wall for the whole asinine situation; there was a clown in here too, looking foolish and pathetic, not to mention incapable of controlling his own behaviour. If he didn't make any more noise, the other would have nothing to mimic. He turned off the light, muting the switch with his hand, before tiptoeing out of the room.

For the duration of a couple of prolonged but silent breaths he was able to enjoy the possibility that his neighbour might be lingering in the bathroom for another noise to echo, and then the enforced hush set about troubling him. It emphasised the anonymity of the bedroom, which felt close to empty even of him. He wasn't going to be forced to act as if he weren't there. Grabbing the remote control from the shelf that enthroned the dwarf television, he threw himself on the bed.

Did he just hear the springs yield beneath him, or was there an answering twang in the adjacent bedroom? He supported his shoulders with a pillow and awakened the television with a shrill whisper of static. Dismissing the Frugotel information menu, he began to search the channels: a comedy film teeming with teenagers even louder than the party he'd seen from the lift, a report of a polo game where all the players were in wheelchairs, a documentary about a drug that was meant to retard ageing, an episode of a reality series called Fostered for a Fortnight, another by the name of From a Previous Relationship... He hadn't reached the second channel when, with barely a second's delay each time, a television beyond the wall behind his head commenced dogging his progress.

His neighbour was entitled to watch television too. The order of the browsing needn't be significant, since it was the obvious one. Ferguson felt irrational for wondering what would happen if he reversed it—at least, until he did so and heard the other television copy him. Changing channels at random produced the same result, and he had to struggle not to shout at the wall. How could he watch the programme he'd been tempted to? Without the sound, of course.

He buttoned it before poking the keys to summon the Frugrownup channel, where he came in some way through an act of the kind the channel offered the no doubt solitary members of its audience. The rhythmic activity was as noiseless as it was vigorous, so that he couldn't help fancying that the participants were all straining to produce a sound. At least he'd called up silence in the next room too, and his body had begun to show signs of emulating that of the man on the screen by the time he heard a noise through the wall.

Somebody was panting. It grew louder and more dramatic, keeping pace with the efforts on the television. His neighbour had given in to the same temptation, Ferguson tried to think, but weren't the gasps too theatrical even for this sort of film, and oddly androgynous? Was the other guest producing them to taunt him? Without question there was just a solitary voice, and he could hear faint laughter too. It was muffled by distance, unless there were more people in the next room, covering their mouths so as to titter at his situation. That was beginning to seem as contemptible as his attempts to pick up the girls in the bar. He switched off the television, and the panting stopped at once.

He lurched away from the bed and stumbled to the window. The hotel was indeed reflected across the deserted downtown street, where the front of a building was largely composed of glass. He could see his room and his faint self in the elongated window of an unlit office, but no sign of the next room. Could its occupant really have seen the reflection of the programme Ferguson had been watching? Perhaps they were using binoculars, or their eyes were keener than his. He dragged the dun curtains together, to be rewarded by a clash of curtain rings on the far side of the wall.

"Show's over," he mouthed and saw the old man beyond the dressing-table risk a triumphant grin. "Try and get to me now," they both said silently as he began to undress. He heard no further sound through the wall as he dumped his clothes on the chair and wriggled under the sheet and the dishevelled quilt before darkening the room.

The silence in the other one felt so frustrated that he nearly laughed aloud, but he wasn't about to invite an imitation. He closed his eyes and edged the quilt over his exposed ear and sought the dark. It swarmed with thoughts, of which the most bearable was the book he'd imagined writing. Even this seemed potentially troubling now—the idea of a couple who fell in love at first sight only to be separated for the rest of their lives. When at last they met again they would be too changed and too senile to recognise each other. In their final moments one would regain the memory, which would seem to keep them together for eternity. Who would have it, or could it somehow be granted to both? The more Ferguson worried the idea the less likely it felt, and he was glad when the Scotch and the bottle of wine he'd had at dinner conspired to sink him in the dark.

A voice wakened him. He thought it was his own, despite its lack of shape. "Elizabeth," it repeated, or more accurately "Livadeth." It was talking in its sleep—no, replicating how he must have talked in his. "Weary of you," it said.

He wouldn't have said that, ever. He must have been asking where she was. "I bloody am of you," he informed his imitator. As soon as the remark started to be echoed he thumped the wall above the rudimentary headboard. "Enough," he yelled. "Enough."

The thumping was mimicked, and so was every repetition of the word. He might have been competing for the last one. He groped for the light switch above the ledge that was Frugotel's version of a bedside table, and was marching or at any rate limping at speed towards the corridor before he grasped that he shouldn't leave the room while he was naked. Grabbing his trousers, he danced an ungainly impromptu hornpipe to don them, accompanied by echoes next door of the thuds of his bare feet. This enraged him so much that he almost forgot to retrieve his key as he stalked into the corridor.

It was deserted. If there was muffled laughter, surely it was downstairs. He pounded on the next door with both fists, so hard that the plastic digits of its number seemed to tremble. No doubt that was partly because of the pounding that answered his. "Stop this bloody game right now," he shouted. "Normal people need their sleep."

He was echoed so closely that they might as well have been speaking in chorus. "That's all. You've had—" he said and felt idiotic for attempting to catch the imitator out by stopping unexpectedly, all the more so when it didn't work. "You've had your chance," he declared and shoved his face at the spyhole in the door. The darkness beyond it only convinced him that he was being observed. Having dealt the door a final thump, he tramped to grab the phone from the ledge by his bed.

The receptionist hadn't finished announcing herself when he said "Can you do something about whoever's next door?"

"What seems to be the problem, sir?"

"They're—" He might have demanded whether she could hear the echo of his side of the conversation, but he didn't want to seem irrational. "They're making all sorts of noise," he said. "I've asked them to stop but they won't."

"Which room is that, sir?"

"They're in 339."

"Just a moment." After several of those the phone rang in the next room. It was answered immediately, but only by a childish imitation. "Ring ring," the voice said in falsetto. "Ring ring."

The phone fell silent, and so did the mimicry. As he strained to hear more than the labouring of his heart, the receptionist said "Is that Mr Ferguson?"

"There's just me here, yes. Why?"

"I'm afraid you're mistaken."

"What do you mean?"

"We've got nobody in 339."

"Don't give me that. You told me you were full. You couldn't change my booking."

"It was a late cancellation."

"Well, someone's in there. I can hear them. I've heard them all the time we've been talking. Maybe some of this weird lot you're full up with have managed to get in." The muttered repetition of his protests had begun to madden him. "Don't take my word for it," he urged. "Go and see."

There was silence at his ear and beyond the wall. Eventually the receptionist said "Somebody will come up."

Ferguson replaced the receiver and was devoting his energy to making no further sound when he wondered if his complaints might have warned off his tormentor. Suppose the person fled and left him looking like a fool? He sprinted to the door despite the twinges of his heart and leaned into the corridor. It was empty, and his neighbour hadn't had time to dodge out of sight along it. He glared towards 339 until he heard a lift hum and stop humming, and a large man in the yellow Frugotel uniform appeared around the corner.

Other than frowning at Ferguson, he refrained from any comment. Once he'd finished peering through the spyhole he rapped on the door of 339. "Staff," he called. "Can I have a word, please."

Ferguson wouldn't have been surprised if the man had received every one of them back, but apparently the prankster wasn't so easily tempted. The man knocked harder and then slid a card into the lock. Brandishing the card like an identification and a threat, he advanced into the room. Ferguson mostly heard his own heart, but there were also the click of a light switch and the scrawny rattle of a shower curtain. He waited for the sounds to be followed up, and then he snatched his key card out of the slot on the wall and padded heavily into the corridor. "What's the hold-up? Who—"

He faltered, not just because the next room was almost indistinguishably similar to his. The Frugotel employee was staring at him across the tucked-in bed. "It's like Reception told you, sir. Nobody's in this room."

"You are," Ferguson thought of retorting, but demanded "Have you looked in the wardrobe?"

The man lingered over looking at him, so that Ferguson wasn't far from opening it by the time the employee did. "Nobody," he said at once. "Nobody's been here. Now if you wouldn't—"

A woman's peevishly sleepy protest interrupted him. "What's going on now?"

She was in the room opposite Ferguson's. From the threshold her husband or a man performing some of the functions of one informed her "It's the old hooligan that was making all the row out here before."

Ferguson was sure he recognised one of the rowdy drinkers from the floor below. "That's more your style, isn't it? I thought people were meant to keep their drinks in the bar."

He wouldn't have minded if the hotel employee had asked what he meant, but it was the man across the corridor who spoke. "You know, he looks like the old reprobate Primmy said was trying to get off with her and Barbaria when they just wanted a quiet drink."

"I don't think any of you know how to be quiet," Ferguson retorted and might have said more if the man hadn't called "Good God, he's showing everyone what it sounded like he wanted to show them."

Ferguson glanced down to find his flies gaping wide. While his member had the grace to hide its head, its mat as grey as dust was well in evidence. "Forgive me," he gasped, yanking up the zip so fiercely that it came close to scalping his crotch. "I'm a bit distracted. It's not long since I lost my wife."

"Then what are you staying here for?" the offstage woman across the corridor wanted everyone to know.

"We'd already booked. I didn't want to let the hotel down. I thought it'd be better than staying at home by myself. We often used to come here," Ferguson added as best he could for a nervous belch, which he tried to explain by saying "It was one of our favourite towns to eat in."

None of this seemed adequate, but before Ferguson could think of a further excuse the man said "We can tell."

"We're sorry to hear of your tragedy. Please accept our sincerest condolences." It was unclear whether the employee was speaking for Frugotel or on behalf of the couple opposite. Having locked 339, he said "Will you be all right now?"

"I haven't been hearing things, if that's what you mean. That's to say I have. I certainly have." Ferguson folded his arms in case this lent him some authority and to hide his hirsute obese breasts. "I've lost my wife," he said, "not my mind."

He had time to interpret the awkwardness of the silence in various ways before the uniformed man said "We don't want any more of a disturbance. Most of our guests are asleep."

"I don't. I'd like to be," Ferguson said and backed into his room. He'd managed not to slam the door when he wished he'd left his listeners a better image of Elizabeth. Perhaps they imagined an old woman as overfed as he was, not the girl he'd carried over a stream and to a gate a quarter of a mile up the sunny slope beyond it, or the mother who'd perched their daughter on her shoulders when they'd returned for the same hillside climb, or the grandmother who'd continued to outdistance him on their countryside walks even once those had grown shorter and more effortful. He bruised his forehead against the door as he peered through the spyhole. If anyone was out there he was going to let them know that he and more importantly Elizabeth had come here for the countryside, not just the food. The corridor was deserted and silent, however. "It's all your fault," he almost yelled at the next room, instead mouthing the words. He tiptoed across the prickly carpet to stand by the bed, where he unbuttoned his trousers and eased the zip down and stepped clumsily but silently out of them. Once they were heaped on the floor he sat so gradually on the bed that the springs stayed as quiet as he was. He inched under the bedclothes and stood a pillow on end to support his raised head while he waited for some sound from the next room.

Could the imitator have gone away? Might they have fled as soon as he'd had the receptionist phone the room? He was convinced that he'd heard them imitating his subsequent protests, but if he was left alone at last, surely it was all that mattered. He listened to the hush until it let him breathe freely and slowed his heart, and then he reached to lay the pillow down. His knuckles bumped the headboard, and he heard an answering rap through the wall.

He might have grabbed the phone to demand another visit from the staff or, better, have dashed into the corridor to cause uproar outside 339, ensuring that the intruder couldn't escape unseen this time. Instead he spoke, quite conversationally. "I know you're there."

"I loathed her hair."

He wanted to believe he'd misheard or imagined the voice, which was more muffled than ever. Even when Elizabeth's hair had grown so thin her scalp showed through, he'd stroked it in the hope she would forget about its state. He hardly knew whom he was addressing as he objected "I never said that."

"I never said fat."

"That's right, I didn't."

"That's right, I did it."

"No, not that either."

"Oh, what a liar."

"That's just not true."

"That just stopped you."

Ferguson had begun to feel trapped in an infantile game by someone who'd succumbed to their second childhood if not worse. He could hardly wait for them to finish echoing or rather misrepresenting him before he responded—he was becoming desperate to think of an answer they couldn't turn into a gibe. He might have imagined he was being tricked into selecting words his tormentor found it easy to mishear. Although he tried to take his time, the best he could produce was "What a lie."

The indefinite voice didn't bother imitating his pause. "Watched her die."

While there was no denying this, he didn't need to admit "That's true."

"Not you."

He was afraid his words might take him unawares. "All right," he mumbled, "let's have silence."

"All right, let's have slyness."

He found his mouth with a hand, flattening his lips to keep in any further inadvertent speech. He ached to sleep, but suppose it released his voice? Even the notion of dozing made him feel threatened by a dream—an ill-defined image of somebody wakening in a dark place and struggling to communicate by whatever clumsy methods they still had. His mind recoiled, but staying awake was no refuge. Soon the voice in the next room began to speak.

He bore it mutely as long as he could, and then he tried to deny all it said. No, he hadn't ever even slightly wanted her to die. No, he hadn't grown tired of holding her hand as she lay in bed open-mouthed as a stranded fish. No, he hadn't wished as her hand grew slack yet again that this time it had slackened for good. No, he hadn't been disgusted by having to dab at her drool and deal with her other secretions. No, he hadn't sneaked out of their room to pray for an end to it all. By now he was striving to blot out the voice, but it went inexorably on until he lost any sense of which of them was trying to contradict the other. "All right," he cried at last. "I did, but only for her sake."

If this was echoed, it was by the flatness of the hotel room. He felt abruptly far too alone in the dark. When he switched on the light, the room looked as impersonal as a hospital ward—the kind of ward where Elizabeth hadn't wanted to spend her last weeks. His scattered belongings were at best pathetic attempts to make some kind of claim for his presence. "I shouldn't have come," he whispered. "There's nothing here."

He didn't know who was supposed to overhear this, or perhaps he did. "It didn't mean anything with those girls," he tried saying. "They wouldn't have wanted me. Nobody would."

He was hoping to be contradicted, but the only sounds were his—the creak of the bed as he shifted his weight, the intermittent urgency of his heartbeat. "You're still there, aren't you?" he said louder. "Say you're there. Say anything you like."

His voice made the room sound as small and flatly featureless as a cell. So did his rapping and then knocking on the wall. It was too late to wonder what he'd done to earn the answering silence. If he caused much more noise the hotel staff might intervene again and drive away for good whoever had been there. He could still use the phone, and he keyed 339, though his fingers were so unsteady that their fat tips almost added extra numbers. He heard the other phone ring in the dark, and continue ringing and at last fall silent, because he'd laid the receiver to rest in its cold plastic trench. After that there was silence—for all the long night, silence.

The Long Way

First published as the chapbook The Long Way, 2008

It must have been late autumn. Because everything was bare I saw inside the house.

Dead leaves had been scuttling around me all the way from home. A chill wind kept trying to shrink my face. The sky looked thin with ice, almost as white as the matching houses that made up the estate. Some of the old people who'd been rehoused wouldn't have known where they were on it except for the little wood, where my uncle Philip used to say the council left some trees so they could call it the Greenwood Estate. Nobody was supposed to be living in the three streets around the wood when I used to walk across the estate to help him shop.

So many people in Copse View and Arbour Street and Shady Lane had complained about children climbing from trees and swinging from ropes and playing hide and seek that the council put a fence up, but then teenagers used the wood for sex and drink and drugs. Some dealers moved into Shady Lane, and my uncle said it got shadier, and the next road turned into Cops View. He said the other one should be called A Whore Street, though my parents told him not to let me hear. Then the council moved all the tenants out of the triangle, even the old people who'd complained about the children, and boarded up the houses. By the time I was helping my uncle, people had broken in. They'd left Copse View alone except for one house in the middle of the terrace. Perhaps they'd gone for that one because the boards they'd strewn around the weedy garden looked rotten. They'd uncovered the front door and the downstairs window, but I could never see in for the reflection of sunlight on leaves. Now there weren't many leaves and the sun had a cataract, and the view into the front room was clear. The only furniture was an easy chair with a fractured arm. The chair had a pattern like shadows of ferns and wore a yellowish circular antimacassar. The pinstriped wallpaper was black and white too. A set of shelves was coming loose from the back wall but still displaying a plate printed with a portrait of the queen. Beside the shelves a door was just about open, framing part of a dimmer room.

I wondered why the door was there. In our house you entered the rooms from the hall. My uncle had an extra door made so he could use his wheelchair, and I supposed whoever had lived in this house might have been disabled too. There was a faint hint of a shape beyond the doorway, and I peered over the low garden wall until my eyes ached. Was it a full-length portrait or a life-size dummy? It looked as if it had been on the kind of diet they warned the girls about at school. As I made out its arms I began to think they could reach not just through the doorway but across far too much of the room, and then I saw that they were sticks on which it was leaning slightly forward—sticks not much thinner than its arms. I couldn't distinguish its gender or how it was dressed or even its face. Perhaps it was keeping so still in the hope of going unnoticed, unless it was challenging me to object to its presence. I was happy to leave it alone and head for my uncle's.

He lived on Pasture Boulevard, where he said the only signs of pasture were the lorries that drove past your bedroom all night. The trees along the central reservation were leafy just with litter. My uncle was sitting in the hall of the house where he lived on the ground floor, and wheeled himself out as soon as he saw me. "Sorry I made you wait, Uncle Philip," I said.

"I'll wait for anything that's worth the wait." Having raised a thumb to show this meant me, he said "And what's my name again, Craig?"

"Phil," I had to say, though my parents said I was too young to.

"That's the man. Don't be shy of speaking up. Ready for the go?"

He might have been starting a race at the school where he'd taught physical education—teaching pee, he called it—until he had his first stroke. When I made to push the chair he brought his eyebrows down and thrust his thick lips forward, which might have frightened his pupils but now made his big square face seem to be trying to shrink as the rest of him had. "Never make it easy, Craig," he said. "You don't want my arms going on strike."

I trotted beside him to the Frugo supermarket that had done for most of the shops that were supposed to make the estate feel like a village. Whenever a Frugo lorry thundered past us he would mutter "There's some petrol for your lungs" or "Hold your breath." In the supermarket he flung a week's supply of healthy food from the Frugorganic section into the trolley and bought me a Frugoat bar, joking as usual about how they'd turned the oats into an animal. I pushed the trolley to his flat and helped him unload it and took it back to Frugo. When I passed his window again he opened it, flapping the sports day posters he'd tacked to the wall of the room, to shout "See you in a week if you haven't got yourself a girlfriend."

I had the books I borrowed from the public library instead, but I didn't need him to announce my deficiency. I knew he disapproved of girls for boys my age—they sapped your energy, he said. "I'll always come," I promised and made for Copse View, where the trees looked eager to wave me on. The wind gave up pushing me as I reached them, and I stopped at the house where the boards had been pulled down. As I peered across the front room, resting my fists on the crumbling wall, my eyes began to ache again. However much I stared, the dim figure with the sticks didn't seem to have moved—not in an hour and a half. It had to be a picture; why shouldn't whoever used to live there have put a poster up? I felt worse than stupid for taking so long to realise. My parents and the English teacher at my school said I had imagination, but I could do without that much.

Ten minutes brought me home to Woody Rise. "Well, would he?" my uncle used to say even after my parents gave up laughing or groaning. The houses on this edge of the estate were as big as his but meant for one family each—they looked as if they were trying to pass for part of the suburb that once had the estate for a park. My father was carrying fistfuls of cutlery along the hall. "Here's the boy who cares," he called, and asked me "How's the wheelie kid?"

"Tom," my mother rebuked him from the kitchen.

I thought he deserved more reproof when I wasn't even supposed to shorten my uncle's name, but all I said was "Good."

As my father repeated this several times my mother said "Let's eat in here. Quick as you like, Craig. We've people coming round for a Homewatch meeting."

"I thought you were going out."

"Just put your coat on your chair for now. We've rescheduled our pupils for tomorrow. Didn't we say?"

She always seemed resentful if I forgot whichever extra job they were doing when. "I suppose you must have," I tried pretending.

"Had you found some mischief to get up to, Craig?" my father said. "Has she got a name?"

"I hope not," my mother said. "You can welcome the guests if you like, Craig."

"He's already looked after my brother, Rosie."

"And some of us have done more." In the main this was aimed at my father, and she said more gently "All right, Craig. I expect you want to be on your own for a change."

I would rather have been with them by ourselves—not so much at dinner, where I always felt they were waiting for me to drop cutlery or spill food. I managed to conquer the spaghetti bolognese by cutting up the pasta with my fork, though my mother didn't approve much of that either. Once I'd washed up for everyone I was able to take refuge in my bedroom before all the neighbours came to discuss watching out for burglars and car thieves and door-to-door con people and other types to be afraid of. I needed to be alone to write.

Nobody knew I did. My stories tried to be like the kind of film my parents wouldn't let me watch. That night I wrote about a girl whose car broke down miles from anywhere, and the only place she could ask for help was a house full of people who wouldn't come to her. The house was haunted by a maniac who cut off people's feet with a chainsaw so they couldn't escape. I frightened myself with this more than I enjoyed, and when I went to sleep despite the murmur of neighbours downstairs I dreamed that if I opened my eyes I would see a figure standing absolutely still at the end of the bed. I looked once and saw no silhouette against the glow from the next street, but it took me a while to go back to sleep.

For most of Sunday my parents were out of the house. As if they hadn't had enough of teaching at school all week, my mother did her best to coax adults to read and write while my father educated people about computers. They couldn't help reminding me of my school, where I wasn't too unhappy so long as I wasn't noticed. It was in the suburb next to the estate, and some of the boys liked to punch me for stealing their park even though none of us was alive when the estate was built, while a few of the girls seemed to want me to act as uncouth as they thought people from it should be. I tried to keep out of all their ways and not to attract any questions in class. My work proved I wasn't stupid, which was all that mattered to me. I liked English best, except when the teacher made me read out my work. I would mumble and stammer and squirm and blush until the ordeal was done. I hated her and everyone else who could hear my helplessly unmodulated voice, most of all myself.

I wouldn't have dared admit to anyone at school that I quite liked most homework. I could take my own time with it, and there was nobody to distract me, since my parents were at night school several evenings, either teaching or improving their degrees. It must have been hard to pay the mortgage even with two teachers' salaries, but I also thought they were competing with each other for how much they could achieve, and perhaps with my uncle as well. All this left me feeling I should do more for him, but there was no more he would let me do.

Soon it was Saturday again. I was eager to look at the house on Copse View, but once it was in sight I felt oddly nervous. I wasn't going to avoid it by walking around the triangle. That would make me late for my uncle, and I could imagine what he would think of my behaviour if he knew. The sky had turned to chalk, and the sun was a round lump of it caught in the stripped treetops; in the flat pale light the houses looked brittle as shell. The light lay inert in the front room of the abandoned house. The figure with the sticks was there, in exactly the same stance. It wasn't in the same place, though. It had come into the room.

At least, it was leaning through the doorway. It looked poised to jerk the sticks up at me, unless it was about to use them to spring like a huge insect across the room. While the sunlight didn't spare the meagre furniture—the ferny chair and its discoloured antimacassar, the plate with the queen's face on the askew shelf still clinging to the pinstriped wall—it fell short of illuminating the occupier. I could just distinguish that the emaciated shape was dressed in some tattered material—covered with it, at any rate. While the overall impression was greyish, patches were as yellowed as the antimacassar, though I couldn't tell whether these were part of the clothes or showing through. This was also the case with the head. It appeared to be hairless, but I couldn't make out any of the face. When my eyes began to sting with trying I took a thoughtless step towards the garden wall, and then

I took several back, enough to trip over the kerb. The instant I regained my balance I dashed out of Copse View.

Perhaps there was a flaw in the window, or the glass was so grimy that it blurred the person in the room, though not the other contents. Perhaps the occupant was wearing some kind of veil. Once I managed to have these thoughts they slowed me down, but not much, and I was breathing hard when I reached my uncle's. He was sitting in the hall again. "All right, Craig, I wasn't going anywhere," he said. "Training for a race?"

Before I could answer he said "Forget I asked. I know the schools won't let you compete any more."

I felt as if he didn't just mean at sports. "I can," I blurted and went red.

"I expect if you think you can that counts."

As we made for Frugo I set out to convince him in a way I thought he would approve of, but he fell behind alongside a lorry not much shorter than a dozen houses. "Don't let me hold you up," he gasped, "if you've got somewhere you'd rather be."

"I thought you liked to go fast. I thought it was how you kept fit."

"That's a lot of past tense. See, you're not the only one that knows his grammar."

I was reminded of a Christmas when my mother told him after some bottles of wine that he was more concerned with muscles than minds. He was still teaching then, and I'd have hoped he would have forgotten by now. He hardly spoke in the supermarket, not even bothering to make his weekly joke as he bought my Frugoat bar. I wondered if I'd exhausted him by forcing him to race, especially when he didn't head for home as fast as I could push the laden trolley. I was dismayed to think he could end up no more mobile than the figure with the sticks.

I helped him unload the shopping and sped the trolley back to Frugo. Did he have a struggle to raise the window as he saw me outside his flat? "Thanks for escorting an old tetch," he called. "Go and make us all proud for a week."

He'd left me feeling ashamed to be timid, which meant not avoiding Copse View. As I marched along the deserted street I thought there was no need to look into the house. I was almost past it when the sense of something eager to be seen dragged my head around. One glimpse was enough to send me fleeing home. The figure was still blurred, though the queen's face on the plate beside the doorway was absolutely clear, but there was no question that the occupant had moved. It was leaning forward on its sticks at least a foot inside the room.

I didn't stop walking very fast until I'd slammed the front door behind me. I wouldn't have been so forceful if I'd realised my parents were home. "That was an entrance," said my father. "Anything amiss we should know about?"

"We certainly should," said my mother.

"I was just seeing if I could run all the way home."

"Don't take your uncle too much to heart," my mother said. "There are better ways for you to impress."

On impulse I showed them my homework books. My father pointed out where the punctuation in my mathematics work was wrong, and my mother wished I'd written about real life and ordinary people instead of ghosts in my essay on the last book I'd read. "Good try," she told me, and my father added "Better next time, eh?"

I was tempted to show them my stories, but I was sure they wouldn't approve. I stayed away from writing any that weekend, because the only ideas I had were about figures that stayed too still or not still enough. I tried not to think about them after dark, and told myself that by the time I went to my uncle's again, whatever was happening on Copse View might have given up for lack of an audience or been sorted out by someone else. But I was there much sooner than next week.

It was Sunday afternoon. While my mother peeled potatoes I was popping peas out of their pods and relishing their clatter in a saucepan. A piece of beef was defrosting in a pool of blood. My father gazed at it for a while and said "That'd do for four of us. We haven't had Phil over for a while."

"We haven't," said my mother.

Although I wouldn't have taken this for enthusiasm, my father said "I'll give him a tinkle."

Surely my uncle could take a taxi—surely nobody would expect me to collect him and help him back to his flat after dark. I squeezed a pod in my fist while I listened to my father on the phone, but there was silence except for the scraping of my mother's knife. My hand was clammy with vegetable juice by the time my father said "He's not answering. That isn't like him."

"Sometimes he isn't much like him these days," said my mother.

"Can you go over and see what's up, Craig?"

As I rubbed my hands together I wondered whether any more of me had turned as green. "Don't you want me to finish these?" I pleaded.

"I'll take over kitchen duty."

My last hope was that my mother would object, but she said "Wash your hands for heaven's sake, Craig. Just don't be long."

While night wouldn't officially fall for an hour, the overcast sky gave me a preview. I was in sight of the woods when I noticed a gap in the railings on Shady Lane. Hadn't I seen another on Arbour Street? Certainly a path had been made through the shrubs from the opening off Shady Lane. It wound between the trees not too far from Copse View.

As I dodged along it bushes and trees kept blocking my view of the boarded-up houses. I couldn't help glancing at the vandalised house; perhaps I thought the distance made me safe. The scrawny figure hadn't changed its posture or its patchwork appearance. It looked as if it was craning forward to watch me or threatening worse. Overnight it had moved as much closer to the street as it had during the whole of the previous week.

I nearly forced my own way through the undergrowth to leave the sight behind. I was afraid I'd encouraged the figure to advance by trying to see it, perhaps even by thinking about it. Had the vandals fled once they'd seen inside the house? No wonder they'd left the rest of the street alone. I fancied the occupant might especially dislike people of my age, even though I hadn't been among those who'd rampaged in the woods. I was almost blind with panic and the early twilight by the time I fought off the last twigs and found the unofficial exit onto Arbour Street.

I was trying to be calmer when I arrived at my uncle's. He seemed to be watching television, which lent its flicker to the front room. I thought he couldn't hear me tapping on the pane for the cheers of the crowd. When I knocked harder he didn't respond, and I was nervous of calling to him. I was remembering a horror film I'd watched on television once until my mother had come home to find me watching.

I'd seen enough to know you should be apprehensive if anyone was sitting with his back to you in that kind of film. "Uncle Philip," I said with very little voice.

The wheelchair twisted around, bumping into a sofa scattered with magazines. At first he seemed not to see me, then not to recognise me, and finally not to be pleased that he did. "What are you playing at?" he demanded. "What are you trying to do?"

He waved away my answer as if it were an insect and propelled the chair across the room less expertly than usual. He struggled to shove the lower half of the window up, and his grimace didn't relent once he had. "Speak up for yourself. Weren't you here before?"

"That was yesterday," I mumbled. "Dad sent me. He—"

"Sending an inspector now, is he? You can tell him my mind's as good as ever. I know they don't think that's much."

"He tried to phone you. You didn't answer, so—"

"When did he? Nobody's rung here." My uncle fumbled in his lap and on the chair. "Where is the wretched thing?"

Once he'd finished staring at me as if I'd failed to answer in a class he steered the chair around the room and blundered out of it, muttering more than one word I would never have expected him to use. "Here it is," he said accusingly and reappeared brandishing the cordless phone. "No wonder I couldn't hear it. Can't a man have a nap?"

"I didn't want to wake you. I only did because I was sent."

"Don't put yourself out on my behalf." Before I could deny that he was any trouble he said "So why's Tom checking up on me?"

"They wanted you to come for dinner."

"More like one did if any. I see you're not including yourself."

I don't know why this rather than anything else was too much, but I blurted "Look, I came all this way to find out. Of—"

One reason I was anxious to invite him was the thought of passing the house on Copse View by myself, but he didn't let me finish. "Don't again," he said.

"You'll come, won't you?"

"Tell them no. I'm still up to cooking my own grub."

"Can't you tell them?"

I was hoping that my father would persuade him to change his mind, but he said "I won't be phoning. I'll phone if I want you round."

"I'm sorry," I pleaded. "I didn't mean—"

"I know what you meant," he said and gazed sadly at me. "Never say sorry for telling the truth."

"I wasn't."

I might have tried harder to convince him if I hadn't realised that he'd given me an excuse to stay away from Copse View. "Don't bother," he said and stared at the television. "See, now I've missed a goal."

He dragged the sash down without bothering to glance at me. Even if that hadn't been enough of a dismissal, the night was creeping up on me. I didn't realise how close it was until he switched on the light in the room. That made me feel worse than excluded, and I wasn't slow in heading for home.

Before I reached the woods the streetlamps came on. I began to walk faster until I remembered that most of the lamps around the woods had been smashed. From the corner of the triangle I saw just one was intact—the one outside the house on Copse View. I couldn't help thinking the vandals were scared to go near; they hadn't even broken the window. I couldn't see into the room from the end of the street, but the house looked awakened by the stark light, lent power by the white glare. I wasn't anxious to learn what effect this might have inside the house.

The path would take me too close. I would have detoured through the streets behind Copse View if I hadn't heard the snarl of motorcycles racing up and down them. I didn't want to encounter the riders, who were likely to be my age or younger and protective of their territory. Instead I walked around the woods.

I had my back to the streetlamp all the way down Arbour Street. A few thin shafts of light extended through the trees, but they didn't seem to relieve the growing darkness so much as reach for me on behalf of the house. Now and then I heard wings or litter flapping. When I turned along Shady Lane the light started to jab at my vision, blurring the glimpses the woods let me have of the house. I'd been afraid to see it, but now I was more afraid not to see. I kept having to blink scraps of dazzle out of my eyes, and I waited for my vision to clear when a gap between the trees framed the house.

Was the figure closer to the window? I'd been walking in the road, but I ventured to the pavement alongside the woods. Something besides the stillness of the figure reminded me of the trees on either side of the house. Their cracked bark was grey where it wasn't blackened, and fragments were peeling off, making way for whitish fungus. Far too much of this seemed true of the face beyond the window.

I backed away before I could see anything else and stayed on the far pavement, though the dead houses beside it were no more reassuring than the outstretched shadows of the trees or the secret darkness of the woods, which kept being invaded by glimpses of the house behind the streetlamp. When I reached the corner of the triangle I saw that someone with a spray can had added a letter to the street sign. The first word was no longer just Copse.

Perhaps it was a vandal's idea of a joke, but I ran the rest of the way home, where I had to take time to calm my breath down. As I opened the front door I was nowhere near deciding what to tell my parents. I was sneaking it shut when my mother hurried out of the computer room, waving a pamphlet called Safe Home. "Are you back at last? We were going to phone Philip. Are you by yourself? Where have you been?"

"I had to go a long way. There were boys on bikes."

"Did they do something to you? What did they do?"

"They would have. That's why I went round." I wouldn't have minded some praise for prudence, but apparently I needed to add "They were riding motorbikes. They'd have gone after me."

"We haven't got you thinking there are criminals round every corner, have we?" My father had finished listening none too patiently to the interrogation. "We don't want him afraid to go out, do we, Rosie? It isn't nearly that bad, Craig. What's the problem with my brother?"

"He's already made his dinner."

"He isn't coming." Perhaps my father simply wanted confirmation, but his gaze made me feel responsible. "So why did you have to go over?" he said.

"Because you told me to."

"Sometimes I think you aren't quite with us, Craig," he said, though my mother seemed to feel this was mostly directed at her. "I was asking why he didn't take my call."

"He'd been watching football and—"

I was trying to make sure I didn't give away too much that had happened, but my mother said "He'd rather have his games than us, then."

"He was asleep," I said louder than I was supposed to speak.

"Control yourself, Craig. I won't have a hooligan in my house." Having added a pause, my mother turned her look on my father. "And please don't make it sound as if I've given him a phobia."

"I don't believe anyone said that. Phil's got no reason to call you a sissy, has he, Craig?" When I shook or at least shivered my head my father said "Did he say anything else?"

"Not really."

"Not really or not at all?"

"Not."

"Now who's going on at him?" my mother said in some triumph. "Come and have the dinner there's been so much fuss about."

Throughout the meal I felt as if I were being watched or would be if I even slightly faltered in cutting up my meat and vegetables and inserting forkfuls in my mouth and chewing and chewing and, with an effort that turned my hands clammy, swallowing. I managed to control my intake until dinner was finally done and I'd washed up, and then I was just able not to dash upstairs before flushing the toilet to muffle my sounds. Once I'd disposed of the evidence I lay on my bed for a while and eventually ventured down to watch the end of a programme about gang violence in primary schools. "Why don't you bring whatever you're reading downstairs?" my mother said.

"Maybe it's the kind of thing boys like to read by themselves," said my father.

I went red, not because it was true but on the suspicion that he wanted it to be, and shook my head to placate my mother. She switched off the television in case whatever else it had to offer wasn't suitable for me, and then my parents set about sectioning the Sunday papers, handing me the travel supplements in case those helped with my geography. I would much rather have been helped not to think about the house on Copse View.

Whenever the sight of the ragged discoloured face and the shape crouching over its sticks tried to invade my mind I made myself remember that my uncle didn't want me. I had to remember at night in bed, and in the classroom, and while I struggled not to let my parents see my fear, not to mention any number of situations in between these. I was only wishing to be let off my duty until the occupant of the derelict house somehow went away. My uncle didn't phone during the week, and I was afraid my father might call him and find out the truth, but perhaps he was stubborn as well.

I spent Saturday morning in dread of the phone. It was silent until lunchtime, and while I kept a few mouthfuls of bread and cheese down too. I lingered at the kitchen sink as long as I could, and then my mother said "Better be trotting. You don't want it to be dark."

"I haven't got to go."

"Why not?" my father said before she could.

"Uncle Phil, Uncle Philip said he'd phone when he wanted me."

"Since when has he ever done that?"

"Last week." I was trying to say as little as they would allow. "He really said."

"I think there's more to this than you're telling us," my mother warned me, if she wasn't prompting.

"It doesn't sound like Phil," my father said. "I'm calling him."

My mother watched my father dial and then went upstairs. "Don't say you've nodded off again," my father told the phone, but it didn't bring him an answer. At last he put the phone down. "You'd better go and see what's up this time," he told me.

"I think we should deal with this first," said my mother.

She was at the top of the stairs, an exercise book in her hand. I hoped it was some of my homework until I saw it had a red cover, not the brown one that went with the school uniform. "I knew it couldn't be our work with the community that's been preying on his nerves," she said.

"Feeling he hasn't got any privacy might do that, Rosie. Was there really any need to—"

"I thought he might have unsuitable reading up there, but this shows he's been involved in worse. Heaven knows what he's been watching or where."

"I haven't watched anything like that," I protested. "It's all out of my head."

"If that's true it's worse still," she said and tramped downstairs to thrust the book at my father. "We've done our best to keep you free of such things."

He was leafing through it, stopping every so often to frown, when the phone rang. I tried to take the book, but my mother recaptured it. I watched nervously in case she harmed it while my father said "It is. He is. When? Where? We will. Where? Thanks." He gazed at me before saying "Your uncle's had a stroke on the way home from shopping. He's back in hospital."

I could think of nothing I dared say except "Are we going to see him?"

"We are now."

"Can I have my book?"

My mother raised her eyebrows and grasped it with both hands, but my father took it from her. "I'll handle it, Rosie. You can have it back when we decide you're old enough, Craig."

I wasn't entirely unhappy with this. Once he'd taken it to their room I felt as if some of the ideas the house in Copse View had put in my head were safely stored away. Now I could worry about how I'd harmed my uncle or let him come to harm. As my father drove us to the hospital he and my mother were so silent that I was sure they thought I had.

My uncle was in bed halfway down a rank of patients with barely a movement between them. He looked shrunken, perhaps by his loose robe that tied at the back, and on the way to adopting its pallor. My parents took a hand each, leaving me to shuffle on the spot in front of his blanketed feet. "They'll be reserving you a bed if you carry on like this, Phil," my father joked or tried to joke.

My uncle blinked at me as if he were trying out his eyes and then worked his loose mouth. "Nod, you fool," he more or less said.

I was obeying and doing my best to laugh in case this was expected of me before I grasped what he'd been labouring to pronounce. I hoped my parents also knew he'd said it wasn't my fault, even if I still believed it was. "God, my shopping," he more or less informed them. "Boy writing on the pavement. Went dafter then." I gathered that someone riding on the pavement had got the bags my uncle had been carrying and that he'd gone after them, but what was he saying I should see as he pointed at his limp left arm with the hand my mother had been holding? He'd mentioned her as well. He was resting from his verbal exertions by the time I caught up with them. "Gave me this," he'd meant to say. "Another attack."

My parents seemed to find interpreting his speech almost as much of an effort as it cost him. I didn't mind it or visiting him, even by myself, since the route took me nowhere near Copse View. Over the weeks he regained his ability to speak. I was pleased for him, and I tried to be equally enthusiastic that he was recovering his strength. The trouble was that it would let him go home.

I couldn't wish he would lose it again. The most I could hope, which left me feeling painfully ashamed, was that he might refuse my help with shopping. I was keeping that thought to myself the last time I saw him in hospital. "I wouldn't mind a hand on Saturday," he said, "if you haven't had enough of this old wreck."

I assured him I hadn't, and my expression didn't let me down while he could see it. I managed to finish my dinner that night and even to some extent to sleep. Next day at school I had to blame my inattention and mistakes on worrying about my uncle, who was ill. Before the week was over I was using that excuse at home as well. I was afraid my parents would notice I was apprehensive about something else, and the fears aggravated each other.

While I didn't want my parents to learn how much of a coward I was, on another level I was willing them to rescue me by noticing. They must have been too concerned about the estate—about making it safe for my uncle and people like him. By the time I was due to go to him my parents were at a police forum, where they would be leading a campaign for police to intervene in schools however young the criminals. I loitered in the house, hoping for a call to say my uncle didn't need my help, until I realised that if I didn't go out soon it would be dark.

December was a week old. The sky was a field of snow. My white breaths led me through the streets past abandoned Frugo trolleys and Frugoburger cartons. I was walking too fast to shiver much, even with the chill that had chalked all the veins of the dead leaves near Copse View. The trees were showing every bone, but what else had changed? I couldn't comprehend the sight ahead, unless I was wary of believing in it, until I reached the end of the street that led to the woods. There wasn't a derelict house to be seen. Shady Lane and Arbour Street and, far better, Copse View had been levelled, surrounding the woods with a triangle of waste land.

I remembered hearing sounds like thunder while my uncle was in hospital. The streets the demolition had exposed looked somehow insecure, unconvinced of their own reality, incomplete with just half an alley alongside the back yards. As I hurried along Copse View, where the pavement and the roadway seemed to be waiting for the terrace to reappear, I stared hard at the waste ground where the house with the occupant had been. I could see no trace of the building apart from the occasional chunk of brick, and none at all of the figure with the sticks.

I found my uncle in his chair outside the front door. I wondered if he'd locked himself out until he said "Thought you weren't coming. I'm not as speedy as I was, you know."

As we made for Frugo I saw he could trundle only as fast as his weaker arm was able to propel him. Whenever he lost patience and tried to go faster the chair went into a spin. "Waltzing and can't even see my partner," he complained but refused to let me push. On the way home he was slower still, and I had to unload most of his groceries, though not my Frugoat bar, which he'd forgotten to buy. When I came back from returning the trolley he was at his window, which was open, perhaps because he hadn't wanted me to watch his struggles to raise the sash. "Thanks for the company," he said.

I thought I'd been more than that. At least there was no need for me to wish for any on the walk home. I believed this until the woods came in sight, as much as they could for the dark. Night had arrived with a vengeance, and the houses beyond the triangle of wasteland cut off nearly all the light from the estate. Just a patch at the edge of the woods was lit by the solitary intact streetlamp.

Its glare seemed starkest on the area of rubbly ground where the house with the watchful occupant had been. The illuminated empty stretch reminded me of a stage awaiting a performer. Suppose the last tenant of the house had refused to move? Where would they have gone now that it was demolished? How resentful, even vengeful, might they be? I was heading for the nearest street when I heard the feral snarl of bicycles beyond the houses. Without further thought I made for the woods.

Arbour Street and Shady Lane were far too dark. If the path took me past the site of the house, at least it kept me closer to the streetlamp. I sidled through the gap in the railings and followed the track as fast as the low-lying darkness let me. More than once shadows that turned out to be tendrils of undergrowth almost tripped me up. Trees and bushes kept shutting off the light before letting it display me again, though could anyone be watching? As it blazed in my eyes it turned my breaths the colour of fear, but I didn't need to think that. I was shivering only because much of the chill of the night seemed to have found a home in the woods. The waste ground of Copse View was as deserted as ever. If I glanced at it every time the woods showed it I might collide with something in the dark.

I was concentrating mostly on the path when it brought me alongside the streetlamp. Opposite the ground where the demolished house had been, the glare was so unnaturally pale that it reduced the trees and shrubs and other vegetation to black and white. A stretch of ferns and their shadows beside the path looked more monochrome than alive or real. My shadow ventured past the lamp before I did, and jerked nervously over a discoloured mosaic of dead leaves as I turned my back on the site of the house. Now that the light wasn't in my eyes I could walk faster, even if details of the woods tried to snag my attention: a circular patch of yellowish lichen on a log, lichen so intricate that it resembled embroidery; the vertical pattern on a tree trunk, lines thin and straight as pinstripes; a tangle of branches that put me in mind of collapsed shelves; a fractured branch protruding like a chair arm from a seat in a hollow tree with blanched ferns growing inside the hollow. None of this managed to halt me. It was a glimpse of a face in the darkness that did.

As a shiver held me where I was I saw that the face was peering out of the depths of a bush. It was on the side of the path that was further from Copse View, and some yards away from my route. I was trying to nerve myself to sprint past it when I realised why the face wasn't moving; it was on a piece of litter caught in the bush. I took a step that tried to be casual, and then I faltered again. It wasn't on a piece of paper as I'd thought. It was the queen's portrait on a plate.

At once I felt surrounded by the deserted house or its remains. I swung around to make sure the waste ground was still deserted—that the woods were. Then I stumbled backwards away from the streetlamp and almost sprawled into the undergrowth. No more than half a dozen paces away—perhaps fewer—a figure was leaning on its sticks in the middle of the path.

It was outlined more than illuminated by the light, but I could see how ragged and piebald the scrawny body was. It was crouching forward, as immobile as ever, but I thought it was waiting for me to make the first move, to give it the excuse to hitch itself after me on its sticks. I imagined it coming for me as fast as a spider. I sucked in a breath I might have used to cry for help if any had been remotely likely. Instead I made myself twist around for the fastest sprint of my life, but my legs shuddered to a halt. The figure was ahead of me now, at barely half the distance.

The worst of it was the face, for want of a better word. The eyes and mouth were little more than tattered holes, though just too much more, in a surface that I did my utmost not to see in any detail. Nevertheless they widened, and there was no mistaking their triumph. If I turned away I would find the shape closer to me, but moving forward would bring it closer too. I could only shut my eyes and try to stay absolutely still.

It was too dark inside my eyelids and yet not sufficiently dark. I was terrified to see a silhouette looming on them if I shifted so much as an inch. I didn't dare even open my mouth, but I imagined speaking—imagined it with all the force I could find inside myself. "Go away. Leave me alone. I didn't do anything. Get someone else."

For just an instant I thought of my uncle, to establish that I didn't mean him, and then I concentrated on whoever had robbed him. An icy wind passed through the woods, and a tree creaked like an old door. The wind made me feel alone, and I tried to believe I entirely was. At last I risked looking. There was no sign of the figure ahead or, when I forced myself to turn, behind me or anywhere else.

I no longer felt safe in the woods. I took a few steps along the path before I fought my way through the bushes to the railings. I'd seen a gap left by a single railing, but was it wide enough for me to squeeze through? Once I'd succeeded, scraping my chest and collecting flakes of rust on my prickly skin, I fled home. I slowed and tried to do the same to my breath at the end of my street, and then I made another dash. My mother's car was pulling away from the house.

She halted it beside me, and my father lowered his window. "Where do you think you've been, Craig?"

His grimness and my mother's made me feel more threatened than I understood. "Helping," I said.

"Don't lie to us," said my mother. "Don't start doing that as well."

"I'm not. Why are you saying I am? I was helping Uncle Phil. He's gone slow."

They gazed at me, and my father jerked a hand at the back seat. "Get in."

"Tom, are you sure you want him—"

"Your uncle's been run over."

"He can't have been. I left him in his flat." When this earned no response I demanded "How do you know?"

"They found us in his pocket." Yet more starkly my father added "Next of kin."

I didn't want to enquire any further. When the isolated streetlamp on Copse View came in sight I couldn't tell whether I was more afraid of what else I might see or that my parents should see it as well. I saw nothing to dismay me in the woods or the demolished street, however—nothing all the way to Pasture Boulevard. My mother had to park several hundred yards short of my uncle's flat. The police had put up barriers, beyond which a giant Frugo lorry was skewed across the central strip, uprooting half a dozen trees. In front of and under the cab of the lorry were misshapen pieces of a wheelchair. I tried not to look at the stains on some of them and on the road, but I couldn't avoid noticing the cereal bars strewn across the pavement. "He forgot to buy me one of those and I didn't like to ask," I said. "He must have gone back."

My parents seemed to think I was complaining rather than trying to understand. When I attempted to establish that it hadn't been my fault they acted as if I was making too much of a fuss. Before the funeral the police told them more than one version of the accident. Some witnesses said my uncle had been wheeling his chair so fast that he'd lost control and spun into the road. Some said he'd appeared to be in some kind of panic, others that a gang of cyclists on the pavement had, and he'd swerved out of their way. The cyclists were never identified. As if my parents had achieved one of their aims at last, the streets were free of rogue cyclists for weeks.

I never knew how much my parents blamed me for my uncle's death. When I left school I went into caring for people like him. In due course these included my parents. They're gone now, and while sorting out the contents of our house I found the book with my early teenage stories in it—childish second-hand stuff. I never asked to have it back, and I never wrote stories again. I couldn't shake off the idea that my imagination had somehow caused my uncle's death.

I could easily feel that my imagination has been revived by the exercise book—by the cover embroidered with a cobweb, the paper pinstriped with faded lines, a fern pressed between the yellowed pages and blackened by age. I'm alone with my imagination up here at the top of the stairs leading to the unlit hall. If there's a face at the edge of my vision, it must belong to a picture on the wall, even if I don't remember any there. Night fell while I was leafing through the book, and I have to go over there to switch the light on. Of course I will, although the mere thought of moving seems to make the floorboards creak like sticks. I can certainly move, and there's no reason not to. In a moment—just a moment while I take another breath—I will.

Dragged Down

First published in Noctem Aeternus, January 2008
Also published in: Just Behind You

As usual, Mz Chester meant far too well. Once all of Year Eight AM were at their desks and starting to be relatively quiet she said "Who's going to tell us a legend about the tunnel?"

"Miss me miss." Having wiped his floppy mouth, Craig offered "There's a man in the middle with needles sticking out of him and he waits for girls to walk through."

"You wish." Jade finished touching up her lips and stowed the mirror and lipstick in her leather bag before adding "He's got a doctor's knife and he cuts the lychees off the boys."

"He chucks them in the canal," her friend Davina agreed, "and they come out Angie Leek's end."

Bas was close to protesting that wasn't Angelique's name, since she'd confined herself to a tired smile, when Mz Chester intervened. "I hope none of you watches films like that," she said. "I told you last week, those aren't legends. They have to be stories you can't trace back to their source."

Over the weekend boys had shouted challenges and worse at one another through the tunnel before meeting halfway, where several had ended up in the canal. As he saw she wanted to foster the idea that the tunnel might represent more than a division between the halves of the town, Bas had an inspiration. "You don't need to shout," he said.

Mz Chester pushed her glasses higher on her almost equally square face. "I don't believe I was, Basil."

"Not you, miss. I mean down there. You just have to whisper at the end and anyone that's at the other side can hear you."

"That's not a legend," Craig spluttered. "Snot even a story."

"You can make it one," Jade told Davina. "You have to go at midnight..."

"And you'll hear someone saying your name and you have to go to them..."

Angelique raised her hand, but only to prop her chin on her fist. Like her friends, she seemed increasingly bullied into silence by their classmates from the other side of town. Bas felt he was demonstrating that it didn't only produce bullies as he added "Because they'll be the person you'll spend the rest of your life with."

That didn't apply to his parents, though couples stayed together in many of the books he liked. Perhaps the unreality was why his barely teenage peers greeted the idea with derision, even some from Angelique's side of the tunnel. This didn't matter once she gave him a quick smile like a secret she was sharing just with him. "That's much more like it," Mz Chester said. "That's really quite authentic."

"What's or then trick?"

"Authentic, Jade. You can say it if you try." Having waited in vain, the teacher said "I'm saying Basil's legend sounds like a real one.

"He robbed it, you mean," said Davina.

"I don't steal," Bas protested. "I made it up."

"If it isn't a tradition it deserves to be," Mz Chester confused him by declaring. "Now I want you all to write a legend about the tunnel, and we won't have any based on nasty films. Think about the fairy tales you liked when you were little. Some people like them even at my age."

Bas shielded his exercise book with his arms while he developed the idea that if you went to the tunnel at midnight and whispered the name of the person you wanted to marry they would have to come to the other end. It did resemble some of the stories his mother used to read to him. He wondered what Angelique might be imagining beneath the concealment of her long blonde hair, but he couldn't read her small neat handwriting across the aisle. Mz Chester waited for them to finish before having Craig collect everybody's books. "Lots of trolls," she commented. "Very good, Angelique and Basil."

Craig rewarded him with a vicious punch on his upper arm. By the time Bas recovered, the girls had been sent ahead out of the classroom as usual. He almost caught up with Angelique in the schoolyard until her brother Sebastian, two years older and bulkier, escorted her and her friends out of the gates. As they and their associates staked their claim to the suburb, Bas made for his side of the tunnel.

A teacher was stationed at the top of the steps to the canal, shaking his head at any pupils of Waterside College who ventured near. Bas joined the rowdy exodus across the bridge above six lanes of speeding traffic. Someone had cut a new hole in the wire mesh that was supposed to prevent people from dropping debris on the road. Through it Bas saw how his territory of tower blocks surrounded by low houses—cartons for humans, he always thought—was divided from the wider thoroughfares of ample twofold dwellings beyond the school. In a minute the littered street lined with untaxed cars brought him home. He transferred a pair of empty lager cans from the stunted wall of the token front yard to the bin on the way to admitting himself to the house.

His mother had found time between cleaning offices and hospital wards to cook him a casserole. He microwaved and ate it all, even the vegetables. Once he'd washed up he stayed in the boxy kitchen with his homework—easy English, not much harder History, dully detailed Science—and then went into the other downstairs room to watch some of the sort of film Mz Chester disapproved of. Later still he took an Alan Garner novel from one of the shelves in his room to bed. With his window open as far as the slat at the top would strain, the June heat and the muted lapping of the canal put him to sleep.

He was rowing a boat through the tunnel, if his unseen companion wasn't wielding the oars, when his mother flustered him awake. "Breakfast on the table," she urged as soon as he left the cubicle of a bathroom. She scrutinised the backs of his ears and tidied his shirt collar and patted down a tuft of his hair while he was too busy to escape, and gave him a harassed hug and kiss the instant he'd finished. "Pardon me if I run," she said, though she looked more tired than ever. "We'll do something at the weekend."

He knew she had to work hard, which was why he tried. Even with two jobs she couldn't afford to rent a house any better than this. He heard the engine of her Mini struggling to start as he washed the breakfast things. On his way across the bridge he saw bits of wood like the remains of a wreck floating out of the tunnel past the school. Parents who'd campaigned against moving Waterside College to the new site stood like vigilantes under the sign that bore the mottoes MORE THAN A SCHOOL—A COMMUNITY and EXCLUSIVELY INCLUSIVE and OUR MISSION PROMISE: LIVE AND LEARN. Some parents frowned at the trespassers, including Bas, and he wondered how they would react if they learned he didn't feel part of either group of pupils. He was looking for Angelique when the assembly bell summoned everyone into the school.

He was almost fast enough into the hall to sit by her. Behind her was next best, even if it placed him between Craig and Jade. He admired the sheen of her hair and a glimpse of her nape framed by two blonde locks while Jade popped fleshy bubbles of gum and Craig misspelled a female syllable on the back of the seat occupied by Angelique's friend Glenda. The pupils stood, many miming weariness, as Mr Lemon strode onstage. Once they'd collapsed into their seats again the headmaster clasped his hands over his capacious stomach and made a chin vanish by raising his head to survey the audience. Bas thought he looked like a comedian determined to be serious, but perhaps it was the other way round, because Mr Lemon said "Who's got some change?"

By now the school was used to his approach, and groans were the only response. Some of the teachers seated behind him seemed to feel expected to be eager, and Mr Mayhew dug in a hip pocket. "Change for the better," Mr Lemon said, and a few teachers dutifully laughed. "What makes change?" he enquired, and answered his own question when nobody fell for it. "Imagination, that's the secret. It sounds as if it's made up of an image and a nation, doesn't it? It's where the image of our nation comes from. A nation's a community, and what's our school?"

"Community," Bas felt compelled to mouth as others muttered it.

"Shout up or you'll have people imagining you aren't proud of it. We're all part of its image, and we need to make that positive. If you've a positive image of yourself you can change for the better. Shall I tell you what I heard?"

Bas had heard a yawn infecting several pupils, but Mr Mayhew murmured "Please, head."

"It shows you can give anything a better image, even that tunnel where I hope we'll be seeing no more trouble. Mz Chester asked Year Eight AM to come up with a positive story about it, and if this isn't true it ought to be. They say if you stand at the end of the tunnel at midnight and call the name of the person you want to marry you'll see them at the other end."

Some of Year Eight had begun to grow resentful until they heard the legend, and Bas would have resented not being named if the general reaction hadn't consisted of catcalls and simulated vomiting. "Don't scoff unless you can do better," Mr Lemon said. "That's to say, don't even if you can." He led the school in the day's hymn of inclusion, and when he'd finished clapping along to it he cried "What's our job today?"

"Know something we didn't know yesterday," Bas wished he didn't feel bound to mouth. He shielded his arm from Craig's responsive punch as they spilled into the aisle, and heard Glenda say to Angelique "That was your midnight story, wasn't it?"

"No, it was me," Bas said so loud that teachers frowned at him.

"Never mind trying to be like us. You tell him, Ange."

Angelique gave him a bright-eyed look. "It was mine, actually."

Though he didn't want to argue with her, she seemed to have robbed him of any other words. Before he could reply Craig said "You calling him a liar, Angie Leek?"

"She doesn't want to call him anything, and that's not her name."

"Should be Leaky Ange," Davina said, and Jade emitted a supportive pop.

Angelique blushed for some reason that was beyond Bas, though he felt it related to his presence. She said no more on the way to the classroom, where Glenda said "Mz Chester, it was Ange's legend Mr Lemon told us, wasn't it?"

"It was hers and Basil's."

Not only Glenda looked outraged for Angelique. "He copied hers, you mean," said Glenda.

Angelique shook her head so vigorously that it appeared to double its blondeness. "I didn't see him copying."

"Nor did I," Mz Chester said. "You both got the idea by yourselves, didn't you? Or you thought you did. Maybe you were tapping into myth. That's how folk stories get started. Nobody knows who was the first to tell them."

Once the teacher's attention moved elsewhere, Glenda scowled at Bas. "Just because she didn't see you doesn't mean you didn't cheat," she hissed.

He was sure he glimpsed sympathy in Angelique's glance. He felt cramped by failing to speak, but too many people would have overheard. He hardly said a word all morning, even when teachers gazed at him as if he was letting them down. When he ended up behind Angelique in the lunch queue he was afraid that he'd left it too late. Then she reached for a tray and as he fumbled to hand her the topmost, the roar of conversations and clangour of utensils let him blurt "We ought to try it."

Her slim fingers didn't quite touch his. "Ta," she said but added "What?"

"See what happens if you call down the tunnel."

"We're here, Ange," Glenda interrupted as she headed for a table.

Angelique turned away, but not before flashing him a tooth-brushed smile and murmuring "I wonder."

So did he, but that was as much as he dared. He wasn't sure if Glenda had heard, though she and her cronies found a subject to whisper and giggle about once Angelique joined them. Suppose the others came with her to the tunnel? Suppose only they came? He wouldn't be able to bear their derision, especially if it spread through the school. Before he'd finished that night's casserole he had pretty well decided not to go—but suppose Angelique turned up and assumed he'd set out to humiliate her? The possibility distracted him from his homework and the television, even when the programmes abandoned good behaviour after nine o'clock. Even so, if his mother's job at the hospital on the far side of the tunnel hadn't kept her out until the early hours he might not have left the house.

A parched breeze jangled the wire mesh on the bridge and fluttered the litter that did for leaves on the bushes a few front gardens boasted. The traffic had abated; just the occasional wave of sound merged with the lapping of the canal. As he picked his way down the weedy steps at the end of the road, Bas heard glass smash in the other half of town. He was hoping it wouldn't divert Angelique as he stepped on the towpath.

One of the spotlights protecting the school shone directly into the canal. It lent the water beyond the tunnel the aggressive brightness of the rim of an eclipse, which charred the inside of the passage blacker than the sky. Beside the school foreshortened silhouettes of railings lay in the canal, crumbling with rust or rather losing definition to the glare. As they stirred like fronds of weed he wasn't sure if he'd glimpsed a figure disappearing around the curve of the towpath. "Are you there?" he called under his breath.

His voice must have carried out of the tunnel, because it sent some creature off the path into the water. The small echoing plop sounded as if it were at his feet. The drowned railings wriggled sluggishly while reflections of ripples tried to climb the steep banks before slithering back. Otherwise there was no response, and so Bas whispered "Angelique."

The tunnel emitted a thundery rumble as a car passed above him. Even when he spoke her name as if she were beside him it earned no answer. Was there a figure among the restless metal bars? He could have imagined that it was escaping from the unstable submerged cage. Had it returned, or was there another? The antics of the railings made him uncertain whether he was seeing anyone at all. He'd repeated Angelique's name several times before he began to feel ridiculous, all the more so if she was silently eavesdropping. He stalked home to dream that she was locked in an underwater cage and pleading with him to let her out before she drowned. At least she was gratifyingly grateful when he did.

He never found out how much, because his mother wakened him for breakfast. The dream left him wondering if he had indeed seen Angelique through the tunnel—if she could have been too shy to make herself known. He was afraid that his mother might ask why he was preoccupied, but she must have concerns of her own. "Busy day again," she said as a mingled apology and farewell and perhaps as an exhortation to him.

She'd wakened late, which meant he had. Once she hurried out he gobbled the rest of his breakfast before giving the plate as quick a wash as he'd had in the bathroom. He ran across the bridge, much to the disdain of schoolmates who were taking all the time they could, and reached the school only just ahead of the bell. He had to sit several rows behind Angelique in the hall, wishing that classmates were required to sit together instead of being encouraged to make new acquaintances. How could she not sense his gaze on her neck? She hadn't acknowledged it when Mr Lemon strode onstage more purposefully than ever. "Hands up anyone who doesn't think we're a community," he said.

Bas suspected quite a few were being withheld, and not just beyond the stage. Presumably Mr Lemon was unaware of this, since he said "And don't we think a community should be able to police itself?" While nobody expressed disagreement, this didn't seem to be enough for him. "It should sadden every one of us that we've had to call the police in," he said and dabbed at one eye. "Let's hope they don't trace the crime back to any member of our community. If any of us know anything, they can prove they're members by coming to me."

He'd been staring wistfully at the audience for some moments when Mr Mayhew cleared his throat. "Should we tell them what's happened?"

"I was about to, thank you, Leonard." Having repeated his pause, Mr Lemon said "The school was broken into last night. Six new computers were taken, not even out of their boxes."

Now Bas knew where the glass had been smashed, and perhaps why he'd glimpsed figures dodging past the railings. He felt as if his hot face could draw the missile of Mr Lemon's gaze. If he ought to have realised he was hearing burglars at the school, wasn't Angelique just as responsible? She would have been closer to the robbery if she had come to the tunnel. Once everyone had finished swaying and clapping to the day's communal chant he hurried to catch her up as they left the hall. "Angelique, did you—"

She was turning when Glenda interrupted. "What are you after now?

"I'm trying to ask about last night."

"She's told me she knows nothing about it. It's people like you they need to look at."

"What do you mean, people like me?"

"People from your side of town. People who their parents dont know where they are at night, if they've got any parents."

Before Bas could produce a retort, perhaps aimed at her grammar, Davina joined in. "Don't you call us robbers, specially not him."

"He's better than any of you lot," said Jade, "and that means Angie Leek."

"I'm not," Bas protested. "I don't need you saying things like that. I'm just me."

"Well, excuse us," Jade said. "We didn't know we weren't good enough to talk about you."

"We'd better leave him with his friends he wants to be like," said Davina.

Bas sidled past her, but too late. Angelique was hallway down the corridor. His frustration was so close to rage that he didn't trust himself to speak, either in class or at break, when she was surrounded by friends. He was nowhere near her in the lunch queue, and the stares of her friends kept him away from her table. He retreated to one full of fourth years whom he didn't know and who didn't want to know him. At least this let him concentrate on watching Angelique, and when she made for the counter to return her tray he seized his. As he attempted to head her off before she could rejoin her group, her brother stepped in his way. "Where do you think you're going?"

Bas brandished the tray. "What does it look like?"

"It looks like a little boy who doesn't know where he belongs."

Bas did his best to stand taller, though it felt as if his hot face were hauling him up. "I'm not a little boy," he said louder than he meant to, "and—"

"That's not all you are you think you're not." As his sister hesitated nearby Sebastian regarded her just long enough to say "I'm dealing with this."

She blinked at them before retreating to her table. Bas turned towards it, but Sebastian sidestepped to block him, which made Bas blurt "I only want —"

"We know what you want, and you won't be getting it." Sebastian worked his hefty shoulders as if limbering up for a fight and leaned his snub-nosed bludgeon of a face at Bas. "Maybe we have to help you people get an education now they've moved the school," he said near the top of his voice, "but you can forget about dragging us down. And in case that isn't simple enough for you, that means stay away from my little sister."

Bas heard jeers and laughter, no doubt aimed at him. Shouldn't the teacher overseeing lunch have intervened on behalf of the school? Bas avoided looking at him too and blundered almost blindly out of the uproarious hall. He took refuge in the boys' toilets, in the solitary cubicle with an intact bolt, where he gazed at the mass of misspelled sentences and even cruder drawings, formulae to conjure sex up, that enclosed him. At the end of lunchtime a lone memory let him venture out, though he wasn't sure of it. He only thought Angelique had wanted to speak up for him.

It wasn't enough. He was unable to catch her eye, let alone the expression he'd seemed to glimpse. Surely she wasn't spurning him as Glenda and her giggling gaggle made a show of doing, or as Craig and Jade and Davina brusquely did. When lessons ended Bas tried to overtake her in the corridor until he saw that her brother had taken charge. He hung back in the school until they were well beyond the gate.

What had she intended her look to convey? He attempted to suppress the question by lingering over the latest casserole and then over his homework. They failed to distract him, and so did returning discs to Dave's Video Dive next to the Angler's Arms and the Bet Your Life betting shop—even the films he borrowed to watch. The words of a Philip Pullman novel fell short of his brain, and he was about to undress for bed when he grew aware of the whisper of the canal. Although it was beyond the back yard and the alley and a second fence, it could almost have been under his window. The restlessness of water—the sibilance of ripples followed by their lapping against the edge of the canal—sounded like a repetition of his name.

Was it just the water? As he strained his ears, the impression of a summons gathered in his brain. He stood on the bed to shove as much of his head as would fit through the transom. While the sound was no clearer, he was suddenly sure who was calling him. He jumped off the bed and ran out of the house.

His feet seemed hardly to touch the pavement. He felt weightless as a dream. The street appeared to have been refined by the late hour, stripped down to light and shadow. He heard a burglar alarm and the hunting cries of police cars, but they were far away, nothing to do with him. They withdrew into insignificance as he descended the steps to the canal.

He felt as if the dark of the tunnel were focusing the mysteriousness of the night for him. The water was so still that the passage might have been holding its breath on his behalf. When the topsy-turvy railings stirred, he had the notion that they were beckoning him into the dazzle at the far end. He saw no other movement, and wondered if she'd given up on him. "Here," he whispered and, when this produced no Angelique, tried saying conversationally "Here."

In a moment a whisper enlivened the dark. "Basil."

"That's you, isn't it, Angelique?" Since the question felt like doubting her, he wished he hadn't uttered it so loud. "I'm coming," he murmured and advanced into the tunnel.

He hadn't ventured far when the spotlight began to alleviate the gloom, sketching trickles of moisture under the brick arch. All the same, he was taken unawares by the wallowing bulk that caught up with him in the middle of the passage. He had to let it float onwards before he distinguished that it was a large cardboard box. It was some way ahead by the time he realised that it bore a picture of a computer. He ought to grab it, not to hide evidence that the thieves lived on his side of town but so that he and Angelique could take it to the headmaster. He hurried along the slippery towpath, and the carton drifted among the unstable railings as he reached the mouth of the tunnel. He was making to pace the box until it sailed within reach when the person who had been concealed by the arch stepped in front of him. "Here comes two kinds of refuse," Sebastian announced, though he was alone. "What do you mean by calling my sister like a dog?"

"I was saying I was here," Bas felt vulnerable enough to explain.

"Do you imagine anyone cares about that? Don't you dare say my sister."

Mightn't Sebastian be interfering because she did? Before Bas could recover from learning that the older boy had been the whisperer, Sebastian peered at the carton. "That's what you were chasing, was it? Trying to dispose of the evidence?"

"I was going to show Mr Lemon."

"I'll be doing that," Sebastian said and blocked his way when Bas tried to sidle around him. "Crawl back in your burrow while you're able and don't come sniffing round here again."

There was no way past him. He looked capable of flinging Bas into the canal. He loitered at the entrance until the younger boy was halfway down the tunnel, and Bas willed him to fall in the water as he fished out the carton. There ought to be a legend that wishing would make this or worse happen. Nothing did, and Bas had to retreat into the dilapidated litter-strewn criminal territory that was home. As he reached the house he saw from his watch that it was only just midnight. No wonder his mother still wasn't in, but it hadn't even been time for his and Angelique's legend to work.

He fell asleep dreaming she would tell him that Sebastian had prevented her from coming to the tunnel, and the possibility wakened him before his mother could. "Eager beaver," she said at breakfast. "I'm glad you like your school." But when he reached the schoolyard there was no sign of Angelique, not even with her brother.

He couldn't locate her in the hall. Teachers frowned at him for turning around while Mr Lemon assured everyone that speaking up was standing up. Nobody did either in response. Bas wanted to talk to Angelique first, but she wasn't in the classroom. He was nerving himself to question Glenda when Mz Chester said "Basil."

She had originally connected him and Angelique, and he wondered if she had some news for him. "What, miss?"

"I was right, the story you wrote wasn't so far off the mark. There's a tradition that if you go to the water at midnight you can call spirits out of it."

"It was our story," Jade objected to Davina as Craig told them "Shows he robbed it, robber."

Bas wasn't sure if Mz Chester was referring specifically to the canal, but another question concerned him more. "It wasn't just mine, it was Angelique's," he said. "Why isn't she in today?"

"I haven't heard. Does anyone know?"

"We wouldn't tell him," said Glenda, "even if we did."

"I hope you'd tell the school," Mz Chester said as she was summoned by a bleep of the laptop on her desk. "Well, you are in demand today, Basil. You're to go to Mr Lemon's office."

Bas tried to feel like a celebrity as he tramped along the corridor echoing with teachers' voices. A transverse passage decorated with class work about Buddhism led to the headmaster's door. Not too long after Bas knocked on it Mr Lemon said "Proceed."

He sat forward at his weighty desk, which hid his stomach, and propped his prayerful hands up before lowering his head an inch that produced an extra chin. "Well, Basil. How are we treating you?

"All right." Since this visibly fell short of expectations, Bas added "Fine, I think."

"Only think? You can't be sure if you're part of our community." When Bas didn't risk an answer the headmaster said "You could prove you are."

"How, sir?"

"Just the truth will do," Mr Lemon said as his face seemed to grow heavier still. "I hear you know more than you're saying about Monday's unfortunate incident."

"Which one?" Bas managed only to mouth, but he was afraid it might have been legible. "Sebastian Barnes said, didn't he? What was he doing there?"

"Protecting the premises. The question is why you were."

"Seeing if that legend worked, the one you told us you liked."

"Storytelling won't help, Basil. The number on the packaging shows it was taken from here."

"What's that got to do with me?" Bas had to make an effort to say Sir.

"We're told you were anxious to dispose of it."

Bas was enraged to find he couldn't keep his lip from shaking his voice. "I wanted to bring it to show you."

"You've had your wish, then. It's been shown." Mr Lemon gazed hard at him before adding "Please try and stay clear in future."

"Why?" Bas said, too affronted to bother with politeness.

"It can be dangerous down there. I believe a fellow was found drowned in the tunnel while our school was being built."

Bas remembered his mother using the death to warn him of various dangers, until he'd lost count of how often he'd mumbled agreement. "He was a druggie," he said.

Mr Lemon frowned as though Bas had contradicted him. "If you've nothing else to say you should be in your class."

Bas turned towards the door and then back to the desk. "Sir?"

"Anything, by all means."

"Just Sebastian's sister. Why's she off school?"

"We understand she's unwell." The question obviously disappointed the headmaster, and so did having to say "I'm glad you're concerned for one of your new classmates, but better keep it within bounds."

This time Bas couldn't doubt how he was being told to stay clear. As he trudged back to class he felt like an outcast whose status everyone was aware of, and all the more shameful for having tried to deny it. "Was he saying how you robbed our story?" Jade suggested, and Davina contributed

"Was you talking about Angie Leek?" The silence of Glenda and her friends was a comment in itself, and his hot face was more of an answer than he wanted to provide, but he succeeded in staying mute until the first break. In the schoolyard he made for Sebastian before any doubts could impede him. "What's wrong with Angelique?"

"You are." Sebastian shared mirth with several of his classmates at the spectacle of Bas. "You are, you little upstart," he said, "and if I hear you've even whispered to her after she comes back, there's a few of us who'll teach you how to shut your mouth."

Bas felt more than able to do that, helped by his swollen lips. All at once there was only one thing he wanted to say, but it would have to wait for nightfall. Staying utterly quiet for the rest of the day lent his intention more strength, and so did fasting at lunchtime in the bolted cubicle. He was too tense to eat dinner either. He laboured over his homework and then devoted his time to composing a fragment of language that meant far more to him. At last he tore the pages covered with erasures out of the middle of his history exercise book and dropped the crumpled wad in the street on his way to the canal.

The water that the darkness of the tunnel was drawing in looked thick and sluggish. It was laden with so much garbage—rotting fruit and vegetables, sodden pornographic magazines, opened packs of frozen food, plastic cartons like miniature boats ridden not by witches but by half-chewed hamburgers—that he assumed somebody had tipped at least one bin into the canal. As he followed the parade to the tunnel he felt as if he'd joined it. He leaned into the stony mouth and whispered "Come out. Come out however bad you are."

Once his voice finished troubling the darkness, the silence grew absolute. His words had become entangled with the echoes of ripples, but now even the lapping had ceased. The light at the far end left the depths of the passage blacker than blindness, and he was straining his eyes when he realised that the cage of the inverted railings had grown as still as the fence itself. He gazed at it for some moments before he grasped what he ought to be seeing. Although the last of the rubbish had vanished into the dark while he was speaking, none of it had emerged from the tunnel.

It must have caught on an obstruction. As his vision began to flicker with strain, he thought he saw where the rubbish had lodged. It appeared to be gathering halfway along the tunnel. The current must be unequal to breaking the jam, though it was pushing it above the surface. Was it really strong enough to raise the dark mass so far? The hulking silhouette had wobbled high enough to outline the roundish lump on top of it against the light when Bas retreated to the steps and fled home.

For the first time in years he gave in to wishing that his mother would be there. As he lay in bed, yearning to hear a key in the lock, he heard a floundering so hollow that he knew it was in the tunnel. It sounded as if some kind of body was struggling to leave the water. Eventually it ceased, and the canal reverted to lapping. He hadn't looked out of his window since returning to his room, and he wasn't about to do so. At last his nervous vigil was rewarded by a scraping at the front door. It wasn't the scratching of nails or anything like them, it was his mother's key. Once he heard her trudge upstairs he was able to take refuge in sleep.

The surreptitious restlessness of the canal kept waking him, however, until he had to go to the window. A smell of rot drifted through the transom as he saw the marks that trailed through the open gate into the back yard. Even when he realised they came in pairs, they were so differently misshapen that he didn't recognise them as footprints until the intruder shuffled backwards to confront him. It had putrid fruit for eyes, but perhaps there was a skull inside the lump he'd seen silhouetted in the tunnel, because it was grinning, exposing more than teeth. It was thin as a skeleton fleshed out with scraps of garbage, but despite the instability of its substance it was able to caper and stretch its crumbling hands towards him. "What is it?" his mother complained sleepily as he screamed and woke, so that he had to call "Me. Nothing."

Surely daylight should have taken his fears away, but he was afraid to go downstairs in case his mother saw he was hiding a secret. He loitered in the bathroom until she left the house, and lingered over his breakfast even though he could hardly taste it. He was nervous of going to school and of understanding why. It might be still worse not to know, and at close to the last moment he dashed out of the house and across the bridge. Was the crowd in the schoolyard more subdued than usual? He couldn't see Angelique, and perhaps more to the point, there was no sign of her brother. Bas didn't know how this made him feel. Sebastian's friends who had mocked Bas stared at him with open dislike as everyone was rung into the school. In the assembly hall he contrived not to sit near anybody he knew, which isolated him with the sight of the teachers lined up on the stage, all of them as solemn as statues in a tomb. Even Mr Lemon had managed to leave his heartiness behind; indeed, for several seconds after the pupils regained their seats he appeared to have abandoned speech as well. "I'm afraid we have some very sad news," he said at last, and Bas felt as if the headmaster's gaze didn't just include him but was directed at him. "There was apparently an accident last night down in the tunnel. I hope at least it will be a warning to every one of us to stay away in future. It's a sad reflection on our community that we had to lose one of us to bring the danger home to us. Please bow your heads with me in memory of Angelique Barnes from Year Eight AM. Let's believe she is on a voyage to a better place."

Until Mr Lemon named the victim Bas had been able to believe that the muffled sobs clustered in the middle of the hall came from someone other than Glenda and her friends. They sobbed louder while Mr Lemon promised everybody counselling, but Glenda was dry-eyed when she confronted Bas in the classroom. "I hope you know she went down there because she had a row about you with her brother."

Bas clung to the only inconsistency he could think of. "How do you know that?"

"Because he told us when we went to pick her up for school." Glenda glared at him as if he'd tried to deny the tragedy. "We think she was looking for you," she accused him. "She slipped on some rubbish and got tangled up in more of it and drowned, that's what her dad says must have happened. Shows what can go wrong if we don't stay away from rubbish."

Bas had no retort, because he felt more responsible than she could know. He imagined Angelique's struggles as she was held down in the water, unable to scream, since otherwise he would have heard her. How guilty did he look? Enough so that nobody talked to him, any more than he spoke to them. He wished he could hide in the cubicle all day instead of just at lunchtime. He had never been so glad to find his mother out at work. He left his dinner in the refrigerator and his homework in its bag, and spent the hours in striving to believe there was more to the legend Mz Chester had told him.

Sirens were tearing through the night, but down by the canal it was as quiet as graveyards were in books. Only the water stirred as he paced to the mouth of the tunnel. "Angelique," he pleaded with the darkness. "Angelique." Was he hearing just his own echoes, or was there a fainter whisper underneath them? Was it more than water? "Please be there," he said as loud as he dared, and advanced into the tunnel. The light beyond it blinded him, so that he could move no faster than a sleepwalker on the treacherous path. The closer he came to the middle of the passage, the more profound the blackness in it seemed to grow. "Is that you?" he murmured almost too breathlessly to hear. Another unseen ripple answered him, and he imagined how cold the lightless depths must be. But the hand that reached up to take his was colder still.

2009

Respects

"Respects owes its existence to the present trend of treating young criminals as folk heroes. Not long before I wrote it a young car thief was eulogised in the obituary pages of the local free newspaper at least as sentimentally as the miscreant in my tale. As far as I can see, there's one less thief to bother the rest of us. Since I wrote the story, shopkeepers in an entire suburb were terrorised into shutting their premises out of a show of respect for a gang member who was gunned down. It seems as if the kind of family I wrote about in The One Safe Place has begun to rule our streets. Time for another novel, perhaps, if I don't get stomped to death first for remonstrating with their kind."—Ramsey Campbell, Story notes from The Year's Best Dark Fantasy And Horror 2010

"The dialogue is brilliant, and it captures an odious sense of entitlement on the part of Dorothy's tormentors that seems extremely true to life."—Ros Jackson, reviewing The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 21

First published in British Invasion, 2009
Also published in: Just Behind You

By the time Dorothy finished hobbling downstairs, somebody had rung three times and knocked several more. Charmaine Bullough and some of her children were blocking the short garden path under a nondescript November sky. "What did you see?" Charmaine demanded at once.

"Why, nothing to bother about." Dorothy had glimpsed six-year-old Brad kicking the door, but tried to believe he'd simply wanted to help his mother. "Shouldn't you be at school?" she asked him.

Brad jerked a thumb at eight-year-old J-Bu. "She's not," he shouted.

Perhaps his absent siblings were, but not barely teenage Angelina, who was brandishing a bunch of flowers. "Are those for me?" Dorothy suggested out of pleasantness rather than because it seemed remotely likely, then saw the extent of her mistake. "Sorry," she murmured.

Half a dozen bouquets and as many wreaths were tied to the lamp-standard on the corner of the main road, beyond her gate. Charmaine's scowl seemed to tug the roots of her black hair paler. "What do you mean, it's not worth bothering about?"

"I didn't realise you meant last week," Dorothy said with the kind of patience she'd had to use on children and parents too when she was teaching.

"You saw the police drive our Keanu off the road, didn't you?"

"I'm afraid I can't say I did."

At once, despite their assortment of fathers, the children resembled their mother more than ever. Their aggressive defensiveness turned resentful in a moment, accentuating their features, which were already as sharp as smashed glass. "Can't or won't?" Charmaine said.

"I only heard the crash."

Dorothy had heard the cause as well–the wild screech of tyres as the fifteen-year-old had attempted to swerve the stolen Punto into her road apparently at eighty miles an hour, only to ram a van parked opposite her house—but she didn't want to upset the children, although Brad's attention seemed to have lapsed. "Wanna wee," he announced and made to push past her, the soles of his trainers lighting up at every step.

As Dorothy raised a hand to detain him, J-Bu shook a fist that set bracelets clacking on her thin arm. "Don't you touch my brother. We can get you put in prison."

"You shouldn't just walk into someone else's house," Dorothy said and did her best to smile. "You don't want to end up—"

"Like who?" Angelina interrupted, her eyes and the studs in her nose glinting. "Like Keanu? You saying he was in your house?"

Dorothy might have. The day before the crash she'd come home to find him gazing out of her front room. He hadn't moved until she managed to fumble her key into the lock, at which point he'd let himself out of the back door. Apart from her peace of mind he'd stolen only an old handbag that contained an empty purse, and so she hadn't hurried to report him to the overworked police. If she had, might they have given him no chance to steal the car? As Dorothy refrained from saying any of this, Charmaine dragged Brad back. "Come out of there. We don't want anyone else making trouble for us."

"I'm sorry not to be more help," Dorothy felt bound to say. "I do know how you feel."

Angelina peered so closely at her that Dorothy smelled some kind of smoke on the girl's breath. "How?"

"I lost my husband just about a year ago."

"Was he as old as you?" J-Bu said.

"Even older," said Dorothy, managing to laugh.

"Then it's not the same," Angelina objected. "It was time he went."

"Old people take the money we could have," said J-Bu.

"It's ours for all the things we need," Brad said.

"Never mind that now," said Charmaine and fixed Dorothy with her scowl. "So you're not going to be a witness."

"To what, forgive me?"

"To how they killed my son. I'll be taking them to court. The social worker says I'm entitled."

"They'll have to pay for Keanu," said Brad.

Dorothy took time over drawing a breath. "I don't think I've anything to offer except sympathy."

"That won't put shoes on their feet. Come on, all of you. Let's see Keanu has some fresh flowers. He deserves the best," Charmaine added louder still.

Brad ran to the streetlamp and snatched off a bouquet. About to throw them over Dorothy's wall, he saw her watching and flung them in the road. As Angelina substituted her flowers, Dorothy seemed to hear a noise closer to the house. She might have thought a rose was scratching at the window, but the flower was inches distant. In any case, the noise had sounded muffled by the glass. She picked up a beer can and a hamburger's polystyrene shell from her garden and carried them into the house.

When she and Harry had moved in she'd been able to run through it without pausing for breath. She could easily outdistance him to the bedroom, which had been part of their fun. Now she tried not to breathe, since the flimsy shell harboured the chewed remains of its contents. She hadn't reached the kitchen when she had to gasp, but any unwelcome smell was blotted out by the scents of flowers in vases in every downstairs room.

She dumped the rubbish in the backyard bin and locked the back door. The putty was still soft around the pane Mr Thorpe had replaced. Though he'd assured her it was safe, she was testing the glass with her knuckles when something sprawled into the hall. It was the free weekly newspaper, and Keanu's death occupied the front page. LOCAL TEENAGER DIES IN POLICE CHASE.

She still had to decide whether to remember Harry in the paper. She took it into the dining-room, where a vase full of chrysanthemums held up their dense yellow heads towards the false sun of a Chinese paper globe, and spread the obituary pages across the table. Keanu was in them too. Which of the remembrances were meant to be witty or even intended as a joke? "Kee brought excitement into everyone's life"? "He was a rogue like children are supposed to be"? "There wasn't a day he didn't come up with some new trick"? "He raced through life like he knew he had to take it while he could"? "Even us that was his family couldn't keep up with his speed"? Quite a few of them took it, Dorothy suspected, along with other drugs. "When he was little his feet lit up when he walked, now they do because he's God's new angel." She dabbed at her eyes, which had grown so blurred that the shadows of stalks drooping out of the vase appeared to grope at the newsprint. She could do with a walk herself.

She buttoned up her winter overcoat, which felt heavier than last year, and collected her library books from the front room. Trying to read herself to sleep only reminded her that she was alone in bed, but even downstairs she hadn't finished any of them – the deaths in the detective stories seemed insultingly trivial, and the comic novels left her cold now that she couldn't share the jokes. She lingered for a sniff at the multicoloured polyanthuses in the vase on her mother's old sideboard before loading her scruffiest handbag with the books. The sadder a bag looked, the less likely it was to be snatched.

The street was relatively quiet beneath the vague grey sky, with just a few houses pounding like nightclubs. The riots in Keanu's memory–children smashing shop windows and pelting police cars with bricks–had petered out, and in any case they hadn't started until nightfall. Most of the children weren't home from school or wherever else they were. Stringy teenagers were loitering near the house with the reinforced front door, presumably waiting for the owner of the silver Jaguar to deal with them. At the far end of the street from Dorothy's house the library was a long low blotchy concrete building, easily mistaken for a new church.

She was greeted by the clacking of computer keyboards. Some of the users had piled books on the tables, but only to hide the screens from the library staff. As she headed for the shelves Dorothy glimpsed instructions for making a bomb and caught sight of a film that might have shown an equestrian busy with the tackle of her horse if it had been wearing any. On an impulse Dorothy selected guides to various Mediterranean holiday resorts. Perhaps one or more of her widowed friends might like to join her next year. She couldn't imagine travelling by herself.

She had to slow before she reached her gate. A low glare of sunlight cast the shadow of a rosebush on the front window before being extinguished by clouds, leaving her the impression that a thin silhouette had reared up and then crouched out of sight beyond the glass. She rummaged nervously in her handbag and unlocked the door. It had moved just a few inches when it encountered an obstruction that scraped across the carpet. Someone had strewn Michaelmas daisies along the hall.

Were they from her garden? So far the vandals had left her flowers alone, no doubt from indifference. As her eyes adjusted to the dimness she saw that the plants were scattered the length of the hall, beyond which she could hear a succession of dull impacts as sluggish as a faltering heart. Water was dripping off the kitchen table from the overturned vase, where the trail of flowers ended. She flustered to the back door, but it was locked and intact, and there was no other sign of intrusion. She had to conclude that she'd knocked the vase over and, still without noticing unless she'd forgotten, tracked the flowers through the house.

The idea made her feel more alone and, in a new way, more nervous. She was also disconcerted by how dead the flowers were, though she'd picked them yesterday; the stalks were close to crumbling in her hands, and she had to sweep the withered petals into a dustpan. She binned it all and replenished the vase with Harry's cyclamen before sitting on the worn stairs while she rang Helena to confirm Wednesday lunch. They always met midweek, but she wanted to talk to someone. Once she realised that Helena's grandchildren were visiting she brought the call to an end.

The house was big enough for children, except that she and Harry couldn't have any, and now it kept feeling too big. Perhaps they should have moved, but she couldn't face doing so on her own. She cooked vegetables to accompany the rest of yesterday's casserole, and ate in the dining-room to the sound of superannuated pop songs on the radio, and leafed through her library books in the front room before watching a musical that would have made Harry restless. She could hear gangs roving the streets, and was afraid her lit window might attract them. Once she'd checked the doors and downstairs windows she plodded up to bed.

Girls were awaiting customers on the main road. As Dorothy left the curtains open a finger's width she saw Winona Bullough negotiate with a driver and climb into his car. Was the girl even sixteen? Dorothy was close to asking Harry, but it felt too much like talking to herself, not a habit she was anxious to acquire. She climbed into her side of the bed and hugged Harry's pillow as she reached with her free hand for the light-cord.

The night was a medley of shouts, some of which were merely conversations, and smashed glass. Eventually she slept, to be wakened by light in the room. As she blinked, the thin shaft coasted along the bedroom wall. She heard the taxi turn out of the road, leaving her unsure whether she had glimpsed a silhouette that reminded her of stalks. Perhaps the headlamps had sent a shadow from her garden, though wasn't the angle wrong? She stared at the dark and tried not to imagine that it was staring back at her. "There's nobody," she whispered, hugging the pillow.

She needed to be more active, that was all. She had to occupy her mind and tire her body out to woo a night's unbroken sleep. She spent as much of Saturday in weeding the front garden as the pangs of her spine would allow. By late afternoon she wasn't even half finished, and almost forgot to buy a wreath. She might have taken Harry some of his own flowers, but she liked to support the florist's on the main road, especially since it had been damaged by the riots. At least the window had been replaced. Though the florist was about to close, he offered Dorothy a cup of tea while his assistant plaited flowers in a ring. Some good folk hadn't been driven out yet, Dorothy told them both, sounding her age.

She draped the wreath over the phone in her hall and felt as if she were saying goodbye to any calls, an idea too silly to consider. After dinner she read about far places that might have changed since she and Harry had visited them, and watched a love story in tears that would have embarrassed him. She was in bed by the time the Saturday-night uproar began. Once she was wakened by a metallic clack that sounded closer than outside, but when she stumbled to the landing the hall was empty. Perhaps a wind had snapped the letterbox. As she huddled under the quilt she wondered if she ought to have noticed something about the hall, but the impression was too faint to keep her awake. It was on her mind when church bells roused her, and as soon as she reached the stairs she saw what was troubling her. There was no sign of the wreath.

She grabbed the banister so as not to fall. She was hastening to reassure herself that the flowers were under the hall table, but they weren't. Had she forgotten taking them somewhere? They were in none of the ground-floor rooms, nor the bathroom, her bedroom, the other one that could have been a nursery but had all too seldom even done duty as a guest room. She was returning downstairs when she saw a single flower on the carpet inches from the front door.

Could a thief have dragged the wreath through the letterbox? She'd heard that criminals used rods to fish property from inside houses. She heaved the bolts out of their sockets and flung the door open, but there was no evidence on the path. It didn't seem worth reporting the theft to the police. She would have to take Harry flowers from the garden. She dressed in her oldest clothes and brought tools from the shed, and was stooping to uproot a weed that appeared to have sprouted overnight when she happened to glance over the wall. She straightened up and gasped, not only with the twinge in her back. One of the tributes to Keanu looked far too familiar.

She clutched at her back as she hobbled to the streetlamp. There was the wreath she'd seen made up at the florist's. It was the only item to lack a written tag. "Earned yourself some wings, Kee" and "Give them hell up there" and "Get the angels singing along with your iPod" were among the messages. The wreath was hung on the corner of a bouquet's wrapping. Dorothy glared about as she retrieved it, daring anyone to object. As she slammed the front door she thought she heard small feet running away.

She had no reason to feel guilty, and was furious to find she did. She locked away the tools and changed into the dark suit that Harry used to like her to wear whenever they dined out. A bus from the shattered shelter on the main road took her to the churchyard, past houses twice the size of hers. All the trees in their gardens were bare now. She and Harry had been fond of telling each other that they would see them blossom next year. The trees in the graveyard were monotonously evergreen, but she never knew what that was meant to imply. She cleared last week's flowers away from Harry's stone and replaced them with the wreath, murmuring a few sentences that were starting to feel formulaic. She dropped the stale flowers in the wire bin outside the concrete wedge of a church on her way to the bus.

As it passed her road she saw the Bulloughs on her path. Charmaine and her offspring strode to meet her at the lamp. "Brad says you lifted our Keanu's flowers."

"Then I'm afraid he's mistaken. I'm afraid—"

"You should be," said Arnie, the biggest and presumably the eldest of the brood. "Don't talk to my mam like that, you old twat."

Dorothy had begun to shake – not visibly, she hoped – but stood her ground. "I don't think I'm being offensive."

"You're doing it now," Arnie said, and his face twisted with loathing. "Talking like a teacher."

"Leave it, Arn," his mother said more indulgently than reprovingly, and stared harder at Dorothy. "What were you doing touching Keanu's things?"

"As I was trying to explain, they weren't his. I'm not accusing anybody, but someone took a wreath I'd bought and put it here."

"Why didn't you?" demanded Angelina.

"Because they were for my husband."

"When are you going to get Kee some?" J-Bu said at once.

"She's not," Charmaine said, saving Dorothy the task of being more polite. "Where were these ones you took supposed to be?"

"They were in my house."

"Someone broke in, did they? Show us where."

"There's no sign of how they did it, but—"

"Know what I think? You're mad."

"Should be locked up," said Angelina.

"And never mind expecting us to pay for it," Arnie said.

"I'm warning you in front of witnesses," said their mother. "Don't you ever touch anything that belongs to this family again."

"You keep your dirty hands off," J-Bu translated.

"Mad old bitch," added Brad.

Dorothy still had her dignity, which she bore into the house without responding further. Once the door was closed she gave in to shivering. She stood in the hall until the bout was over, then peeked around the doorway of the front room. She didn't know how long she had to loiter before an angry glance showed that the pavement was deserted. "Go on, say I'm a coward," she murmured. "Maybe it isn't wise to be too brave when you're on your own."

Who was she talking to? She'd always found the notion that Harry might have stayed with her too delicate to put to any test. Perhaps she felt a little less alone for having spoken; certainly while weeding the garden she felt watched. She had an intermittent sense of it during her meal, not that she had much appetite, and as she tried to read and to quell her thoughts with television. It followed her to bed, where she wakened in the middle of the night to see a gliding strip of light display part of a skinny silhouette. Or had the crouching shape as thin as twigs scuttled across the band of light? Blinking showed her only the light on the wall, and she let the scent of flowers lull her to sleep.

It took daylight to remind her there were no flowers in the room. There seemed to be more of a scent around her bed than the flowers in the house accounted for. Were her senses letting her down? She was glad of an excuse to go out. Now that they'd closed the post office around the corner the nearest was over a mile away, and she meant to enjoy the walk.

She had to step into the road to avoid vehicles parked on the pavement, which was also perilous with cyclists taking time off school. Before she reached the post office her aching skull felt brittle with the sirens of police cars and ambulances in a hurry to be elsewhere, not to mention the battering clatter of road drills. As she shuffled to the counter she was disconcerted by how much pleasure she took in complaining about all this to her fellow pensioners. Was she turning into just another old curmudgeon weighed down by weary grievances? Once she'd thanked the postmaster several times for her pension she headed for the bus stop. One walk was enough after all.

Although nobody was waiting outside her house, something was amiss. She stepped gingerly down from the bus and limped through gaps in the traffic. What had changed about her garden? She was at the corner of the road when she realised she couldn't see a single flower.

Every one had been trampled flat. Most of the stalks were snapped and the blossoms trodden into the earth, which displayed the prints of small trainers. Dorothy held onto the gatepost while she told herself that the flowers would grow again and she would live to see them, and then she walked stiff as a puppet into the house to call the police.

While it wasn't an emergency, she didn't expect to wait nearly four unsettled hours for a constable less than half her age to show up. By this time a downpour had practically erased the footprints, which he regarded as too common to be traceable. "Have you any idea who's responsible?" he hoped if not the opposite, and pushed his cap higher on his prematurely furrowed forehead.

"The family of the boy you were trying to catch last week."

"Did you see them?"

"I'm certain someone must have. Mrs Thorpe opposite hardly ever leaves the house. Too worried that clan or someone like them will break in."

"I'll make enquiries." As Dorothy started to follow him he said "I'll let you know the outcome."

He was gone long enough to have visited several of her neighbours. She hurried to admit him when the doorbell rang, but he looked embarrassed, perhaps by her eagerness. "Unfortunately I haven't been able to take any statements."

"You mean nobody will say what they saw," Dorothy protested in disbelief.

"I'm not at liberty to report their comments."

As soon as he drove away she crossed the road. Mrs Thorpe saw her coming and made to retreat from the window, then adopted a sympathetic wistful smile and spread her arms in a generalised embrace while shaking her head. Dorothy tried the next house, where the less elderly but equally frail of the unmarried sisters answered the door. "I'm sorry," she said, and Dorothy saw that she shouldn't expect any witness to risk more on her behalf. She was trudging home when she caught sight of an intruder in her front room.

Or was it a distorted reflection of Keanu's memorial, thinned by the glare of sunlight on the window? At first she thought she was seeing worse than unkempt hair above an erased face, and then she realised it was a tangle of flowers perched like a makeshift crown or halo on the head, even if they looked as though they were sprouting from a dismayingly misshapen cranium. As she ventured a faltering step the silhouette crouched before sidling out of view. She didn't think a reflection could do that, and she shook her keys at the house on her way to the door.

A scent of flowers greeted her in the hall. Perhaps her senses were on edge, but the smell was overpowering–sickly and thick. It reminded her how much perfume someone significantly older might wear to disguise the staleness of their flesh. Shadows hunched behind the furniture as she searched the rooms, clothes stirred in her wardrobe when she flung it open, hangers jangled at her pounce in the guest room, but she had already established that the back door and windows were locked. She halted on the stairs, waving her hands to waft away the relentless scent. "I saw you," she panted.

But had she? Dorothy kept having to glance around while she cooked her dinner and did her best to eat it, though the taste seemed to have been invaded by a floral scent, and later as she tried to read and then to watch television. She was distracted by fancying there was an extra shadow in the room, impossible to locate unless it was behind her. She almost said "Stay out of here" as she took refuge in bed. She mouthed the words at the dark and immediately regretted advertising her nervousness.

She had to imagine Harry would protect her before she was able to sleep. She dreamed he was stroking her face, and in the depths of the night she thought he was. Certainly something like a caress was tracing her upturned face. As she groped for the cord, the sensation slipped down her cheek. The light gave her time to glimpse the insect that had crawled off her face, waving its mocking antennae. It might have been a centipede or millipede–she had no chance to count its many legs as it scurried under the bed.

She spent the rest of the interminable night sitting against the headboard, the bedclothes wrapped tight around her drawn-up legs. She felt surrounded, not only by an oppressive blend of perfume that suggested somebody had brought her flowers–on what occasion, she preferred not to think. As soon as daylight paled Keanu's streetlamp she grabbed clothes and shook them above the stairs on her way to the bathroom.

She found a can of insect spray in the kitchen. When she made herself kneel, stiff with apprehension as much as with rheumatism, she saw dozens of flowers under her bed. They were from the garden–trampled, every one of them. Which was worse: that an intruder had hidden them in her room or that she'd unknowingly done so? She fetched a brush and dustpan and shuddered as she swept the debris up, but no insects were lurking. Once she'd emptied the dustpan and vacuumed the carpet she dressed for gardening. She wanted to clear up the mess out there, and not to think.

She was loading a second bin-liner with crushed muddy flowers when she heard Charmaine Bullough and her youngest children outdoing the traffic for noise on the main road. Dorothy managed not to speak while they lingered by the memorial, but Brad came to her gate to smirk at her labours. "I wonder who could have done this," she said.

"Don't you go saying it was them," Charmaine shouted. "That's defamation. We'll have you in court."

"I was simply wondering who would have had a motive."

"Never mind sounding like the police either. Why'd anybody need one?"

"Shouldn't have touched our Kee's flowers," J-Bu said.

Her mother aimed a vicious backhand swipe at her head, but a sojourn in the pub had diminished her skills. As Charmaine regained her balance Dorothy blurted "I don't think he would mind."

"Who says?" demanded Brad.

"Maybe he would if he could." Dorothy almost left it at that, but she'd been alone with the idea long enough. "I think he was in my house."

"You say one more word about him and you won't like what you get," Charmaine deafened her by promising. "He never went anywhere he wasn't wanted."

Then that should be Charmaine's house, Dorothy reflected, and at once she saw how to be rid of him. She didn't speak while the Bulloughs stared at her, although it looked as if she was heeding Charmaine's warning. When they straggled towards their house she packed away her tools and headed for the florist's. "Visiting again?" the assistant said, and it was easiest to tell her yes, though Dorothy had learned to stay clear of the churchyard during the week, when it tended to be occupied by drunks and other addicts. She wouldn't be sending a remembrance to the paper either. She didn't want to put Harry in the same place as Keanu, even if she wished she'd had the boy to teach.

Waiting for nightfall made her feel uncomfortably like a criminal. Of course that was silly, and tomorrow she could discuss next year's holiday with Helena over lunch. She could have imagined that her unjustified guilt was raising the scents of the wreath. It must be the smell of the house, though she had the notion that it masked some less welcome odour. At last the dwindling day released her, but witnesses were loitering on both sides of the road.

She would be committing no crime – more like the opposite. As she tried to believe they were too preoccupied with their needs to notice or at least to identify her, a police car cruised into the road. In seconds the pavements were deserted, and Dorothy followed the car, hoping for once that it wouldn't stop at the Bullough house.

It didn't, but she did. She limped up the garden path as swiftly as her legs would work, past a motor bicycle that the younger Bulloughs had tired of riding up and down the street, and posted the wreath through the massively brass-hinged mahogany door of the pebbledashed terrace house. She heard Charmaine and an indeterminate number of her children screaming at one another, and wondered whether they would sound any different if they had a more than unexpected visitor. "Go home to your mother," she murmured.

The police were out of sight. Customers were reappearing from the alleys between the houses. She did her best not to hurry, though she wasn't anxious to be nearby when any of the Bulloughs found the wreath. She was several houses distant from her own when she glimpsed movement outside her gate.

The flowers tied to the lamp-standard were soaked in orange light. Most of them were blackened by it, looking rotten. Though the concrete post was no wider than her hand, a shape was using it for cover. As she took a not entirely willing step a bunch of flowers nodded around the post and dodged back. She thought the skulker was using them to hide whatever was left of its face. She wouldn't be scared away from her own house. She stamped towards it, making all the noise she could, and the remnant of a body sidled around the post, keeping it between them. She avoided it as much as she was able on the way to her gate. As she unlocked the door she heard a scuttling of less than feet behind her. It was receding, and she managed not to look while it grew inaudible somewhere across the road.

The house still smelled rather too intensely floral. In the morning she could tone that down before she went for lunch. She made up for the dinner she'd found unappetising last night, and bookmarked pages in the travel guide to show Helena, and even found reasons to giggle at a comedy on television. After all that and the rest of the day she felt ready for bed.

She stooped to peer under it, but the carpet was bare, though a faint scent lingered in the room. It seemed unthreatening as she lay in bed. Could the flowers have been intended as some kind of peace offering? In a way she'd been the last person to speak to Keanu. The idea fell short of keeping her awake, but the smell of flowers roused her. It was stronger and more suggestive of rot, and most of all it was closer. The flowers were in bed with her. There were insects as well, which didn't entirely explain the jerky movements of the mass of stalks that nestled against her. She was able to believe they were only stalks until their head, decorated or masked or overgrown with shrivelled flowers, lolled against her face.

Safe Words

First published in Just Behind You, 2009

At first Masters thought the girls in uniform were watching him. Then a mottled pensioner in a musty flapping tweed suit waddled past in the lobby of the cinema, and their unanimous gaze followed him. He ogled the schoolgirls on a St Trinian's poster until he noticed the usherettes, and then he dodged into the unit as if it were a lair. Both girls wrinkled their noses. "I'm not cleaning up after him," one said.

"We shouldn't let his sort in," said her colleague.

"Better going to a film than doing something worse."

"Make sure he doesn't sit near any girls in there."

"I wasn't," Masters felt he needed to establish, since their attention was drifting towards him. "In there, I mean. I just saw Pride and Prejudice."

Presumably inattention made one say "Nobody's prejudiced here."

"Me included," Masters said.

This was plainly of no interest. Outside the multiplex the early September evening sky reshaped small masses of white cloud above the retail park. A multitude of cars slumbered in the amber twilight while families strolled around the shops on the mile of perimeter— not so much a communal activity as a reverie of shopping. He was heading for his car when he saw almost a classful of schoolgirls outside the Hummock of Sphagnum.

He thought they hadn't realised the quaint name belonged to a pub until he realised they were a few years older than their costumes. He was about to hurry past when a kneesocked young woman in a pleated skirt and white blouse noticed him. "Excuse me," she called, "aren't you Charlie from the school?"

"You'd better pull your tie up, Nancy," one of her friends advised her.

Masters had been trying to ignore how they were dressed. "I'm Charles Masters," he said. "And you'll be ... "

"Nancy Hamilton. Your new music teacher."

Mr Duggan had introduced her to the staff at the end of the summer term. Masters hardly remembered meeting her or telling her to call him Charlie, his standard response to any introduction, but he would remember her now: bright red hair in pigtails, oval face and snub nose, pale slightly pink cheeks, full faintly amused lips... "Let's hope none of your pupils see you like this," he said.

"Let's hope just you do," she said with a wink.

Masters licked his lips and blurted "I've been watching a film of a book that's on the syllabus."

"We believe you," said her friend. "We don't think you were watching us."

He heard his voice grow more rigid than his hot face. "I meant some of the pupils might be here for it too."

"Watch out, Nancy. Sounds like you're in trouble."

"I'll see you tomorrow." This earned a chorus of encouragement, and so he added "At school." The chorus was even more enthusiastic about this. As he retreated Nancy called "Bottoms up, Charlie." Had somebody brought her a drink? Masters didn't look, but as he walked with some effort to his Mini he seemed to sense attention at his back. When he glanced in the mirror, nobody was outside the pub.

Four miles took him home and brought the night on. By the sound of it, the couple on the ground floor were making love or watching such a film or both. He drummed on the banister as he went upstairs, but it made no appreciable difference. A faint aroma of microwaved curry loitered in the hall of his apartment. He was in the main room and heading for the computer when he veered towards the shelves of discs of films. He tried John Wayne and Howard Keel and Elvis Presley, but perhaps he'd had enough of films for one evening, and so he went to bed with David Lodge on language. Long before he switched the light off he was pondering Nancy Hamilton's wink.

In the morning he used the flush to muffle the plops of his droppings, then took a fierce shower before spicing his armpits and minting his teeth in front of his plump introverted reflection. Once black coffee and a one-man packet of cereal had done him for breakfast, he dressed and went out to his car. Jude and Beverley were slipping into theirs, but he resisted the temptation to enquire what kind of night they'd had. Foliage hung limp and dull along the suburban avenues as he drove to Justwell High, which often struck him as describing too many of the pupils rather than naming the school. Above it the sky was featureless with cloud no paler than the concrete buildings. Today was just for the staff, many of whose cars were already parked in the yard. Masters found the nearest space for his and hurried into Excellence Block.

In the assembly hall three mathematics teachers were helping Mr Duggan arrange chairs in a circle as if to solve a geometry problem. "Do come in, that's the way," Mr Duggan boomed. "All here now, are we? Then let's get interpersonal. Bonding before brainstorms, that's how we work."

Masters was wondering why he needed to be reminded, and looking for an empty chair as the staff sat down like the players of some kind of game, when he realised the headmaster wasn't addressing him. "You'll remember our new colleague," Mr Duggan told them all.

Masters glanced back to see Nancy Hamilton in a restrained grey suit and flat shoes, which hushed her footsteps. Her red hair was tied severely back. Bob Pollard, the head of his department, was levelling an impatient hand at the place beside him. As Masters took the seat Nancy sat almost opposite him, and Mr Duggan rounded off the problem by sitting nearly equidistant from them. "Let's start by each sharing a secret about ourselves," he said.

This was his latest inspiration, which homed in on Masters by the shortest route. As colleagues owned up to reading horror Action or enjoying Frugoburgers or listening to Rolf Harris albums, he tried to think of an admission to make. Too soon it was his turn, and he blurted "I collect films."

Nobody bothered reacting. Perhaps he sounded unadventurous, but he couldn't afford to surprise them. Was Nancy having to consider her admission too? She seemed thoughtful. Her immediate neighbour confessed to nights of Bingo with his mother, and then she said "I like being someone else."

"There's a new idea." Having applauded or at least slapped his fat hands together, Mr Duggan said "How do you mean that exactly?"

"I like playing roles. Dressing up."

"You'll want to speak to her about your drama group, Bob," the headmaster told Pollard, who pursed his lips but nodded. The parade of secrets grew ponderous with jokes as it approached Mr Duggan, who put it out of its misery by saying "I broke a window when I was a boy. Let's keep the thoughts flowing. Who's going to give us ideas?"

"I've a few about discipline," Pollard said.

As Masters clasped his hands in his lap Nancy produced a notebook from her handbag. "That's the spirit," Mr Duggan told her. "You take down whatever you think you should take down."

Masters crouched forward and flattened his lap with his hands while he tried to find somewhere to look. Suppose someone noticed that he alone wasn't looking at Nancy? He gazed at her harder than he meant to and was rewarded with a wink. He barely managed not to wink back, though everybody else was watching Pollard as he enthused about regaining respect for the uniform, single file and silence in the corridor, standing up when a teacher entered the room... "Well, that's so old it's nearly new," Mr Duggan said. "I'll raise it with our Learning Consumers Council. That's the elected body of our pupils, Nancy, that we liaise with on a monthly basis. I hope this meeting will be just as productive and meaningful. Who's next in the ring?"

It wasn't going to be Masters. He had a condition to cover up, not too obviously, he hoped. It made him more aware of language that was secretly significant to him: keep your end up, get to the bottom of it, over the, position ... Whenever someone's words lurched out of their context he glanced at Nancy, and twice he was given a wink. At last it was lunchtime, and he was painfully conscious how hard it might be to struggle to his feet. He tried to stay unnoticed while the rest of the staff made for the canteen, but Mr Duggan came over to him. "You've been looking eager to put something in, Charles. Nothing's inhibiting you, I hope."

He couldn't risk changing his cramped stance. "Are you having trouble with anything?" Mr Duggan said.

"Just thinking," Masters said in the hope that would end the interrogation.

"By all means do it aloud. That's why we're here today and every day. You know I've always got an ear." Mr Duggan lowered his voice and himself to enquire "It's not the new member, is it?"

Masters gritted his teeth so as to mutter "How do you mean?"

"Miss Hamilton. She hasn't been bothering you."

"She's done nothing at all."

"You seemed to find her the most interesting thing in the room." Mr Duggan brought up a smile and weighted it with a frown. "Could the interest be more than professional?"

"I was just thinking she'll be good for Justwell."

"You young people." Whatever Mr Duggan meant by this and by shaking his head, he added "You'll remember we have to set an example, won't you? I'm sure I don't need to remind anyone. I'd be happy to have her for a daughter."

Once Mr Duggan was well on his way to the door, Masters succeeded in rising from some of his crouch. He overtook the headmaster in the corridor to dodge into the male staff toilet. "If you wouldn't—" Mr Duggan said, but Masters hadn't time to linger. He was bolting the door of the solitary cubicle when Mr Duggan said "Are you likely to be long?"

"I'll try not to be."

"I may as well wait, shall I?"

Mr Duggan's toilet was next to his office in Achievement Block. While Masters was tempted to send him there, he said only "I don't know."

"I'll wait in the corridor," Mr Duggan declared.

Presumably he'd grasped that Masters was embarrassed, even if he couldn't suspect why, thank God. As soon as the door to the corridor shut, Masters dashed to the sink. Suppose Mr Duggan heard the tap and thought it was safe to come in? "I'm nearly done," Masters shouted loud enough, he hoped, to cover up the splashing of cold water. "Just another, just another minute or so. Another few seconds. Not many more now." Though the water had achieved the desired effect, he couldn't dry himself with the roller towel except by hopping on tiptoe. Barely in time, having zipped himself up, he thought to flush the toilet for Mr Duggan to hear. "All yours," he told him in the corridor.

His face was growing hot by the time Mr Duggan said "I hope you washed your hands, Charles. Can't have a healthy mind without clean hands."

"Of course," Masters said, waggling his fingers so vigorously he sprinkled the other man. "Sorry," he said and regretted adding "Just water."

In the canteen he thought it best to stay away from Nancy Hamilton, not even in her sight unless she'd turned her head. He loaded his plate with half a dozen species of salad from the Well-being Buffet that many of the pupils called Smellpeeing. "Eating myself healthier," he told Mr Duggan when the headmaster ambled around the tables like just another of the staff, but the comment didn't seem to go down much better than the oily multicoloured pasta did. He was healthy enough—there were many other people like him. After lunch he had to muffle a cough with a fist whenever anybody's choice of words seized his imagination. Nancy was to his left now, and he would have had to crane his neck to see her. At last Mr Duggan closed the proceedings by saying "Let's carry our enthusiasm forward into the school year."

Masters felt as if he was carrying part of himself forward as he made not much less than a bolt for freedom. He took refuge in his car and subsided as he drove awkwardly home. Boys were playing football in the yard of the primary school across the road. The irregular pulse kept faltering and reviving as he microwaved his packaged Chinese dinner. The thumps fell silent at last while he ate out of the plastic carton, and he was able to hear the couple downstairs. They sounded in the mood for a quiet evening; not a solitary word was audible, though their murmurs were. Would they be too quiet for him to watch a film?

He shouldn't feel so secretive. They weren't films only people like him watched, and how many of the actors in them shared his tastes? Rock Hudson and Harold Lloyd and Steve Martin? Peter Cushing, Ray Milland, Robert Mitchum, William Powell, Alfie Bass? Bob Todd's enthusiasm seemed unmistakeable, while Lionel Stander applied himself and his belt with rather more than a will. Masters would have liked to know how some of the women felt when they were over someone's knee or in an equally humiliating position: Paulette Goddard, Ginger Rogers, Mai Zetterling, Francoise Dorleac, Maureen O'Hara, Doris Day... Helena Bonham Carter looked delightfully dishevelled after a caning, and perhaps he could content himself with that, since the actual punishment wasn't shown or, more importantly, heard. Would scenes from the foreign films be audible downstairs—identifiable, rather? Words weren't the issue now. Jude and Beverley might overhear Marcello Mastroianni caning Sydne Rome, or Per Oscarsson using a ruler on Geraldine Chaplin in school uniform, or Magda Vasaryova being whipped in the street with the tube from a bicycle pump and then baring her bottom for more... Wouldn't that be quiet enough? Another Czech film, Closely Observed Trains, was even quieter about the reason he'd bought it, and he inserted that disc in the player.

Much of the film took place in a railway station, where the station master warned his assistant that if she misbehaved he would mark her bottom. One night she took the bait, and he bent her over and took quite a time about lowering her knickers, the kind English schoolgirls used to wear. When he'd first watched it the episode had taken Masters unawares; he hadn't realised there were such scenes in films or that they could be so excruciatingly appealing. It had revealed him to himself, but now that he knew the outcome of the scene—the station master simply imprinted the girl's bottom with a rubber stamp—it no longer worked, and the aftermath in which she displayed her stamped behind to several interested bureaucrats didn't compensate. He ejected the disc and switched on the computer.

He was paying only for the Internet. He didn't pay for any site. Searching for references wasn't so different from browsing in a dictionary or a thesaurus for all the disciplinary words and phrases, a pastime he'd discovered after watching the scene with the stamp. On some sites people wrote about their experiences or fantasies, which helped him to feel less alone and abnormal, not least because many of the contributors seemed to suffer from these feelings too, although why should they fear exposure when gay couples like the one downstairs no longer did? Some sites reviewed films dedicated to his tastes, and some offered clips of the films. Since he only used the free sites, he couldn't be so obsessed or desperate. He was sure he'd recently seen a clip that was beginning to mean more to him.

It wasn't on www.baredbottoms.com or www.spickandpanked.de or www.thefirmfirm.co.uk. www.blushingbums.co.uk didn't have it, nor did www.cheekycheeks.com. Eventually he found it on www.severleyspanked.co.uk, where he often wondered whether the misspelling of the site name was designed to be provocative. In Naughty Nancy's Punishment, or rather in the excerpt meant to tempt viewers to buy the film, a gowned headmistress lectured a young woman in a gymslip about her behaviour. A room containing a bookcase and a flimsy desk represented an office, and the lecture was just as rudimentarily amateur. "I won't have such behaviour at my school," the headmistress declared without ever specifying what it was. "I've never seen such behaviour in my life. I don't expect my head girl to behave like that. If you're going to act like a junior you'll have to be treated like one." Nancy shifted her feet and twisted her skirt with her fingers and worked on looking apprehensively penitent until she was sent to fetch a chair. She brought one from off-screen and spent at least a minute in arranging it as instructed in front of the desk before the headmistress was prepared to sit on it. "Over my knee, young lady," she said and repeated the order while the young woman—a phrase that had no power at all for Masters—mimed reluctance. She was complying at last when the excerpt came to an end.

He left the site and typed the title of the film in the Frugoget search box, so enthusiastically that he had to keep deleting mistakes. Baughty Nancy, Naughty Ban, Naughty Nancy's Pubis... That part didn't appeal to him; it wasn't why he watched the films, and whenever they showed it he felt uneasy, not least with the notion that even a grown-up schoolgirl was being made to bare it. Naughty Nancy's Punishment, and at last he had the words right, but they did him no good. The only free sample was the one he'd watched.

He wasn't going to pay when there was no need. He watched the clip again. "Over my knee, young lady..." Sometimes just a few magical words were enough. The headmistress repeated them, and then his mind did, by which time they were achieving the effect he'd had reason to regret in the assembly hall. He attempted to maintain its delicious equilibrium as long as it would let him. When at last he was unable to resist bringing it to a conclusion he was in the bathroom, and soon after that in bed.

He needn't feel guilty. He was sure that the people he'd watched had been enjoying themselves, both of them. If he wasn't normal, what did that make them? Of course they all were, just as much as Nancy Hamilton. Until today his favourite words and phrases had never affected him when he'd heard them innocently used. How careful would he have to be now that they did?

He slept so dreamlessly that he didn't hear the alarm clock. He floundered out of sleep and bed almost half an hour late. He would have brushed his teeth in the shower except for fear of electrocuting himself with the brush.

He hadn't time for breakfast or to respond to Beverley's effusive greeting as he ran downstairs. "Well, good morning to us, I'm sure," Jude complained.

"Nothing personal." They looked wilfully unconvinced, and as Masters struggled with the vintage latch of the front door he added "I mean, nothing against you. Either of you. Both of you either."

"Sounds like a threesome," Beverley said.

"Or a daisy chain," said Jude.

Masters succeeded in twisting the latch. "I'm just in a rush."

"Then don't let us take up another instant of your time," Jude said.

Masters dashed to his car and sped through the suburb whenever the traffic and the guards with signs on poles in the roads outside schools let him. At Justwell High he had to sound his horn behind groups of pupils on his way to the car park. He inched the Mini into the space between the hulking vehicles the gym masters drove, and then he hurried across the crowded schoolyard to Excellence Block.

As usual, Mr Duggan had a new theme for his welcome speech—welcome, Masters thought, only as in welcoming. "Every year we all set off on an adventure voyage. We're on the good ship Education..." The ship's officers had to stand up as he named them and face the pupils as well as a fusillade of pops of gum. He promised that the captain's door was always open, which suggested to Masters that the contents of the cabin needed to be nailed down. Soon Mr Duggan drifted off among his metaphors, asking all the members of the crew to keep everything shipshape and then declaring that they were ambassadors for the school as well as explorers for knowledge and divers for it too. At last it was time for the teachers to teach.

Masters had sixth-formers for the morning—Year Twelve, who were rewarded with the old-fashioned title for choosing to stay on. Pollard was still furious that Mr Duggan had prescribed the subject for the term—the relevance of language to modern life—but Masters hardly cared, since in any case he wasn't allowed to select it. He was impressed and wryly amused by the detailed analysis his pupils applied to a Frugo special offers leaflet. All the same, he was impatient for an opportunity to speak to Nancy Hamilton.

The day brought none, though they were both in Attainment Block. At the breaks she always seemed to be surrounded by her fellow music teachers.

On Wednesday he heard her voice not raised but edged with authority as she addressed a class in her room on a corner of the building. Was he secretly glad that circumstances were keeping them apart? Was he afraid to approach her because she was real? He had no excuse on Thursday morning, when he came face to face with her in his corridor.

She was there when he returned from the mid-morning break. "Just you wait in the corridor, young lady," he couldn't help hearing himself say. "Go and wait outside my room." She was talking to several Year Eleven girls about their tastes in music and apparently discovering that she liked some of the same performers: Afterbirth, Susie Cervix, a band called SSS... Was she trying to seem school-girlish? As Masters attempted to tamp down his thoughts, a girl said "Who do you like, Mr Master?"

"Now, Sarah, you know that's not my name," he said and risked admitting "Madonna and Armand van Helden."

"Don't know him."

Neither did her friends, although they giggled. Perhaps Nancy was unaware that both performers had made spanking videos—Madonna enthused about receiving the treatment. "Well," Nancy said, "time for everyone to—"

He couldn't let the chance to talk to her escape him. "How are you finding life in the corner?"

"Which is that?" she said but also winked.

"Your classroom. You're settling in all right."

"No complaints so far."

Did she mean from her or about her? It seemed an odd comment to make in front of their pupils, but perhaps she felt as awkward as he did. "Well," she said, "as I was saying, I think it's time everyone was in their classes."

In a moment she was striding down the corridor, her severely pinstriped bottom waving an adieu if it wasn't a promise. Masters realised he shouldn't have watched her for so long when Sarah said "Do you like her, Mr Master?"

Speaking too harshly might have betrayed his confusion, and so he sounded close to playful. "What's my name, Sarah?"

"It's Mr Masters, isn't it?" She might have been emulating his tone as she added "Mr Master."

"Just you be careful. If you keep on behaving like that you may end up finding out how much of one I am."

The girls squealed with shock or delight or amusement, not at all unlike Nancy's companions had outside the pub. He was about to step up his sternness when the girls grew blank-faced and retreated along the corridor. He turned to see Bob Pollard frowning at him. "Everything in hand, Mr Masters?" Pollard said.

"I've handled them. No further action necessary," Masters said and shut himself in his room.

He needn't act as if he had something to hide. He'd never spoken to a pupil like that before, and he wouldn't again. Real schoolgirls didn't figure in his fantasies—their shrill immaturity, their shallowness, their lived-in uniforms and fashionably drooping socks didn't appeal to him at all. He tried to lose himself in language, in analyses of last night's television adverts, even if he wasn't allowed to point out that the sixth-formers had misspelled many of the words they'd used or copied down. "Let them sort that out when we've got them to university," Mr Duggan always said.

While Masters didn't set out to favour the boys, that afternoon he was more at ease with them than with the girls. He was trying to be absolutely careful, and it felt like cowardice. Wasn't he guilty of that with Nancy Hamilton? He only had to catch her and say whatever needed saying. The trouble was that she wouldn't ordinarily pass his room—hers was closer to the corridor on the far side of the block—and whenever he tracked her down she was with pupils or colleagues. He had to find a reason to go to her room.

He almost missed the one she gave him late on Friday afternoon. As he helped a class analyse the language in the photographs of graffiti they'd brought in, he heard distant music from a small sweet orchestra with the high notes of an organ joining in the dance. The last school bell of the day contributed a contemporary dissonance like a warning that the music wasn't up to date. Masters outdistanced most of the sixth-formers to the door and hurried to Nancy's room.

Most of the audience had made their escape, but several gawky fourth years were lingering. He might have carried on around the corner if he hadn't hesitated long enough that Nancy saw him. Her smile was an enquiry as well as a greeting, and he was almost at her desk before he realised he'd failed to prepare a remark. The best he could whip up was "What were you playing? What was your dancing organ?"

"Handel. My treat for the end of the week."

He was wondering whether it was her reward or the children's or both when she said "Lovely, wasn't it?"

"It's not the only—"

He didn't know how he might have gone on if a girl hadn't interrupted. "Can we bring our own music next week, miss?"

At least this established that Nancy was unmarried. He peered at her ring finger, which was bare as any schoolgirl's should be. "Don't you like mine?" she said.

The Year Ten screwed her face up. "A bit old."

"Don't you mean old-fashioned?" Masters said. "Sometimes that's best."

"We'll see next week, girls," Nancy said and turned back to him. "Was that all?"

He guessed she didn't want it to be, but the girls were loitering. "Shall I walk along with you?" he said.

"I've work to finish here first."

"Kept in after class, hey?" As her eyelid twitched he said "Maybe we should find a better time."

"For what, Mr Masters?"

He thought she barely pronounced the final consonant. "To get to know each other," he murmured.

She blinked past him at the girls. "We could go for a drink," he thought it best to add in case they heard.

"When?"

His reply almost fell over itself in its eagerness to be uttered. "Tonight?"

"Not tonight."

"How about tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow." She appeared to be sampling the word before she said "Where?"

"Where I saw you playing your role."

This elicited a wink. "I'll see you there eightish," she said.

He was so happy to be heading for the future that he was halfway to Frugo before he thought they should have swapped phone numbers. Surely there would be no need. The rest of Friday felt like a celebration: stocking up for next week at the supermarket, his dinner of microwaved paella from the Frugood delicatessen counter, the first bottle of wine of the weekend—only the weekend, and not the whole bottle, which proved he was no alcoholic. It didn't seem to matter what he watched on television, because he enjoyed it all: the news, a quiz, a quiz about the news, a comedy, a comedy quiz. He didn't have recourse to the computer or even to dreams in bed.

He spent more of Saturday than usual on cleaning and tidying his rooms. He didn't know how the evening might develop after drinks and, he hoped, dinner. Just one unresolved element bothered him, and when he heard voices downstairs he hurried out of his apartment. "Can I have a word, chaps?"

"Which one?" Jude said.

"If there was any misunderstanding last time we met I'd like to clear it up."

"Clear away," Beverley said.

"I was almost late for work. I don't know what you do, but I expect you know what that can be like."

"Beverley's an accountant and I work in a bank."

"And we make a point of never being late."

"All I'm trying to say," Masters persisted, "is I didn't mean to snub you. I hope you know I'm not like that."

"We don't know what you're like," Beverley said.

"Not too much unlike you in a way. That's to say we're all, how shall I put it, people who like to think they're normal wouldn't think we are."

Both men gazed at him, and then Jude scragged the latch. "Time we went shopping," he said. "That's what people like us do."

"I do as well," Masters told them, but they were out of the house.

He finished cleaning the apartment and found more tidying to occupy the afternoon. Why weren't his disciplinary video discs in order? He made them alphabetical and was admiring the result when it occurred to him that there was a principle only his sort would appreciate. While it was a challenge, eventually the discs were lined up from the least severe—films like the one where Conrad Veidt kept threatening to spank Valerie Hobson—to the most, such as the film he always had to stop before the caned schoolgirl released the cord of the guillotine from between her teeth. He didn't enjoy torture, let alone anything worse.

He'd scarcely established the final order when it was time to call a taxi. "Being careful?" the driver said as Masters seated himself.

"Of what?"

"Not driving when you've had a drink."

"I wouldn't. I hope someone else doesn't either."

"And who's that going to be?"

"The young lady I—" Rather than say or even think too much he said "The one I'm meeting."

The pavement outside the Hummock of Sphagnum was crowded with smokers. Quite a few of Sunday's schoolgirls had been smoking, though not Nancy Hamilton. Almost no tables or booths in the pub were unoccupied, but she was nowhere to be seen. When a bargirl decided it was his turn at last he bought a glass of Canadian Chardonnay and found an empty booth, where he sat on the outer end of a padded bench and stood his glass on the far side of the table to keep a place for Nancy. At a quarter past eight he was no longer alone, until he convinced several middle-aged women that he wouldn't be the solitary occupant of the booth. As they tramped off in search of a table he glimpsed someone flourishing a cane—a billiard cue. At twenty past the jukebox struck up a song accompanied by rhythmic whacks on some form of percussion. Twenty-five past brought him still more people on a quest for seats, and he began to wonder whether Nancy had been in the pub at eight o'clock before deciding he'd let her down. Why couldn't they have exchanged mobile numbers? Somebody was being slapped nearby—no, people were clapping in time with the new selection from the jukebox. Now here came the latest searcher for a seat, and he had to insist yet again that he was waiting for a friend, or was he deluding himself? He lifted his head and saw Nancy Hamilton.

She was wearing a black sweater and equally tight denim jeans. Her hair swayed around her face as if to conceal her expression. Her full lips looked ready as ever to pout, but she settled on a wry smile and a lingering wink. "I haven't kept you waiting long, have I?" she said.

He held up the glass he'd been unable to refill for fear of losing the booth. "As long as it's taken me to drink this."

"Oh dear. That was naughty of me, wasn't it?" As Masters responded, though not verbally and he very much hoped not visibly, she said "White, was it? I'll get you another."

"Should you put something on your seat? I've been looking after it for you."

"It does look a bit bare." She dropped her handbag on the bench, having taken out her purse. "Keep an eye on it," she said and made for the bar.

Masters turned, not without some covert difficulty, to watch her progress. In the snug blue material her bottom looked like an unmistakeable message, and he clearly wasn't the only customer in the pub to think so. What role was she playing—a teenager on a night out? As she returned with a glass of white wine in each hand, a young couple hurried after her. "Are those taken?" the man said.

"They are. These aren't. Slide along, Charlie."

She moved her handbag to the end of the bench against the wall and followed it, and Masters sat across from her. In a moment he was boxed in by the man and faced by one more woman than he welcomed, and it didn't help that Nancy appeared to be waiting for him to speak. "In the corner again," he said.

"We are."

Was she being provocative or seeing that the other couple didn't understand? Perhaps her wink meant both. "Bottoms up," he said. "Just one."

The second phrase was audible only inside his head, though it seemed loud as the clink of their glasses. "Here's to the end of the week," Nancy said.

"Back to school again soon."

"No need to talk about that here."

As he scrutinised her face he saw that she was withholding a wink, which was surely as good as a promise. He was taking rather more than a sip of wine when she said "So tell me all about your secret."

He hadn't quite swallowed, and now he did too fast. He coughed for a generous number of moments before his neighbour on the bench dealt his back several hearty thumps. None of this helped him think of a reply, but as soon as he'd washed away the last threat of a cough with another gulp of wine Nancy said "All right now? Let's be hearing, then."

"I'm not sure what you want," Masters said and let her see him glance towards their seatmates.

"Have you forgotten what you said?" As he struggled to decide or risk guessing which of his comments she could have in mind, she said "When we had to talk about ourselves. What sort of films do you collect?"

"All sorts. Any that take my fancy. Sometimes I think the end's in sight and then something else turns up." When this failed to earn a wink he said "I wouldn't be surprised if you'd like them."

"Tell me some."

He'd said too much, and achieved nothing with another sidelong glance. "Musicals?" he tried suggesting.

"I do like some. Which ones?"

"Kiss Me Kate and Blue Hawaii, they're the ones everyone knows. And My Fair Lady" he was inspired to add, though he didn't own it. "Eliza, bring me my slipper."

"I'm fond of that," Nancy said as her neighbour on the bench protested "That's not right."

"What's not?" her boyfriend said.

"It's 'Eliza, where the devil are my slippers?' That's what he says at the end of the film. Sorry, shouldn't be listening. We should be having our own conversation."

Masters drained his glass and stood up to buy drinks for Nancy and himself. Perhaps not offering to treat the other couple would let them know they weren't included in anything. When he came back with the drinks, however, Nancy was telling them how she taught music. As soon as she gave him a chance he said "What's your favourite?"

"I think you'll have guessed."

"Your favourite music."

"Exactly." After a pause and with some disappointment she said "Handel."

"Handel with care," said the man beside Masters and looked ready to favour him with a further thump.

As Nancy's neighbour winced at the joke Masters said "What was the band I heard you say you liked, the one with three esses?"

"Skanks Smoking Skunk," said Nancy's seatmate.

"The girls brought it up," Nancy said. "I wouldn't have."

She seemed deliciously close to penitent, but how could he respond? At first he was grateful when the other man took over the conversation, enthusing about his car stereo and then the sports car he'd bought as a bargain. His girlfriend explained or apologised that he sold cars, and after several minutes more of him Masters started interjecting questions. Wouldn't the salesman rather have a spanking new car? Did he cane his car much? Were prices going to bottom out? Did he think they'd touched bottom? If prices dropped, would the salesman be able to keep his end up, or might he find himself up a creek without a paddle? This sounded forced even to Masters, who became aware that he'd drunk most of a bottle of wine despite not having eaten since breakfast. Even if the salesman didn't understand his choice of words, he and his girlfriend had begun to look uncomfortable, possibly suspicious. All the same, Masters was ready to ask what position he assumed on the environment when Nancy said "Do you think we'd better move on?"

Masters finished his drink and rose to his feet so eagerly that everyone else in the booth seemed to be taken unawares. He had to glance around to see that Nancy was following him across the pub. She caught up with him beyond the smokers' rally. In the glare of the lamps, which looked close to propping up the suffused reddish sky, her face resembled a quizzical mask. "So where did you want to go now?" he said.

"I wasn't meaning we should leave. I meant it might be good to change the subject."

"We'll have to be careful of our words, won't we?" He tailed that with a laugh and said "What kind of dinner would you like?"

"I had something before I came out. Didn't you?"

"I didn't have time."

"You need to eat, Charlie. I could make you something if you like."

"That would be perfect."

"Don't imagine too much," Nancy said, which might have sounded like a warning if she hadn't winked as well. "Let me call a taxi.

He felt proud and excited while he waited with her. He held the door open for her and sat beside her, careful not to touch. The taxi headed towards the school, away from where he lived, and turned along a side street lined with pairs of houses big enough for a main road. "You must be doing well for yourself," he said.

"It's my parents' house. They're away for the weekend."

"Lucky there's someone to take you in hand, then," Masters said, showing her his palm to fend off the money she held out. "It's my treat."

The house greeted her with a security light as she stepped into the large gravelled garden. The garden was bordered by shrubs, and weren't some of them cotoneaster? "Caning at Easter," Masters murmured as he thought of telling Nancy that the shrub derived its name from the Slovak tradition in which girls were still birched by their suitors. She had already let herself in and was switching off an alarm as he followed her into the wide bright hall, which smelled of lilacs and more faintly of pipe tobacco. The light of a cut-glass chandelier glinted on the glass of a series of photographs that climbed beside the broad staircase—pictures of a baby and progressively a child who grew up to be Nancy by the time the portraits reached the landing. Masters might have imagined they were leading him upstairs, but Nancy led him to the kitchen, an extensive room dominated by pine and metal. "I'm good at sandwiches," she said. "What do you fancy?"

"You don't have to be too good. Whatever you think will be fine."

She opened the refrigerator and bent over, stretching the seat of her jeans even tighter and rounder. Masters flattened his right hand on the chilly table to keep it under control and sat on a hard straight chair. As she took salami and salad out of the refrigerator he said "So did you hire that costume?"

"This one?" Nancy said, bumping the metal door shut with her bottom. "Why would I need to do that?"

"The one I saw you in that night."

"Gosh, no," she said and set about chopping the salad. "That's my old uniform."

"All of it?" When she looked puzzled he tried saying "It's all authentic."

"Everything you saw." As he wondered whether he could risk pursuing this she said "I don't feel comfortable otherwise."

"Well then, you—"

"In a costume unless it's accurate, I mean. I must have a word with Bob Pollard."

Though this was as unwelcome as it seemed irrelevant, Masters tried to use it. "Why, do you want to be back at school?"

"Just to talk to him about the theatre group. I'm in one already. That's where I wear costumes."

"You ought to dress up like you did more often."

She looked up, but not at Masters. She might have been addressing her reflection in the window backed by a large dim garden as she said "How's your appetite?"

He couldn't tell whether the question was designed to be ambiguous. "To be honest, I'm not very hungry," he said and took a breath so deep it seemed to taste of the faint lingering domestic smells. "I think—"

"I'll just give you one of my specials, then, and you can always have more."

She was turning to the refrigerator again, perhaps to resume her mockingly provocative stance, when Masters said "I think you should go and get dressed."

"I am dressed. What's wrong with how I am?"

She clearly was an actress. He might have believed in her confusion if it hadn't been for her wink. "You know perfectly well what I mean, young lady," he said. "Go and put on your uniform."

"Why?"

He could never have anticipated there would be so much delicious tension in the game. She must be experiencing it too, which tightened the knot of expectancy in his stomach and reached lower. "So you'll be appropriately dressed," he said.

"Appropriate to what?"

"To what's in store for you, my girl. Skanks Smoking Skunk, indeed. If you act like a naughty schoolgirl you must expect to be treated like one."

"Forgive me." Without letting him have time to take this as a plea she said "I'm not at school any more, and even if I was—"

"That's were, young lady. Perhaps you'd better have a grammar lesson too. Now just you go and get changed unless you want to go across my knee like that. You won't be keeping those on long in any case."

As he stood up or more accurately crouched to move the chair away from the table she stepped back, dropping the knife with a clatter on the breadboard. She was playing the scene for all she was worth. He shouldn't be moving his chair—he should tell her to put one in the middle of the floor, where there was space for her to wriggle and kick as girls did. The tension dissipated as he sat down, but he had plenty to say to revive it. He was opening his mouth when Nancy said "What do you think you're doing?"

"Waiting for you to do as you're told, young lady. And when you come back—"

"I'm not going anywhere. I'm afraid you are."

Was she betraying her inexperience? The line didn't fit the scenario. "And where might that be, young lady?" he prompted.

"Home, I should think. Not here, anyway. I don't know how you've got the wrong idea about me, but I've never done that kind of thing."

"Maybe not done it, but you know all about it, don't you? Or maybe you want to."

"Whatever makes you think that?"

"You have. You've kept giving me the wink. There, you're doing it now."

"That's nerves."

The knot in his guts had grown more apprehensive than expectant and was bidding to become the hardest part of him. "What is?" he demanded.

"My eye. It's a tic. I try not to do it. I don't try so hard when I'm with people I think I can trust."

Masters staggered to his feet, shoving the chair back. He saw her growing tense again, but it gave him nothing like pleasure. The middle of his body felt like a hole in his sense of himself. "All right," he said, which seemed to fall short of conveying any reassurance. "I won't come anywhere near you. I'm sorry I—Don't worry, I'm gone."

The security light showed him up as he stumbled out of the house and dragged the door shut. Gravel gnashed beneath his feet all the way to the gate. He was groping for his mobile when he realised that he mustn't loiter near the house in case Nancy or her neighbours saw him. As he wandered homewards he phoned for a taxi, but it was ten minutes before he saw one. He waved at it with the little authority he still had, expecting the driver to ignore him. When it halted he recognised the woman who had driven him to the pub. "Walking it off?" she said.

"What do you think I'd have to walk off?"

This silenced her while she turned the car away from Nancy's house, and then she said "Looks as if you've been getting around."

"I've been getting nothing."

"What happened to your young lady?"

"Nothing happened to her. Nothing at all. Can we just get home?"

Although he'd shut the driver up at last, he felt as if there were no words he could use that mightn't set a trap for him. She scarcely thanked him for the change he let her keep when he arrived home. He blundered upstairs, faster for hearing a key in the front door. Jude and Beverley had come home too, and he couldn't face talking to them. As their chatter spilled into the downstairs hall he closed his door with rather too much of a slam.

He splashed his face with handfuls of cold water—he no longer had a reason to apply it elsewhere—and gulped several glassfuls before sprawling into bed. Whenever he managed to doze, memory jerked him awake. What had he done? What did he deserve for behaving like that? The thought led nowhere he wanted to find himself just now. He couldn’t risk a confrontation at the school; he had to talk to Nancy before then. Surely he could phone even if it wouldn't be wise to go to her house.

In the morning the Internet gave him the land line number. He was so appalled by the temptation to spend time on the spanking sites while he waited until it wasn't too early to phone that he almost shoved the computer off the desk in his haste to shut it down. He stared at his breakfast without managing to summon up an appetite and eventually went out to buy a plump Sunday newspaper. Once he'd tiptoed upstairs so as not to disturb Jude and Beverley he rang Nancy's house. A man answered at once.

Masters jabbed the key to end the call and clenched his fist around the mobile. Had it been her father or a boyfriend? They couldn't identify the mobile, but suppose they rang back? It was slippery with sweat by the time his hand relaxed. They must have decided the call was a wrong number, and perhaps he could still phone Nancy. Her mobile number must be on record at the school.

He crept downstairs and hurried to his car. Across the road a solitary youth had been elected as an emblem of rude health—was kicking a football around the schoolyard, at any rate. There were no games at Justwell, where the yard was deserted. Masters had to yank the bolts of the gates out of the pavement before he could drive into the yard. Even once he'd parked in the shadow of Attainment Block he still felt too exposed by the bare sky. Did he look like an intruder sneaking into the school to get up to mischief? He wasn't one, because the door was locked.

Surely a caretaker ought to be on the site, and Masters could say he needed something from his room. He rapped on the door of Attainment and then knocked without rousing a response. The other blocks didn't own up to being occupied either. He went back to Attainment and trudged around the outside. None of the windows was open, and those that looked as if they might admit him didn't yield, neither Nancy's nor the school secretary's. When the tour brought him back to his car he drove out of the yard and shut the gates, ramming the bolts into their sockets. The clank and its equally commanding twin put him in mind of a prison cell.

Could he stay off sick tomorrow? It would only delay any confrontation. He spent hours attempting to distract himself with the Sunday paper, but the words might as well have been in an unknown tongue. Television didn't engage his mind either—the screen could have been as blank as the computer monitor. When he went to the shelves full of films, he had to step back from a compulsion to grab them by the handful and fling them into the bin. He took refuge in bed, where shame and guilt and apprehension were waiting for him.

He was up early in the morning—no point lying in bed when he couldn't sleep for thoughts. He hoped he would at least lose weight by going without today's breakfast too. It let him drive early to school, to have more of a choice of a seat in the hall, wherever Nancy wasn't sitting near. She was already at the left end of the front row. He sat at the opposite end of the next one and willed her not to look back.

She didn't, even or especially when Mr Duggan used words or phrases that might have made her wink: bear in mind, rear, behind... Each of them made Masters feel as if the headmaster was observing his hot and hotter face. He was fleeing to Attainment before Nancy stood up, almost before any of the pupils did. He closeted himself with the sixth form and heard at least some of their analyses of the blurbs on their favourite albums. Skanks Smoking Skunk were mentioned more than once. What else wouldn't let him stop thinking of Nancy? He ought to go to her room and ensure they were alone when he spoke to her. But at morning break she was waiting in the corridor.

Masters felt as if the exodus of teenagers was blocking his escape, unless the sight of Nancy was. He wasn't as ready for her as he'd tried to think. She hesitated until the last of his class emerged, and then she stepped or strode or stalked into the room. "Have you got time for a word?"

"Shut the door. Come over here."

His speech seemed eager to play tricks on him. He was only doing his best to ensure they weren't overheard. He moved towards the window and stared through it at a weed sprouting from the concrete roof of Achievement like a feather in a cap. As Nancy joined him she murmured "I'm sorry, I shouldn't have said what I said."

He didn't dare face her in case he was misinterpreting her. "You said quite a lot, so which—"

"I didn't mean to say I couldn't trust you. It isn't as though you actually did anything."

"I wouldn't have if you didn't want it."

"I've nothing against it for people who like it. It just isn't me. I've never been treated that way."

"Then maybe you can't know if—" He was going too far again, at least given where they were. "I wouldn't have started if I hadn't seen you dressed like that," he said.

"You ought to be careful. You might come up against someone who isn't like me. You don't want to get the wrong sort of reputation."

"Schoolgirls, you mean? They don't do anything like that for me, any of the ones here. My kind of schoolgirl—" He turned to look at her at last, which might have made further words redundant, but that wasn't why he broke off. Standing in the doorway with a fist around the doorknob was Bob Pollard.

Among the feelings that overwhelmed Masters were rage and a sense of betrayal. "I told you to shut the door."

"I thought I did," Nancy said, and no more as she noticed Pollard.

Masters stared hot-eyed at him. "How long have you been there?"

"More than long enough."

"Do you usually sneak into people's rooms? Don't you ever knock?"

"I believe Miss Hamilton wanted to speak to me."

"Oh yes, and what was that about?"

"Drama," Pollard said.

Nancy seemed to confirm or qualify this with a wink, but at last Masters was fully aware that the trait meant nothing at all. "Leave that," he said as Pollard made to close the door. "I'm on my way out.

Pollard gave this an old-fashioned look. Several girls were strolling, if even that, past the classroom. "Never mind listening," Masters blustered. "Just you make yourselves scarce before—" Rather than risk continuing, he marched away along the corridor.

He dodged into the male staff toilet and bolted the cubicle door. Whenever anyone tried it he muttered less than a word—less, he hoped, than would identify him. When the bell ended the break he strode to his classroom like a teacher in a film. Some of Year Eleven had watched Pride and Prejudice at home, but they only wanted to talk about the actors, so that he felt as if language had ceased to matter. He did his best by the book for an hour, but it seemed as remote as they blatantly found it. He might have welcomed lunchtime—he was planning to spend it away from the school—if a sixth-former hadn't stopped him outside the room. "Mr Duggan wants you in his office."

Did the boy know why? How many other people knew? By the time Masters reached Achievement, he'd more than renewed his fury. As he shut Mr Duggan's door behind him he struggled to control his words. "I don't know what Bob thinks he heard, but it was a private conversation."

Mr Duggan raised his head while keeping his gaze on Masters. "What should he have heard?"

"As I say, it was private. Nothing to do with the school. Nancy needed to discuss something with me, that's all."

"And didn't know Mr Pollard was there, is that so? I haven't spoken to him." With just enough of a pause to load it with meaning Mr Duggan added "Yet."

"So why did you want to see me?"

"I'd like you to explain your behaviour recently around the school."

"What behaviour? Are you sure you haven't been listening to Pollard?" Masters was contending with rage again. "Nobody needs to look out around me, not the girls or anyone else," he said. "Especially not them."

Perhaps the addition was unnecessary or worse, and he was trying to think how to counteract it when the headmaster said "Your behaviour yesterday."

"Which was..."

"You were seen attempting to break into the school."

"Who says I was?"

"I do, Charles." Mr Duggan looked saddened by the question and the answer. "A lady who lives across the road showed me your picture on her mobile," he said. "She didn't know you taught here."

"She must have seen I didn't break in. I'd left something in my room, that's all."

"What would that have been?" Having waited some seconds, Mr Duggan said "Could it have been something you wanted to hide?"

"Such as what? Come on, come and look. Search all you want. I won't touch a thing."

"Don't say anything you might regret, Charles." Mr Duggan remained seated with an emphatic creak of his fat chair. "I think you've said enough just now," he advised. "We'll need to have another session after I've consulted."

"If it's with Pollard I don't give me much of a chance," Masters said, and then there were no more words.

Perhaps the parting shot helped lose him his job. Being raided must have, whoever told the police about him, even when his computer was returned at last without his being prosecuted. By then the local newspaper had named him and identified him as a teacher and mentioned that he lived opposite another school. Before he left Justwell High, hardly anyone was speaking to him. Nor did Jude and Beverley, even on his last day in the house. "At least you found someone like each other," he said at the end of his final trudge downstairs, but their door stayed shut. As he and the removal van set out to trek three hundred miles he bore his last sight of Nancy with him—little more than a glimpse along a corridor crowded with girls. He would always wonder what she'd mouthed at him. All he knew was that it had come with a wink.

2010

The Correspondence Of Cameron Thaddeus Nash

First published in Black Wings: New Tales Of Lovecraftian Horror, 2010

In 1968 August Derleth was sent a number of letters that had apparently been received by H. P. Lovecraft. The anonymous parcel bore no return address. Although the letters had been typed on a vintage machine and on paper that appeared to be decades old, Derleth was undecided whether they were authentic. For instance, he was unsure that someone living in a small English village in the 1920s would have had access to issues of Weird Tales, and he could find no obvious references to Nash in any of Lovecraft's surviving correspondence. Derleth considered printing some or all of Nash's letters in the Arkham Collector but decided against using them in the Winter 1969 issue devoted to Lovecraft. Later he asked me to think about writing an essay on Lovecraft for a new Lovecraftian volume that might offer the letters a home, but the project was shelved. Intrigued by his references to the Nash letters, I persuaded him to send me copies, including the other documents. It isn't clear what happened to the originals. When I visited Arkham House in 1975, James Turner knew nothing about them, and he was subsequently unable to trace them. He did mention that in Howard Phillips Lovecraft: Dreamer on the Nightside, Frank Belknap Long referred to an English writer who "thought it was amusing to call people names," by whom Lovecraft had supposedly been troubled for several years. Since Long was unable to be more specific, Turner deleted the reference. I reproduce all the letters here, followed by the final documents. Nash's signature is florid and extends across the page. It grows larger but less legible as the correspondence progresses.

7, Grey Mare Lane,
Long Bredy,
West Dorset,
Great Britain.

April 29th, 1925.

My dear Mr. Lovecraft,

Forgive a simple English villager for troubling such a celebrated figure as yourself. I trust that the proprietors of your chosen publication will not think it too weird that a mere reader should seek to communicate with his idol. As I pen these words I wonder if they might not more properly have been addressed to the eerie letter-column of that magazine. My fear is that the editor would find them unworthy of ink, however, and so I take the greater risk of directing them to you. I pray that he will not find me so presumptuous that he forwards them no farther than the bin beside his desk.

May I come swiftly to my poor excuse for this intrusion into your inestimably precious time? I have sampled six issues of the "unique magazine", and I am sure you must be aware that it has but a single claim to uniqueness—the contributions of your good self. I scarcely know whether to marvel or to be moved that you should allow them to appear amongst the motley fancies which infest the pages of the journal. Do you intend to educate the other contributors by your example? Are you not concerned that the ignorant reader may be repelled by this commonplace herd, thereby failing to discover the visions which you offer? The company in which you find yourself reads like the scribbling of hacks who have never dared to dream. I wish that the magazine would at least emblazon your name on the cover of every number which contains your prose. I promise you that on the occasion when I mistakenly bought an issue which had neglected to feature your work, I rent it into shreds so small that not a single vapid sentence could survive.

I am conscious how far any words of mine will fall short of conveying my admiration of your work. May I simply isolate those elements which remain liveliest in my mind? Your parable of Dagon seems to tell a truth at which the compilers of the Bible scarcely dared to hint, but I am most intrigued by the dreams which the narrator is afraid to remember in daylight. The quarry of your hideous hound declares that his fate is no dream, yet to this English reader it suggests one, brought on by the banal Baskerville investigations of Sherlock Holmes. Your narrator de la Poer dreams whilst awake, but are these reveries shaped by awful reality or the reverse? As for the descendant of the African union, perhaps he never dreams of his own nature because he has a germ in him—the same germ which infects the minds of all those who believe we are as soulless as the ape. But it is your hypnotic tale of Hypnos which exerts the firmest hold on my imagination. May I press you to reveal its source? Does it perhaps hint at your own experience?[1]

As to myself, I am sure you will not want to be fatigued by information about me. I am but a player at the human game. However long I sojourn in this village, none of its natives will tempt me to grow breedy. While my body works behind a counter, my spirit is abroad in the infinity of imagination. At least the nearby countryside offers solitude, and it harbours relics of the past, which are keys to dreams. Please accept my undying gratitude, Mr. Lovecraft, for helping to enliven mine. If you should find a few moments to acknowledge this halting missive, you will confer existence on a dream of your most loyal admirer.

I have the honour to remain, Mr. Lovecraft,

Your respectful and obedient servant,

Cameron Thaddeus Nash.

7, Grey Mare Lane,
Long Bredy,
West Dorset,
Great Britain.

August 12th, 1925.

My esteemed Mr. Lovecraft,

I am sorry that you find New York inhospitable and that you have been inconvenienced by burglary. May I counsel you to reflect that such disadvantages are negligible so long as one's fancies remain unfettered? Your corporeal experiences count for naught unless they prevent you from dreaming and from communicating your dreams. Let me assure you that they have reached across the ocean to inspire a fellow voyager.

I was sure that your stories which I have read gave voice to your dreams, and I rejoice to understand that other tales of yours do so. But why must these pieces languish in amateur publications? While the mob would doubtless greet them with brutish incomprehension, surely you should disseminate your visions as widely as possible, to give other dreamers the opportunity to chance upon them. I hope some of our kind made themselves a Yuletide present of your tale about the festival in the town which you had never visited except in dreams. I fear that any reader with a brain must have been seasonably inebriated to enjoy the other contents of that number of the magazine. How can it still neglect to advertise your presence on the cover? I remain appalled that the issue which contained your tale of Hypnos chose to publicise Houdini's contribution instead. How misguided was the editor to provide a home for those ridiculous Egyptian ramblings? Houdini even dares to claim that the tale is the report of a dream, but we genuine dreamers see through his charlatanry. I believe he has never dreamed in his life, having been too bent on performing tricks with his mere flesh.[2]

May I presume to pose a question? I wonder if Hypnos represents only as terrible an aspect of dream as you believe the reader could bear to confront, unless this evasion is born of your own wariness. For myself, I am convinced that at the farthest reach of dream we may encounter the source, whose nature no deity ever imagined by man could begin to encompass. Perhaps some Greek sage glimpsed this truth and invented Hypnos as a mask to spare the minds of the multitude. But, Mr. Lovecraft, our minds stand above the mass, and it is our duty to ourselves never to be daunted from dreaming.

I wish you could have shared my midsummer night's experience, when I spent a midnight hour with the Grey Mare and her colts. They are fragments of an ancient settlement, and I seemed to dream that I found the buried entrance to a grave. It led into a labyrinth illuminated only by my consciousness. As I ventured deeper I became aware that I was descending into an unrecorded past. I understood that the labyrinth was the very brain of an ancient mage, the substance of which had fertilised the earth, where his memories emerged in the form of aberrant subterranean growths. One day I may fashion this vision into a tale.

I have done so, and I take the great liberty of enclosing it. Should you ever be able to spare the time to glance over it, I would find any comments that you cared to offer beyond price. Perhaps you might suggest a title more fitting than The Brain Beneath the Earth?

I bid you adieu from a land which you have dreamed of visiting.

Yours in inexpressible admiration,

Cameron Thaddeus Nash.

18, Old Sarum Road,
Salisbury,
Wiltshire,
Great Britain.

October 30th, 1925.

Dear H. P. Lovecraft,

Thank you for your kind praise of my little tale, and thank you for taking the trouble to think of a title. Now it sounds more like a story of your own. Please also be assured of my gratitude for the time you spent in offering suggestions for changes to the piece. I am sure you will understand if I prefer it to remain as I dreamed it. I am happy that in any case you feel it might be worthy of submission to the "unique magazine", and I hereby authorise you to do so. I am certain that Beneath the Stones can only benefit from your patronage.

I must apologise for my mistake over the "Houdini" tale. Had it appeared as Under the Pyramids by none other than the great Howard Phillips Lovecraft, I promise you that it would have excited a different response from this reader. I should have guessed its authorship, since it proves to be the narration of a dream. May I assume that Houdini supplied some of the material? I believe this robs the tale of the authenticity of your other work. Only genuine dreamers can collaborate on a dream.

I was amused to learn that you had to devote your wedding night to typing the story afresh. Perhaps your loss of the original transcription was a lucky chance which you should continue to embrace. I trust you will permit a fellow dreamer to observe that your courtship and marriage appear to have distracted you from your true purpose in the world. I fervently hope that you have not grown unable to dream freely now that you are no longer alone. May your wife be preventing you from visiting sites which are fertile with dreams, or from employing relics to bring dreams to your bed? You will have noticed that I have moved onwards from my previous abode, having exhausted the site of which I wrote to you. I believe my new situation will provide me with a portal to dreams no living man has begun to experience.

In the meantime I have read your brace of tales which recently saw publication. The musician Zann and his street are dreams, are they not? Only in dreams may streets remain unmapped. Is the abyss which the music summons not a glimpse or a hint of the source of the ultimate dream? And Carter's graveyard reverie conjures up the stuff of dream.[3] It rightly stays unnameable, for the essence of dreams neither can nor should be named. You mentioned that these tales were composed before your courtship. May I take the liberty of suggesting that they remind you what you are in peril of abandoning? The dreamer ought to be a solitary man, free to follow all the promptings of his mind.

At least while you are unable to write, you are still communicating visions —my own. Now that you have become my American representative I shall be pleased if you will call me Thad. It is the name I would ask a friend to use, and it sounds quite American, does it not? Let me take this opportunity to send you three more tales for your promotion. I am satisfied with them and with their titles. May I ask you not to show them to any of your circle or to mention me? I prefer not to be heard of until I am published. I hope that the magazine will deign to exhibit both of our names on the cover. Let the spiritless scribblers be confined within, if they must continue to infest its sheets.

Yours in anticipation of print,

Thad Nash.

18, Old Sarum Road,
Salisbury,
Wiltshire,
Great Britain.

February 14th, 1926.

Dear Howard Phillips Lovecraft,

I am grateful to you for your attempt to place my work. You had previously mentioned that Farthingsworth Wrong[4] tends to be unreceptive to the truly unique. I am certain that you must have done everything in your power to persuade him to your opinion of my tales. Are there other markets where you will do your best to sell them, or is it more advisable to wait for his tastes to mature? You will appreciate that I am relying on your experience in these matters.

I do not recall your mentioning that you had written new fiction last summer. I am relieved to learn that your marital subjugation has not permanently crippled your ability to dream. May I assume that these stories did not hinder your marketing of my work? I believe that our writing has little in common other than the title you provided, but I wonder if the editor's judgement may have been adversely affected by your sending him too many pieces all at once. Perhaps in future it would be wise to submit my work separately from your own, and with a reasonable interval between them.

I am heartened by the information that you plan to write a history of supernatural literature. I am sure that your appreciation of the form will produce a guide which should be on the shelves of every dreamer. I look forward eagerly to reading it. If I can advise or in any way aid you, please do not hesitate to ask.

You will be anxious to hear about the progress of my own work. Please reassure yourself that your failure to place my stories has not cast me down. Rather has it goaded me to venture deeper into dream, whence I shall return bearing prizes no less wonderful than dreadful. I shall tell ancient truths which no reader will be able to deny and no editor dare to suppress. I am certain that the nearby sites contain unsuspected relics, although soon I may have no more need of them. However it is used, a relic is but the germ of a dream, just as your dreams are the germs of your fiction. I wonder to what extent your dreams have become fixed on your native Providence? Perhaps your desire to return there is draining your imagination of the energy to rise higher and voyage farther. I hope you will ultimately find as congenial an environment as I have myself.

I await news of your efforts.

Yours for the supremacy of dream,

Cameron Thad Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

May 23rd, 1926.

Dear HPL,

I write to alert you that, like yours, my body has found a new lodging. It became necessary for me to decamp to an unfamiliar town. I had been surprised one night in the process of obtaining a relic. The donor of the item could have made no further use of it, but I fear that the mob and its uninformed, uniformed representatives of unformed uniformity have little understanding of the dreamer's needs. The resultant pursuit was unwelcome, and a source of distraction to me. For several nights I was annoyed by dreams of this mere chase, and they led to my seeking a home elsewhere.

Well, I am done with graves and brains and the infusion of them. I am safe inside my skull, where the mob cannot spy, nor even dreamers like yourself. I have learned to rise above the use of material aids to dream. I require but a single talisman—the night and the infinite darkness of which it is the brink. Let the puny scientists strive to design machines to fly to other worlds! This dreamer has preceded them, employing no device save his own mind. The darkness swarms with dreams, which have been formed by the consciousnesses of creatures alien beyond the wildest fancies of man. Each dream which I add to my essence leads me deeper into uncharted space. A lesser spirit would shrivel with dread of the ultimate destination. In my tales I can only hint at the stages of my quest, for fear that even such a reader as yourself may quail before the face of revelation.

I see you are content to have reverted to your native Providence. I hope that your contentment will provide a base from which you may venture into the infinite. I have read your recent contributions to Farthingsworth's rag. Will you forgive my opining that your story of the dreamer by the ancestral tomb seems a trifle earthbound? I had higher expectations of the other tale, but was disappointed when the narrator's dreams urged him to climb the tower not to vistas of infinity but to a view of the dull earth. No wonder he found nothing worthy of description in the mirror.[5] I wonder if, while immolated in your marriage, you became so desperate to dream that you were unable to direct the process. I counsel you to follow my example. The dreamer must tolerate no distractions, neither family nor those that call themselves friends. None of these is worth the loss of a solitary dream.

At your urging I recently viewed the moving picture of The Phantom of the Opera. You mentioned that you fell asleep several times during the picture, and I have to inform you that you must have been describing your own dream of the conclusion rather than the finale which appears on the screen. I assure you that no "nameless legion of things" welcomes the Phantom to his watery grave. I am glad that they at least remained nameless in your mind. No dream ought to be named, for words are less than dreams.

I look forward to reading your short novel about the island raised by the marine earthquake, although would an unknown island bear such a name as "L'yeh" or indeed any name?[6] And I am anxious to read your survey of supernatural literature when it, too, is completed. In the meantime, here are three new tales of mine for your perusal and advancement. Please do make all speed to advise me as soon as there is news.

Yours in the fellowship of dreams and letters,

CTN.

P.S. Could you make sure to address all correspondence to me under these initials?

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

April 17th, 1927.

Dear HPL,

I trust that you have not been alarmed by my prolonged silence. I thought it wise not to attract the attention of the mob for a judicious period. I also felt obliged to give you the opportunity to place some of your fiction and to compose new tales before I favoured you with the first sight of my latest work. I think now you have been amply represented in Farthingsworth's magazine, and I am encouraged to learn that you have recently been productive. I believe it is time that you should have reports of my nocturnal voyaging, and I shall include all those which I judge to be acceptable to my audience. Some, I fear, might overwhelm the mind of any other dreamer.

I hope those which I send you will go some way towards reviving your own capacity to dream. May I assume that the anecdote about the old sea captain and his bottles was a sketch for a longer story and saw publication by mistake? I suppose it was trivial enough for Farthingsworth's mind to encompass. I note that the narrator of your tale about the Irish bog is uncertain whether he is dreaming or awake, but his dream scarcely seems worth recording. Your tale of the nameless New Yorker is no dream at all, since the narrator's night is sleepless, and the only fancy you allow him is your own, which you have already achieved—to return to New England. As for the detective in Red Hook, he needs specialists to convince him that he dreamed those subterranean horrors, but I am afraid the medical view failed to persuade this reader.[7]

I am glad to hear that you wrote your story of the upraised island. May I trust that it has greater scope than the tales I have discussed above? Perhaps this may also be the case with your most recent piece, though I confess that the notion of a mere colour falls short of rousing my imagination. No colour can be sufficiently alien to paint the far reaches of dream, which lie beyond and simultaneously at the core of the awful gulf which is creation. Of the two novels you have recently completed, does the celebration of your return to Providence risk being too provincial? I hope that the account of your dream-quest is the opposite, and I am touched that you should have hidden my name within the text for the informed reader to discover. But I am most pleased by the news that you have delivered your essay on supernatural literature to the publisher. Could you tell me which living writers you have discussed?[8]

Let me leave you to do justice to the enclosed pieces. Perhaps in due time I may risk sending those I have withheld, when you have sufficiently progressed as a dreamer. Have you yet to loose your mind in the outer darkness? Every dream which I encounter there is a step towards another, more ancient or more alien. I have shared the dreams of creatures whose bodies the mob would never recognise as flesh. Some have many bodies, and some have none at all. Some are shaped in ways at which their dreams can only hint, and which make me grateful for my blindness in the utter dark. I believe these dreams are stages in my advance towards the ultimate dream, which I sense awaiting me at the limit of unimaginable space.

Yours in the embrace of the dark,

CTN.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

June 23rd, 1927.

Dear HPL,

Of course you are correct in saying that my new pieces have progressed. I hope that you will be able to communicate your enthusiasm to Farthingsworth and to any other editors whom you approach on my behalf.

Thank you for the list of living writers whose work you have praised in your essay. May I take it that you have withheld one name from me? Perhaps you intended me to be surprised upon reading it in the essay, unless you wished to spare my modesty. Let me reassure you that its presence would be no surprise and would cause me no embarrassment. If by any chance you decided that my work should not be discussed in the essay because of its basis in actual experience, pray do remind yourself that the material is cast in fictional form. In the case of such an omission, I trust that the error will be rectified before the essay sees publication.

Yours in urgency,

CTN.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

August 25th, 1927.

Dear HPL,

I was glad to receive your apology for neglecting to include me in your essay. On reflection, I have concluded that your failure to do so was advantageous. As you say, my work is of a different order. It would not benefit from being discussed alongside the fanciful yarns of the likes of Machen and Blackwood. It is truth masquerading as fiction, and I believe you will agree that it deserves at least an essay to itself. I hope its qualities will aid you in placing your appreciation in a more prestigious journal, and one which is more widely read. To these ends I sent you yesterday the work which I had previously kept back. I trust that your mind will prove equal to the truths conveyed therein. While you assimilate their implications, I shall consider how far they are suitable for revelation to the world.

Yours in the darkest verities,

CTN.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

November 1st, 1927.

Dear HPL,

I am assured by the postmistress that the parcel of my work has had ample time to reach you. I hope that the contents have not rendered you so speechless that you are unable to pen a response. Pray do not attempt to comment on the pieces until you feel capable of encompassing their essence. However, I should be grateful if you would confirm that they have safely arrived.

Yours,

CTN.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

January 1st, 1928.

Lovecraft,

Am I meant to fancy that the parcel of my work faded into nothingness like a dream? You forget that my dreams do not fade. They are more than common reveries, for they have grasped the stuff of creation. The accounts which I set down may be lost to me, but their truths are buried in my brain. I shall follow wherever they may lead, even unto the unspeakable truth which is the core of all existence.

I was amused by your lengthy description of your Halloween dream of ancient Romans. I fear that, like so many of your narrators, you are shackled to the past, and unable to release your spirit into the universe. I read your amazing story of the alien colour, but I failed to be amazed except by its unlikeness.[9] How can there be a colour besides those I have seen? The idea is nothing but a feeble dream, and your use of my name in the tale is no compliment to me. When I read the sentence "The Dutchman's breeches became a thing of sinister menace," I wonder if the story is a joke which you sought to play on your ignorant audience.

Nevertheless, it has some worth, for it convinces me that you are by no means the ideal agent for my work. I ignored your presumption in suggesting changes to my reports as if they were mere fiction, but I am troubled by the possibility that you may regard your work as in any way superior to mine. Is it conceivable that you altered the pieces which you submitted on my behalf? I suspect you of hindering them for fear that your fiction might be unfavourably compared to them, and in order that it might reach the editors ahead of them. I am sure that you excluded my work from your essay out of jealousy. I wonder if you may have resented my achievement ever since I gave you my honest appraisal of your Houdini hotchpotch. For these reasons and others which need not concern you, I hereby withdraw my work from your representation. Please return all of it immediately on receipt of this letter.

Sincerely,

Cameron Thaddeus Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

March 3rd, 1928.

Loathecraft,

Where is my work? I have still not had it back.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

May 1st, 1928.

Lovecramped,

So a second parcel has vanished into the void! How capricious the colonial post must be, or so you would have me believe. I am not to think that you are fearful of my seeing any alterations that you made to my work. Nor should I suspect you of destroying evidence that you have stolen elements of my work in a vain attempt to improve your own. You say that I should have kept copies, but you may rest assured that the essence is not lost. It remains embedded in my brain, where I feel it stirring like an eager foetus as it reaches for the farthest dream.

I wonder if its undeveloped relative may have made its lair in your brain as you read my work. Perhaps it is consuming your dreams instead of helping send them forth, since your mind falls so short of the cosmos. Your limits are painfully clear from your tale of the regurgitated island. Could you imagine nothing more alien than a giant with the head of an octopus? You might at least have painted it your non-existent colour. Giants were old when the Greeks were young, and your dreams are just as stale. No doubt your acolytes—Augur Dulldeath and Clerk Ashen Sniff and Dullard Wantdie and Stank Kidnap Pong and the rest of your motley entourage[10]—will counterfeit some admiration of the tale.

I assume they have been deluded into valuing your patronage, and are so afraid of losing it that they dare offer you no criticism. I would demonstrate to you how your tale should have been written if it included any matter worthy of my attention. In any case, all my energy is necessary to dealing with my dreams. I doubt that I shall write them down in future. I am unaware of anyone who deserves to learn of them. Let mankind experience them for itself when it has sufficiently evolved to do so.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

December 25th, 1929.

Lugcraft,

Did you dream that you would never hear from me again? Had you, perhaps, even forgotten my existence, since reading my work has evidently taught you nothing as a writer? You are but a shell in which a few dreams writhed and then withered when exposed to daylight. I had the misfortune to leaf through your claptrap about Dunwich.[11] I suppose you must have chosen to write about the submarine village before you remembered that you had already written about a submarine island.[12] You would have done better to leave both of them sunken. Can you dream of nothing except tentacles? It seems to me that your writing is a decidedly fishy business. Has my mislaid work yet to put in a mysterious reappearance?

I was reminded of you upon recently encountering Mr. Visiak's novel Medusa.[13] He, too, writes of a tentacled colossus which inhabits an uncharted rock. His prose is infinitely subtler and more skilled than your own, and evokes the dream which must have been its seed. Have you read the book? Perhaps it is one reason why you appear to have written so little of late. He has achieved all that you strain to achieve and more, with none of your symptoms of labour. He is rightly published by a reputable London house, whereas your efforts are removed from view within a month. Pulp thou art, and pulp thou shalt remain.

Are you struggling to shape some kind of myth out of the mumbo-jumbo in your recent effusions? It does not begin to hint at any kind of truth. You can never hope to touch upon that until you approach the ultimate, the source, the solitary presence, the very secret of all being. What is the universe but the greatest dream, which dreamed itself into existence? At its core, which is also its farthest boundary, is the lair of its creator. That awful entity is the essence of all dreams, and so it can be glimpsed only through them. The visionary dreams of the inhabitants of the universe are fragments of its nature, and it is jealous of bestowing them. Could you convey any of this in your spiritless fiction? I am certain you could not. Even I flinched from the merest distant glance upon the presence which hovers in the deepest dark, mouthing vast secrets while it plucks many-legged at the fabric of the universe. Perhaps I shall capture its essence in a final literary offering, The Eater of Dreams. Should it see print, your attempts and those of all your acolytes will fade into deserved oblivion.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

November 1st, 1931.

Lumpcraft,

Have you still failed to lay your hands on my misplaced work? It is evident that you have learned nothing from its example. When I saw the title of your latest washout I wondered if the whisperer might have been your feeble version of the truth to which I previously alluded, but it is even weaker than I would have expected of you.[14] The conclusion of the tale was obvious to me before I read the first page. You have always donned the mask of fiction to aid you in your pitiful attempts to scare your few admirers, but now it should be plain to the dullest of them that there is nothing behind the mask.

Your day is done, Lumpcraft, such as it ever was. I was amused to see that you have rendered Farthingsworth's rag even less unique by reprinting your tired tales of the hound and the rats. Are you now so bereft of imagination that you must resort to reanimating these soulless cadavers? Perhaps you have realised that, enervated though they are, they have more life than your latest efforts.

Which of those has lured in your new lickspittle, Rabbity Cowherd?[15] I presume he is avid for the world to notice that he refers in his own scribblings to your mumbo-jumbo. Is this intended to delude the reader into mistaking your puerile fancies for truth, or is it simply a game which you and your courtiers play? If you had been granted even the briefest glimpse of the denizen of the ultimate darkness, you would not dare to misuse your dreams in this fashion. You would recognise that you are but the least of its countless dreams. If you had discerned the merest hint of its nature, you would know that by attempting to perceive it, you had attracted its attention. How shall I describe the experience in words that the likes of you may understand? It feels as though some embryonic organ has become embedded in my brain. Sometimes I feel it stir, and then I know that I am observed by a consciousness so vast and so indifferent to me that it shrivels my being to less than an atom. Perhaps these moments are immeasurably brief, and yet they last for an eternity, both of which are constant states of the denizen of the infinite. In such a moment I become aware that time is as much of an illusion as space and all the materials which compose the universe. Nothing is real except the dreams of the source that clutches with its countless limbs at its creation. What would you write if you grasped even a fraction of its nature, Lumpcraft? I believe that you would never write again. What a boon that would be! For myself, I have done writing to you. You are no more to me than I am to the boundless dreamer.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

September 3rd, 1933.

Pulpcraft,

Well, you have outdone yourself. Who else could have written your tale about the witch's house?[16] Who else would have wanted to do so? Who, having committed the offence, would have put his name to it? I am beginning to think that you may indeed not have received my later work. Certainly its example is nowhere to be seen, although the same may equally be said of my work which you admitted to receiving. This latest farrago is an insult to the very name of dream, and I suspect that even your fawning friends will search in vain for elements to praise. Since they all write fiction, no doubt they will produce some to comfort you. Are you so timid or so dishonest that you cannot admit your failings as a writer even to yourself? Were I you, Pulpcraft, I should give up the struggle before I perpetrated worse embarrassments. I writhe in disgust at your humdrum pulpy prose, and so does the mouth in my brain.

It is indeed the semblance of a mouth. Just as the glimpses of the presence with which I tantalised you were no more than similes, so this may be the merest hint of the reality. All the same, I often feel its moist lips shift within my cranium, and sometimes I have felt a tongue explore the folds of my brain, probing among them. Increasingly I seem to sense its whispered secrets seeping into the substance of my cerebrum. At times I have to overcome a compulsion to voice them as I deal with the mob beyond the counter. Does this raise your hope that I may reveal some of them to you? You will have no further opportunity to steal the fruits of my dreaming. You lack the courage to venture where my spirit travels, and so you are unworthy of the reward. Let your prudent providence provide you with the prize you earn.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

October 24th, 1935.

Cravecraft,

Behold, you have enticed a new follower to yourself! Bobby Blob writes like a very young man.[17] Was Dulldeath not one, too? Doubtless you find their kind easiest to influence. Do you now require your lackeys to imitate your awkward prose besides including your mumbo-jumbo in their fiction? Perhaps you should be wary of accepting young Blob's tale of the shambler as a tribute.[18] The narrator appears to need very little excuse to do away with the writer from Providence. I am reminded that Stank Pong also exterminated such a writer.[19] He had an even better reason, since his image of the hand which plays with brains comes closer to the cosmic truth than all your slime and tentacles and gibberish.

You should heed the message of your minions. You are redundant, Cravecraft, and a burden on your scanty audience. Do you not see that your friends feel obliged to praise you? I believe your lack of inspiration has finally overwhelmed you, since your pen appears to have dribbled its last. You are reduced to disinterring the decayed carcasses of tales which should have been left in their unmarked graves. The fiddler Zann begs for pennies once more, and the white ape joins in with a jig. Why, you have given the tale of the ape a new name in the hope of misleading the reader that its publication is unique![20] I doubt that even Farthingsworth's dull audience will be deluded. No mask can disguise material which is so uninspiringly familiar, and all the perfumes in the world cannot swamp the stench of rot.

You will be interested to learn that one of the conduits through which I was dreamed into the world has ceased to function. He leaves a sizeable amount of money and his fellow channel, my mother. Both are useful in relieving me of the need to remain in prosaic employment. As well as dealing with domestic matters, my mother will act as my envoy to the mundane world. I am glad to be free of the distractions of customers and fellow butchers, for their incomprehension was becoming an annoyance. The secrets that are mouthed within my brain must be pronounced aloud, but only the enlightened should hear them. Do not dream for an instant that you are numbered among that fellowship.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

June 19th, 1936.

Strivecraft,

Never imagine that you can pass off my discoveries as your own. Wherever you are published, I shall find you. Do you now seek to astound? You appear to have astounded your new readers solely by your unwelcomeness.[21] They are as unimpressed by all your slime and tentacles as any audience should be. What possessed you to inflict your outmoded fancies on a readership versed in science? Since you claimed Farthingsworth as your most sympathetic editor, have you perhaps thrown yourself upon an agent? He must be poor, both financially and intellectually, to accept your work. At least, if I am not mistaken, he has revised it to improve your prose. No doubt your craven sycophants will chorus that your enfeebled work goes from strength to strength.

The true visionary neither requires supporters nor expects them. My mother's only functions are to keep the house in order and to deal with the mob on my behalf. Her interpretations of my pronouncements are none of my concern, and I shall not allow them to annoy me. It is only to retain her usefulness that I exert myself to keep my secrets from her, instead sharing them with the lonely hills when the night permits. There I can release the truths which the lips constantly shape in my brain. Sometimes things consumed by ancientness gather about me to listen to my utterances, and sometimes I am witnessed by creatures that will inhabit the earth when the mob is no more.

As to you, Strivecraft, will you persist in scribbling when you have less than nothing to communicate? Perhaps you should be shown what a true seer looks like. The next time I dispatch my mother to the shops I may have her bring me a camera. While your mind would shrivel at the merest glimpse of the source of all dreams, perhaps you can bear to look upon its human face, although I do not think you will survive the comparison. I think you will never again want to face yourself in a mirror.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

October 12th, 1936.

Limpcraft,

I see that Rabbity Coward has ceased to play the brave barbarian. His dreams must have been as frail as your own. Or might he have intended to set you an example by ridding the world of himself? How long will you persist in loitering where you are unwanted? The readers of the scientific fiction magazine have made your unwelcomeness plainer still.[22] What delusion drives you to seek publication where you must know you will be loathed? Even Farthingsworth is not so desperate that he feels compelled to disseminate your latest flops. Limpcraft, you are but a dismal caricature of the man I once sought to be. As well as burdening literature, your inert presence weighs me down and binds me to the earth. My brain aches at the thought that you continue to infest the world, just as my jaws ache with declaration.

I have the camera, but I do not think any technician could look upon the photograph which would be developed. Whenever my mother is at home I keep to my room. I have trained her to leave my meals outside the door, since it would be inconvenient to have her flee. The curtains shut out the attentions of the mob. I have no need of mirrors, because I know that I am transformed by dreaming. Perhaps I am growing to resemble the source, or perhaps its awareness has begun to consume me. Perhaps I am how it mouths its way into the world. By now the lips that gape within me feel as vast as space. Your puny skull could never contain even the notion of them.

C. T. Nash.

1, Toad Place,
Berkeley,
Gloucestershire,
Great Britain.

January 18th, 1937.

Lovecrass,

So you are dreaming of me, are you? Or you are so bereft of dreams that you have to write tales about me. I am a haunter of the dark, am I, and a shell which owes its vitality to the presence of a woman.[23] It is time that you were confronted with the truth. I shall convey a revelation from which even your mind will be unable to hide. I vow that you will no longer be able to ignore your ignorance.

I shall enclose my photograph. There is, of course, no need for my to delegate my mother to obtain a print, since you can have the film developed yourself. Have you the courage to gaze upon the face of dream, or has all your dreaming been a sham? Perhaps you will never sleep again while you remain in the world, but whenever you dream, there shall I be. Do not imagine that your death will allow you to escape me. Death is the dream from which you can never awaken, because it returns you to the source. No less than life, death will be the mirror of your insignificance.

C. T. Nash.

This was apparently Nash's final letter. Two items are appended to the correspondence. One is a page torn from a book. It bears no running title, and I have been unable to locate the book, which seems to have been either a collection of supposedly true stories about Gloucestershire or a more general anthology of strange tales, including several about that area. Presumably whoever tore out the sheet found the following paragraph on page 232 relevant:

Residents of Berkeley still recall the night of the great scream. Sometime before dawn on the 15th of March 1937, many people were awakened by a sound which at first they were unable to identify. Some thought it was an injured animal, while others took it for a new kind of siren. Those who recognised it as a human voice did so only because it was pronouncing words or attempting to pronounce them. Although there seems to have been general agreement that it was near the river, at some distance from the town, those who remember hearing it describe it as having been almost unbearably loud and shrill. The local police appear to have been busy elsewhere, and the townsfolk were loath to investigate. Over the course of the morning the sound is said to have increased in pitch and volume. A relative of one of the listeners recalled being told by her mother that the noise sounded "as if someone was screaming a hole in himself". By late morning the sound is supposed to have grown somehow more diffuse, as though the source had become enlarged beyond control, and shortly before noon it ceased altogether. Subsequently the river and the area beside it were searched, but no trace of a victim was found.

The second item is a photograph. It looks faded with age, a process exacerbated by copying. The original image is so dim as to be blurred, and is identifiable only as the head and shoulders of a man in an inadequately illuminated room. His eyes are excessively wide and fixed. I am unable to determine what kind of flaw in the image obscures the lower part of his face. Because of the lack of definition of the photograph, the fault makes him look as if his jaw has been wrenched far too wide. It is even possible to imagine that the gaping hole, which is at least as large as half his face, leads into altogether too much darkness. Sometimes I see that face in my dreams.

Notes

1. Nash refers here to Lovecraft's tales Dagon, The Hound, The Rats in the Walls, Arthur Jermyn and Hypnos, all recently published in Weird Tales

2. In this paragraph Nash refers to The Festival and Imprisoned with the Pharaohs.

3. Nash is referring to The Music of Erich Zann and The Unnamable.

4. Farnsworth Wright, editor of Weird Tales.

5. The Tomb and The Outsider.

6. Lovecraft's original name for the island in The Call of Cthulhu.

7. The Terrible Old Man, The Moon-Bog, He and The Horror at Red Hook.

8. The Call of Cthulhu, The Colour out of Space, The Case of Charles Dexter Ward, The Dream-Quest of Unknown Kadath and Supernatural Horror in Literature

9. The Colour out of Space was published in Amazing Stories.

10. August Derleth, Clark Ashton Smith, Donald Wandrei and Frank Belknap Long.

11. The Dunwich Horror.

12. Dunwich is a submerged town off the Suffolk coast.

13. Medusa: A Story of Mystery, and Ecstasy, & Strange Horror (Gollancz, 1929).

14. The Whisperer in Darkness.

15. Robert E. Howard.

16. The Dreams in the Witch House.

17. Robert Bloch.

18. The Shambler from the Stars.

19. The Space-Eaters by Frank Belknap Long.

20. The tale originally published as The White Ape was reprinted as "Arthur Jermyn".

21. On its appearance in Astounding Stories, At the Mountains of Madness attracted hostile comment in the letter-column.

22. After the publication of The Shadow out of Time, Astounding Stories ran further hostile correspondence.

23.. Nash is referring to The Haunter of the Dark and The Thing on the Doorstep, published in the most recent issues of Weird Tales.

Chucky Comes To Liverpool

"Chucky and his films have indeed become Liverpool legends of the darkest kind. The media ascribed the murder of James Bulger in 1991 by two Merseyside ten-year-olds to the influence of Child's Play 3, although the film had been seen by neither of them and was never mentioned in evidence. (In fact the film that the murder resembles is the PG-rated Home Alone, in which the ten-year-old Macauley Culkin amuses the audience by submitting burglars to some of the violence James Bulger was to suffer three years later.) Subsequent Chucky films were never shown in Liverpool, and the newspaper reports quoted in my story are real. Footage of the abduction of James Bulger can be seen on YouTube accompanied by a pop song."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in Haunted Legends

First published in Haunted Legends, 2010

As Robbie watched his mother he felt ten years old, but it wasn't unwelcome for once. She looked as she used to when they played board games together; her eyes would calm down while her face hid its lines until she seemed no older than she was, hardly twice the age he'd racked up now. She'd been happy to concentrate on just one thing, and it included him. He was buoyed up by the memory until she glanced away from the computer screen in the front room and saw him.

Did she think he was spying on her through the window, the way his father had after they'd split up? Her head jerked back as if her frown had pinched her face hard, and Robbie hurried to let himself into the house. Her bicycle and rucksack had narrowed the already narrow hall. As he dumped his schoolbag on the stairs she was snatching pages from the printer, so hastily that one sailed out of her grasp. "Leave it, Robbie," she said.

"I'm only getting it for you."

It was a cinema poster headed CHUCK IN THE DOCK. Most of it consisted of a doll's wickedly gleeful round young face, which was held together with stitches that looked bloody even in black and white. Whatever it was advertising would be shown over the weekend at the Merseyscreen multiplex as part of the Liberating Liverpool arts festival, which was all Robbie had time to learn before his mother reached for the sheet. "Well, now you've had a good look after you were told not to," she said.

"What's all that for?"

"Something you mustn't see."

"I just did."

"That isn't clever. That's nothing but sly." Once she'd finished giving him a disappointed look she said "It's about films I don't want you ever to watch."

There were so many of those he'd lost count, if he was counting—any with fights or guns or knives, which could make him behave like boys did, or bombs, though mostly grownups used those, or language, which didn't seem to leave him much. "More of them," he said.

"I won't have you turning into a man like your father. Too many of you think it's your right to bully women and do a lot worse to them." Before Robbie dared to ask what she was leaving unsaid, which was very little where his father was concerned, she added "I'm not saying you're like that yet. Just don't be ever."

"Why did you print all that out? What's it for?"

"It's time we took more of a stand." He guessed she meant Mothers Against Mayhem as she said "They're evil films that should never be shown. They were supposed to be banned everywhere in Liverpool. They get inside children and make them act like that."

"Like what?"

"Like that thing," she said and poked the pages she'd laid face down on the table. "Now that's all. You're bullying me." She gazed harder at him while she said "Promise me you'll never watch any of those films."

"Promise."

"Let's see your hands."

He felt younger again, accused of being unclean. While he hadn't crossed his fingers behind his back, he didn't think he had quite promised either. Eventually she said "You'd better put dinner on. We've a meeting at Midge's."

Midge was the tutor on her assertiveness course and the founder of Mothers Against Mayhem. Robbie sidled past the bicycle to the kitchen, which was even smaller than the front room, and switched on the oven. He still felt proud of learning to cook, though he would never have said so at school. He only wished his mother wouldn't keep reminding him that his father was unable or unwilling even to boil an egg. He watched bubbles pop on the surface of the casserole of scouse, a spectacle that put him in mind of a monster in another sort of film he wasn't meant to view. Gloves too fat for a killer in a film to wear helped him transfer the casserole to the stained mat the table always sported. "Mmm," his mother said and "Yum," despite eating less and faster than Robbie. "Enough for dinner tomorrow," she declared. "Have you got plenty of homework?"

"A bit. A lot really."

"Give it all you've got." She was already shrugging her rucksack on. "I don't know how late I'll be," she said as she wheeled her bicycle to the front door. "If I'm not here you know when to go to bed."

He left the stagnant casserole squatting on its mat while he washed up the dinner items before making for the front room. Like the television, the computer was inhibited by all the parental locks his mother could find. He logged on to find an essay about Liverpool poets, and changed words as he copied it into his English homework book. He was altering the last paragraph when his mobile rang.

It no longer had a Star Wars ringtone since his mother decided that was about war. Robbie didn't give peace much of a chance—he silenced the chorus before they had time to chant all they were saying. "Is that Duncan Donuts?" he said.

"If that's Robin Banks."

His father had named Robbie for a Liverpool footballer, but now his mother told people he was called after a singer. "My mam's with your mam," Duncan said. "All mams together."

"The midge got them."

"More like the minge did."

This went too far for Robbie's tastes. "What are you doing tonight?"

"What do you think? I'm in the park."

"Just finishing my homework."

"Wha?" Duncan improved on this by adding "Doing your housework?"

"Homework," Robbie said, not without resentment. "I'm on the last lap."

"Whose?" Duncan didn't wait for an answer. "Hurry up or I'll of smoked it all."

Robbie found some words to change as he transcribed the paragraph. Shutting the computer down, he hurried out of the house. Across the road Laburnum Place was just a pair of stubby terraces of houses almost as compressed as his, but the next street—Waterworks Street—led to the park. A wind urged clouds across the black October sky while another brought a thick stink up from the grain silos at the Seaforth docks. Robbie heard explosions and saw violent glares along the cross streets, but war hadn't broken out yet; they were premature fireworks, and the huge prolonged crash behind him wasn't the work of a bomb—it was another delivery of scrap at the yard beyond the Strand shopping mall.

A pedestrian crossing guarded by nervous amber beacons ended at the park gates. Shadows of bushes sprawled across the concrete path leading to a disused bandstand. Sleepy pigeons fluttered on the cupola as if waiting to compete for a position on the birdless weather vane. There was no sign of Duncan inside the railings that encircled the bandstand, but Robbie located him by the smell of skunk.

The other thirteen-year-old was sitting on the balustrade at the top of a wide flight of steps that climbed beside a bowling green. Above him a noseless whitish statue on a pedestal brandished the stump of a wrist like the victim of a maniac with a cleaver. Behind the statue a deserted basketball court was overlooked by houses at least twice the size of Robbie's. Duncan must have watched him search around the bandstand, since the vantage point commanded a view in every direction. Robbie ran up the steps two at a time as leaves slithered underfoot, crunching like a baby's bones. "Give us some," he said.

Though Duncan hadn't finished the fat joint, perhaps he had already smoked one. He took a drag before passing Robbie the remains. "It's fucking special, that," he gasped as he laboured to contain the smoke.

Robbie inhaled as much as he could and held it until he had to let some of it out through his nose. More emerged in a series of belches while Duncan had another toke. "You're right," Robbie said, or someone using his voice did.

"Wha?"

"It's special."

"Fucking special."

"Fucking," Robbie had to agree as, with a rumble, the world started to collapse. It was another crash of scrap down by the river, but he could barely hold on to that sense of it. The statue pointed the gun barrel of its arm at a silhouetted tree, bits of which swelled up to flap across the park. Fallen leaves cawed as a tree took them back, and he was afraid he'd smoked too much too soon. In a bid to recover control of the teeming interior of his skull he said "Do you know what they're talking about?"

"The crows? They's saying they's black. Respect, man," Duncan called to them.

"Not them." Robbie laughed, but it didn't help much. "The mams," he said.

"Can't hear them. Can you?"

"Course I can't," Robbie said, hoping their voices wouldn't invade the cavern above his eyes. "I know what they're disgusting, though."

He wasn't sure if he'd intended to use the wrong word. "Wha?" Duncan said.

"The most evilest film anyone's ever made anywhere ever."

Duncan passed him the smouldering roach. As the tip reddened like a warning light he said "Bet I know which."

Robbie exhaled the token toke as if he were anxious to discover "Which?"

"Chucky. One of his."

The idea lit Duncan's face up. It glared pale as plastic, and lines like stitches pinched his red eyes narrow while his teeth gleamed unnaturally white. The jagged lines were shadows of twigs cast by a firework in the sky, however much they lingered, and Robbie tried to erase them by asking "How did you know that?"

"Give us that if you're not having it." Duncan sucked the roach down to his fingertips and doused it on his tongue and threw his head back to swallow it. At last he said "I know everything, that's why. You turn into a puppet if you watch those films."

"Films can't do that. They're just films."

"Those ones can. It started round here."

Robbie had a notion that he already knew all this, and yet he had to ask "What did?"

"Two kids killed a littler one like Chucky does. It was up the road when my mam was living with my real dad before they had me. And then some bigger kids tortured some girl and they were listening to Chucky when they did. A man that had a shop with Chucky videos by the Strand, someone smashed the window and stabbed him with the glass. Chucky does that to people, and a kid in Liverpool stabbed his mam's friend and said Chucky made him. And there was a Paki shop up the road they set fire to because he had magazines with Chucky in them."

Robbie was distracted by a sense of being spied upon. The watchful face was on a screen. He glanced toward it and saw curtains bring the film to an end—no, fall shut at the window of a house beyond the basketball court. "Want to see him?" Duncan said.

Robbie saw shadows clawing their way up through the concrete paths.

Pigeons shivered as they strutted across the dim stage of the bandstand like the opening act of a show whose star performer was about to appear. Surely their feathers were only trembling in the wind. "Where?" he risked asking.

"At mine next time they have a meeting."

"You've never got those films."

"I can get them whenever I want them, and lots of others she doesn't like too."

"Why don't we get some of those? Can you get—"

"You're not scared of Chucky, are you?" Duncan's grin widened as if stitches were about to split his cheeks. "Godzillions of kids have watched him and they haven't done anything. Even girls," he said and let his grin drop. "If we smoke enough we'll be too stoned for him to make us." His gaze strayed past Robbie, and he slipped down from the balustrade. "Time we went," he said.

Robbie twisted around to see red and blue fireworks in the gateway beyond the basketball court. They were the roof lights of a police car, and Duncan had already dodged behind the cleaver victim's plinth. "Don't go that way,"

Robbie had to whisper in case the crows raised the alarm. "Someone in those houses called the police."

"I'm not going. I'm gone," Duncan said and crouched lower. "You go somewhere else."

Robbie was sure that if he encountered the police his face would betray him, grinning too much while he struggled not to grin. He retreated down the steps and showed Duncan his severed head. "Catch you at school. Me, not the police."

"They won't bother much about kids having a smoke. Wait till they've gone and we'll skin up again."

"You can," Robbie said and ran down the steps, desperate to leave behind the swarms of beetles that crunched underfoot. The police might hear that, or the applause his sprint past the bandstand earned from his pigeon audience. He skidded to a halt at the gates that framed the pedestrian crossing, where the beacons were trying to measure his pulse, and then he dashed across the road. Lights flared down the cross streets, but they were fireworks, not police speeding to cut him off. Nobody grabbed him from behind as his key scrabbled to let him into the house.

How long did he have to spend at perfecting the use of the toothbrush on the teeth a face was baring in the mirror? Only the fear that his mother would see that he'd changed sent him to bed. The bed was a boat in which he was floating away from explosions on a beach, and then he was brought home by the soundtrack—the thud of the front door, the trundling of the bicycle along the hall, the thump of the dropped rucksack. Other noises followed—some that he was embarrassed to overhear—but the impact of the rucksack left an echo in his skull. It brought him out of his room once he believed his mother was asleep.

A streetlamp lowered its bulbous head to watch him through the window over the front door. Suppose his mother had left the pages with Midge? They were in the rucksack, and he took them into the front room. Since he couldn't risk switching the light on, he tiptoed to the window and unfolded the crumpled wad in the glare from the street. Except for the poster for a showing of all five Chucky films and a talk about them, the sheets were copies of newspaper reports. Fifteen years ago but less than a mile away, two boys not even his age had tortured a toddler to death. Several newspapers blamed a Chucky film, and one said For the sake of ALL our kids... BURN YOUR VIDEO NASTY. The bold letters seemed to glisten like the stitches on Chucky's face. He wasn't so easily destroyed, even if the cinemas in Liverpool had banned him. He'd made some young kidnappers use his voice while they were torturing a girl, and it had been Chucky's idea for a seven-year-old Liverpool boy to stab his mother's friend twenty-one times with a kitchen knife. Newspapers had tried to have him stopped, but two more films had been made about him, though they hadn't been shown in Liverpool. Now he was getting his way there too. No wonder he was grinning, and as Robbie stared into the gleeful eyes the expression tugged at his own mouth.

It must be all right to watch the films when you were old enough—otherwise the dockland cinema wouldn't be allowed to show them. The showing was for adults only, but videos didn't need to be. If Duncan could watch them, Robbie could; he wasn't going to let his mother make his friend despise him. He was years older than any of the boys Chucky had manipulated. Maybe they'd all been young enough to play with dolls and believe in them along with Christmas and fathers and the other things that went away as you grew up. Being frightened of films must do, and it was time it did. Robbie folded the pages and stowed them in the rucksack and took his grin to bed.

He always felt dull the morning after he'd had a smoke, but his mother brightened him. "Good job we've got that dinner," she said over breakfast. "We're at Midge's again. They have to be stopped, those films."

She was on her way to work at Frugo in the mall by the time he left the house. He joined the parade of boys and girls in black and white, which seemed to lead to a funeral for the past—a Liverpool history lesson where most of his classmates were silent as mourners. He didn't have a chance to speak to Duncan until the morning break. As they emerged into the corridor Duncan said "I've got them."

"Chucky."

As Duncan's grin confirmed this, a girl they didn't even know demanded "What about him?"

"We're going to see him," Robbie said.

"My mother says nobody should out of respect."

"That's what crows get," said Duncan.

She and her friend blinked blankly in unison. "They'll bring him back," the other girl said with an extravagant shudder.

"Who will?" Robbie protested in case he was being accused.

"Anyone that watches him."

"Anyone that does when they know they shouldn't," said her friend. "That's like trying to call him up."

"It's like calling up a demon so you'll get possessed," the first girl said.

"These won't, though."

Their scorn provoked Robbie to blurt "Why won't we?"

"They'll never let you in to see those films."

"We don't care. We—"

"We'll get in anyway," Duncan interrupted. "Chucky'll let us in so we can see him."

He mustn't want the girls to know about the viewing session at his house. He wasn't quite as reckless as he liked Robbie to think. The girls scoffed at him and ran into the schoolyard as Duncan muttered "I've got two for tonight. I'll text you when."

For the rest of the day Robbie was dry-mouthed and brittle-skulled and barely able to sit still. He had to at dinner so that his mother wouldn't notice. "Lots of homework again?" she said.

"Like last night."

This was cleverer than usual, because she didn't realise. He must be growing up. "Never mind, you've got all evening," she told him.

He was altering an article about the slums of Victorian Liverpool when his mobile took a message. shes gon cum ruond, it said.

Comming, Robbie responded. His head tingled and throbbed while he searched for words to change so that he could leave the house. Televisions relayed images from room to room all the way along the street to the Jawbone Tavern. Duncan and his mother lived in a house as small as Robbie's almost opposite the pub. His friend and a smell of skunk met Robbie at the front door. "Better be ready for this," Duncan said.

Robbie hesitated, only to see several men emerging from the pub for presumably another kind of smoke. Duncan raised two fingers, displaying the joint and gesturing at the men. "Get some of that. Last night's was for wimps."

"Not out here. Someone might see."

"I don't want her smelling it in the house." With a protracted red-eyed look Duncan said "Go out the back."

He needn't make it seem as if Robbie's caution were the problem. Robbie followed him along the hall, which at least was free of bicycles, and through a kitchen cluttered with furniture into the yard. He had a manly toke that made him thoroughly aware of the spectators—upstairs windows, all of them lifeless except for the wailing of a child somewhere he couldn't locate. Before he and Duncan finished the joint he'd had enough of the windowless cell above which fireworks clawed at the sky on his behalf. "Where's Chucky, then?" he said.

"Waiting for you."

Duncan meant for both of them, of course. He led Robbie to the front room, where a plump couch and two undernourished chairs were miming patience at a blank television. The chair that had been on less of a diet was occupied by a romance of the Liverpool slums, while a woman's orange cardigan sprawled across half of the couch. Duncan slipped a disk into the player and lounged beside the cardigan. "Chuck that," he said.

Robbie laid the rumpled paperback on the carpet and propped his spine—more especially the cumbersome head it was sprouting—against the chair as Child's Play started on the screen. That was the name of the film and, he supposed, what you called the mischief that the Chucky doll got up to once a killer's spirit hid inside it. Why did everyone blame the boy who owned the doll? Why couldn't they see that the doll was pretending to be him? They even took him to a psychiatrist for the doll to kill. At last the boy's mother caught Chucky misbehaving and the boy helped throw him on a fire, burning him for the sake of all the kids as the paper said you should, though the mother still had to blow him to bits with a gun. Robbie was relieved she'd seen the truth at last. As he let go of the bony arms of the chair, which had apparently been bruising his hands for some time, Duncan said "Wimp."

"Who is?"

"Him, going crying to his mam. Hope the other one's better."

How could the doll come back? It had grown its stitches now, but this wasn't even its second film, and so Robbie couldn't tell what had revived it. It killed a woman who used to go with the killer, and then it put her inside a girl doll. As that one began to speak, a noise crept into the room—giggling that ballooned into shrieks. "What's so funny?" Robbie was panicked into asking.

"It's Marge out of the Simpsons."

At once Robbie recognised the croaky female voice from his mother's favourite cartoon show. He felt isolated with the sight of Marge Simpson disguised as a doll that helped Chucky kill people. Eventually she was burned alive, which didn't finish her off, and Chucky was exhaustively shot once again despite shouting "I'll be back." Didn't someone else say that? How many films had Chucky and his partner taken over? A baby or a bloody doll popped out of her to end the film. Duncan ejected the disk and set about searching the cable channels, which fluttered past like slides snatching at the chance to move until Robbie cried "He's there."

Duncan jumped up, and the cardigan cowered away from him, flailing an armless arm. "Who?" he snarled, dashing to the window.

"Chucky. Not out there."

Duncan shut the curtains and glared at Robbie, whether for unnerving him or because he hadn't pointed out that passersby could see what they were watching. "That's not him."

"It's one of him," Robbie protested, but as the grinning doll sprang from under a boy's bed Duncan poked the information button to reveal it was a Spielberg film. It was meant to be about a poltergeist, which didn't reassure Robbie. "I'd better get home before she does," he said.

Duncan grinned like Chucky. "You're never scared of your mam."

"I'm not scared of any fucker or any fucking thing."

"Better believe I'm not. My dad tried to make me scared of stupid fucking Chucky. Not my real dad, the one I got for my birthday when I was four."

"What did he do?"

"Never mind what he done." Having stared at Robbie, Duncan added "Said Chucky would get me if I was bad. That's what they used to tell kids."

Had someone once told Robbie that? It seemed uneasily familiar. "They didn't know what they were on about," Duncan said. "That's not how Chucky works."

He meant in the films, of course—he couldn't mean anything else. "See you at school," Robbie said.

"Shut it on your way out. I'm going to watch him give the doctor shocks again."

The street was deserted. Lamps patched the pavements with light, which mouldered on the roofs of parked cars. If Robbie were a girl or in a film he might be daunted by the gaps between the vehicles, where a small jerky figure could dart out as its victim reached one of the stretches of pavement the lamps didn't entirely illuminate. The only place he had to look for Chucky was on all the televisions, and he was lingering outside a window to see that no doll attacked the young couple in bed on the screen when a woman in an armchair caught sight of him. As she sprang to her feet he fled home. She didn't chase him, but did she know where he lived? Suppose she told his mother? She couldn't say he'd been looking for Chucky; nobody knew that, not even Duncan. Chucky was safe in his head where nobody would notice him.

The house was unlit, which meant that Robbie's mother wouldn't see him until he had a chance to sleep off any guilt that might escape onto his face. It didn't look guilty in the bathroom mirror, where it foamed at the mouth while the toothbrush polished its grin. He was in bed well before his mother came home, though he couldn't sleep. If he'd been allowed a computer in his room he would have played on it, but the games might have been too violent for his mother's taste; she'd decided even board games were aggressive. He slept once the grinning doll subsided inside the jack-in-the-box of his head.

He thought he was behaving normally at breakfast, however dull his head felt, until his mother said "What's the matter, Robbie? Why are you looking like that?"

"I'm not looking like anything."

"Your eyes are. Aren't you sleeping?"

"It's all the stuff you've been saying about Chucky."

"I won't again. Don't worry, we'll be getting rid of him." As a further comfort she said "My turn to make dinner."

So there wasn't a meeting. Perhaps that was why Duncan didn't seek him out but only gave him a grin across the classroom. He joined him at the morning break, when the girl who'd accosted them yesterday caught up with them in the schoolyard. "Hope you're happy now," she said.

Robbie grinned, though it felt inadvertent if not meaningless. "Why?" Duncan demanded.

"Someone's brought your Chucky back."

"We haven't lost him," Robbie blurted as Duncan said louder "Who's brought what where?"

"They've got him in a shop down by the Strand, in the window where everyone can see him."

"They've got no respect," her friend said.

"Nobody can stop him. He'll get everywhere," Duncan said, baring his teeth.

He kept the grin up until the girls left them alone. If he seemed to find it hard to abandon, that was just a joke. He made the face at any girls who looked at him and Robbie as they slouched around the yard, and the trick amused Robbie so much that he couldn't help joining in, even if it felt as though strings were attached to the corners of his mouth. His lips had grown weary by the time the bell herded everyone into the school.

The history mistress wanted to hear stories of the past that people's families had told them. One boy said how the government had hated Liverpool so much they'd tried to take all the jobs down south, and a girl retorted that the unions hadn't let her dad or anybody do their jobs. "I think those are legends more than they're history," Mrs Picton said, and Robbie took the cue. "What about Chucky?" he said.

"What about..."

"He's a story mams and dads tell, isn't he? How it all started when those kids watched that film."

Before Mrs Picton could respond, Robbie's classmates did. Someone used to dream Chucky was under the bed after she'd read about him in the paper. Someone knew a girl who'd set her dolls on fire in case any of them might be Chucky. Someone else had heard of a boy who'd attacked his sister because he thought Chucky was inside her. Several people confirmed this, but Duncan said nothing at all. "It's only a film," Mrs Picton said, which sounded somehow familiar. "That doesn't mean any of you should watch anything like that at your age."

"Didn't those boys really kill anyone, then?" Robbie said.

"Of course they did. It's history, and now please leave it alone."

Why should he feel accused? He didn't speak for the rest of the lesson, despite the doubtful glances she kept giving him. When the bell jerked him to his feet at last she said "Will you wait, please, Robbie."

He stood like a doll at his desk until she took him to the headmistress. If someone had reported him for being Chucky in the yard, why wasn't Duncan with him? It should be Duncan who was being stared at and whispered girlishly about as he was escorted along the corridor like a killer to the execution chamber. Robbie and his guard were almost at Mrs Todd's office when he realised they couldn't do this to him; his mother had to be there. But she was in the office.

She looked even more disappointed than the other women did, and he turned on Mrs Picton. "You said it was only a film."

"What have you been watching?" his mother said.

"I didn't see them all. Dunk saw more. They haven't done anything to us. Like she says, it's just a legend. Just some wimpy films."

"Have you been too busy watching films," Mrs Todd enquired, "to do your homework?"

"I did it all. Who says I haven't?"

"The school does," Robbie's mother said sadly. "Your teacher found it on the Internet."

Robbie's skull felt close to cracking like plastic. "That's only like looking it up in a book."

"It was practically word for word," said Mrs Picton. "You'd think you wanted to be caught."

"What have you been filling your head with instead?" his mother clearly didn't care to know.

"Try devoting your imagination to your schoolwork. That's what it's for," Mrs Todd said. "I'm letting you off with a warning this time, but I'll treat any further offence much more seriously. Please remember you're letting yourself and your mother down as well as the school."

"And I'll want to see that work from you done properly," Mrs Picton said.

His mother played his silent jailer as far as the schoolyard. She was hardly out of the gate when Duncan came to him. "What did they want?"

"Just about my homework."

"Was it bad?"

Robbie had to imitate his grin, because he didn't know if Duncan meant the homework or the interview. "It was evil."

This widened Duncan's grin, which aggravated Robbie's. It was starting to feel like a contest when a girl said "What do you two think you look like?"

"Chucky," the boys said in chorus, which made them grin until Robbie's cheeks felt in danger of splitting like plastic.

He couldn't keep it up all afternoon, though his lips stirred if any of the teachers even glanced at him. Though the lessons felt interminable, they ended far too soon. Where could he go except home? He wasn't about to be scared of his mother when he wasn't scared of Chucky, especially since she was. Her nagging would just leave his head duller still—and then he thought of somewhere to go on the way home.

The metal benches outside the shopping precinct were crammed with quartets of pensioners, warily eyeing his schoolmates while they fought at bus stops or flung litter at each other. Robbie felt watched by them as he caught sight of the face across the road, in a small shop on the side street opposite a corner of the precinct. He sprinted in front of a bus stuffed with children and gave the driver his best grin, encouraged by the face in the shop window full of skulls and hairy visages and greenish corpse heads. Though the eyeless round rubbery mask was decorated with stitches, Robbie wasn't sure whether they were all where they should be. The longer he gazed at it, the more secretive the grin seemed to grow. He thought of wearing the mask while his mother lectured him, but she wouldn't let him own it, any more than he could buy even one of the fireworks lined up at the foot of the window. Suppose she didn't know? He could wear it when he went out at night while she was with Midge. He hadn't enough money on him, but there was more in his room, and that was why he hurried home.

His mother came into the hall as he shut the front door. "What have you been doing now?"

"Nothing. Coming home."

"Can't I trust you any more? Whose idea was it to do exactly what I told you not to?"

"Both of ours." Robbie dropped his schoolbag on the stairs, only to feel that it was blocking his way as she and her bicycle were. "You won't tell his mam what I said about him, will you? You don't have to. Please don't, please."

"Why, are you frightened how he'll behave now you've watched those films?"

"Course not. That's stupid. Why do you want to stop people seeing them? They aren't that scary, and they only make little kids be bad."

"I wouldn't grin about it. Is that really what you think? You'd better look at this." Grabbing her rucksack, she extracted the crumpled pages and flapped one at him. "What do you call them?" she said.

She was brandishing the report about the girl who'd been tortured in Manchester. Robbie thought he was expected to say that her tormentors were monsters or just men until he saw what he'd overlooked: the people who'd listened to Chucky's voice had been years older than he was now. He would have liked to have the Chucky mask to hide his face. All he could find to say was "Some of them were girls."

"That shows how bad those films are. That's why they have to be stopped, and now I can't leave you on your own."

"Why can't you?"

"I almost wish we had your father back. Are you going to turn into something else for me to worry about? Aren't you ever going to do anything to make me proud?"

Robbie ducked to his schoolbag so that she wouldn't see his face. "My homework," he muttered.

While he was no more eager to do it than usual, rewriting the history essay distracted him intermittently from his fears—that the English teacher would notice he'd copied from the Internet, that Duncan would discover Robbie had told on him, that they weren't as immune to the films as they'd thought, because they weren't old enough after all. His nerves kept jabbing the dull lump of his mind, and he was glad when his mother called him to dinner.

Perhaps she looked reproachful because she'd made turkey burgers, his favourite. Whenever their eyes met he thought it best to grin. The meal ended some time after he'd stopped enjoying it. As she returned the chutney to the refrigerator his mother said "Now look what you've made me do."

She was craning inside, her neck between the doorframe and the edge of the door, as she held the refrigerator open with one hand. "What?" Robbie said.

"I forgot to buy orange and now there's none for breakfast."

As the legs of his chair and the linoleum collaborated on a squeal that a maniac's victim might have been proud of, Robbie said "I'll go."

"Just hurry there and hurry back."

He ran upstairs and made sure she heard him go into the bathroom, and then he dodged into his room. Now his footfalls felt as light as plastic. The money was the only secret in his room, not that it was much of one; less than half was change he'd kept the last time she'd sent him to the shops. Dust squeaked beneath his fingernails as he groped behind the wardrobe for the coins. He flushed the toilet and sprinted downstairs, to be met by his mother. "Remember what I said," she told him.

As he hurried to the shop he felt as if his face was shaping itself so that the mask would fit. What would the mask allow him to do? He thought of peering in the windows at the televisions inside which Chucky might be hiding, and his grin expanded, only to sag when he reached the street that led down to the Strand. The shop with the masks in was dark.

The door didn't budge, and nobody answered however hard Robbie clattered the letter box. "What are you grinning at?" he demanded, but the mask didn't seem to hear. It looked entertained by his plight, unless it was amused by its secret thoughts. Suppose he smashed the window and set Chucky free that way? He glanced about to make sure the street was deserted and in search of something he could use. Then, with a shock that turned his mouth so dry it felt raw with skunk, he realised what he was planning to do.

Had the mask put the idea into his mind? What else might Chucky have sneaked in? Robbie remembered wishing he could wear the mask so that he could deal with his mother, and all at once he saw her neck in the guillotine of the refrigerator. Lightning widened the empty eyes as if the mask had been enlivened by the memory. The flash was the explosion of a firework above the houses, and it sent Robbie away from the window, to the grocery around the corner.

Had the flash been an omen too? There were fireworks under the glass counter, and he used the carton of juice to point. "One of them as well."

He thought the shopkeeper was about to refuse, but she must have been waiting for politeness. As she shook her head and laid the firework on the counter Robbie said "And some matches."

She didn't take the second chance to say no. Robbie paid and hurried back to the intersection. If there was anybody in the other street he wouldn't be able to carry out his plan—but the street was deserted even by traffic. He wandered over to the shop as if he were bound somewhere else entirely, and then he lit the firework.

The stitched mask seemed to watch him askance as he inserted the long cardboard barrel through the letter box and gave it a violent sideways shove. The firework landed inside the window. In a few seconds it spouted fire, and moments later several fireworks were ablaze. Even if Chucky never stayed burned in the films, mightn't this destroy his face? The mask appeared to writhe in fear as detonations shook the window. The glass held, but the masks slithered down it to fall on top of the outbursts of flame. Gouts of fire spurted from Chucky's eyes, which grew larger and blacker and emptier, and then the helpless upturned face began to split apart as if the stitches had torn open. When the pieces started curling up and bubbling like slugs, Robbie dashed home.

He felt both reckless and justified. His mother should be proud of him, but could he risk telling her? As he inserted the unnecessarily shaky key into the lock he was trying to decide how much he might hint. He'd eased the door shut when he heard a voice croaking somewhere in the house.

It was Chucky's mate. Before Robbie could begin to deal with this, his mother darted like a killer out of the front room. "Where have you been this time? How long does it take to buy juice?"

He was distracted by the film she'd been watching—the Simpsons film. "There was a shop on fire," he said.

"I suppose I can't blame you for that."

Robbie didn't grin until he was heading for the kitchen, and managed to suppress the expression on his way back. Once he joined in watching the film he had no idea how to look. He tried only laughing if his mother did, but this was almost always when Marge Simpson spoke in that unnatural voice. He peered at the film as if it might show him what else he could do, and then his mobile clanged. As he brought up the message his mother leaned over to read it. chuckies burnd shop down, Duncan wanted him to know. "What does he mean?" Robbie's mother demanded.

Robbie thought it wisest just to shrug, and she was rediscovering how to laugh with Marge when the ringtone interrupted. "Is that Duncan again?" Robbie's mother said and silenced the television. "Put him on the loudspeaker."

Robbie was unnerved by the sight of her dubbing Marge's dialogue. Poking the loudspeaker key seemed to bring an audience into the room. "That shop those girls said about, it's on fire," Duncan shouted over the sounds of the crowd. "You want to come and see."

"I saw."

"Did you see Chucky? He's gone now. Maybe he done it and went."

"No he didn't." Since Robbie's fervour apparently impressed his mother, he added "He's just in his films."

"Till someone lets him out."

"I've got to go now," Robbie said and cut the call off.

He still had to face his mother. "Was he trying to tell you he'd started the fire?" she said.

"It wasn't him."

"How do you know?"

"There was a Chucky mask he'd have wanted. It's all burned up."

Far too many seconds passed before her gaze relented. "Just please don't ever watch any of those films again."

"I won't."

"Don't go anywhere near them."

At once, having realised what else he could do, Robbie was afraid she meant to extract the promise. She picked up the remote control, however, and restored the doll's voice. He kept hearing it and Chucky's even once the film was over, but now he knew how to stop them. When his mother started watching a programme about refuges for women he used it as an excuse to go to bed. "You get your sleep. You've plenty to do tomorrow," she said.

She had no idea. He wasn't sure himself. As he lay in bed he saw Chucky's face bubble and blacken while it struggled to crawl out of the flames. It didn't let him sleep much; he kept jerking awake like a puppet someone was testing. He was afraid his mother might interrogate him at breakfast, but perhaps she was used to his red eyes or too preoccupied to notice. He tried not to grin every time she looked at him, and eventually he was able to stay out of her sight by taking his homework into the front room.

For English he had to write about a film. He was tempted to discuss Chucky but didn't know what he might say. He wrote about the Simpsons film, although the need to avoid mentioning the truth about Marge's voice felt like wearing a mask. As he strove to keep his mind on the essay, the phone in the hall went off like an alarm.

Had someone seen him set fire to the shop? Would the police believe why he'd had to do it? He heard his mother take the receiver to the kitchen, but he couldn't distinguish her words or even her tone. He wrote very few words while he listened for her footsteps in the hall. At last she came back and opened the door. "Midge wants us to picket the films tonight," she said. "What am I going to do with you?"

He was searching for an answer when his mobile tried to crawl across the table. what you doeing tonit, Duncan wanted to know. Robbie couldn't say, and he felt his skull grow thin as plastic as he waited for his mother to decide. Neither of them had spoken by the time Duncan rang. "Let me hear," Robbie's mother said.

As Robbie amplified the sound Duncan said "Where have you fucked off to now?"

"Doing my homework."

"Hope it's evil." When Robbie didn't respond Duncan said "My mam's got me picketing Chucky tonight. Should be a laugh. Want to come?"

Robbie's mother shook her head as hard as she was gazing at him. "Can't," he said.

"Why, what'll you be doing?"

"Homework," Robbie said, the only safe answer he could think of. "I've got to do some of it again."

"All right," his mother said as he ended the call, "I'm going to trust you. You don't need to come with me tonight."

She was making sure he wouldn't be with Duncan. Robbie felt as if he were in a film where whatever the plot required was bound to happen. Nothing else had to for the rest of the day, and he stayed in the front room when he wasn't helping his mother shop. He wondered if he was grinning too often over dinner, but she left him to clear up. He waited to be certain she was well on her way to Midge's, and then he left the house.

He might have borrowed the bicycle if she hadn't locked it. As he hurried to the bus stops, the smell from the grain silos hovered in the cold dark air like the stench of melted plastic. Burning claws reared up to sear black prints on the sky or on his eyes, and he heard the mound of Chucky's grave collapse as the doll fumbled its way out, but that was scrap being dumped beside the river. A bus took him into Liverpool, where he alighted just short of the dockland multiplex.

People were converging on it—students, older couples, solitary characters carrying Gorehound magazine with Chucky's face on it. All of them were met outside the cinema by pickets waving placards—CHILDREN NOT CHUCKY, HORROR ISN'T HEALTHY, CARE FOR KIDS INSTEAD OF FILMS, SAVE OUR BABES FROM SADISM... Whichever Robbie's mother might be wielding, he ran behind an apartment block without locating her.

The luxury block was guarded by an electrified fence, the outside of which led him parallel to the river. He didn't think anyone saw him sprint from the corner of the fence to the rear of the multiplex, where the plot he was enacting seemed to abandon him. All the back doors of the cinemas were locked, and the side doors were just as immovable. As he faltered in the recess of the exit closest to the pickets, they began to chant "Chuck Chucky out" and drum the staves of their placards on the concrete. Somebody was remonstrating with them, and when Robbie peeked around the corner he saw it was the manager, supported by quite a few of the cinema personnel. Among the pickets growing louder in response were Duncan's and Robbie's mothers, but nobody appeared to see him dodge through the nearest front door into the multiplex.

Nearly all the staff must be confronting the pickets, and the girls in the box office were dealing with a queue. There wasn't even anyone to take tickets at the entrance to the screens. While the staff at the popcorn counter might have, they were serving customers. Robbie walked not too quickly or too surreptitiously past them into a corridor where posters indicated which door led to which film. He hadn't found the poster he was looking for when he heard Chucky's voice.

It was beyond a door marked STAFF ONLY. Robbie glanced around to see that the corridor was deserted. He hauled the door open and slipped past as it began to close behind him. He felt as if he were not merely in a film but in a dream he'd had, unless he was having it now. He was where he would have hoped to be—in a projection room.

The projectionist was elsewhere. Six projectors—half the number of screens—were casting images through dwarfish windows on the far side of the room. The mocking gleeful voice led Robbie to the second machine from the left. A window next to the one the projector was using showed him Chucky's face swollen larger than any of the audience beneath it in the darkened auditorium. They were watching a documentary about the films, all five of which were stacked in cans beside the projector.

Robbie lifted both fire extinguishers out of their cradles on the walls and laid them alongside the projector. A film magazine was lying on a table by the door, and he tore it up to pile the pages between the extinguishers. Prising the lid off the topmost can of film, he tipped out the contents, which unwound across the heap of paper. The chant of the pickets and the drumming of sticks urged him on. By the time he'd emptied all the cans his fingernails twinged from opening the lids, and his arms ached with his efforts. None of this mattered, because the extinguishers had prevented the tangle of celluloid from burying all the paper. Perhaps Chucky wanted to be caught—to be stopped. Robbie took out the matchbox and struck a match.

The paper flamed at once, blazing up beneath the pile of film. In a moment the celluloid was on fire. Chucky was still ranting in the shaky darkness, but he wouldn't be for long. Robbie would have liked to see the flames reach the film in the projector, except that the fire or the projectionist might trap him. As the room began to fill with a plastic stench he retreated into the corridor. He was loitering outside the toilets near an exit—he would look as if he were waiting for someone if anybody noticed him—when a man appeared at the far end of the corridor and made for the projection room.

For just an instant Robbie wanted to warn him, and then he realised that the projectionist must have watched Chucky while checking all the films. Robbie observed him as he pulled the door open and uttered a syllable and lurched into the room. The door shut behind him, puffing out thick smoke, and then there was silence apart from the noise of the pickets. Robbie was at the side exit when a figure covered with flames and partly composed of them staggered into the corridor.

Was it a doll? Bits of plastic were peeling away from it, unless they were pieces of film. It wasn't making much noise; a clogged rising groan was the best it could do for a scream. Perhaps its face was melting. As it pranced away it looked more than ever like a puppet, growing smaller while its hands clutched at and flinched away from its blazing skull. It had almost reached the far end of the corridor when a woman and her children came out of a cinema to scream on its behalf. Robbie had to cover his grin with a hand as if he was overcome by their emotion; he might have been putting on a mask. As the family retreated screaming into the cinema and the puppet fell on any face it had left, he let himself out of the multiplex.

The pickets were still chanting and thumping their sticks. He would have told them there was no longer any need, but however necessary his actions had been, suppose he was misunderstood? He sprinted behind another apartment block while fireworks in the sky celebrated his success. The top deck of a bus from the stop beyond the multiplex gave him a view of people streaming out of all the exits, and just a few signs sprouting from the crowd. A placard sank out of sight as he watched, and he thought it was acknowledging him.

He had to shut a smell of melted plastic out of the house. He felt hollow, but in the best way—emptied of the need to intervene. He drowsed in bed until he heard his mother come home, and then he fell asleep. He didn't dream or waken, even when a church started ringing its bells. Perhaps they were for Chucky's funeral, but there must have been a phone as well, because Robbie opened his eyes at last to see his mother in the doorway of his room. "You had a long one," she said. "My nan used to say you only sleep well if you've been good."

Could he tell her how good he'd been? As he tested the mechanism of his lips she said "You missed it all."

His lips parted, but she headed off whatever he might have said. "It's a good job you weren't there, though."

"Why?"

"There was a fire at the cinema. The police think it was deliberate. They want to talk to us."

Would they understand? She ought to hear before they did, and Robbie was about to tell his secret when she said "One of the staff was in the fire. Midge just called to say he died. We're all going over to hers for a while. I've left your breakfast."

So she hadn't meant the police were after him. He should have seen how normal she wanted life to be. She looked sad for the projectionist, and perhaps he hadn't deserved to be burned, but he'd had to be. All at once she looked sadder. "I forgot your juice again."

"I can get some."

"You're a good boy really. Stay like that," she said and hurried downstairs.

As soon as the bicycle trundled out of the house Robbie headed for the bathroom. He still had work to do. Perhaps he could be sad about it, if you needed to be sad about people who'd turned into dolls. He didn't look sad in the mirror; he could see no expression at all—his ordinary face was the only mask he needed. He was contemplating it when his phone struck up its slogan.

There wouldn't be peace yet, but there might be soon. "You should of been there last night," Duncan told him.

"What happened?"

"My mam and yours nearly got in a fight with the cinema. And somebody started a fire and half of it's burned down, and a feller was in it. I'll tell you all about it when I see you. I've got some stuff that'll do your head in."

Watching so much Chucky had done that to Duncan, Robbie thought. "Where?" he said.

"In the park. I found somewhere nobody'll know we're there. Are you coming now?"

"I've got to go to the shop first."

"Being your mam's good boy again, are you?"

"You'll see." Robbie knew Duncan was grinning, and imagined how they both would when they met. His grin wouldn't be the same as Duncan's; it was a mask, because he was the opposite of Chucky. "I won't be long," he said. "I'll be back."

The Rounds

First published in The End Of The Line, 2010

As the train arrives at James Street one of the women behind me in the carriage murmurs "They're talking about us again."

"What's somebody saying this time?" her friend protests, but I miss the answer in the midst of a recorded warning not to leave luggage unattended. The amplified voice seems to herd commuters off the underground platform onto the train, and an Asian woman in a headscarf black enough for a funeral takes a seat at the far end of the carriage. Perhaps she's a lawyer from the courts at the top of James Street, since she's carrying a briefcase. The voice falls silent as the train heads into the tunnel.

There's just a solitary track on the loop under Liverpool, where the tunnel shrinks to half its previous width. Lights embedded in the walls flash out of the dark every few seconds like some land of signal. In about a minute more passengers board at Moorfields; it's the start of the rush hour. I'm at the nearest doors well before the train pulls into Lime Street, where the Muslim woman alights further down the carriage. As I make to step onto the platform I notice she's without her briefcase.

"Excuse me," I call, but she doesn't seem to hear. Several people look up or around and then lose interest as I dash along the carriage. The case is on the floor by the seat she vacated, and I grab it before struggling between the last of the commuters boarding the train. The woman isn't on the platform. She could have used the lift, but the escalators are closer, and I sprint for the exit that leads to them.

Is she late for a main line train? By the time I reach the bank of escalators her strides have taken her almost to the top. I'd try and overtake her on the other upward escalator, but it isn't moving. "Excuse me," I shout, "you dropped this."

She turns with one hand on the banister and smiles, though the expression looks a little automatic. I'm hurrying towards her when she sails out of view. The briefcase is so shabby that I might conclude she meant to dump it if it weren't also heavy with documents. I assume that's what the contents are, but the lock is jammed; it's so distorted that someone might already have tried to force it—perhaps she has lost the key. I admit I'm glad to find her waiting beyond the escalator, this side of the ticket barrier. "Oh, thank you," she says and makes her smile rueful. "I don't know what I could have been thinking of."

I'm at least equally ashamed of having thought she might be up to no good. It shows how prejudiced we've all grown, how inclined to think in today's stereotypes. I pass her the briefcase with both hands, and she grasps the scruffy handle as she shows her ticket at the barrier. I flash my pass and am following her along the passage to the escalators that lead up to the main station when my breast pocket emits a series of piercing clanks that put me in mind of a faulty pacemaker.

I read the message on my mobile as the escalator lifts me into the glare of sunlight through the glass roof. Have to cancel, it says. No train. Beneath the huge cautionary voice of the station there's the babble of a crowd that's hurrying to the platforms while at least as many people stream out onto the concourse. The Muslim woman has disappeared among them. I pocket the mobile without sending a response and tramp down the descending escalator. As I display my pass the ticket collector says "You look familiar."

"I expect there's plenty more like me." I'd say that was as witty as her quip, but she doesn't bother laughing. She seems to feel it's her duty to ask "Weren't you here just now?"

"If you say so."

"Did you forget something?"

"That's not me. I thought I was meeting someone but I'm not after all."

"You want to be sure what's happening another time."

The pointless exchange has delayed me so much that as I step on the underground escalator I hear a squeal of wheels—the arrival of the train I meant to catch. I clutch at the unsynchronised banisters and dash down two sinking steps at a time, to reach the platform just as the train sets about shutting its doors. With a leap that leaves me feeling rejuvenated I jam my foot between the nearest pair, which flinch apart, raising an alarm that all the others take up. "I've still got it," I declare as I board the train.

Nobody seems interested. One man lowers his head as though his tweed hat is weighing it down. A younger man is leafing through a cardboard folder full of documents, and a girl is lost in the world of her personal stereo, while a woman in a coat patterned like a chessboard frowns at a Mtogo poster as if she thinks an African restaurant has no right to advertise on the train. I find a seat near the doors as the train heads for Central Station, where it swaps commuters for commuters before following the loop back to James Street. Just one passenger alights there, hurrying behind the crowd on the platform. She's the Muslim with the briefcase.

She must have used the lift at Lime Street while I was held up at the barrier. I've a reason to have caught the first train back, but what's hers? However prejudiced it makes me feel, I can't help lurching to my feet and forcing my way onto the platform. She's already past the nearest exit—she isn't even on the stairs to which it leads. If I find she's returning to the courts, where she could perfectly well have left some item, I hope I'll be cured of making suspicious assumptions. If she sees me I'll be more embarrassed still. I sprint up the boxed-in stairs and reach the top just in time to see her leaving the enclosed bridge across the underground tracks. She isn't bound for the outside world. She's on her way down to the platform for the trains around the loop.

I hear a train approaching, and her running down to meet it. I can't see her as I dash down the steps, and she isn't on the platform scattered with commuters. I'm opposite the last carriage of the train. I could try to reach the driver or attract their attention, but what would I say? All I know is that if the woman plans to abandon the briefcase again, we should all be safe until she's well away from it. The thought sends me onto the train.

This time I don't trigger the alarm, and the train moves off at once. The carriage is crowded, but I can see every head, and there's no sign of a headscarf. Suppose she's so fanatical that she would take it off to be less obvious? I struggle through the crowd, peering at every face and at the floor beside and between and especially under the seats. All the people in the aisle would make a briefcase easier to hide, but it seems the woman wasn't in this carriage, or at least she hasn't left the case here. I haul open the door between the carriages, to see a man leaning against the next door. He's so bulky that he blocks the view into the other carriage, and he doesn't budge when I knock on the window. I make to shove the door at him, and then I'm overwhelmed by a blaze of light. It isn't an explosion, even if my innards wince. The train has emerged from the tunnel.

We're at Moorfields. The doors open to the platform, but I'm nowhere near any of them. When I push at the one between the carriages the man with his wide flabby shoulders against it doesn't shift an inch. More people squeeze onto the train, and I'm near to panicking. As it moves off I crane back to stare through a window at the platform. A woman is striding fast along a passage to the escalators. She's the headscarved Mohammedan, and she doesn't have her briefcase.

My guts clench like a helpless fist, and a sour taste surges into my mouth. Until this moment I can't really have believed my own suspicions—might as well have been enacting a scene from a cheap thriller based on the news. As the tunnel closes around the carriage I kick the connecting door and pound on it with both fists. When the hulking man turns his big stupid head to stare at me I flash my pass, too quickly for him to take issue with it. "Let me through," I shout and mime as well.

Even he must realise we all need to be concerned about security, though he makes it clear that he's doing me a favour by stepping aside. I brush past him and shoulder my way through the swaying crowd. The lights on the walls of the tunnel are hurtling towards me like the future. There's a bag of shopping between two seats, and there's another carrier bag on the floor, but where's the briefcase? Is it even in this carriage? How much distance may the woman want to put between herself and the case, or how little? I'm nearly at the first set of doors, and I'm shamefully tempted to make my escape, but we're still in the tunnel. The train lurches as if it has been derailed, and its hollow roar seems to grow louder. I seize the metal pole above the partition that separates the seats from the crowded space in front of a pair of doors. The carriage steadies, and as I grasp there was no explosion I see a briefcase on the floor, almost hidden by the legs of passengers. "Sir," I say urgently, "is that your case?"

The man who's closest to it glances down and then just as indifferently at my face. "Nothing to do with me."

His neighbours shake their heads, and I stoop to retrieve the case. I recognise it at once—recognise the warped lock, which I'm beginning to think might have been deliberately forced out of shape so that nobody can open it. I close my fist around the ragged handle and lift the case.

At once light flares all around me. I'm back at Lime Street. All along the carriage matrix signs spell it out, and a woman's amplified voice pronounces the words for anyone who can't read. As I make for the doors I'm frantically trying to decide where to take the briefcase. The train is coasting to a halt, and I'm still trapped by all the bodies pressing close around me, when someone taps me on the shoulder hard enough for a knock on a door. "That yours?" a man says in my ear.

"It isn't," I declare and struggle around to face him. He's a cleaner in a yellow jerkin. Usually the cleaners don't collect the rubbish from the trains during the rush hour, and his appearance is as unexpected as it's reassuring —even the Union Jack badge just visible on the lapel of his jacket. "It was left before," I murmur for only him to hear. "I think—"

"We saw," he says just as low and reaches for the briefcase. "Give it here."

However grateful I am to let it go, I want to be sure he understands. "You saw who left it," I mutter.

"We know all about those."

This could be prejudice symbolised by the badge. Under the circumstances I can't be choosy, and I hand him the briefcase. "Be careful with it," I whisper. "Whatever's inside—"

"It's seen to, granddad," he says and steps onto the platform.

As he strides towards the nearest exit a young woman offers me a seat. Perhaps I look shaken by having to deal with the briefcase, unless she heard what the cleaner called me. I sink onto the seat, but I can't begin to relax until the train leaves the station and is safely in the tunnel. "Thank God that's over," I say aloud.

I oughtn't to have spoken. At least nobody seems to want to enquire into my remark. One man clasps his hands and bows his head as if to dazzle everyone with the shine of his bald scalp. A girl in a sweater striped like a wasp stares out of the window at the repetition of the lights. A young businessman reads a magazine, and the woman next to him might almost be hypnotised by the swaying of her earrings, which are shaped like inverted question marks although she doesn't look remotely Spanish. More passengers manage to find room when we reach Central Station, and soon the voice of the train reads out the illuminated announcement about James Street. In a very few moments I'll be out of the loop at last. Just one person leaves the train and heads for the exit. He's wearing a yellow jerkin, and he's carrying a briefcase.

He's the man who spoke to me. It needn't be the same case, except that I can see the warped lock. Didn't he understand my warning? How could he risk bringing the case back on the train? The explanation makes my nerves yank me to my feet. "It's him as well," I gasp. "He's part of it."

Nobody appears to want to understand or to let me off the train. I have to shout in one man's ear before he gives an inch, followed by hardly any more as I struggle past him. I've barely staggered onto the platform when the train shuts its doors. I could shout to the driver, but if anyone else hears me, won't that cause a panic or worse? My heart thumps like a frenzied drum as I dash up the steps to the underground bridge.

I can't see the man in the yellow jerkin or the briefcase. Has he used one of the lifts up to street level? I could—there are always staff at the top—but that might take longer than it's safe to take. There's a more immediate way of communicating with the staff, and I sprint across the bridge to leap down two steps at a time to the other platform.

Passengers are waiting for a train around the loop, but I can't see what I'm afraid to see. An intercom is embedded in the wall. A blue button offers Information, but I jab the green one that says Emergency. My heart deals me a couple of irregular thumps that I hear as well as feel before the grille above the buttons speaks. "Hello?"

"I'm at James Street." Lurching close to the grille, I cup my hands around my mouth to murmur "I think—"

"Can't hear you."

"You won't want anybody else hearing." All the same, the man's voice is coarse with static, and suppose mine is even more distorted? I press the sides of my hands around the grille and shove my mouth closer. "Someone's up to something down here," I say as loud as I dare. "They keep trying to leave a case on the train."

"Who does?"

"I think they're Muslims, or they may not be. Maybe they're people who're against Muslims and trying to make it look as if it's them." The speaker has begun to remind me of a grille in the door of a cell. I strain my eyes as far to the side as their aching muscles will drag them. I can't see the man or the briefcase, but everyone nearby seems to be watching me until they look away. I'm the last person they ought to suspect, and they wouldn't find my behaviour odd if they knew I was acting on their behalf. "The one who's got the case now," I say urgently, "he's one of your cleaners or he's pretending to be."

"Where are you saying he is?"

"He just got off the train at James Street. I'm not sure where he went." I have to raise my voice to compete with the sounds of the latest train. Most of the people around me converge on the doors, and I'm so confused by nervousness that for a moment I think I'm about to miss the train. Of course I don't want to return to the loop, and I'm about to demand how the railway will be dealing with my information when a man darts off the stairs and onto the train.

He's wearing an unobtrusively dark suit. It's no longer hidden by the yellow jerkin, and I might not have recognised him except for the flag pinned to his lapel and the briefcase in his hand. "He's here," I shout, and my hands sprawl away from the grille. "He's got back on the train."

The only response from the grille is a blurred metallic clatter. I didn't say that the man has the case, and now I'm sure it's too late. My instincts send me to the train before I have a chance to think, and I dodge between the closing doors. "Let me through," I say at once.

I didn't have time to reach the carriage the man boarded. Nobody ahead of me seems to believe my mission is urgent. I have to thrust my pass over people's shoulders to flash it in their faces, just long enough to leave them with an impression of officialdom. I'm crawling with sweat from the closeness of so many bodies, whose softness feels horribly vulnerable, ready to be blown apart. The carriage seems little better than airless, and I feel walled in by the tunnel, not to mention my own scarcely rational decision to pursue the man onto the train. Now I'm at the door to the next carriage, and someone is lounging against it. As I pound on the glass my heart mimics the rhythm. At last the loafer turns his sluggish apathetic head. He stares at my pass and then at me as if I might be a patient posing as a nurse, and then he slouches aside just far enough to let me sidle around the door.

I can't see the man with the briefcase. His badge is too small to show up in the crowd, and what else is there to distinguish him? Mousy hair, bland nondescript face, dark suit—none of these stands out. My heart counts the seconds like a clock or some more lethal mechanism as I force my way along the carriage. I peer at the floor but see only people's legs—bones that could shatter in a moment, flesh and muscles that would fill the air. I'm nearly at the first set of doors, and I crane around the partition behind the seats. There indeed is the briefcase.

I feel as though I've rehearsed the moment. I stoop and grab the handle, and I'm lifting the case when the train shudders in the midst of a burst of light. I'm almost used to that, because I know it means we've reached Moorfields. I still haven't located the man with the flag in his lapel, but it can't matter just now. The moment the door opens I struggle through the crowd and its reinforcements onto the platform. Where can I take the briefcase? I'm fleeing to the nearest exit when a hand grasps my shoulder. "Where do you think you're going with that?" says a voice.

It belongs to a tall man in an unobtrusively expensive suit. The lines on his high forehead and the hint of grey in his cropped black hair may be raising his apparent age, but he seems reassuringly official. "Where's safe?" I blurt.

"I'm asking what you're doing with it," he says and keeps hold of my shoulder.

"Trying to get rid of it, to dispose of it, I mean. Someone deliberately left it on the train, and not just once either. Don't you know what that means?" I'm so desperate that I shake the case at him, and it emits an ominous metallic rattle. "Just let me—"

"You made the call."

I don't see how this can be an accusation, and so I say "It was me, yes."

"Thank you, Mr Conrad."

I'm bemused by this, even though his grip on my shoulder has begun to feel more appreciative than custodial. "How do you know my name?"

"We know everything we have to know."

His eyes have grown so professionally blank that I say "You're not with the railway, are you?"

"We're responsible for this kind of situation. That's all I can tell you." He lets go of my shoulder and repeats, "Thank you, Mr Conrad."

Even when he holds out his hand I don't immediately see he's asking for the briefcase. Its reappearances have left me wary, and I say "I wonder if you've got some identification."

"Don't you think we would have?" he says and produces a wallet almost as thin as a wafer. It contains a single card with his name and his likeness and some abbreviated information. "Is that good enough for you?" he wants to know.

"Thank you, Mr Joseph," I say and hand over the briefcase.

He doesn't move away at once. He has to know what he's about, which is why I didn't panic when he lingered over questioning me—he would hardly have been putting himself at risk. There may be a trace of doubt in my eyes, since he says "Are you sure that settles it? Would you like to be there when its disposed of?"

"I'm sure." Indeed, I'm growing anxious for him and the case to be gone. "You're the authority," I tell him. "It's in safe hands now."

As he heads for the nearest stairway I hear a train. I'm eager to board, and more eager for it to leave any danger behind. The doors close as I find a seat and give in to expressing relief—shaking my head, mopping my brow, letting out a loud sigh that shudders with my heartbeat. "I've really done it this time," I declare.

Nobody responds except for glancing at me as if I might be a mental patient on the loose. I don't care what they think of me; I know I've kept them safe. A young man in a business suit returns to reading a comic book, and a girl gazes at her extravagantly large wristwatch, which shows seven minutes to six. A woman who pushed her thin spectacles high with a forefinger lets them subside, and a man lifts one foot after the other to rub the toecaps of his shoes even shinier on his trouser cuffs. None of the passengers might be able to do any of this without me. The idea accompanies me around the loop, past Lime Street and Central Station, and prompts me to stare along the James Street platform. I see nobody with a briefcase, but the absence isn't quite reassuring enough. As the doors start to close I jump off the train and run up the stairs to the underground bridge.

I still seem to have a task. When a train appears I stay on the platform until the doors begin to close, but I can't see anyone suspicious. As soon as I step aboard a girl gives me a seat, and everything seems settled as the train sets off around the loop. A bald man with a tweed hat on his lap gazes at the polished toecaps of his shoes before turning over his newspaper. A bespectacled woman in a checked overcoat and with queries dangling from her earlobes is reading another copy of the paper. A young man dressed for business takes a comic book from among the documents in a cardboard folder, and a young woman in a waspishly striped sweater pushes a headphone away from one ear while she consults her considerable wristwatch. As blackness closes around the train I see the time is seven minutes to six.

I could imagine the lights on the tunnel walls are signalling to me, and I search for some distraction inside the carriage. The headline on the front page of the bald man's newspaper says Islamic Panic, but I'm not sure if that's the name of a terrorist group. The bespectacled woman's paper has its letters page facing me. One letter is entitled No Asylum, which seems to be the slogan of a party called Pure Brit, and the correspondent has suggested that the party is planting bombs so as to blame Muslims and provoke a backlash against immigrants. I grow aware of a voice too small to belong to any of the passengers. It isn't in my head; it's on the young woman's headphones—a recorded radio phone-in, where somebody is arguing that the bombs are the work not of Muslims or their foes but the first stages of a plan by the secret service to force the country to accept dictatorship. Another caller on the phone-in accuses the man who was credited with trying to save his fellow passengers of having planted the bomb himself. All these idle theories make me feel as if nothing is to be trusted, and I focus my attention on the young man's comic book. The cover shows a boffin grimacing in disbelief while he tells his colleagues "It's not that kind of time bomb. It's a bomb that destroys time. It'll blow the past to bits."

"It's nothing like that." The idea has gone too far, and I can't keep quiet any longer, especially since I've seen the truth at last. I can hear the women murmuring behind me like nurses, and I should have listened to them sooner. "That's right, someone's talking about us again," I tell everyone. "But don't you see, if they can keep changing it we can change it too."

Nobody appears to want to listen. They're all gazing at the floor, even those who've turned towards me. "It needn't be what any of them say happened to us," I insist—I feel as if a voice is speaking through me. "It needn't even be what did."

Everyone is staring at the floor beside me. I look at last and see the briefcase. "We don't have to be what people say just because of where we are," I vow as I take hold of the handle. A thunderous rumble swells in my ears, and brightness flares in my eyes, but it's on the wall of the tunnel. I mustn't be distracted by the absence of my shadow—of anyone's. I have to get my task right this time, and then we can head for the light, out of the tunnel.

With The Angels

First published in Visitants: Stories Of Fallen Angels And Heavenly Hosts, 2010

As Cynthia drove between the massive mossy posts where the gates used to be, Karen said "Were you little when you lived here, Auntie Jackie?"

"Not as little as I was," Cynthia said.

"That's right," Jacqueline said while the poplars alongside the high walls darkened the car, "I'm even older than your grandmother."

Karen and Valerie giggled and then looked for other amusement. "What's this house called, Brian?" Valerie enquired.

"The Populars," the four-year-old declared and set about punching his sisters almost before they began to laugh.

"Now, you three," Cynthia intervened. "You said you'd show Jackie how good you can be."

No doubt she meant her sister to feel more included. "Can't we play?" said Brian as if Jacqueline were a disapproving bystander.

"I expect you may," Jacqueline said, having glanced at Cynthia. "Just don't get yourselves dirty or do any damage or go anywhere you shouldn't or that's dangerous."

Brian and the eight-year-old twins barely waited for Cynthia to haul two-handed at the brake before they piled out of the Volvo and chased across the forecourt into the weedy garden. "Do try and let them be children," Cynthia murmured.

"I wasn't aware I could change them." Jacqueline managed not to groan while she unbent her stiff limbs and clambered out of the car. "I shouldn't think they would take much notice of me," she said, supporting herself on the hot roof as she turned to the house.

Despite the August sunlight, it seemed darker than its neighbours, not just because of the shadows of the trees, which still put her in mind of a graveyard. More than a century's worth of winds across the moors outside the Yorkshire town had plastered the large house with grime. The windows on the topmost floor were half the size of those on the other two storeys, one reason why she'd striven in her childhood not to think they resembled the eyes of a spider, any more than the porch between the downstairs rooms looked like a voracious vertical mouth. She was far from a child now, and she strode or at any rate limped to the porch, only to have to wait for her sister to bring the keys. As Cynthia thrust one into the first rusty lock the twins scampered over, pursued by their brother. "Throw me up again," he cried.

"Where did he get that from?"

"From being a child, I should think," Cynthia said. "Don't you remember what it was like?"

Jacqueline did, not least because of Brian's demand. She found some breath as she watched the girls take their brother by the arms and swing him into the air. "Again," he cried.

"We're tired now," Karen told him. "We want to see in the house."

"Maybe grandma and auntie will give you a throw if you're good," Valerie said.

"Not just now," Jacqueline said at once.

Cynthia raised her eyebrows high enough to turn her eyes blank as she twisted the second key. The door lumbered inwards a few inches and then baulked. She was trying to nudge the obstruction aside with the door when Brian made for the gap. "Don't," Jacqueline blurted, catching him by the shoulder.

"Good heavens, Jackie, what's the matter now?"

"We don't want the children in there until we know what state it's in, do we?"

"Just see if you can squeeze past and shift whatever's there, Brian."

Jacqueline felt unworthy of consideration. She could only watch the boy wriggle around the edge of the door and vanish into the gloom. She heard fumbling and rustling, but of course this didn't mean some desiccated presence was at large in the vestibule. Why didn't Brian speak? She was about to prompt him until he called "It's just some old letters and papers."

When he reappeared with several free newspapers that looked as dusty as their news, Cynthia eased the door past him. A handful of brown envelopes contained electricity bills that grew redder as they came up to date, which made Jacqueline wonder "Won't the lights work?"

"I expect so if we really need them." Cynthia advanced into the wide hall beyond the vestibule and poked at the nearest switch. Grit ground inside the mechanism, but the bulbs in the hall chandelier stayed as dull as the mass of crystal teardrops. "Never mind," Cynthia said, having tested every switch in the column on the wall without result. "As I say, we won't need them."

The grimy skylight above the stairwell illuminated the hall enough to show that the dark wallpaper was even hairier than Jacqueline remembered. It had always made her think of the fur of a great spider, and now it was blotchy with damp. The children were already running up the left-hand staircase and across the first-floor landing, under which the chandelier dangled like a spider on a thread. "Don't go out of sight," Cynthia told them, "until we see what's what."

"Chase me." Brian ran down the other stairs, one of which rattled like a lid beneath the heavy carpet. "Chase," he cried and dashed across the hall to race upstairs again.

"Don't keep running up and down unless you want to make me ill," Jacqueline's grandmother would have said. The incessant rumble of footsteps might have presaged a storm on the way to turning the hall even gloomier, so that Jacqueline strode as steadily as she could towards the nearest room. She had to pass one of the hall mirrors, which appeared to show a dark blotch hovering in wait for the children. The shapeless sagging darkness at the top of the grimy oval was a stain, and she needn't have waited to see the children run downstairs out of its reach. "Do you want the mirror?" Cynthia said. "I expect it would clean up."

"I don't know what I want from this house," Jacqueline said.

She mustn't say she would prefer the children not to be in it. She couldn't even suggest sending them outside in case the garden concealed dangers—broken glass, rusty metal, holes in the ground. The children were staying with Cynthia while her son and his partner holidayed in Morocco, but couldn't she have chosen a better time to go through the house before it was put up for sale? She frowned at Jacqueline and then followed her into the dining-room.

Although the heavy curtains were tied back from the large windows, the room wasn't much brighter than the hall. It was steeped in the shadows of the poplars, and the tall panes were spotted with earth. A spider's nest of a chandelier loomed above the long table set for an elaborate dinner for six. That had been Cynthia's idea when they'd moved their parents to the rest home; she'd meant to convince any thieves that the house was still occupied, but to Jacqueline it felt like preserving a past that she'd hoped to outgrow. She remembered being made to sit up stiffly at the table, to hold her utensils just so, to cover her lap nicely with her napkin, not to speak or to make the slightest noise with any of her food. Too much of this upbringing had lodged inside her, but was that why she felt uneasy with the children in the house? "Are you taking anything out of here?" Cynthia said.

"There's nothing here for me, Cynthia. You have whatever you want and don't worry about me."

Cynthia gazed at her as they headed for the breakfast room. The chandelier stirred as the children ran above it once again, but Jacqueline told herself that was nothing like her nightmares—at least, not very like. She was unnerved to hear Cynthia exclaim "There it is."

The breakfast room was borrowing light from the large back garden, but not much, since the overgrown expanse lay in the shadow of the house. The weighty table had spread its wings and was attended by six straight-backed ponderous chairs, but Cynthia was holding out her hands to the high chair in the darkest corner of the room. "Do you remember sitting in that?" she apparently hoped. "I think I do."

"I wouldn't," Jacqueline said.

She hadn't needed it to make her feel restricted at the table, where breakfast with her grandparents had been as formal as dinner. "Nothing here either," she declared and limped into the hall.

The mirror on the far side was discoloured too. She glimpsed the children's blurred shapes streaming up into a pendulous darkness and heard the agitated jangle of the chandelier as she made for the lounge. The leather suite looked immovable with age, and only the television went some way towards bringing the room up to date, though the screen was as blank as an uninscribed stone. She remembered having to sit silent for hours while her parents and grandparents listened to the radio for news about the war—her grandmother hadn't liked children out of her sight in the house. The dresser was still full of china she'd been forbidden to venture near, which was grey with dust and the dimness. Cynthia had been allowed to crawl around the room—indulged for being younger or because their grandmother liked babies in the house. "I'll leave you to it," she said as Cynthia followed her in.

She was hoping to find more light in the kitchen, but it didn't show her much that she wanted to see. While the refrigerator was relatively modern, not to mention tall enough for somebody to stand in, it felt out of place. The black iron range still occupied most of one wall, and the old stained marble sink projected from another. Massive cabinets and heavy chests of drawers helped box in the hulking table scored by knives. It used to remind her of an operating table, even though she hadn't thought she would grow up to be a nurse. She was distracted by the children as they ran into the kitchen. "Can we have a drink?" Karen said for all of them.

"May we?" Valerie amended.

"Please." Once she'd been echoed Jacqueline said "I'll find you some glasses. Let the tap run."

When she opened a cupboard she thought for a moment that the stack of plates was covered by a greyish doily. Several objects as long as a baby's fingers but thinner even than their bones flinched out of sight, and she saw the plates were draped with a mass of cobwebs. She slammed the door as Karen used both hands to twist the cold tap. It uttered a dry gurgle rather too reminiscent of sounds she used to hear while working in the geriatric ward, and she wondered if the supply had been turned off. Then a gout of dark liquid spattered the sink, and a gush of rusty water darkened the marble. As Karen struggled to shut it off Valerie enquired "Did you have to drink that, auntie?"

"I had to put up with a lot you wouldn't be expected to."

"We won't, then. Aren't there any other drinks?"

"And things to eat," Brian said at once.

"I'm sure there's nothing." When the children gazed at her with various degrees of patience Jacqueline opened the refrigerator, trying not to think that the compartments could harbour bodies smaller than Brian's. All she found were a bottle of mouldering milk and half a loaf as hard as a rusk. "I'm afraid you'll have to do without," she said.

How often had her grandmother said that? Supposedly she'd been just as parsimonious before the war. Jacqueline didn't want to sound like her, but when Brian took hold of the handle of a drawer that was level with his head she couldn't help blurting "Stay away from there."

At least she didn't add "We've lost enough children." As the boy stepped back Cynthia hurried into the kitchen. "What are you doing now?"

"We don't want them playing with knives, do we?" Jacqueline said.

"I know you're too sensible, Brian."

Was that aimed just at him? As Cynthia opened the cupboards the children resumed chasing up the stairs. Presumably the creature Jacqueline had glimpsed was staying out of sight, and so were any more like it. When Cynthia made for the hall Jacqueline said "I'll be up in a minute."

Although she didn't linger in the kitchen, she couldn't leave her memories behind. How many children had her grandmother lost that she'd been so afraid of losing any more? By pestering her mother Jacqueline had learned they'd been stillborn, which had reminded her how often her grandmother told her to keep still. More than once today Jacqueline had refrained from saying that to the twins and to Brian in particular. Their clamour seemed to fill the hall and resonate all the way up the house, so that she could have thought the reverberations were shaking the mirrors, disturbing the suspended mass of darkness like a web in which a spider had come to life. "Can we go up to the top now?" Brian said.

"Please don't," Jacqueline called.

It took Cynthia's stare to establish that the boy hadn't been asking Jacqueline. "Why can't we?" Karen protested, and Valerie contributed "We only want to see."

"I'm sure you can," Cynthia said. "Just wait till we're all up there."

Before tramping into the nearest bedroom she gave her sister one more look, and Jacqueline felt as blameworthy as their grandmother used to make her feel. Why couldn't she watch over the children from the hall? She tilted her head back on her shaky neck to gaze up the stairwell. Sometimes her grandfather would raise his eyes ceilingwards as his wife found yet another reason to rebuke Jacqueline, only for the woman to say "If you look like that you'll see where you're going." Presumably she'd meant heaven, and perhaps she was there now, if there was such a place. Jacqueline imagined her sailing upwards like a husk on a wind; she'd already seemed withered all those years ago, and not just physically either. Was that why Jacqueline had thought the stillbirths must be shrivelled too? They would have ended up like that, but she needn't think about it now, if ever. She glanced towards the children and saw movement above them.

She must have seen the shadows of the treetops—thin shapes that appeared to start out of the corners under the roof before darting back into the gloom. As she tried to grasp how those shadows could reach so far beyond the confines of the skylight, Cynthia peered out of the nearest bedroom. "Jackie, aren't you coming to look?"

Jacqueline couldn't think for all the noise. "If you three will give us some peace for a while," she said louder than she liked. "And stay with us. We don't want you going anywhere that isn't safe."

"You heard your aunt," Cynthia said, sounding unnecessarily like a resentful child.

As Brian trudged after the twins to follow Cynthia into her grandmother's bedroom Jacqueline remembered never being let in there. Later her parents had made it their room—had tried, at any rate. While they'd doubled the size of the bed, the rest of the furniture was still her grandmother's, and she could have fancied that all the swarthy wood was helping the room glower at the intrusion. She couldn't imagine her parents sharing a bed there, let alone performing any activity in it, but she didn't want to think about such things at all. "Not for me," she said and made for the next room.

Not much had changed since it had been her grandfather's, which meant it still seemed to belong to his wife. It felt like her disapproval rendered solid by not just the narrow single bed but the rest of the dark furniture that duplicated hers, having been her choice. She'd disapproved of almost anything related to Jacqueline, not least her husband playing with their granddaughter. Jacqueline avoided glancing up at any restlessness under the roof while she crossed the landing to the other front bedroom. As she gazed at the two single beds that remained since the cot had been disposed of, the children ran to cluster around her in the doorway. "This was your room, wasn't it?" Valerie said.

"Yours and our grandma's," Karen amended.

"No," Jacqueline said, "it was hers and our mother's and father's."

In fact she hadn't been sent to the top floor until Cynthia was born. Their grandfather had told her she was going to stay with the angels, though his wife frowned at the idea. Jacqueline would have found it more appealing if she hadn't already been led to believe that all the stillbirths were living with the angels. She hardly knew why she was continuing to explore the house. Though the cast-iron bath had been replaced by a fibreglass tub as blue as the toilet and sink, she still remembered flinching from the chilly metal. After Cynthia's birth their grandmother had taken over bathing Jacqueline, scrubbing her with such relentless harshness that it had felt like a penance. When it was over at last, her grandfather would do his best to raise her spirits. "Now you're clean enough for the angels," he would say and throw her up in the air.

"If you're good the angels will catch you"—but of course he did, which had always made her wonder what would happen to her if she wasn't good enough. She'd seemed to glimpse that thought in her grandmother's eyes, or had it been a wish? What would have caught her if she'd failed to live up to requirements? As she tried to forget the conclusion she'd reached Brian said "Where did they put you, then?"

"They kept me right up at the top."

"Can we see?"

"Yes, let's," said Valerie, and Karen ran after him as well.

Jacqueline was opening her mouth to delay them when Cynthia said "You'll be going up there now, won't you? You can keep an eye on them."

It was a rebuke for not helping enough with the children, or for interfering too much, or perhaps for Jacqueline's growing nervousness. Anger at her childish fancies sent her stumping halfway up the topmost flight of stairs before she faltered. Clouds had gathered like a lifetime's worth of dust above the skylight, and perhaps that was why the top floor seemed to darken as she climbed towards it, so that all the corners were even harder to distinguish—she could almost have thought the mass of dimness was solidifying. "Where were you, auntie?" Karen said.

"In there," said Jacqueline and hurried to join them outside the nearest room.

It wasn't as vast as she remembered, though certainly large enough to daunt a small child. The ceiling stooped to the front wall, squashing the window, from which the shadows of the poplars seemed to creep up the gloomy incline to acquire more substance under the roof at the back of the room. The grimy window smudged the premature twilight, which had very little to illuminate, since the room was bare of furniture and even of a carpet. "Did you have to sleep on the floor?" Valerie said. "Were you very bad?"

"Of course not," Jacqueline declared. It felt as if her memories had been thrown out—as if she hadn't experienced them—but she knew better. She'd lain on the cramped bed hemmed in by dour furniture and cut off from everyone else in the house by the dark that occupied the stairs. She would have prayed if that mightn't have roused what she dreaded. If the babies were with the angels, mustn't that imply they weren't angels themselves? Being stillbirths needn't mean they would keep still—Jacqueline never could when she was told. Suppose they were what caught you if you weren't good? She'd felt as if she had been sent away from her family for bad behaviour. All too soon she'd heard noises that suggested tiny withered limbs were stirring, and glimpsed movements in the highest corners of the room.

She must have been hearing the poplars and seeing their shadows. As she turned away from the emptied bedroom she caught sight of the room opposite, which was full of items covered with dustsheets. Had she ever known what the sheets concealed? She'd imagined they hid some secret that children weren't supposed to learn, but they'd also reminded her of enormous masses of cobweb. She could have thought the denizens of the webs were liable to crawl out of the dimness, and she was absurdly relieved to see Cynthia coming upstairs. "I'll leave you to it," Jacqueline said. "I'll be waiting down below."

It wasn't only the top floor she wanted to leave behind. She'd remembered what she'd once done to her sister. The war had been over at last, and she'd been trusted to look after Cynthia while the adults planned the future. The sisters had only been allowed to play with their toys in the hall, where Jacqueline had done her best to distract the toddler from straying into any of the rooms they weren't supposed to enter by themselves—in fact, every room. At last she'd grown impatient with her sister's mischief, and in a wicked moment she'd wondered what would catch Cynthia if she tossed her high. As she'd thrown her sister into the air with all her strength she'd realised that she didn't want to know, certainly not at Cynthia's expense—as she'd seen dwarfish shrivelled figures darting out of every corner in the dark above the stairwell and scuttling down to seize their prize. They'd come head first, so that she'd seen their bald scalps wrinkled like walnuts before she glimpsed their hungry withered faces. Then Cynthia had fallen back into her arms, though Jacqueline had barely managed to keep hold of her. Squeezing her eyes shut, she'd hugged her sister until she'd felt able to risk seeing they were alone in the vault of the hall.

There was no use telling herself that she'd taken back her unforgivable wish. She might have injured the toddler even by catching her—she might have broken her frail neck. She ought to have known that, and perhaps she had. Being expected to behave badly had made her act that way, but she felt as if all the nightmares that were stored in the house had festered and gained strength over the years. When she reached the foot of the stairs at last she carried on out of the house.

The poplars stooped to greet her with a wordless murmur. A wind was rising under the sunless sky. It was gentle on her face—it seemed to promise tenderness she couldn't recall having experienced, certainly not once Cynthia was born. Perhaps it could soothe away her memories, and she was raising her face to it when Brian appeared in the porch. "What are you doing, auntie?"

"Just being by myself."

She thought that was pointed enough until he skipped out of the house. "Is it time now?"

Why couldn't Cynthia have kept him with her? No doubt she thought it was Jacqueline's turn. "Time for what?" Jacqueline couldn't avoid asking.

"You said you'd give me a throw."

She'd said she wouldn't then, not that she would sometime. Just the same, perhaps she could. It might be a way of leaving the house behind and all it represented to her. It would prove she deserved to be trusted with him, as she ought not to have been trusted with little Cynthia. "Come on then," she said.

As soon as she held out her arms he ran and leapt into them. "Careful," she gasped, laughing as she recovered her balance. "Are you ready?" she said and threw the small body into the air.

She was surprised how light he was, or how much strength she had at her disposal. He came down giggling, and she caught him. "Again," he cried.

"Just once more," Jacqueline said. She threw him higher this time, and he giggled louder. Cynthia often said that children kept you young, and Jacqueline thought it was true after all. Brian fell into her arms and she hugged him. "Again," he could hardly beg for giggling.

"Now what did I just say?" Nevertheless she threw him so high that her arms trembled with the effort, and the poplars nodded as if they were approving her accomplishment. She clutched at Brian as he came down with an impact that made her shoulders ache. "Higher," he pleaded almost incoherently. "Higher."

"This really is the last time, Brian." She crouched as if the stooping poplars had pushed her down. Tensing her whole body, she reared up to fling him into the pendulous gloom with all her strength.

For a moment she thought only the wind was reaching for him as it bowed the trees and dislodged objects from the foliage—leaves that rustled, twigs that scraped and rattled. But the thin shapes weren't falling, they were scurrying head first down the tree-trunks at a speed that seemed to leave time behind. Some of them had no shape they could have lived with, and some might never have had any skin. She saw their shrivelled eyes glimmer eagerly and their toothless mouths gape with an identical infantile hunger. Their combined weight bowed the lowest branches while they extended arms like withered sticks to snatch the child.

In that helpless instant Jacqueline was overwhelmed by a feeling she would never have admitted—a rush of childish glee, of utter irresponsibility. For a moment she was no longer a nurse, not even a retired one as old as some of her patients had been. She shouldn't have put Brian at risk, but now he was beyond saving. Then he fell out of the dark beneath the poplars, in which there was no longer any sign of life, and she made a grab at him. The strength had left her arms, and he struck the hard earth with a thud that put her in mind of the fall of a lid.

"Brian?" she said and bent groaning to him. "Brian," she repeated, apparently loud enough to be audible all the way up the house. She heard her old window rumble open, and Cynthia's cry: "What have you done now?" She heard footsteps thunder down the stairs, and turned away from the small still body beneath the uninhabited trees as her sister dashed out of the porch. Jacqueline had just one thought, but surely it must make a difference. "Nothing caught him," she said.

2011

The Room Beyond

First published in The New And Perfect Man (Postscripts #24/25), April 2011

As soon as Todd drove off the motorway it vanished from the mirror, and so did the sun across the moor. On both sides of the street the slender terraced houses huddled together like old folk afraid of descending the precipitous slope. Most of the shops in the town at the foot of the street were illuminated, but the streetlamps seemed oblivious of the September dusk. As he braked and braked again he saw the hotel sign across the maze of roofs.

The middle was blocked by the spire of a church, but BEL and the final E were visible. He hadn't realised that the hotel was on the far side of town. Whenever he stayed with his uncle and aunt he'd come by train, from which they had escorted him through the back streets to their house, interrogating him and talking at him so incessantly that he'd had little chance to learn the route. It had been the same on Sundays, when they'd walked to the Bellevue for a dauntingly formal lunch. Now the town hardly seemed large enough to accommodate either route.

More than this had changed in fifty years. While the clock from beneath which figures emerged on the hour was still outside the jewellers on the High Street, the road was one way only now. It turned away from the hotel, and all the side streets leading there displayed No Entry signs. Most of the shops were either new or disused, and the Apollo, where he'd once seen an airman climbing steps to heaven, had become the Valley Bottom pub. In a few minutes Todd found himself back at the clock, which hadn't moved on from twenty-five to six. The tarnished figures were paralysed on their track, and one stood in a miniature doorway as if he were loath to venture beyond. Shops were being shuttered, and at last the streetlamps came on, illuminating virtually deserted streets. This time Todd left the High Street ahead of the bend, but the lane he followed returned to the clock. He glimpsed Christ the Redeemer down a narrow alley, though the church was dark. He had to drive along the High Street yet again to discover that a road around the outside of the town led towards the hotel.

Was the park beside the road the one where his relatives had taken him to hear a brass band? He wouldn't have placed it so close to the hotel. The doctor's surgery must have been in one of the derelict houses facing the park, but Todd couldn't identify which. He hadn't thought of it for all these years, and he would have been happy to forget it now. He hadn't passed a single inhabited house by the time the road brought him to the hotel.

He had to laugh, as his uncle liked him to. The long black building was less than half the size he seemed to remember. While it might have been designed to resemble a mansion, he could have taken it for some kind of institution now. A wind blundered off the moor and flapped a torn section of the canvas awning across most of the unilluminated name. A couple of cars were parked on the forecourt, under a solitary orange floodlight that turned his blue Passat as black as they appeared to be. Dead windblown vegetation splintered beneath the wheels as he parked in front of a tall window blacked out by heavy curtains. His boxy suitcase was resting on the back seat, and he trundled it to the hotel. No uniformed doorman was waiting to sweep the massive glass door wide, and Todd might have imagined that the door itself had shrunk. Its metal corner scraped over the tiled floor with an excruciating screech that made the receptionist glower. She was a brawny broad-shouldered woman with gilded spectacles as narrow as her eyes. Her grey hair was severely waved, and the glasses seemed to pinch her features small and sharp. She kept up her frown as Todd crossed the lobby, which was lit to some extent by a few bulbs of the dusty chandelier. More than just her attitude reminded him of someone else, so that he blurted "Excuse me, did you have a mother?"

She pursed her lips so hard that the surrounding skin turned grey along with them. "I beg your pardon," she said while doing nothing of the kind.

Her voice was hoarse and blurred, like a smoker's who was also somewhat drunk. "Sorry," Todd said and risked a laugh, only to wish he'd kept it to himself. "Does it run in the family, I meant to say."

"I'm sure I don't know what you mean."

"What you do. Admitting. Admission." Todd's words seemed to be straying out of his control, an unwelcome reminder of his age. "What I'm trying to say," he said, "was she a receptionist? The one in the practice by the park round the corner."

"That's a graveyard, not a park."

He could only assume she had somewhere else in mind. "Anyway," he said, "Can I have my room?"

"Have you booked?"

"I rang," Todd said and wondered if the woman who'd taken the call had been her in a more hospitable mood. "Jacob Todd."

"Todd." His uncle used to greet him with a cry of "Now it's all jake," but Todd felt as if the receptionist had dropped his name with a dull thud. She dragged a ledger bound in black from under the counter and plucked at the pages before repeating "Todd" like an accusation. He might have thought the pages at the back were loose with age until he realised they were registration forms, one of which she laid before him on the counter. "Fill yourself in," she said.

Discolouration had lent the form a dark border. The print was both small and smudged, and squinting at it only left Todd more frustrated with the task it set him. "Who needs all this?"

The receptionist raised her spectacles to train her gaze on him. Her fingertips looked as earthy as the edges of the form. "You might be taken ill," she said.

"Suppose I am, who'll want all this information?"

"The authorities," she said and stared unblinkingly at him.

The solitary writing instrument on the counter was a ballpoint splintered like a bone and bandaged with sticky plastic tape. As Todd strove to fit his details into narrow boxes on the form, the inky tip stumbled about like a senile limb. Last name, first name, address, date of birth, place of birth... "What's your business in our town?" the receptionist said.

"A funeral."

"You'll be just round the corner."

Even if that was indeed a graveyard, it needn't be the only one in town. Christ the Redeemer hadn't appeared to be anywhere near the hotel. Todd could go for a walk and find his way to the church once he'd checked into his room. Profession, driving licence number, car registration number, telephone number, email... "Will you be taking the dinner?" the receptionist said.

Todd was distracted by someone's attempts to enter the hotel or even to locate the handle of the door. He turned to see that the door was shaking just with rain, which was surging across the moor. "When do you need to know?" he said.

"As soon as you like." This plainly meant as soon as she did. "Cook wants to get away."

Perhaps at least the meal would be up to the standard Todd remembered, and he could save his walk in case the rain ceased. "Put me down, then," he said.

The receptionist vanished like a shadow into a small office behind the counter. Presumably the dim light from the lobby was all she required, for Todd heard the rattle of a telephone receiver. "One for dinner," she said, and somewhere in the building a distant version of her voice joined in. Another hollow rattle was succeeded by a metallic one, and she reappeared with a key attached to a tarnished baton. "Are you written up yet?" she said.

Towards the bottom of the form the print was almost too indistinct to read. Method of payment, onward destination, next of kin... "That's a blank, I'm afraid," Todd said. He scrawled his signature, in which age had reduced the first name to resembling Jab, and unstuck his discoloured fingers from the pen while the receptionist pored over the form.

He'd had more than enough of the sight of her greyish scalp through her irregular parting—it put him in mind of a crack in weedy stone—by the time she raised her head. "Retired from what?" she apparently felt entitled to learn.

"Education." When this didn't lessen her scrutiny Todd added, "Teaching them their sums."

This failed to earn him even a blink "Will you be dressing?" she said.

"For dinner, you mean?" She'd begun to remind him of his aunt, who had always found some element of his appearance to improve—a collar to tug higher on his neck, a tie to yank tighter, a handkerchief that was either lying too low in his breast pocket or standing too impolitely erect. "I'll be changing," he said.

"Better look alive, then. It's nearly eight, you know."

"Nowhere, near," said Todd, shaking the cuff of his heavy sweater back from his thin wrist. He was about to brandish the time—not much after half past five—when he saw his watch had stopped. His aunt and uncle had sent it for his twenty-first, and it had never let him down before. He drew his cuff over its battered face and found the receptionist frowning at him as if he'd betrayed some innumeracy. "Let's have my key, then," he said, "and I'll be down as soon as I'm fit to kill."

Whenever she'd finished sprucing him Todd's aunt used to say that was how he was dressed, but perhaps the receptionist didn't know the phrase.

"You're number one," she informed him, planting the brass club on the counter with a blow like the stroke of a hammer. "You'll have to work the lift yourself."

Todd couldn't tell whether she was apologising for the attendant's absence or reminiscing about the hotel's better days. As he headed for the gloomy alcove that housed the entrance to the single lift, a wheel of his suitcase dislodged a loose tile. The receptionist watched with disfavour while he replaced it in its gritty niche, and he didn't linger over deciphering the blurred letters on the underside of the tile—presumably some firm's trademark. Once he dragged open both latticed doors of the lift he struggled over shutting them. The wall of the lift shaft inched past the rusty mesh, and at last the floor of a grudgingly illuminated corridor sank into view, although the lift fell short of aligning with it. Todd had to clamber up and haul his suitcase after him before he could make for his room.

It was at the far end of the left-hand stretch of corridor, where a window above a fire escape showed the town reduced to runny mud by the rain on the glass. The feeble lamps on the corridor walls resembled glazed flames, all the more by flickering. The number on Todd's door was dangling head down from its one remaining screw. He twisted the key in the aged shaky lock and pushed the leaden door open, to be met by a smell of old fabric. It made Todd feel enclosed, invisibly and impalpably but oppressively, even after he switched on the miniature chandelier.

The small room was darkened by the furniture—a black wardrobe with a full-length mirror in its narrow door, an ebony dressing-table, a squat chest of drawers that looked stunted by age, a bed that wasn't quite single or double, with a hint of an indentation underneath a shaggy blanket as brown as turned earth. A door led to a shower and toilet, while another would have communicated with the next bedroom but was blocked by a luggage stand. Behind the heavy curtains at the foot of the bed Todd found a window that showed him darkness raging above the moor. He was unpacking his case when he heard what could have been the fall of several pans in the kitchen. As he changed into his dark suit—the only one he'd brought—a phone rang.

At first he thought it was in the next room. It shrilled at least a dozen times before he traced the dusty wire from the skirting board to the upper compartment of the wardrobe. When he swung the door open, the receiver toppled off the hook, starting to speak as he fumbled it towards his face. "The gong's gone, Mr Todd."

The receptionist's tone seemed capable of stripping Todd of all the years since his last visit. "Oh, is that what it was?" he retorted. "I'll be with you as soon as I can."

He would have liked to shower and shave, but the hotel could take the blame, even if the man in the black frame of the mirror would never have passed his aunt's inspection. Todd had always felt on probation, never quite knowing if his visits were treats or punishments. "If you won't behave you can go to your aunt's," his mother used to say, and he'd suspected she was a little afraid of her older sister. His uncle hadn't seemed to be, and made a joke wherever he could find one, but then he'd done so at the surgery as well. Todd didn't need to be alone with those memories, and hurried out of the room.

If he'd been able to locate the stairs he would have used them, but the corridor offered him just the silent doors, bearing numbers like steps in a child's first arithmetic lesson. He was close to hearing them chanted in his skull. He stepped gingerly down into the lift and pushed the marble button, only to leave a blotchy print on it. He hadn't even washed his hands. "Not my fault," he muttered, feeling threatened by a second childhood.

The lobby was deserted except for a sign on a stand outside a room Todd hadn't previously noticed. The plastic numbers separated by a hyphen weren't years, they were hours with just sixty minutes between them. The words above them would have said DINING ROOM if they hadn't lost a letter. Todd found the N on the carpet in the doorway—carpet trampled as flat and black as soil. As he attempted to replace the letter between the I and its twin he felt as if he were playing an infantile game. He hadn't succeeded when he grew aware of being watched from the room beyond the sign. "Just putting you together," he said.

The waiter was dressed even more sombrely than Todd. He stepped back a silent pace and indicated the room with a sweep of one white-gloved hand. The room was nowhere near as daunting as Todd recalled. While the tables were still draped like altars, and the place was certainly as hushed as church, it was scarcely big enough for a chapel. Even if it had always sported chandeliers, he didn't remember them as being so ineffectual. He had to squint to be sure of the burly waiter's small sharp face, the eyes narrowed as though in need of spectacles, the brow that he could have imagined had been tugged unnaturally smooth by the removal of a wig from the clipped grey hair. He was disconcerted enough to blurt "Has your sister gone off?"

The waiter paced to the farthest table and drew back its solitary chair. "Who was that, sir?"

His voice was as unctuously slow as a priest's at a pulpit, and might have been striving for hoarseness and depth. "Aren't you related to the lady at reception?" Todd said.

"They say we're all related, don't they?" Before Todd could give this whatever response it deserved, the waiter said "Will you be taking the buffet?"

Todd sat down as the waiter slipped the chilly leather seat beneath him. "Can I see the menu?" he said.

He never had while he was visiting—he'd only watched his aunt and uncle leafing through leather-bound volumes and then ordering for him. "I wouldn't recommend it, sir," the waiter said.

Todd was starting to feel as he'd felt as a child—that everyone around him knew a secret he wouldn't learn until he was older. "Why not?" he demanded.

"We're just providing the buffet option on this occasion. Chef had to leave us."

"Then I haven't much choice, have I?"

"We always have while we're alive."

The waiter sounded more priestly than ever, and his pace was deliberate enough for a ritual as he approached the lengthy table that stood along the left side of the room. He uncovered every salver and tureen before extending a hand towards them. "Enough for a large party, sir."

When waiters used to say things like that, Todd had expected his uncle to respond with a witticism. The hotel seemed to be turning into a joke Todd didn't understand. As he crossed the shiny blackened carpet to the buffet, the waiter raised a cloth from an elongated heap at the end of the table and handed him a plate. The buffet offered chicken legs and slices of cold meat, potatoes above which a fog hovered or at least a stagnant cloud of steam, a mound of chips that reminded him of extracting sticks from a haphazard pile in a game for which his aunt had never had the patience. Last came salads, and as he loaded his plate a lettuce leaf attempted a feeble crawl before subsiding on the salver. The movement might have betrayed the presence of an insect, but it was the work of a wind that had moved the floor-length curtain away from a window behind the table as though somebody was lurking there. As a child Todd had somehow been led to believe that God lived behind the curtains above the altar in the church.

The curtains on the far side of the table veiled only a vast darkness tossing restlessly as a sleeper in a nightmare. He did his best to ignore the impression while remarking "At least I'm the first one down."

"The only one," the waiter said and found utensils under the cloth for him. "It's all been put on for you, Mr Todd."

Was this meant to shame him into taking more? Todd might have wondered if his fellow guests knew better than to eat at the hotel, but he was more inclined to ask how the waiter knew his name. The man spoke before Todd could. "Will you be having the house?"

"I'll try a bottle. Make it red." In a further attempt to recapture some sense of maintaining control, Todd said, "And a jug out of the tap."

The waiter gave a priestly bow before gliding through a doorway to the left of the buffet, and Todd heard him droning to himself under his breath. Any response was in the same voice, and monotonous enough to suggest that the man was murmuring a ritual. After some sounds of pouring the waiter reappeared with a tray that bore an unstoppered carafe and a jug. He served Todd water and wine and stepped back. "Can you taste it, sir?" he murmured.

Todd took a mouthful of the wine, which seemed oddly lifeless, like some kind of token drink. "It'll do," he said, if only to make the waiter step back.

The man continued loitering within rather less than arm's length. He'd clasped his hands together on his chest, which put Todd in mind of someone praying beside a bed. When he tried to concentrate on his meal the hands glimmered so much at the edge of his vision that he might have imagined the gloves were plastic. "I'll be fine now," he said as persuasively as he could.

The waiter seemed reluctant to part his hands or otherwise move. At last he retreated, so slowly that he might have felt he didn't exist apart from his job. "Call me if there's anything you need," he said as he replaced the covers on the buffet before withdrawing into the inner room. He began murmuring again at once, which made it hard for Todd to breathe. It reminded him too much of the voice he used to hear beyond the doctor's waiting-room.

"Go to the doctor's with your uncle," his aunt would say, and Todd had never known whether she disliked having him in the house by herself or was providing her husband with company if not distraction, unless it had been her way of making certain that Todd's uncle saw the doctor yet again. Every time he'd filled the wait with jokes at which Todd had felt bound to laugh, although neither the quips nor his mirth had seemed to please the other patients. He'd felt not just embarrassed but increasingly aware that the joking was designed to distract someone—himself or his uncle or both—from the reason they were waiting in the room. He had never ventured to ask, and his uncle hadn't volunteered the information. It had been the secret waiting beyond the door through which his uncle would disappear with a last wry grin at Todd, after which Todd would gaze at the scuffed carpet while he tried to hear the discussion muffled by the wall. Eventually his uncle would return, looking as if he'd never given up his grin. While Todd had seldom managed to distinguish even a word, he'd once overheard his uncle protest "This isn't much of a joke."

Todd knew the secret now, but he preferred not to remember. He was even glad to be distracted by the waiter, who had stolen at some point back into the dining-room. Todd seemed to have been so preoccupied that he might have imagined somebody else had eaten his dinner, which he couldn't recall tasting. The jug and carafe were empty too. He'd barely glanced at his plate when the waiter came swiftly but noiselessly to him. "Do go back, Mr Todd."

The subdued light and the oppressive silence, not to mention the buffet, were making Todd feel as if he were already at a wake. "I've finished, thank you," he said. "The doctor says I have to watch my food."

When his uncle used to say that, Todd could never tell if it was a joke. Certainly his uncle had gazed at his food until his wife protested "Don't put ideas in the boy's head, Jack." Since the waiter seemed ready to persist, Todd said, "I'll be down in the morning. I have to be ready for a funeral."

The waiter looked lugubriously sympathetic, but Todd was thrown by the notion that the man already had. "Whose is that, sir?"

"I'd rather not talk about it if you don't mind." Todd regretted having brought the subject up. "I'm on my own now," he said as he made his way between the empty tables, which had begun to remind him of furniture covered with dustsheets in an unoccupied house. When he glanced back from the lobby the waiter was nowhere to be seen, and Todd's place was so thoroughly cleared that he might never have been there. A curtain stirred beside the long uneven mound draped from head to foot on the buffet table, and Todd discovered he would rather not see the mound stir too. He made some haste to leave before he realised that he didn't know when breakfast was served. Calling "Hello?" brought him no response, neither from the dining-room nor from the impenetrably dark office beyond the reception counter. He'd arrange to be wakened once he was in his room.

Why did he expect to be met in the lift? He was close to fancying there was no room for anyone but him as soon as he returned to the panelled box. He fumbled the gates shut and watched the wall ooze past them like a mudslide. He was anxious for light to appear above it well before that happened, and as soon as the lift wobbled to a halt he clambered up into the corridor.

It was as silent as ever. The sombre doors between the dim glazed flames could easily have reminded him of a mausoleum. The rain on the window at the end was borrowing colours from the lights of the town. The storm was slackening, and Todd was able to read some of the illuminated signs. Beneath the race of headlamps on the motorway he made out several letters perched on a high roof—ELLE and also U. An unwelcome thought took him to the window, on which he couldn't distinguish his breath from the unravelling skeins of rain. The sign swam into focus as if he were regaining his vision, and he saw it belonged to the Bellevue Hotel.

If anybody heard his gasp of disbelief, they gave no response. For a moment he had no idea where he was going, and then he found his numbered baton and jammed the key into the lock. A few bulbs flared in the dwarfish chandelier—not as many as last time, but they showed him the shabby leather folder on the dressing-table. He threw the folder open on the bed, revealing a few dog-eared sheets of notepaper and a solitary envelope. While he couldn't tell how much of their brownishness the items owed to age, there was no mistaking the name they bore. He was in the Belgrave Hotel.

It might have been yet another element of a joke that somebody was playing on him, unless he was playing it on himself. He was too late to change hotels, whatever time it was—"too late, Kate," as his uncle liked to say even when Todd's aunt wasn't there. Just now Todd wanted nothing more than to lie down, but first he needed to arrange his morning call.

He retrieved the phone from the upper cupboard of the wardrobe, only to find no instructions on the yellowed paper disc in the middle of the dial. When he picked up the bony receiver he heard a sound not unlike a protracted breathless gust of wind, presumably the Belgrave's version of a dialling tone. 9 seemed the likeliest number, but when he tried it Todd heard a phone begin to ring along the corridor. He was tempted to speak to his fellow guest, if only to establish there was one, but the hollow muffled note tolled until he cut it off. Dialling 1 brought him only the empty tone, and so he tried the zero. A bell went off in the depths of the building and was silenced, and a slow hoarse blurred voice in his ear said "Mr Todd."

"Can you get me up for eight?"

"For how many would that be, sir?"

"I'm saying can you see I'm down for breakfast. What time's that?"

"Eight will do it, Mr Todd."

Had the receptionist heard his first question after all? Todd was too weary to say any more—almost too exhausted to stand up. He stumbled to the token bathroom, where he lingered as briefly as seemed polite. The shower cubicle put him in mind of a cramped lift that had somehow acquired plumbing, while the space outside it was so confined it almost forced the toilet under the sink. Another reason for him to leave the windowless room was the mirror, but the wardrobe door showed him more of the same, displaying how age had shrunken and sharpened his face. He switched off the light and clambered into bed.

The indentation in the mattress made it easiest for him to lie on his back, hands crossed on his breastbone. He heard a hollow plop of rain on wood and then an increasingly sluggish repetition of the sound, which put him in mind of heartbeats. The wind was more constant, keeping up an empty drone not unlike the voiceless noise of the receives. Though he'd remembered one of his uncle's favourite turns of phrase—the comment about lateness—it didn't revive as many jokes as Todd hoped. It only brought back his uncle's response to hearing the doctor's receptionist call his name. "That's me," he would say, "on my tod."

It wasn't even true. His nephew had been with him, sharing the apprehension the man had been anxious if not desperate to conceal. None of these were memories Todd wanted to keep close to him in the dark. With an effort he recalled names his uncle had dug up from history: Addled Hitler, Guiser Wilhelm, Josef Starling, Linoleum Bonypart, Winsome Churchill... For years Todd had believed they had all been alive at the same time. Now the names seemed more like evidence of senility than jokes— blurred versions of the past that put him in mind of the way the rain on the window had twisted the world into a different shape. They left him unsure of himself, so that he was grateful to hear a voice.

It was next door. No, it was beyond the other room, though not far, and apparently calling a name. Presumably the caller wanted to be let in, since Todd heard a door open and shut. For a while there was silence, and then someone came out of the adjoining bathroom—a door opened, at any rate.

As Todd tried to use the hint of companionship to help him fall asleep, he grew aware of more sounds in the next room. His neighbour must be drunk. They seemed to be doing their utmost to speak—to judge by their tone, striving to voice some form of protest—but so unsuccessfully that Todd might have imagined they had no means of pronouncing words. He was struggling to make sense of it, since it was impossible to ignore, when someone else spoke. Was it the voice he'd first heard? Or perhaps the guest in the next room but one was calling for quiet. In a moment a door opened and closed. Todd willed the silence to let him sleep, but he was still awake when he heard the door again, followed by activity in the other room. His neighbour seemed to be in a worse state than ever, and had given up any attempt to speak while bumping into all the furniture. After some time the ungainly antics subsided, letting Todd hope his neighbour had found the bed or at least fallen asleep. But a voice was calling a name, and the door was audible again. By now Todd knew the silence wouldn't last, and he reared up from the trough of the mattress. "What are you doing in there?" he shouted.

The darkness engulfed his protest as somebody came back into the next room. They no longer sounded able to walk. They were crawling about on the floor, so effortfully that Todd fancied he heard them thumping it with their hands if not clawing at it. He'd had enough, and he lurched off the bed, groping at the dark until he found the light switch. As soon as a couple of bulbs flickered in the chandelier he stumbled along the corridor to knock on the door of his neighbour's room.

The huge indifferent voice of the dark answered him—the wind. He pounded on the door until the number shivered on its loose screw, but nobody responded. The nearest glazed flame lent the digit a vague shadow that came close to transforming it into an 8, although Todd was reminded of a different symbol. It would have needed to be lying down, as he did. He thumped on the door again as a preamble to tramping back to his room. He parted his thin dry lips as he snatched the receiver off the hook and heard its empty sound. It was the wind, and the instrument was dead as a bone.

As he let the receiver drop into its cradle he heard the door in the next room. He couldn't take a breath while he listened to the noises that ensued. His neighbour was crawling about as blindly as before but less accurately than ever. It took them a considerable time to progress across the room. Todd would have preferred them not to find the connecting door, especially once he heard a fumbling at the bottom of it, a rudimentary attempt that sounded too undefined to involve fingers. As the door began to shake, a rage indistinguishable from panic swept away Todd's thoughts. Grabbing the suitcase, he flung it on the bed and dragged the luggage stand aside. He heard a series of confused noises in the other room, as if somebody were floundering across it, retreating in an agony of embarrassment at their own state. The connecting door wasn't locked, and he threw it wide open.

The next room was deserted, and it wasn't a bedroom. By the light from his own room Todd made out two low tables strewn with open books and magazines. Against the walls stood various chairs so decrepit that they seemed to need the dimness to lend them more substance. If the room hadn't been deserted he might not have ventured in, but he felt compelled to examine the items on the tables, like a child determined to learn a secret. He was halfway across the stained damp carpet when he wished he hadn't left his room.

The books were textbooks, in so many pieces that they might have been dismantled by someone's fumbling attempts to read them. There were no magazines, just scattered pages of the oversized books. Despite the dimness, Todd was able to discern more about the illustrations than he even slightly liked. All of them depicted surgical procedures he wanted to believe could never have been put into practice, certainly not on anyone alive or still living afterwards. Mixed up with the pages were sheets of blank paper on which someone had drawn with a ballpoint pen, perhaps the taped-up pen that lay among them. Its unsteadiness might explain the grotesque nature of the drawings, which looked like a child's work or that of someone unusually crippled. In a way Todd was grateful that he couldn't judge whether the drawings were attempts to reproduce the illustrations from the textbooks or to portray something even worse. He was struggling to breathe and to retreat from the sight of all the images, not to mention everything they conjured up, when he heard the door shut behind him.

He whirled around to find he could still see it—could see it had no handle on this side. He only had to push it open, or would have except that it was locked. He was throwing all his weight against it, the very little weight he seemed to have left, when a voice at his back said "Mr Todd."

It was the voice he'd been hearing, as hoarse and practically as blurred as it had sounded through the wall. "You don't want me," he pleaded, "you want someone else," but the silence was so eloquent that he had to turn. He still had one hope—that he could flee into the corridor—but the door to it had no handle either. The only open door was on the far side of the room.

The doorway was admitting the light, such as it was. When he trudged across the waiting-room he saw that the source of the dim glow was a solitary bare bulb on a tattered flex. It illuminated a room as cramped as a trench. The bare rough walls were the colour of earth, which might be the material of the floor. The room was empty apart from a long unlidded box. Surely the box might already contain someone, and Todd ventured forward to see. He had barely crossed the threshold when a voice behind him murmured "He's gone at last." They switched off the power and shut him in, and the light left him so immediately that he had no time to be sure that the room was another antechamber.

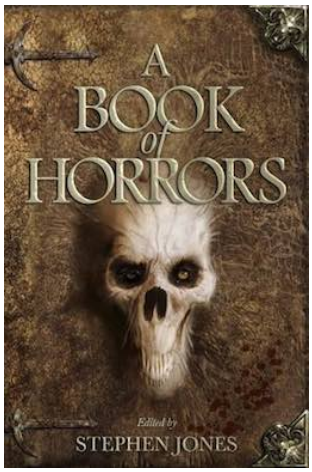
Getting It Wrong



"This is one of many tales that spring from some everyday element that I've taken for granted for years and suddenly don't. In this case, quiz shows where contestants can phone a friend. I think I may also have had at the back of my mind one of our friend John Probert's wickeder delights. Oddly enough, after finishing the tale I discovered that there could have been another answer to the Elisha Cook, Jr. question, since he also plays a criminal in the Mickey Spillane film I, The Jury. Though he has two major scenes, he isn't credited. Let's assume my characters didn't know that any more than I did."—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in A Book Of Horrors

First published in A Book Of Horrors, 2011

Edgeworth was listening to a reminiscence of the bus ride in Hitchcock's Lucky Jim when the phone rang. He switched off the deluxe anniversary special collector's edition of Family Plot and raised the back of his armchair to vertical. As he grabbed the receiver he saw the time on his watch jerk even closer to midnight. 'Hello?' he said and in less than a second 'Hello?'

'Is this Mr Edgeworth?'

He didn't recognise the woman's voice, not that he knew any women he could imagine ringing him. 'That's who you've got,' he said.

'Mr Eric Edgeworth?'

'You're not wrong yet.'

'Have you a few minutes, Mr Edgeworth?'

'I don't want anybody fixing my computer. I haven't had an accident at work or anywhere else either. I'm not buying anything and I'm not going to tell you where I shop or what I shop for. My politics are my affair and so's the rest of what I think right now. I've never won a competition, so don't bother saying I have. I don't go on holiday abroad, so you needn't try to sell me anything over there. I don't go away here either, not that it's any of your business. Anything else you want to know?'

'That isn't why were calling, Mr Edgeworth.' In the same brisk efficient tone she said 'Will you be a friend of Mary Barton?'

At first Edgeworth couldn't place the name, and then it brought him an image from work - a woman heaping cardboard tubs of popcorn while she kept up a smile no doubt designed to look bright but more symptomatic of bravery 'I wouldn't go that far,' he said, although the call had engaged his interest now: it might be the police. 'Is she in trouble?'

'She's in inquisition.' This might well have meant yes until the woman added 'She'd like you to be her expert friend.'

'Never heard of it.' Having deduced that they were talking about a quiz show, Edgeworth said 'Why me?'

'She says she's never met anyone who knows so much about films.'

'I don't suppose she has at that.' All the same, he was growing suspicious. Could this be a joke played by some of his workmates? 'When's she going to want me?' Edgeworth said.

'Immediately, if you're agreeable.'

'Pretty late for a quiz, isn't it?'

'It's not a show for children, Mr Edgeworth.'

'Aren't I supposed to be asked first?'

'We're doing that now.'

If all this was indeed a joke, he'd turn it on them. 'Fair enough, put her on,' he said as he stood up, retrieving his dinner container and its equally plastic fork from beside the chair.

'Please stay on the line.'

As Edgeworth used his elbow to switch on the light in the boxy kitchen off the main room of the apartment, a man spoke in his ear. 'Eric? Good to have you on. Terry Rice of Inquisition here.'

He sounded smug and amused, and Edgeworth had no doubt he was a fake. The kitchen bin released a stagnant tang of last night's Chinese takeaway while Edgeworth shoved the new container down hard enough to splinter it and snap the fork in half. 'Mary's hoping you'll give her an edge,' the man said. 'Do you know the rules?'

'Remind me.'

'There's only one you should bother about. You're allowed to get three answers wrong.'

'If we're talking about films I'm not bothered at all.'

'You don't need any more from me, then. Mary, talk to your friend.'

'Eric? I'm sorry to trouble you like this so late. I couldn't think of anybody else.'

That was a laugh when she'd hardly ever spoken to him. It was the first time she'd even used his name, at least to him. From her tone he could tell she was wearing her plucky smile. 'What channel are you on?' he said.

He was hoping to throw her, but she barely hesitated. 'Night Owl.'

The hoaxers must have thought this up in advance. Edgeworth would have asked how he could watch the channel, but he didn't want to end the game too soon. He'd begun to enjoy pretending to be fooled, and so he said 'What have you brought me on for?'

'Because I don't know what a film is.'

He thought this was true of just about all his workmates - a good film, at any rate. He'd imagined a job in a cinema would mean working with people who loved films as much as he did. Had she tried to put a tremble in her voice just now? She'd got that wrong; contestants on quiz shows weren't supposed to sound like that. 'Give me a go, then,' he said.

'What's the film where James Dean has a milkshake?'

Edgeworth waited, but that was all. She ought to be telling him how little time he had, and shouldn't there be some kind of urgent music? 'East of Eden,' he said.

'That's a twist,' said whoever was calling himself Terry Rice.

'Mr Rice is saying you're not right, Eric.'

It was a funny way of saying so, even by the standards of a prank. Perhaps that was why she sounded nervous. 'Then it'll be Rebel without a Cause,' Edgeworth said with a grin but no mirth.

'That's another.'

'Mr Rice says that's not right either.'

She sounded close to desperation. However far they took the pretence, Edgeworth could go further. 'It's Giant for sure, then,' he said. 'They're the only films he starred in.'

'That's one more.'

Did Edgeworth hear a faint suppressed shriek? Perhaps one of Mary Barton's accomplices had poked her to prompt her to speak. 'That can't be right, Eric,' she said high enough to irritate his ear.

'Give up,' the supposed quizmaster said or asked, though Edgeworth wasn't sure who was being addressed. 'Eric can't have heard of Has Anybody Seen My Gal?'

'Of course I have. I've seen it. James Dean has a milkshake at the soda fountain.' In case this failed to restore his own reputation Edgeworth added 'I knew it was the answer.'

'Were you fancying a bit of fun? You should play seriously even if you think it's just a game.' To Edgeworth's disbelief, this sounded like a rebuke. 'I expect your friend has something to say about it,' the man said.

'She's not my friend and none of you are.' Edgeworth confined himself to mouthing this, if only to hear what comment she would have to manufacture. He heard her draw an unsteady breath and say 'Thanks for coming on, Eric. I wish—'

'No point in wishing here. You know that isn't how we play. Thank you for entering into the spirit, Eric,' the man said and, along with Mary and the girl who'd called, was gone.

Surely his last words contradicted his rebuke, which had to mean he couldn't even keep the hoax up. Of course the number he'd called from had been withheld. It was too late for Edgeworth to go back to the commentary on the disc, and he returned the film to the shelf before tramping to the bathroom and then to bed.

With all his films he didn't need to dream. In the morning he ate off a tray in front of Third Time Sucky, a Stooges short just the right length for breakfast. 'I wish I knew what to wish for.' 'I wish I had one of your wishes.' 'I wish you two would shut up,' Moe retorted, the effects of which made Edgeworth splutter a mouthful of Sticky Rotters over his dressing-gown. He showered and donned his uniform, which said Frugotomovies on the sweater, and headed for the Frugoplex.

The cinema was an extensive concrete block that resembled the one where he lived. The February sky was just as flat and white. He'd chosen the apartment because he could walk to the cinema, but there were increasingly fewer new films that he wanted to watch; he hardly used his free pass any more. At least he didn't have to enthuse about them to the public. He was gazing with disfavour at the titles outside when the manager let him in. 'Any problem?' Mr Gittins said, and his plump smooth face displayed a smile too swift and sketchy to be identified as such. 'I hope you can leave it at home.'

Rather than retort that some of his workmates were to blame, Edgeworth made for the anonymous concrete staffroom. Soon the rest of the staff began to show up, some of them not far from late. Without exception they were decades younger than he was. As he took his place behind a ticket desk Larry Rivers came over. 'What were you watching last night, Eric?' Larry said with a grin as scrawny as his face.

Had he called himself Terry Rice last night? His name was similar, and he liked quizzing Edgeworth, who said 'I was listening.'

'What were you listening to, Eric?'

He was using the name like a quizmaster. Edgeworth was tempted to confront him, but perhaps that was exactly what he and the rest of them wanted. 'The man who wrote North by Northwest,' Edgeworth said.

'Don't know it. Is it a film?'

Edgeworth suspected this wasn't even meant as a joke. 'Cary Grant,' he said. 'James Mason.'

'Don't know them either.'

'Hitch, for heaven's sake.'

'Is that the film with Will Smith?' one of the girls seemed to feel it would be helpful to suggest.

'Hitchcock, love.'

'Sounds a bit mucky to me.'

'Sounds a bit like sexual harassment,' another girl warned Edgeworth.

'Alfred Hitchcock,' he said in desperation. 'Psycho.'

'Was that the one with Vince Vaughn?' Larry said.

Did they all think the past - anything older than them - was a joke? No wonder Timeless Video had failed when there were so many people like them. Edgeworth had lost all the money he'd sunk in the video library, which was why he'd been glad of the job at the Frugoplex. Some old things wouldn't go away, not least him. He was about to say at least some of this when Mr Gittins opened the door once again. 'Only just in time,' he said like a head teacher at a school gate.

Mary Barton ducked as if her apologetic smile had dragged her head down. Did she glance at Edgeworth or just towards all the staff around the ticket counter? She seemed wary of being seen to look. She hurried to the staffroom and scampered back to the lobby as Mr Gittins addressed the staff. 'Let's keep the public happy and coming back for more.'

Edgeworth might have wished to be a projectionist if the job wouldn't have involved watching too many films that bored him if not worse. He was reduced to noticing which film attracted the most customers, a dispiriting observation. Today it was the latest 3-D film, Get Outta My Face. Whenever there was a lull he watched Mary Barton at the refreshments counter opposite. Had her left little finger been bandaged yesterday? It looked significantly bigger than its twin. Her smile was if possible braver than ever, especially if she caught him watching, though then he stared at her until her eyes flinched aside. At times he thought her thin prematurely lined face was trying to look even older than it was, almost as old as him. He wasn't going to accuse her and give everyone a chance to scoff at him; he wouldn't put it past them to accuse him of harassing her. Instead he made sure she never had an opportunity to speak to him away from the public - she clearly didn't have the courage or the gall to approach him in front of anyone who wasn't privy to last night's witless joke.

When he left for home she was besieged by a queue, but as she filled a popcorn tub that she was holding gingerly with her left hand she sent him an apologetic look. If they'd been alone it might well have goaded him to respond. He had to be content with stalking next door to Pieca Pizza, where he bought a Massive Mighty Meat that would do for tomorrow's dinner as well.

He downed two slices in the kitchen and took another three into the main room, one for each version of Touch of Evil. He was halfway through Orson Welles' preferred cut when the phone rang. He paused the manic gangling hotel clerk and prepared to say a very few short words to the uninvited caller. 'It's that time again, Eric,' said a voice he could hardly believe he was hearing.

'My God, you're worse than a joke.' Edgeworth almost cut him off, but he wanted to learn how long they could keep up the pretence. 'Can't you even get your own rules right?' he jeered.

'Which rules are those, Eric?'

'Three mistakes and I was supposed to be out of your game.'

'You haven't quite got it, my friend. Last night was just one question you couldn't answer.'

'Trust me, I could. I was having a laugh just like you.'

'Please don't, Eric.'

Mary Barton sounded so apologetic it was painful, which he hoped it was for her. He could almost have thought she'd been forced against her will to participate in the hoax, but any sympathy he might have felt she lost by adding 'Don't make any more mistakes. It's serious.'

'He sounds it.'

'We get this problem sometimes.' The man's amusement was still plain. 'Listen to your friend,' he said. 'See how she sounds.'

'I'm truly sorry to be pestering you again, Eric. Hand on heart, you're my only hope.'

Edgeworth didn't know which of them angered him more. Her pathetic attempt to convince him she was desperate made her sound as though she was trying to suppress the emotion, and he was provoked to demand 'Where are you on the television? I want to watch.'

'We're on the radio.' With a giggle all the more unpleasant because it had to be affected the man said 'You wouldn't want to, trust me.'

Edgeworth agreed, having left out the comma. What radio show would have inflicted this kind of conversation on its audience? All that interested him now, though not much, was learning what question they'd come up with this time. They must have been reading a film guide to have thought of last night's. 'Go on then, Mr Terry Rice,' he said, baring his teeth in a substitute for a grin. 'Terrorise me again.'

'Do your best, Mary.'

'What's the Alfred Hitchcock film where you see him miss a bus?'

Someone stupider than Edgeworth might have imagined she was pleading with him, Did they genuinely expect him not to realise they were mocking what he'd said today to Larry Rivers? 'Strangers on a Train,' he said at once.

'Have a closer look.'

He didn't know if this was meant for him or the Barton woman, but her voice grew shrill and not entirely firm. 'Not that one, Eric.'

'Must have been The Birds, then.'

'Closer.'

'Please, Eric,' Mary Barton blurted, and he was disgusted to hear her attempting to sound close to tears. 'You must know. It's your kind of thing.'

'I know,' Edgeworth said with a vicious grin. 'I'll give it to you. Rope.'

'Not close enough yet.'

'Please!'

Edgeworth jerked the receiver away from his aching ear. 'What are you supposed to be doing?'

'It's my eye.'

Was he also meant to hear a stifled sob? 'That's what my grandma used to say,' he retorted. 'She'd say it to anyone talking rubbish.' Nevertheless he wasn't going to seem ignorant. 'Here's your answer since you're making such a fuss about it, as if you didn't know. It's—'

'Too late, Eric,' the man said without concealing his delight. 'You've had your second chance.'

'Please ...'

Edgeworth could only just hear Mary Barton's voice, as if it was no longer directed at him. He was right to hold the phone at arm's length to protect his eardrum from any surprises they had in mind, because he heard a shrill metallic sound before the line went dead. It was ridiculous even to think of searching the airwaves for Night Owl. He did his best to pick up the Welles film where he'd left off, but the twitching maniac in charge of the motel disturbed him more than he liked. He put the film back in its place among the dozens of Ts before tramping angrily to bed.

He lurched awake so often, imagining he'd heard the phone, that not just his eyes were prickly with irritation by the time he had to get up for work.

He was going to let Mary Barton know he'd had more than enough, and he wouldn't give the rest of them the chance to enjoy the show. 'Eager to get going?' the manager said by way of greeting.

'I'm eager all right,' Eric said and grinned as well.

He clocked on and hurried to the ticket counter, hoping Mary Barton would be first to arrive so that he could follow her to the staffroom. She'd been warned yesterday about timekeeping, after all. He watched the manager let in their workmates and grew more frustrated every time the newcomer wasn't her. Larry Rivers was among the last to join Edgeworth at the counter. 'What were you up to last night, Eric?' he said.

Edgeworth almost turned on him, but he could play too. 'Nothing you've ever seemed interested in.'

Somebody more gullible than Edgeworth might have thought the fellow felt rebuffed. No doubt he was disappointed that Edgeworth hadn't taken the bait, and some of their audience looked as if they were. There was still no sign of Mary Barton by opening time. 'Meet the public with a smile,' Mr Gittins said.

Perhaps the woman had stayed home because she was too embarrassed to face Edgeworth, unless it was her day off. 'Isn't Mary Barton coming in?' he said before he knew he meant to.

'She's called in sick.' Mr Gittins seemed surprised if not disapproving that Edgeworth felt entitled to ask. As he made for the doors he added 'Some trouble with her eye.'

Edgeworth struggled to think of a question. 'She'll have had it for a while, won't she?'

'She's never said so.' Mr Gittins stopped short of the doors to say 'Her mother hasn't either.'

'What's she got to do with anything?'

'She's looking after Mary's children while Mary's at the hospital. Happy now, Eric? Then I hope we can crack on with the job.'

As Mr Gittins let the public in, one of the girls alongside Edgeworth murmured 'You'll have to send her a Valentine, Eric. She isn't married any longer.'

'Keep your gossipping tongues to yourselves.' He glared at her and her friends who'd giggled, and then past them at Rivers. 'I'm putting you on your honour,' he said as his grandmother often had. 'You and your friends have been ringing me up at night, haven't you?'

'What?' Once Rivers finished the laugh that underlined the word he said 'We get more of you here than we want as it is, Eric.'

After that nobody except the public spoke to Edgeworth, and he couldn't even interest himself in which films they were unwise enough to pay for. Of course there was no reason to believe Rivers was as ignorant as he'd pretended - not about the late-night calls, at any rate. Edgeworth felt as if the long slow uneventful day were a curtain that would soon be raised on a performance he had no appetite for. At last he was able to leave behind everyone's contemptuous amusement, which felt like a threat of worse to come. When he shut himself in his apartment he found that he hoped he was waiting for nothing at all.

The pizza tasted stale and stodgy, an unsuccessful attempt to live up to itself. He tried watching classic comedies, but even his favourites seemed unbearably forced, like jokes cracked in the midst of a disaster or anticipating one. They hardly even passed the time, never mind distracting him from it. He was gazing in undefined dismay at the collapse of a dinosaur skeleton under Cary Grant and Katherine Hepburn when the phone went off like an alarm.

He killed the film and stared at the blank screen while the phone rang and rang again. He left it unanswered until a surge of irrational guilt made him grab it. 'What is it now?' he demanded.

'Someone was scared you weren't playing any more, Eric.'

'I thought your friend was meant to be in hospital,' Edgeworth said in triumph.

'She's your friend, Eric, only yours. You're the only one she can turn to about films.'

'Can't she even speak for herself now?'

'I'm here, Eric.' Mary Barton's voice had lost some strength or was designed to sound as feeble as the prank. 'They've fixed me up for now,' she said. 'I had to come back tonight or I'd have lost everything.'

'Trying to make a bit extra for your children, are you?'

'I'm trying to win as much as we need.'

Was she too preoccupied to notice his sarcasm, or wouldn't that fit in with her game? Could she really be so heartless that she would use her children to prolong a spiteful joke? His grandmother never would have - not even his mother, though she'd had plenty to say about any of Edgeworth's shortcomings that reminded her of his unidentified father. 'Ready to help?' the man with Mary Barton said.

'What will you do if I don't?'

Edgeworth heard a suppressed moan that must be meant to sound as terrified as pained. 'Up to you if you want to find out,' the man said.

'Go on then, do your worst.' At once Edgeworth was overtaken by more panic than he understood. 'I mean,' he said hastily, 'ask me about films.'

'Be careful, Mary. See he understands.'

The man seemed more amused than ever. Did he plan to ask about some detail in the kind of recent film they knew Edgeworth never watched? Edgeworth was ready with a furious rejoinder by the time Mary Barton faltered 'Which was the film where Elisha Cook played a gangster?'

There were three possibilities; that was the trick. If she and Rivers hoped to make Edgeworth nervous of giving the wrong answer, they had no chance. 'The Maltese Falcon,' he said.

'Wider, Mary.'

'That's not right, Eric.'

Her voice had grown shriller and shakier too, and Edgeworth was enraged to find this disturbed him. 'He was a gangster in that,' he objected.

'It isn't what they want.'

'Then I expect they're thinking of The Killing.'

'Wider again,' the man said as if he could hardly bear to put off the end of the joke.

'No, Eric, no.'

It occurred to Edgeworth that the actor had played a criminal rather than a gangster in the Kubrick film. The piercing harshness of the woman's ragged voice made it hard for him to think. 'Just one left, eh?' he said.

'Please, Eric. Please be right this time.'

She might almost have been praying. Far from winning Edgeworth over, it embarrassed him, but he wasn't going to give a wrong answer. 'No question,' he said. 'It's Baby Face Nelson.'

'Wider still.'

'What are you playing at?' Edgeworth protested. 'He was a gangster in that.'

'No, it was his son,' the man said. 'It was Elisha Cook Junior.'

'That's what you've been working up to all along, is it?' Edgeworth wiped his mouth, having inadvertently spat with rage. 'What a stupid trick,' he said, 'even for you.' He would have added a great deal if Mary Barton hadn't cried 'No.'

It was scarcely a word. It went on for some time with interruptions and rose considerably higher. Before it had to pause for breath Edgeworth shouted 'What are you doing?'

'It's a good thing we aren't on television.' By the sound of it, the man had moved the phone away from her. 'We couldn't show it,' he said gleefully, 'and I don't think you'd want to see.'

'Stop it,' Edgeworth yelled but failed to drown out the cry.

'Relax, Eric. That's all for you for now,' Terry Rice said and left silence aching in Edgeworth's ear.

The number was withheld again. Edgeworth thought of calling the police, but what could that achieve? Perhaps it would just prove he'd fallen for a joke after all. Perhaps everything had been recorded for his workmates to hear. He grabbed the remote control and set about searching the audio channels on the television. He thought he'd scanned through every available radio station, since the identifications on the screen had run out, when a voice he very much wished he couldn't recognise came out of the blank monitor. 'This is Night Owl signing off,' Terry Rice said, and Edgeworth thought he heard a muffled sobbing. 'Another night, another game.'

Edgeworth gazed at the silent screen until he seemed to glimpse a vague pale movement like a frantic attempt to escape. He turned off the set, nearly breaking the switch in his haste, and sought refuge in bed. Very occasionally his thoughts grew so exhausted that they almost let him doze. He did without breakfast - he couldn't have borne to watch a film. Once the shower had made him as clean as he had any chance of feeling he dressed and hurried to work.

He had to ring the bell twice at length to bring Mr Gittins out of his office. The manager's plump smooth face set not much less hard than marble as he saw Edgeworth. He was plainly unimpressed by Edgeworth's timeliness; perhaps he thought it was a ruse to gain his favour. 'I hope you'll be doing your best to get on with your colleagues,' he said.

'Why, who's said what?'

Mr Gittins didn't deign to answer. He was turning away until Edgeworth blurted 'Do we know if Mary Barton's coming in today?'

'What concern is it of yours?' Having gazed at Edgeworth, Mr Gittins said 'She won't be in for some time. I'm told she can't walk.'

Edgeworth swallowed, but his voice still emerged as a croak. 'Do we know why?'

'It really isn't something I'm prepared to discuss further.'

Mr Gittins looked disgusted by Edgeworth's interest and whatever it revived in his mind. Edgeworth gave him a grimace that felt nothing like apologetic and dashed to the staffroom. For once the list of staff and their phone numbers on the notice board was of some use. He keyed Mary Barton's number on his mobile and made the call before he had time to grow any more fearful. Well ahead of any preparation he could make for it a woman's tightened weary voice said 'Hello, yes?'

'I'm one of Mary's friends at work. I was wondering how she is.' With more of an effort he managed to add 'Just wondering what's wrong with her.'

'Has it got something to do with you?'

The woman's voice was loud and harsh enough to start two children crying, and Edgeworth felt as if the sounds were impaling his brain. 'I wouldn't say it has exactly, but—'

'If I thought you were the man who did that to Mary I'd find you and make sure you never went near a woman again. Just you tell me your name or I'll —'

Edgeworth jabbed the key to terminate the call and shoved the mobile in his pocket. As soon as it began to ring he switched it off. He couldn't loiter in the staffroom in case Mr Gittins wondered why, and so he ventured into the lobby, where a stray lump of popcorn squeaked piteously underfoot and then splintered like an insect. He'd hardly reached the ticket counter when the phones on it began to ring in chorus. 'See who it is,' Mr Gittins said.

Edgeworth clutched at the nearest receiver and hoisted it towards his face. 'Frugoplex Cinemas,' he said, trying not to sound like himself.

When he heard the woman's voice he turned his back on the manager. While she wasn't the caller he'd been afraid to hear or the one he might have hoped for, she was all too familiar. 'Congratulations, Eric,' she said. 'Three wrong means you're our next contestant. Someone will pick you up tonight.'

He dropped the phone, not quite missing its holder, and turned to find Mr Gittins frowning at him. 'Was that a personal call?'

'It was wrong. Wrong number,' Edgeworth said and wished he could believe. Mr Gittins frowned again before making for the doors as some of Edgeworth's workmates gathered outside. Edgeworth searched their faces through the glass and struggled to think what he could say to them. Just a few words were repeating themselves in his head like a silent prayer. 'You're my friend, aren't you?' he would have to say to someone. 'Be my friend.'

Recently Used

First published in Black Static #24, August 2011

Tunstall thought he hadn't slept when the phone rang. He clutched it and sat up on the bed, which felt too bare and wide by half. On the bedside table the photograph of him with Gwyneth in the sunlit mountains far away was waiting to be seen once more, and beyond it the curtains framed a solitary feeble midnight star. He rubbed his aching eyes to help them focus on the mobile as he thumbed the keypad. "Hello?" he said before he'd finished lifting the phone to his face.

"Forgive me, is this Charlie?"

The sight of Gwyneth's name on the midget screen had raised his hopes, but the voice belonged to somebody he'd never met. "Charles Tunstall," he had to say, "yes."

"Excuse me, Mr Tunstall. Your name is showing up on this phone as the last person called."

"I know." He couldn't leave it at that, and he said "It's my wife's."

"We hoped so." While the pause after the first word was close to imperceptible, the woman seemed to have to get ready to add "I'm afraid Mrs Tunstall—"

"What? Go on, for God's sake."

Why did he need to interrupt? It only delayed her saying "Your wife has had an accident, Mr Tunstall."

He felt as if they were rehearsing a script whose triteness simply made it more painful. "What's happened?" he said and was unable to go on.

"We believe she missed her footing on the escalator at the shopping precinct."

He knew it all too well. He'd always stood in front of her or held her hand to keep her steady as the metal steps bore them eighty feet down. Why couldn't the friends with whom she'd been dining have looked after her as he did? If she'd wanted to demonstrate her independence by setting off home on her own, why couldn't she at least have held tight to the banisters? Tunstall tried to take a breath before saying his next overused line. "How is she?"

"She's on her way to the hospital. Do you know where that is?"

He resented the question almost as much as the lack of information. "Of course I know."

"You might want to make your way over as soon as possible. Can you drive, or is there somebody who can?"

"I'm not that far gone yet. I can drive myself."

"How close are you?"

Though he was desperate to reduce the answer, he had to say "Fifteen minutes."

"That should do it, Mr Tunstall."

Tunstall struggled not to demand what she meant. "I'm on my way," he said.

He was. As he'd dashed across the bedroom Gwyneth's wardrobe had crept open with a jangle of hangers like the sound of a deadened alarm. Her bathrobe had slipped from the hook on the bathroom door to lie white and motionless beside the shower. The dormant beds in the next room had put him in mind of goodnights, of Gwyneth stooping to kiss the grandchildren. He'd taken the stairs two precarious treads at a time, so clumsily the house had seemed to shake. The kitchen calendar was scrawled with notes by him and Gwyneth, reminders large enough to read along the hall if their handwriting hadn't grown so vague. The dining-table was set for the weekend's family dinner, utensils glimmering in the dimness, and in the front room he might have glimpsed a crossword Gwyneth had begun, frowning at the clues or at fitting the letters into their boxes. As he ended the phone call he lurched out of the house.

The terraced side street was as deserted as his mind was attempting to be. He didn't need to think, he only had to drive. Beyond the bijou front gardens all the houses were silent enough for a stage set awaiting a performance. On both sides of the road parked cars glittered with November frost like a hint of Christmas. At least it hadn't blotted out his windscreen. Tunstall hauled the door open and jabbed the key into the ignition, and felt as if crouching into the driver's seat had shrunk or even crippled him. When he swung the car out of the meagre space between its neighbours, Gwyneth's water bottle from the gym trundled across the floor beside him.

He was driving almost faster than he dared, especially once he turned along the promenade. Now that the summer illuminations had been taken down, the seafront felt like a reminiscence of a holiday resort—the lightless fairground, the shuttered arcades, the hotels closed for the winter. Although a few faint stars glittered intermittently above the flat black sea, the darkness stretching to the horizon looked capable of going on for ever. He mustn't think about that—mustn't think anything other than that he would be in time, which made him tread on the accelerator as if he could outrun the dark.

Beyond the last hotels the buildings dwindled. The road left the side streets behind as it bent inland, where it was flanked by fields darker than the sky. No doubt they helped ice crawl over his windscreen, which made him feel as if his eyes were growing cataracts. Even once he turned the heater up to maximum and raised the headlight beams, he appeared to be speeding into blurred emptiness, defined only by a strip of illuminated tarmac so uniform it mightn't have been moving. When he saw an indistinct light ahead he braked for fear of an oncoming vehicle. He had to scrape the windscreen with his nails to be sure he was seeing the hospital.

He was praying, although wordlessly, by the time it came into focus. Clumps of floodlights towered above the concrete grounds, blanching flowers around scattered patches of turf, so that the vegetation looked artificial if not dead. The light robbed the long low unadorned buildings not just of any colour but of depth. As the car sped through the gates with a slither of tyres he was desperately tempted to leave it outside the main block, in one of the spaces for ambulances. He would only have to come back and move it before he went to Gwyneth, and he drove fast to the car park.

The metal arm at the entrance must have repeated its actions so often that it was practically lifeless. The hospital buildings were no longer in his mirrors when he found a space among the inert vehicles. Every windscreen was a white slab, and every roof sparkled like a festive decoration. As Tunstall limped breathlessly back to the reception area, he saw the breath he was leaving behind, an ephemeral ghost in the icy air. "Why can't I know where to go?" he pleaded without wishing for an answer, and tried to put all of himself into tramping faster to the hospital.

Before the automatic doors succeeded in crawling apart he was close to digging his fingers between them. Beyond them a glassed-in counter faced several dozen chairs, in some of which figures sat as if they feared any movement would disturb their injuries or ailments. As Tunstall hastened to the reception counter he heard an ambulance reiterate, probably to nobody, that it was reversing. "Excuse me," he said louder than the mechanical voice and tapped on the glass.

The receptionist took some moments to raise her round smooth nondescript face, but not enough to find much of an expression. "You've just brought my wife in," Tunstall was already saying. "She fell on an escalator."

The woman gazed at his lips as if to make certain he'd finished. He couldn't help parting them again, which only silenced her. At last she said "Did we tell you we had?"

"Not you. Whoever rang me did." The need to go through all this brought Tunstall close to clawing at the window. "The name's Tunstall," he blurted. "Hers and mine. It has been since before you were thought of."

"Tunstall." The receptionist's head sank, reminding Tunstall of the sight of her close-cropped turfy blonde coiffure. As she peered at her computer screen she murmured "What first name?"

"Gwyneth," Tunstall said and was compelled to add "Gwyn."

"Gwyneth Tunstall." The receptionist set about typing, not nearly sufficiently fast for him. When she leaned towards the monitor he had the grotesque notion that she was about to nod off, having spent too long at her repetitive job. "She's in a block," she appeared to tell him.

"A Block," Tunstall had to repeat.

"Block A, that's right."

Her deliberateness might have been rebuking his urgency, and made him more nervous. "Where's that again?" he yearned not to need to ask.

"Along there." Raising her left hand just enough to indicate that corridor, she said "You'll see the signs."

He was lurching past the seated patients, none of whom might have stirred, when she called "Mr Tunstall…"

He swung around so violently it seemed to leave his vision behind. Once his eyes cleared he managed to distinguish her through the glass, which the glare of the overhead lights had iced almost opaque. "I was going to say," she said, "when you get there you may have to wait to see her."

"I already have," Tunstall almost retorted. Surely all that mattered was being told where to find Gwyneth, and he made for the corridor as the receptionist began to page a Timmy Sawyer.

The passage was the colour of moonlit fog and nearly as featureless. A few doors bearing words he didn't need to focus on did very little to relieve the blankness of the walls. At the end he saw a sign, apparently too far away to read. He was panting by the time he came close enough to identify the first few letters of the alphabet, as if he were rediscovering how. It was a list of the hospital blocks, and A was Intensive Care.

He couldn't pretend not to have known as much, but mightn't it just mean that somebody cared about Gwyneth—cared enough to keep her alive? Tunstall squeezed his raw eyes shut while he breathed a plea, and opened them at once for fear of losing his sense of where he was. The sign pointed left to all the blocks, and he hurried into a corridor he couldn't have distinguished from the one he'd just left, except for the sight of a nurse wheeling a prone form on a trolley, receding so fast that the sheets flapped as if a wind had invaded the hospital. In another moment nurse and trolley vanished through a pair of doors at the end of the corridor, and at once he couldn't hear them.

Her urgency had brought him close to panic. The doors led to a walkway made of thick translucent plastic, which merged the light above the grounds into a generalised radiance like the glow of a befogged moon. The chill of the night fastened on Tunstall as he blundered through the walkway into the next block. The sign that met his eyes might have been designed for if not by someone close to blindness, but he had to strain them to distinguish that the large ill-preserved letter stencilled on both walls was E, not A at all.

Perhaps there had been a more direct route, but he mustn't think of retracing his steps; it would feel too much like giving up. He could only hasten past the side wards, glimpsing twin ranks of supine sheeted figures with a nurse on watch beyond each pair of doors, an illuminated face like a mask in some kind of shrine. He had to fend off an impression that the corridor was leading him into fog. The pallid surface in the distance was a wall, which stopped retreating once he concentrated on it, and soon he came close enough to see it wasn't even blank. There was a list of blocks, divested of one letter. The arrow sent him left again, and he did his best to run.

His haste seemed to lodge shadowy blotches where the walls met the roof. Beyond another corridor of silent twilit wards a walkway was darkened by fallen leaves, which scraped and scuttled like beetles on the plastic. Tunstall hugged himself and rubbed his shivering arms as he dashed through the passage, which felt entirely too exposed to the wind. The double doors thumped behind him like a faltering heartbeat as he saw the letter that identified the next block. For a panicky moment he feared he'd lost more than his way, and then he realised that the letter wasn't E again, even if the Bs on both walls looked as if a vandal had tried to erase them. What sense did the arrangement of the buildings make? He just had to believe he was heading for the right one, but he clamped a shaky hand over his lips so as not to call Gwyneth's name.

As he hurried down a corridor not at all unlike the ones he was trying to leave behind, a crumbling voice followed him. It was still paging Timmy Sawyer, who was apparently needed in E Block. The address system must be overdue for maintenance; the receptionist's voice was so splintered that the last words could almost have been the harsh cry of a night bird. Tunstall might have imagined the nurses in the wards took him to be responding to the summons. More likely they weren't sure what he was doing, a solitary wanderer in the hospital so late at night, although the frozen glowing faces owned up to no thoughts at all.

He was more than halfway down the corridor before the wall at the end gave up its likeness to fog. His head was aching as much as his eyes by the time the sign came into focus. It was almost the same as the previous list, though in a different order, and where could the arrow have pointed except left? An uneven section of linoleum snagged his feet as he dashed around the corner, and he supported himself on the wall. He thought he felt the chilly plaster crack, but he hadn't time to look.

The next walkway was damaged. Slits in the plastic admitted the wind, and dead leaves were crawling on the grubby floor. Grit had strayed in too, and its grinding underfoot felt like a symptom of fever. Gusts of wind sent shudders through the tunnel. They seemed more threatening than Tunstall cared to understand, so that he hurried along it fast enough to outrun his breath.

He faltered as the double doors ground shut behind him. The letter on each wall was nearly a B, though even closer to an E. Until he controlled his vision the sight put him in mind of a digital display reassembling its fragments. Identifying the letter as an F wasn't reassuring; had whoever laid out the hospital been as confused as Tunstall felt? He had to be grateful to see somebody else in the corridor.

The woman wasn't digging up the floor at the far end; she was nuzzling the wall with a vacuum cleaner. "Excuse me," Tunstall called and hurried towards her, trailing sodden gritty leaves that he hoped she wouldn't notice. "Am I right for Intensive Care?"

She turned with a finger to her lips. The gesture was more distinct than her face, which he could have imagined her holding still with the finger. She pointed left with the silent vacuum cleaner—that must be what the jerky movements meant, however much they looked like an attempt to drive a pest away. Tunstall wasn't anxious to speak again, since his shout had brought dim heads rearing up from beneath sheets beyond the doors on either side of him, though surely not in unison. Before he had a chance to overtake the thin woman she disappeared as if the machine had towed her around the corner. When he reached it she was nowhere to be seen.

He might have concluded she didn't want to be blamed for the state of the corridor. Perhaps the walls were stained just by his blotchy vision, and she couldn't do much about the incompleteness of the linoleum. He mustn't let any of this distract him; he just had to remember that Gwyneth was here in the hospital. The sign in front of him displayed another rearrangement of the letters and sent him left as usual. How often had he turned that way? Would it bring him back where he'd started from? He could only follow the arrow, not quite fast or breathlessly enough to be unable to think.

He did his best not to glance into the wards, where his glimpses of the solitary illuminated faces seemed increasingly similar. They no longer looked enshrined; they reminded him more of waxworks in a museum. The voice in the air sounded synthetic enough to belong to one if not to all. Was Timmy Sawyer needed in the hallway of E Block? Being unable to grasp the last words made Tunstall feel threatened with losing a sense. Ahead of him the double doors shook with the wind, and so did the walkway beyond them. It was quaking so violently he couldn't focus on the tunnel.

Tunstall blundered through the doors and saw there was no tunnel. Where it might have been was a cracked concrete path, enclosed by fog so thick he couldn't see the grounds. He stumbled at a run along the path, shivering as the fog seeped into him. His breaths tasted like a fever by the time he saw a pair of doors ahead. The pallid surface framing them wasn't fog, but the face of the figure beyond the small glass panels might have been. It was a blank white patch.

When he saw the eyes above the erased blotch Tunstall realised it was a surgical mask. The windows in the doors were so befogged that he could have thought a blurred face was forming from the mask rather than concealed by it. Before Tunstall could read any expression in the eyes, the surgeon darted out of sight. Was it the disappearance or the urgency that brought Tunstall to the edge of panic? He only knew he had to be quick. He was even repeating the word, which emerged as one gasp of fog after another. He used both hands to thump the doors, and they lumbered inwards.

The whitish light seemed to flare up, illuminating one more corridor. Leaves scrabbled along it like insects retreating into their nest. Only the letter on the wall should count, an A with its left leg crippled by a fall of plaster. The right-hand line appeared to be pointing to the nearest side ward, and why couldn't that be an omen? As Tunstall lurched in that direction, the voice that had followed him through the hospital reiterated its message. "Timmy Sawyer E hallway—" He didn't need to understand that—indeed, he didn't want to—or how the light had changed as the doors staggered shut. He sprinted to the entrance to the ward as if he could outdistance the voice and peered through the nearest window.

Gwyneth was in the first bed on the left. Her face was upturned on the pillow, and she looked peacefully asleep. Wires and slim tubes led from various parts of her. In the pale foggy light they put Tunstall in mind of a cobweb, and he could imagine wisps of mist floating from them. He eased the left-hand door open and advanced into the ward.

He was trying to see only Gwyneth and above all not to blink. It didn't have to matter that the message in the air was growing clearer. As he gazed at her luminous face he was able to believe that her peace was the only message for him. That wasn't quite enough, and he felt his lips part as if they were yearning for a kiss. When he spoke it felt more like a gasp, a breath he couldn't hold in any longer. "Gwyneth."

"Charlie."

He might have mistaken the sound for a whisper of dead leaves, except that her eyelids fluttered as well. He was struggling not to hear the other voice, which had grown less fragmented. He'd just remembered he could block his ears when the words came into focus. "Time he saw where he always goes… Time he saw where he always goes…" All the memories he'd succeeded in keeping at bay overwhelmed him, and he stumbled to reach for Gwyneth's hand. Before he could touch her his eyes gave way to strain, and he blinked.

In a breath he saw the light again, streaming through the broken windows and holes in the roof. It illuminated the remains of the solitary bed leaning on one splintered leg, the rusty springs strewn with fallen plaster. His entire being strove to see what had been there, but once more it was too late. He trudged out of the ward and dragged the doors at the end of the corridor open on their rusty twisted hinges. The moonlit fog was still so thick he wondered if he would be able to locate his car. He found it soon enough—it was alone in the middle of the waste ground—and drove home. He knew it was useless to loiter at or even near the hospital.

The fog stayed among the fields, allowing him to drive faster along the promenade. He parked the car and let himself into the house and plodded upstairs to sit on the bed, where he brought up Gwyneth's last text message on his phone, the goodnight she'd sent while dining with her friends. It wasn't the same as hearing her voice. How old was the message now? Not old enough for him to forget—never that—and he held onto the phone when he lay down.

He thought he hadn't slept when it rang. He clutched it and sat up on the bed, which felt too bare and wide by half. On the bedside table the photograph of him with Gwyneth in the sunlit mountains far away was waiting to be seen once more, and beyond it the curtains framed a solitary feeble midnight star. He rubbed his aching eyes to help them focus on the mobile as he thumbed the keypad. "Hello?" he said before he'd finished lifting the phone to his face.

"Forgive me, is this Charlie?"

Long ago he'd learned he had no option but to go through it all again. Perhaps this time Gwyneth would open her eyes—perhaps she would even see him. "Charles Tunstall," he had to say, "yes."

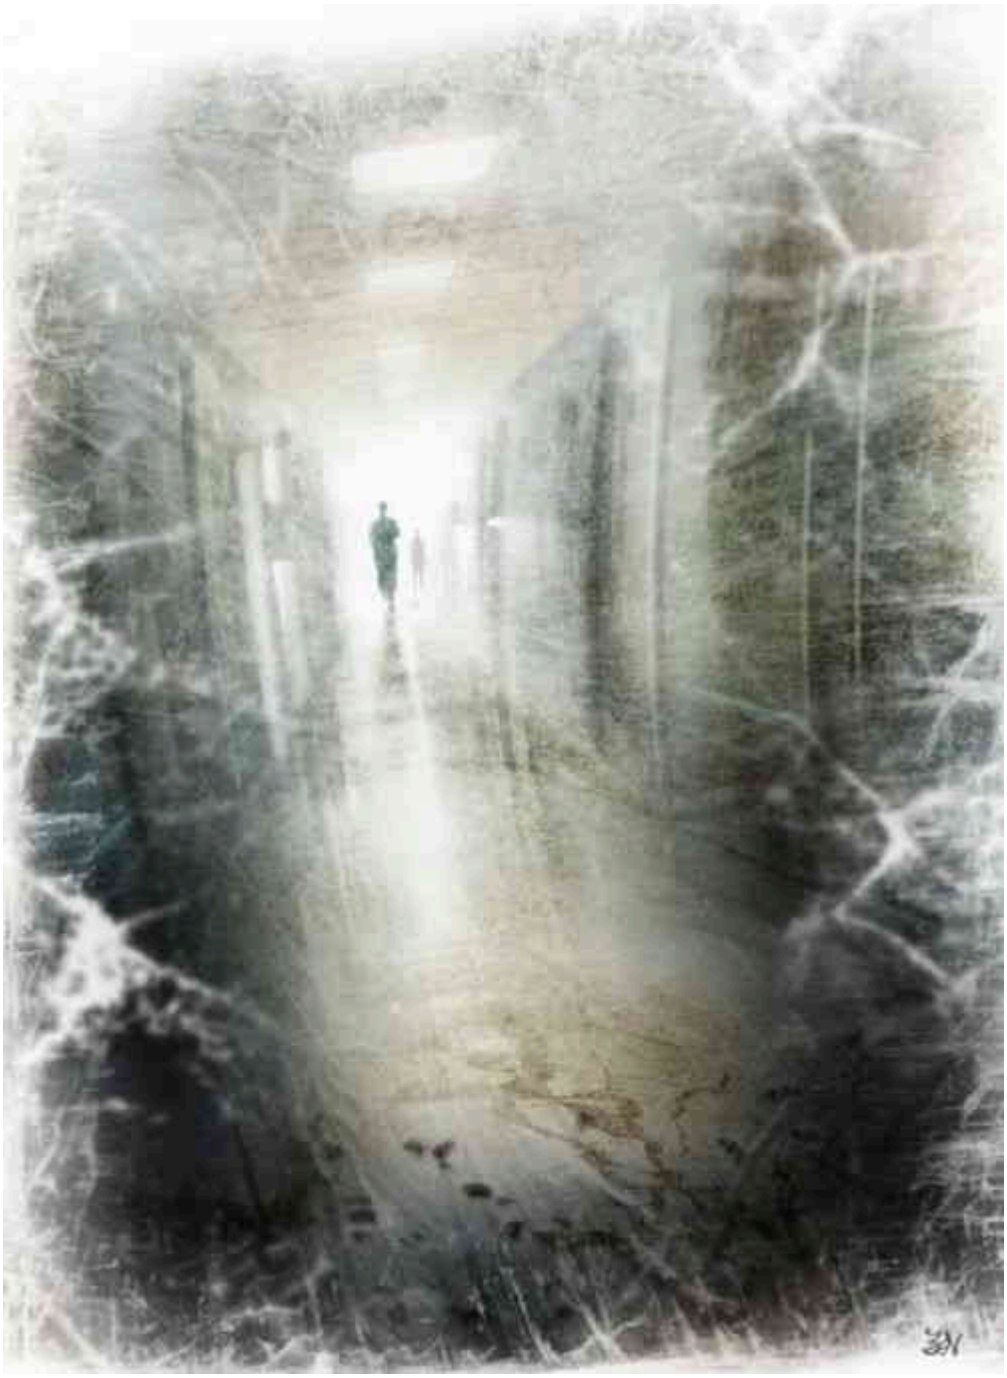

Illustration by Ben Baldwin, taken from Black Static #24, 2012.

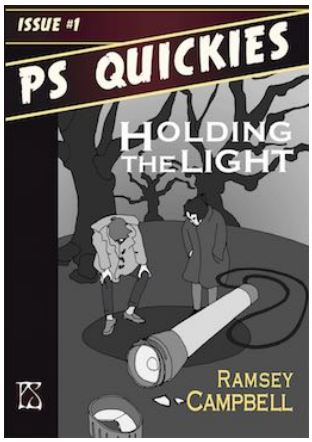
Holding The Light



"Holding the Light came out of an experience in Rhodes two years ago, at Epta Piges ('Seven Springs'). During the occupation, Italians constructed an irrigation tunnel there, 180 metres long and very much like the one that figures in my tale. It's a favourite stop on guided tours and turned up on two that we took. You won't be surprised that I was delighted to go through it both times, though others in the party stayed out. Pete Crowther had mentioned a Hallowe'en chapbook he wanted to publish, including several new tales. Sadly, the event he wanted to build it around didn't work out, but by that time I'd written my contribution, and he published it as a singleton. As soon as I went through the Epta Piges tunnel the first time I knew I had a tale for him."—Ramsey Campbell, Introduction to the story in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 23, 2012

First published as the chapbook Holding The Light, November 2011

As his cousin followed him into the Frugoplex lobby Tom saw two girls from school. Out of uniform and in startlingly short skirts they looked several years older. He hoped his leather jacket performed that trick for him, in contrast to the duffle coat Lucas was wearing. Since the girls were giggling at the cinema staff dressed as Hallowe'en characters, he let them see him laugh too. "Hey, Lezly," he said in his deepest voice. "Hey, Dianne."

"Don't come near us if you've got a cold," Lezly protested, waving a hand that was bony with rings in front of her face.

"It's just how boys his age talk," Dianne said far too much like a sympathetic adult and blinked her sparkly purple eyelids. "Who's your friend, Tom?"

"It's my cousin Lucas."

"Hey, Luke."

Lezly said it too and held out her skull-ringed hand, at which Lucas stared as if it were an inappropriate present. "He's like that," Tom mumbled but refrained from pointing at his own head. "Don't mind him."

"Maybe he doesn't want to give you his germs, Lezly." To the boys Dianne said "What are you going to see?"

"Vampire Dating Agency," Lucas said before Tom could make a choice.

"That's for kids," Lezly objected. "We're not seeing any films with them."

"We don't have to either, do we, Lucas?" Tom said in a bid to stop his face from growing hotter. "What are you two seeing?"

"Cheerleaders with Guts," Dianne said with another quick glittery blink.

"We can't," Lucas informed everyone. "Nobody under fifteen's allowed."

Tom glared at him as the girls did. At least none of the staff dealing with the noisy queues appeared to have heard the remark. Until that moment Tom had been able to prefer visiting the cinema to any of the other activities their parents had arranged for the boys over the years—begging for sweets at neighbours' houses, ducking for apples and a noseful of water, carving pumpkins when Lucas's received most of the praise despite being so grotesque only out of clumsiness. Now that the parents had reluctantly let them outgrow all this Tom seemed to be expected to take even more care of his cousin. Perhaps Lucas sensed his resentment for once, because he said "We don't have to go to a film."

"Who doesn't?" said Dianne.

Tom wanted to say her and Lezly too, but first he had to learn "Where, then?"

"The haunted place." When nobody admitted to recognising it Lucas said "Grinfields."

"Where the boy and girl killed themselves together, you mean," Lezly said.

"No, he did first," Dianne said, "and she couldn't live without him."

It was clear that Lucas wasn't interested in these details, and he barely let her finish. "My mum and dad say they did it because they watched films you aren't supposed to watch."

"My parents heard they were always shopping," Tom made haste to contribute. "Them and their families spent lots of money they didn't have and all it did was leave them thinking nothing was worth anything."

That was his father's version. Perhaps it sounded more like a gibe at the girls than he was afraid Lucas's comment had. "Why do you want us to go there, Luke?" Dianne said.

"Who's Luke?"

"I told you," Tom said in some desperation, "he's like that."

"No I'm not, I'm like Lucas."

At such times Tom understood all too well why his cousin was bullied at school. There was also the way Lucas stared at anybody unfamiliar as if they had to wait for him to make up his mind about them, and just now his pasty face—far spottier than Tom's and topped with unruly red hair—was a further drawback. Nevertheless Dianne said "Are you sure you don't want to see our film?"

She was speaking to Tom, but Lucas responded. "We can't. We've been told."

"I haven't," Tom muttered. He watched the girls join the queue for the ticket desk manned by a tastefully drooling vampire in a cloak, and then he turned on Lucas. "We need to switch our phones off. We're in the cinema."

Accuracy mattered most to Lucas. Once he'd done as he was told Tom said "Let's go, and not to the kids' film either."

A frown creased Lucas's pudgy forehead. "Which one, then?"

"None of them. We'll go where you wanted," Tom said, leading the way out into the Frugall retail park.

More vehicles than he thought he could count in a weekend were lined up beneath towering lamps as white as the moon. In that light people's faces looked as pallid as Lucas's, but took on colour once they reached the shops, half a mile of which surrounded the perimeter. As Tom came abreast of a Frugelectric store he said "We'll need a light."

Lucas peered at the lanky lamps, and yet again Tom wondered what went on inside his cousin's head. "A torch," he resented having to elucidate.

"There's one at home."

"That's too far." Before Lucas could suspect he didn't want their parents learning where the boys would be Tom said "You'll have to buy one."

He was determined his cousin would pay, not least for putting the girls off. He watched Lucas select the cheapest flashlight and load it with batteries, then drop a ten-pound note beside the till so as to avoid touching the checkout girl's hand. He made her place his change there for him to scoop up while Tom took the flashlight wrapped in a flimsy plastic bag. "That's mine. I bought it," Lucas said at once.

"You hold it then, baby." Tom stopped just short of uttering the last word, though his face was hot again. "Look after it," he said and stalked out of the shop.

They were on the far side of Frugall from their houses and the school. An alley between a Frugranary baker's and a Frugolé tapas bar led to a path around the perimeter. A twelve-foot wall behind the shops and restaurants cut off most of the light and the blurred vague clamour of the retail park. The path was deserted apart from a few misshapen skeletal loiterers nuzzling the wall or propped against the chain-link fence alongside Grinfields Woods. They were abandoned shopping trolleys, and the only sound apart from the boys' padded footsteps was the rustle of the plastic bag.

Tom thought they might have to follow the path all the way to the housing estate between Grinfields and the retail park, but soon they came to a gap in the fence. Lucas dodged through it so fast that he might have forgotten he wasn't alone. As Tom followed he saw his own shadow emerge from a block of darkness fringed with outlines of wire mesh. The elongated shadows of trees were reaching for the larger dark. By the time the boys found the official path through the woods they were almost beyond the glare from the retail park, and Lucas switched on the flashlight. "That isn't scary," he declared as Tom's shadow brandished its arms.

Tom was simply frustrated that Lucas hadn't bothered to remove the flashlight from the bag. He watched his cousin peer both ways along the dim path like a child showing how much care he took about crossing a road, and then head along the stretch that vanished into darkness. The sight of Lucas swaggering off as though he didn't care whether he was followed did away with any qualms Tom might have over scaring him more than he would like. He tramped after Lucas through the woods that looked as if the dark had formed itself into a cage, and almost collided with him as the blurred jerky light swerved off the path to flutter across the trees to the left. "What's pulling something along?" Lucas seemed to feel entitled to be told.

"It's got a rope," Tom said, but didn't want to scare Lucas too much too soon. "No, it's only water."

He'd located it in the dried-up channel out of sight below the slope beyond the trees. It must be a lingering trickle of rain, which had stopped before dark, unless it was an animal or bird among the fallen leaves. "Make your mind up," Lucas complained and swung the light back to the path.

The noise ceased as Tom tramped after him. Perhaps it had gone underground through the abandoned irrigation channel. Without warning—certainly with none from Lucas—the flashlight beam sprang off the ragged stony path and flew into the treetops. "Is it laughing at us?" Lucas said.

Tom gave the harsh shrill sound somewhere ahead time to make itself heard. "What do you think?"

"Of course it's not," Lucas said as if his cousin needed to be put right. "Birds can't laugh."

Once more Tom suspected Lucas wasn't quite as odd as he liked everyone to think, although that was odd in itself. When the darkness creaked again he said "That's not a bird, it's a tree."

Lucas might have been challenging someone by striding up the path to jab the beam at the treetops. As he disappeared over a ridge the creaking of the solitary branch fell silent. Though he'd taken the light with him, Tom wasn't about to be driven to chase it. He hadn't quite reached the top of the path when he said "No wonder aunt and uncle say you can't make any friends."

He hadn't necessarily intended his cousin to hear, but Lucas retorted "I've got one."

Tom was tempted to suggest that Lucas should have brought this unlikely person instead of him. His cousin was taking the light away as though to punish Tom for his remark. Having left the path, he halted under an outstretched branch. "You can see where they did it," he said.

The flashlight beam plunged into the earth—into a circular shaft that led down to the middle of the irrigation tunnel. At some point the entrance had been boarded over, but now the rotten wood was strewn among the trees. Tom peered into the opening, from which a rusty ladder descended into utter darkness. "You can't see if you don't take the bag off."

As darkness raced up the ladder, chasing the light out of the shaft, Lucas said "What do you think is laughing now?"

"Maybe you should go down and find out."

Another hollow liquid giggle rose out of the unlit depths, and Tom thought of convincing his cousin it wasn't water they were hearing. Lucas crumpled the bag in his hand and sent the light down the shaft again. The beam just reached the foot of the ladder, below which Tom seemed to glimpse a dim sinuous movement before Lucas snatched the beam out of the shaft and aimed it at the branch overhead. "He hung himself on that, didn't he, and then she threw herself down there."

He sounded little more than distantly interested, which wasn't enough for Tom. "Aren't you going down, then? I thought you wanted a Halloween adventure."

The glowing leafless branch went out as Lucas swung the light back to the path. "All right," he said and made for the opposite side of the ridge.

Did he really need absolute precision or just demand it? As Tom trudged after him he heard a rustling somewhere near the open shaft. "I thought you never left litter," he called. "How about that bag?"

"It's here," Lucas said and tugged it half out of his trouser pocket before stuffing it back in.

When Tom glanced behind him the Frugall floodlights glared in his eyes, and he couldn't locate what he'd heard—perhaps leaves stirring in a wind, although he hadn't felt one. Of course there must be wildlife in the woods, even if he'd yet to see any. He followed Lucas down the increasingly steep path and saw the flashlight beam snag on the curve of a stone arch protruding from the earth beside the track. It was the end of the tunnel, which had once helped irrigate the fields beyond the ridge. Now the fields were overgrown and the tunnel was barricaded, or rather it had been until somebody tore the boards down. As Lucas poked the flashlight beam into the entrance he said "Where's the bell?"

Tom thought the slow dull metallic notes came from a car radio in the distance, but said "Is it in the tunnel?"

Lucas stooped under the arch, which wasn't quite as tall as either of the boys. "Listen," he said. "That's where."

Tom heard a last reverberation as he stepped off the path. Surely it was just his cousin's gaze that made him wonder if the noise had indeed come from the tunnel, unless someone was playing a Halloween joke. Suppose the girls had followed them from the cinema and were sending the sound down from the ridge? In his hopelessly limited experience this didn't seem the kind of thing girls did, especially while keeping quiet as well. The thought of them revived his discontent, and he said "Better go and see."

Lucas advanced into the tunnel at once. His silhouette blotted out most of the way ahead, the stone floor scattered with sodden leaves, the walls and curved roof glistening with moss, a few weeds drooping out of cracks. The low passage was barely wider than his elbows as he held them at his sides —so narrow that the flashlight bumped against one wall with a soft moist thud as he turned to point the beam at Tom. "What are you doing?"

"Get that out of my face, can you?" As the light sank into the cramped space between them Tom said "I'm coming too."

"I don't want you to."

Tom backed out, almost scraping his scalp on the arch. "Now you've got what you want as usual. Just you remember you did."

"It won't be scary if we both go in." This might have been an effort to placate his cousin—as much of one as Lucas was likely to make—but Tom suspected it was just a stubborn statement of fact. "I'm not scared yet," Lucas complained. "It's Halloween."

"Want me to make sure?"

"I know it is." Before Tom could explain, if simply out of frustration, Lucas said "You've got nothing to do."

He sounded intolerably like a teacher rebuking an idle pupil. As Tom vowed to prove him wrong in ways his cousin wouldn't care for, Lucas ducked out of the tunnel and thrust the flashlight at him. "You can hold this while I'm in there."

Tom sent the beam along the tunnel. It fell short of the ladder, which was a couple of hundred yards in. Once Lucas returned to the tunnel the light wouldn't even reach past him. Tom was waiting to watch his reaction to this when Lucas said "I don't mean here."

He might have been criticising Tom's ability to understand, a notion that was close to more than Tom could take. "Where?" he demanded without at all wanting to know.

"Go up and shine it down the hole, then I can see where halfway is. Shout when you get to the hole."

"And you answer." In case this wasn't plain enough Tom added "So I can hear."

"Course I will."

Tom could have done without the haughtiness. He made off with the flashlight, swinging it from side to side of the deserted woods. As he reached the top of the path the lights above the distant retail park glared in his eyes, and he had a momentary impression that a rounded object was protruding just above the shaft at the midpoint of the tunnel. He squeezed his eyes shut, widening them as he stepped onto the ridge. Perhaps he'd seen an exposed root beyond the shaft, but he couldn't see it now. He marched to the opening and sent the beam down to the tunnel, where he seemed to glimpse movement—a dim shape like a scrawny limb or an even thinner item retreating at speed into the dark. It must have been a shadow cast by the ladder. "Come on," he called. "I'm here."

"I'm coming."

Tom was disconcerted to hear his cousin's shout resound along the tunnel while it also came from beyond the ridge. Despite straining his eyes he couldn't judge how far the flashlight beam reached; the glare from the retail park was still hindering his vision. He dodged around the shaft to turn his back on the problem, and saw that the beam of the cheap flashlight fell short of illuminating the tunnel itself. "Can you see the light?" he called.

"I see something."

Tom found this wilfully vague. "What?" he yelled.

"Must be you."

This was vaguer still, particularly for Lucas. Was he trying to unnerve his cousin? Tom peered into the shaft, waiting for Lucas to dart into view in a feeble attempt to alarm him. Or did Lucas mean to worry him by staying out of sight? Tom vowed not to call out again, but he was on the edge of yielding to the compulsion when an ill-defined figure appeared at the bottom of the shaft. He didn't really need it to turn its dim face upwards to show it was Lucas. "What am I doing now?" Tom grudged having to ask.

"Holding the light."

"I'm saying," Tom said more bitterly still, "what do you want me to do?"

"Stay there till I say," Lucas told him and stooped into the other section of the tunnel.

Tom tried to listen to his receding footsteps but soon could hear nothing at all—or rather, just the sound he'd previously ascribed to plastic. Perhaps the bag in his cousin's pocket was brushing against the wall, except that Tom seemed to hear the noise behind him. Had Lucas sneaked out of the far end of the tunnel to creep up and pounce on him? Surely his shadow would give him away, and when Tom swung around, only the trees were silhouetted against the glare from the retail park. He'd kept the flashlight beam trained down the shaft on the basis that he might have misjudged Lucas, but how long would he have to wait to hear from him? He had a sudden furious idea that, having left the tunnel, Lucas was on his way home. "Where are you now?" he shouted.

"Here," Lucas declared, appearing at the foot of the shaft.

So he'd been playing a different trick—staying out of sight until Tom grew nervous. "Finished with the light?" Tom only just bothered to ask.

"Go and meet me at the end," Lucas said before ducking into the dark.

Tom felt juvenile for using the flashlight to search among the trees around him—he wasn't the one who was meant to be scared—and switched it off as he hurried down the path. He was waiting at the mouth of the tunnel by the time his cousin emerged. Lucas looked dully untroubled, unless the darkness was obscuring his expression, and Tom wished he'd hidden long enough to make his cousin nervous. "What's it like?" he tried asking.

"Like I wasn't alone."

"You weren't."

"That's scary."

Tom thought he'd been more than sufficiently clear. He was feeling heavy with resentment when Lucas said "Now it's your turn."

As Tom switched on the flashlight, darkness shrank into the tunnel. "You can't do that," Lucas protested. "I'm supposed to go on top with it so you'll be in the dark."

Was he planning some trick of the kind Tom had spared him? When Tom hesitated while the unsteady shadows of weeds fingered the moss on the walls of the tunnel, Lucas said "I have to say what we do with it. It's mine."

Tom was so disgusted that he almost dropped the flashlight because of his haste to be rid of it. "I'll have to shout," Lucas told him. "You won't see."

He hadn't extinguished the light, which scrambled up the path ahead of him, leaving Tom to wonder if Lucas was uneasy after all. Suppose that distracted him from keeping the beam down the shaft? Once his cousin vanished over the ridge Tom peered along the tunnel, but it might as well have been stuffed with earth. He hadn't distinguished even a hint of light when Lucas called "It's waiting."

His voice was in more than one place again—somewhere down the tunnel and on the ridge as well. It occurred to Tom that he should have extracted a promise, and he cupped his hands around his mouth to yell "Say you'll wait there for me."

"That's what I'm doing."

Tom could have fancied he was hearing another voice imitate Lucas. "Say you will," he insisted, "as long as I want the light."

"I will as long as you want the light."

This had to be precise enough, and surely Lucas was incapable of acting other than he'd said he would. Wasn't his saying it in more than one voice like a double promise? Tom had no reason to hesitate, even if he wished Dianne were with him to be scared and then comforted. He wouldn't be comforting Lucas, and he ducked into the tunnel.

The darkness fastened on his eyes at once. They felt coated with it, a substance like the blackest paint. It hindered his feet too, as if they had to wade through it, shuffling forward an inch at a time, which was all he felt able to risk. He extended his arms in front of him to avoid touching the slimy walls, though he could have imagined his fingertips were about to bump into the dark. Of course there was nothing solid in front of him. Lucas hadn't switched off the flashlight and sneaked down the ladder to stand in the blackness until Tom's outstretched fingers found him. Just the same, the thought made Tom bring his hands back and lower his arms. "Are you really up there?" he shouted.

"You'll see."

His cousin's voice was somewhere ahead and above the tunnel. Otherwise the exchange didn't reassure Tom as much as he would have hoped if he'd needed reassurance. It wasn't simply that his shout had been boxed in by the walls and the roof that forced his head down; his voice had seemed muffled by some obstacle in front of him. Was he about to see it? There appeared to be a hint of pallor in the blackness, if that wasn't just an effect of straining his eyes or of hoping to locate the flashlight beam. When he edged forward the impression didn't shift, and he kept his gaze fixed on the promise of light until his foot nudged an object on the floor of the tunnel.

He heard it stir and then subside. He had no room to sidle around it, and he didn't care to turn his back. By resting his foot on it and trampling on it he deduced that it was a mass of twigs and dead leaves. He trod hard on it on his way past, and worked out that the material must have fallen down the shaft, which was just visible ahead by the light that nearly reached down to the tunnel roof. He could scarcely believe how long he'd taken to walk halfway; it felt as if the darkness had weighed down the passing of time. A few waterlogged leaves slithered underfoot as he reached the shaft and was able to raise his head. "See me?" he called.

Lucas was an indefinite silhouette against the night sky beyond the flashlight, which almost blinded Tom even though the beam on the wall opposite the ladder was so dim. "You were a long time," Lucas protested.

An acoustic quirk made versions of his voice mutter in both sections of the tunnel. Before Tom could reply, less irately than the complaint deserved, Lucas said "When you've been through the rest you have to come back this way."

That he had needn't mean Tom should. Lucas wasn't frightened yet, which was among the reasons why Tom intended to leave the tunnel by the far end so as to tiptoe up behind him. He shut his eyes to ready them for the darkness as far as he could. He hadn't opened them when Lucas enraged him by calling "Are you scared to go in?"

Tom lowered his head as if he meant to butt the dark and advanced into the tunnel. He wouldn't have believed the blackness could grow thicker, but now it didn't just smother his eyes—it filled them to the limit. He'd taken a very few steps, which felt shackled by his wariness, when his foot collided with another heap of leaves. He heard twigs if not small branches snap as he trod several times on the yielding heap, which must be almost as long as he was tall. Once he was past it the floor seemed clear, but how far did he have to shuffle to catch his first glimpse of the night outside? It couldn't be so dark out there that it was indistinguishable from the underground passage.

He was stretching his eyes wide, which only served to let more of the darkness into them, when his foot struck a hindrance more solid than leaves—an object that his groping fingers found to be as high and wide as the tunnel. The entrance was boarded up.

So Lucas hadn't just been setting out the rules of the game. Perhaps he'd believed he was making it plain that Tom couldn't leave the tunnel at this end. Tom thumped the boards with his fists and tried a few kicks as well, but the barrier didn't give. When he turned away at last he had to touch the cold fur of the wall with his knuckles to be certain he was facing down the tunnel. He shuffled forward as if he were being dragged by his bent head, and his blacked-out eyes were straining to find the light when his toe poked the mass of leaves and wood on the floor. If he was so close to the shaft, why couldn't he make out even a hint of the flashlight beam? "What are you playing at?" he shouted.

There was no response of any kind. Perhaps Lucas had decided to alarm him. He dealt the supine heap a kick, but it held more or less together. He tramped on it a number of times while edging forward. It was behind him, though not far, when something moved under his feet—a large worm, he thought, or a snake. As he stumbled clear of it he heard scattered leaves rustle with its movement, and recognised the sound he'd attributed to plastic on his way to the tunnel. He needn't think about it further—he only wanted to reach the light. That still wasn't visible, and he wasn't eager to shout into the dark again, surely just because Lucas might think he was scared. He had no idea how many timid paces he'd taken before he was able to lift his head.

For a moment this felt like nothing but relief, and then he saw that the top of the shaft was deserted. "Lucas," he yelled. "Lucas." He was trying just to feel furious, but the repetition unnerved him—it seemed too close to doing his best to ensure that only his cousin would respond. He was about to call once more when Lucas appeared above him, at least fifty feet away, and sent the flashlight beam down the highest rungs of the ladder. Tom would have shouted at him except for being assailed by a sudden unwelcome thought. He knew why he'd seemed to take too long to return to the shaft: because the supine mass on which he'd trodden was further from it than before. While he'd been trying to find his way out, it had crawled after him in the dark.

He twisted around to peer behind him, but the blackness was impenetrable. Although he was afraid to see, not seeing might be worse. "Lucas," he blurted, and then forced himself to raise his voice. "Send the light down here."

The response was a noise very much like one he'd previously heard—a clang like the note of a dull bell. Now he realised it had been the sound of an object swinging against the ladder, repeatedly colliding with the upper rungs. This time the flashlight was making the noise, and struck another rung as it plummeted down the shaft. The lens smashed on the tunnel floor, and the light went out at once.

"What have you done now," Tom almost screamed, "you stupid useless retard?" He dropped into a crouch that felt as if a pain in his guts had doubled him over. His fingers groped over the cold wet stone and eventually closed around the flashlight. He pushed the switch back and forth, but the bulb must be broken too. When he jerked his head back to yell at Lucas he saw that the dim round hole at the top of the shaft was empty once more. He staggered to his feet and threw out a hand to help him keep his balance, and clutched an object that was dangling beside him in the tunnel. It was the rope he'd wanted to think was a worm or a snake.

A mindless panic made him haul at the bedraggled rope, and an object nuzzled the back of his hand. It was a face, though not much of one, and as he recoiled with a cry he felt it sag away from the bone. He was backing away so fast he almost overbalanced when he heard sounds in the other section of the tunnel. Between him and the way out, someone was running through the absolute blackness as if they had no need of light—as if they welcomed its absence.

For a moment that seemed endless Tom felt the darkness claim him, and then he shied the flashlight in the direction of the sodden flopping footsteps. He clutched at the ladder and hauled himself desperately upwards. He mustn't think about climbing towards the outstretched branch that had creaked as the boys made for the ridge. Perhaps nobody had killed themselves—perhaps that was just a story made up by adults to scare children away from any danger. He could no longer hear the loose footsteps for all the noise he was making on the shaky ladder. Lucas must be waiting by the shaft—he'd promised to—and of course he'd turned the light away when he'd heard Tom thumping the boards that blocked the tunnel. The thought gave Tom the chance to realise who the friend Lucas said he had must be. "I'm still your friend," he called, surely not too late, as he clambered up the rusty ladder. He didn't dare to look down, and he was just a few rungs from the top when he lost his footing. His foot flailed in the air and then trod on the head of whatever was climbing after him.

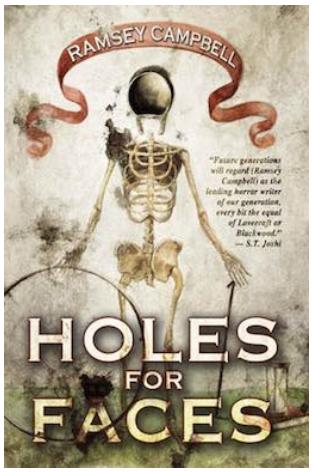
It moved under his foot—moved more than any scalp ought to be able—as he kicked it away. He was terrified what else he might tread on, but he only found the rung again. His head was nearly level with the exit from the shaft before a pulpy grasp closed around his ankle. However soft they were, the swollen fingers felt capable of dragging him down into the blackness to share it with its residents. He thrust his free hand above the shaft in a desperate appeal. Surely Lucas hadn't felt so insulted that he'd abandoned his cousin—surely only he was out there. "Get hold of me," Tom pleaded, and at once he had his answer.

Behind The Doors



Written In: 2011
First published in Holes For Faces, August 2013

As Adam ran to the school gates he cried "Look what the teacher gave me, grandad."

It was an Advent calendar, too large to fit in his satchel. Each of the little cardboard doors had the same jolly bearded countenance, with a bigger one for Christmas Day. "Well," Summers said as the mid-December air turned his breath pale, "that's a bit late."

The ten-year-old's small plump face flushed while his eyes grew wider and moister. "He gave me it because I did best in the class."

"Then hurrah for you, Adam." Summers would have ruffled the boy's hair if it hadn't been too clipped to respond. "Don't scoff all the chocolates you should have had already," he said as Adam poked at a door with an inky finger. "We don't want your mum and dad telling me off for letting you spoil your dinner."

"I was going to give you one," the boy protested, shoving the calendar under one arm before he tramped across the road.

Summers kept a sigh to himself as he followed Adam into the park opposite Park Junior. He didn't want to upset the boy, especially when he recalled how sensitive he'd been at Adam's age. He caught up with him on the gravel path along an avenue of leafless trees, above which the sky resembled an untrodden snowfield. "How did you earn the prize, Adam?"

"The maths teacher says I should be called Add 'Em."

"Ha," said Summers. "Who's the witty teacher?"

"Mr Smart," Adam said and glanced back to see why Summers had fallen behind. "He's come to our school because Miss Logan's having a baby."

Summers overtook him beside the playground, a rubbery expanse where swings hung inert above abandoned cans of lager. "What else can you tell me about him?"

“I expect he was teaching when you were at school.” With some pride in the observation Adam said “He must be as older than you than I’m old.”

“Does he always give his pupils calendars like that?”

“I don’t know. Shall I ask him?”

“No, don’t do that. Don’t mention me, that’s to say anything I said.”

“Didn’t you ever get one?”

Summers attempted to swallow a sour stale taste. “Not that I could tell you.”

Adam considered this while his expression grew more sympathetic, and then he said “You can have mine if you like.”

Summers was touched by the offer but disconcerted by the prospect. “I tell you what,” he said, “you give me that and I’ll buy you another.”

He was glad for Adam as soon as the boy handed him the calendar. Even if only the winter day made the cardboard feel cold and damp, the corners were scuffed and the colours looked faded. The jovial faces were almost as white as their beards, and the floppy red hats had turned so brown that they resembled mounds of earth perched on the heads. Summers thrust the calendar under his arm to avoid handling it further. “Let’s get you home,” he said.

Beyond a bowling green torn up by bicycles a Frugo Corner supermarket had replaced a small parade of shops that used to face the park. As the automatic doors let out the thin strains of a carol from the overhead loudspeakers, Summers wondered if it was too late for Advent calendars to be on sale. He couldn’t bring the date to mind, and trying to add up the spent days of December made his head feel raw. But there were calendars beside the tills, and Adam chose one swarming with creatures from outer space, though Summers was unclear what this had to do with Christmas.

His old house was half a mile away across the suburb. Along the wide quiet streets the trees looked frozen to the sky. He saw Adam to the antique door that Paul and Tina had installed within their stained-glass wrought-iron porch. “Will you be all right now?”

The boy gave the elderly formula an old-fashioned look. “I always am,” he reminded Summers and slipped his key into the lock.

The streets narrowed as Summers made his way home. The houses grew shabbier and their doorbells multiplied, while the gardens were occupied by seedy cars and parts of cars. Each floor of the concrete block where he lived was six apartments long, with a view of an identical block. Once Elaine left him he'd found the house too large, and might have given it to his son even if Paul hadn't moved in with a partner.

The apartment was something like halfway along the middle balcony, two doors distant from the only other number with a tail, but Summers knew it by the green door between the red pair. He marched down the hall to the kitchen, where he stopped short of the bin. If the sweets in the calendar weren't past their edible date, why shouldn't he finish them off?

He stood it on the mantelpiece in the main room, beneath Christmas cards pinned to the nondescript wallpaper. As he searched for the first cardboard door he heard an object shift within the calendar, a sound emphasised by the silence of the hi-fi and the television and the empty suite that faced them. At last he located the door in the midst of the haphazard dates and pried it open with a fingernail. The dark chocolate behind the door was shaped like the number. "One up for me," he declared, biting it in half.

The sweet wasn't stale after all. He levered the second door open as soon as he found it, remarking "Two's not for you" as he put the number in his mouth. How many did he mean to see off? He ought to heed the warning he'd given Adam about dinner. "Three's a crowd," he commented once he managed to locate the number. That had certainly felt like the case when, having decided that Paul was old enough for her to own up, Elaine had told Summers about the other man. The taste in his mouth was growing bitter yet sickly as well, and any more of it might put him off his dinner. Perhaps it already had, but since taking early retirement he'd gained weight that he could do with losing. There was no point in eating much when he was by himself.

For a while he watched the teachers' channel, which seemed to be the only sign of intelligence on television. An hour or two of folk music on the hi-fi with the sound turned low out of consideration for the neighbours left him readier for bed. He brushed his teeth until the only flavour in his mouth was toothpaste, and then he did his best to be amused by having to count a multitude of Santas in the dark before he could fall asleep.

At least his skull wasn't crawling with thoughts of tomorrow's lessons and more lessons yet to plan, and tests to set, and conflicts to resolve or at any rate address, both among the children and within themselves. However badly he might sleep, he no longer had to set the alarm clock, never mind lying awake for hours before it went off or struggling to doze until it did. Since it was Friday he needn't bother with breakfast; he would be meeting some of his old colleagues from Dockside Primary—and then he realised he'd lost count of the weeks. His friends would be preparing for tonight's Christmas play at the school, and they'd cancelled their usual Friday lunch.

He could still do without breakfast, given the stale sweetish taste in his mouth. He brushed his teeth at length and used mouthwash before swallowing his various pills. Once he was dressed heavily enough to switch off the heating he wandered into the living room to feed himself today's date from the Advent calendar. When at last he put his finger on the eighteenth he felt he'd earned a walk in the park.

In spring he'd liked to take his classes to the one near Dockside Primary—to imagine that their minds were budding like the trees. That was before teaching had turned into a business of filling in forms and conforming to prescribed notions as narrow as the boxes on the documents. Now he could think that the children in the schoolyard of Park Junior were caged not just by the railings but by the educational system. He couldn't see Adam, but if he ventured closer the boy might be embarrassed by his presence. What was Summers doing there at all? The children's uninhibited shouts must prove that Smart was nowhere near.

Summers watched the school until he saw teachers trooping back from lunch, but none of them looked familiar. Once the yard was empty he stood up from the bench. Ambling around the park used up some time, and then he strolled to the Dockside library, where he might have found work if the job had involved fewer numbers. People even older than he was or just as unemployed were reading the papers, and he had to content himself with a tabloid. Perhaps the prose as terse as the bitten-off headlines was all that some people could read. That was a failure of education, like the young and even younger criminals who figured in many of the reports. The paper took him a very few minutes to read, and then he hurried back to the school. He wanted to be there before anyone emerged.

Some teachers did in the midst of the flood of children, but he recognised none of them, and Adam was impatient to question him. “How many did you have?”

Summers was thrown by the irrational notion that it could have been a problem set by Smart. “Not as many as you, I expect,” he retorted.

“I just had one and then we had some after dinner.”

“Good boy.” Summers felt a little sly for adding “Did your teacher say anything about it?”

“He wanted me to add up all the days till today in my head.”

“Just this month, you mean. And did you?”

“I got it right. He said everyone should be like me.”

“It wouldn’t be much of a world if we were all the same, do you think?” Summers sensed that the boy had more to tell. “Is that all he did?”

“Jimmy was next to top in class but he got the answer wrong.”

“What happened, Adam?”

“Mr Smart gave him a calendar as well but now Jimmy has to give it back.”

“I knew he couldn’t change. He’s the shit he always was.”

Summers had done his best to lower his voice, but Adam giggled with delight. “What did you say, grandad?”

“You didn’t hear it, and don’t tell your parents, all right? There’s no need for language like that.”

“I don’t mind. Some of the boys in my class say worse, and the girls.”

“Then they shouldn’t, even about—” Although Summers had already said too much, his nerves were prompting him. “Just so long as your teacher never tries anything like that with you,” he said. “He’ll have me to deal with. I’ve got the calendar.”

“He won’t, grandad. He says he wishes all the summers were like me.”

Summers recalled Smart’s jokes about his name, but they’d been vicious. “So long as you are, Adam,” he said, and nothing more until they reached the house. “I’ll see you all tomorrow,” he said, which meant once a week.

He brought dinner home from the Donner Burger Pizzeria, and ate nearly half of the fish and some of the chips before thoughts of Smart stole his appetite. He'd prove he deserved to have the prize. He cleared the kitchen table and laid the calendar face up on it. The open doors stood more or less erect, and he totted up their numbers while he looked for the fourth. There it eventually was, and he rewarded himself with the contents as he added to the total in his head and carried on the search. Ten became fifteen, and he swallowed to make room for the five in his mouth. He needn't eat any more chocolates; he certainly shouldn't see off however many led to today's, even if it would feel like saving Adam from any reason to be grateful to the teacher. Twenty-what, twenty-one, twenty-more… At the eighth he lost count and had to start again. The relentless glare of the fluorescent tube overhead intensified his sense of sitting an examination, but it was only a mock one. One, three, six, ten… This time he progressed as far as the eleventh, and then searching through the numerical maze drove the total out of his head. He did his best to add up the numbers without looking for them, but he'd tallied fewer than many when he found he had to see them. He tried saying them aloud as he found them and repeating the latest total over and over while he searched for the next number, though he had to keep raising his voice to hold the count in his head. At last he arrived at the date and shouted the total, not loud enough to bother the neighbours, he hoped. He was about to feed himself one more sweet when he wondered if he'd arrived at the right answer.

He added all the numbers up again, and the total was even louder than the process. It was a shout of frustration, because the amount was twenty-two less than his previous answer, which couldn't even mean he'd missed a number out. He tried another count, though his throat was raw with shouting before he came to the end. Figuring out the difference aggravated the headache that was already making his vision throb. The total was nineteen more than the last one, which meant it was three less than he'd added up in the first place, but why did he need to know any of this? His head felt as if it was hatching numbers, a sensation that exacerbated a greasy sweetish sickness in his mouth. He stumbled to the bathroom to gulp water and splash some on his face. When none of this seemed to help he groped his way into the bedroom, but his thoughts came to bed with him. The year Smart had taken him for mathematics had been one of the worst of his life.

“I’m here to make you smart like me,” the teacher had informed the class. “If I don’t do it one way I’ll do it another.” With his plump petulant constantly flushed face he’d resembled an overgrown schoolboy, and he’d revealed a schoolboy’s ingenuity at inventing tortures, tweaking a tuft of hair at the nape of the neck to lift his victim on tiptoe and hold them there until he’d delivered a lecture to them or about them. He’d called his favourite victim Summer because, he’d said in anything but praise, the boy was so singular. Before long Summers had spent every school night lying awake in terror of the next day, but he’d been too ashamed to tell his parents and afraid that any intervention would only make the situation worse. He’d lost count of how often he’d been singled out before the first of December, when Smart asked him to add up the days of the month.

Everyone had found his bewilderment hilarious. He’d had to risk answering at last, and Smart had given him a round of dry applause. When he’d produced an advent calendar from his briefcase Summers had felt encouraged until he was called to the front of the class to find the date. Long before he did, the teacher was declaring “Summer means to keep us all here till next summer.” After that every mathematics lesson began with Summers on his feet to announce the total to date. He’d succeeded for over a week, having lost even more sleep to be sure of the answers, but he’d gone wrong on the ninth and on every school day for the rest of December. He’d still had to find the day’s sweet as he stood on tiptoe, raised ever higher by the agonising drag at his neck, and then he’d had to drop the chocolate into the bin.

His anger at the memory kept him awake. Counting Father Christmases no longer helped, and he tried adding up punches to Smart’s cruel smug face. That was satisfying enough to let Summers doze, only to waken in a rage, having realised that he didn’t need to find the numbers on the calendar to count them. He turned it on its face and listed all the dates in a column on a pad—if he hadn’t felt that mobile phones involved too many numbers he would have had a calculator to use now. He tapped each date with the pen as he picked his way down the column. A smell of paint threatened to revive his headache, but eventually he had a number to write at the foot of the last row and another to add at the top of the next one. At last he had the full amount, and muttered something like a prayer before adding up the dates again. He did the sum a third time to be certain, and then he rewarded himself with a bath. Three times in a row he’d arrived at the same answer.

He oughtn't to have tried to prove he could repeat the calculation in his head. By the time he succeeded, the water was too cold to stay in. He meant only to glance at the bedside clock to see how soon he ought to leave for Paul's and Tina's, but he was already late. He almost snagged the padding of his jacket with the zip as he hurried out, to be hindered by tins of paint on the balcony. His left-hand neighbour's door had turned green. "Just brightening the place up for you," the overalled workman said, sounding rather too much like a nurse in a sickroom.

Summers had scarcely rung the bell in the wrought-iron porch when Adam ran to open the door. "I said grandad said he was coming."

Paul emerged in a chef's apron from the kitchen as Tina appeared from the dining-room with an electric corkscrew. "I didn't mean to keep you waiting," Summers said.

"Don't give it a thought." To his wife Paul said "I told you he'd never mistake the date."

"He's just being silly, Teddy," Tina assured Summers, which only made him wonder what else she'd said about him. "Take your grandfather's coat, Adam," she said and blinked at Summers. "Haven't you been well?"

"Perfectly," Summers said, feeling too defensive to be truthful. "What makes you ask?"

"You look as if you could do with feeding," Paul said.

"You can have one of my chocolates if you like," said Adam.

"I hope you thanked grandpa for the calendar," Paul said. "I never had one at your age."

"I gave grandad one as well."

"Poor mite," Tina said to Paul, and less satirically "That was kind of you, Adam."

"He gave me mine so he could have the one the teacher gave me."

"I don't think I understand."

She was gazing at Paul, but Summers felt interrogated. "Perhaps we could discuss it later," he said.

"Adam, you can set the table," Tina said as if it were a treat, and gestured the adults into the lounge. Once the door was shut she said "What's the situation?”

“I shouldn’t really think there is one,” Summers tried saying.

“It sounds like one to us,” Tina said without glancing at Paul. “Why did you want Adam’s present?”

“I just took it off him because it looked a bit ancient. Exactly like his grandfather, you could say.”

“You mean you binned it.”

Summers might have said so, but suppose Adam learned of it? “I didn’t do that, no. I’ve still got most of it.”

“Most,” Paul said like some kind of rebuke.

“I ate a few chocolates.” Summers felt driven to come up with the number. “Five of them,” he said with an effort. “I’m sure they’re nowhere near as good as the ones I gave Adam.”

“They can’t be so bad,” Tina said, “if you saw five of them off.”

“All right, it wasn’t only that. I just didn’t want Adam taking anything from that man.”

“Which man?” Tina demanded as Paul said even more sharply “Why?”

“The maths man. I hope he won’t be there much longer. Smart,” Summers made himself add and wiped his lips. “I wouldn’t trust him with a dog, never mind children.”

“What are you saying?” Tina cried as Paul opened his mouth.

“I had him for a year at Adam’s age. It felt like the rest of my life.” Summers saw he had to be specific so that they wouldn’t imagine worse. “He loved hurting people,” he said.

“He’d never get away with that these days at school,” Paul protested.

“There are more ways than physical. Let’s just hope Adam stays his favourite.”

Tina gave Summers a long look before enquiring “Have you said any of this to Adam?”

“I wouldn’t put him under any pressure, but I do think you should keep a close eye on the situation.”

“I thought you said there wasn’t one,” Tina said and opened the door to the hall. “We’ll be discussing it further.”

Summers gathered that he wouldn’t be involved, and couldn’t argue while Adam might hear. He offered to help but was sent into the dining-room, where Tina served him a glass of wine while his son and grandson brought in dinner. He saw they meant to make him feel at home, but every Saturday he felt as if he’d returned to find the house almost wholly unfamiliar, scattered with a few token items to remind him he’d once lived there—mostly photographs with Elaine in them. At least he could enthuse about Paul’s casserole, but this gave Adam an excuse to ask “Do you know what it’s called, grandad?”

“Adam,” his mother warned him.

“It’s not called Adam.” Perhaps the boy was misbehaving because he’d been excluded from the conversation in the lounge. “It’s cock off, Ann,” he said.

“That’s very rude,” Tina said, “and not at all clever.”

“Maybe it’s cocker fan.”

“That’s rude too.” Apparently in case it wasn’t, Tina insisted “And silly as well.”

“Then I expect it’s cock—”

“Now, Adam, you’ve already impressed us with your schoolwork,” Summers said as he thought a grandparent should. “You’re an example to us all. You’re even one to me.”

“How am I, grandad?”

“I’ve been doing some sums of my own. I can tell you what the month adds up to so far.” When nobody asked for the answer Summers felt not much better than distrusted, but he’d repeated the amount to himself all the way to the house. “One hundred and eighty-one,” he said with some defiance.

Adam squeezed his eyes shut for a moment. “No it isn’t, grandad.”

“I’m sure it is, you know.” On the way to growing desperate Summers said “Hang on, I’ve left today out, haven’t I?”

“That’s not it, grandad. One hundred and ninety, you should have said.”

“I don’t think that can be right,” Summers said to the boy’s parents as well. “That’s ten times whatever it’s ten times, nineteen, isn’t it, of course.”

“I should have thought the last thing you’d want to do,” Tina said, “is undermine his confidence.”

“He’s undermining mine,” Summers complained, but not aloud. He was silent while he tried to make the days add up to Adam’s total. They either fell short or overshot it, and the need to carry on some sort of conversation didn’t help, any more than the drinks during and after the meal did.

The streets were full of numbers—on the doors of houses and the gates, on the front and back of every car and, if they were for sale, in their windows too. There were just three digits to each registration plate, and he tried to add up each group as it came in sight. He was absurdly grateful to reach home, although the orange lights on the balcony had turned his door and its neighbours identically black. “Nine,” he repeated, “nine, nine,” and felt as if he were calling for aid by the time he managed to identify the door.

The Advent calendar was still lying on its numbers, and he hoped that would keep them out of his head—but they were only waiting for him to try to sleep, and started awake whenever he did. They got out of bed with him in the morning and followed him into the bath. Couldn’t he just add today to Adam’s total? That seemed too much like copying an answer in an examination, and in any case he wanted to learn how Adam had arrived at the result. When it continued to elude him he floundered out of the bath.

He did his best to linger over dressing, then listed all the numbers on a new sheet of the pad, pronouncing them aloud to make certain he missed none. Today’s date could be added once he’d written down the total. He poked each number with the ballpoint as the amount swelled in his head, only for the pen to hover above the space beneath the line he’d drawn at the foot of the column. He went down the list of figures again and again, jabbing at them until they looked as though they’d contracted a disease. He announced every amount on the way to the total—he might almost have been uttering some kind of Sunday prayer—but none of this was much use. One hundred and seventy-nine, one hundred and ninety-three, one hundred and eighty-seven… He hadn’t hit upon the same amount twice, let alone the one Adam had told him, when somebody rang the raucous doorbell.

He thought they might have come to complain about his noise, especially once he noticed it was dark. He couldn’t leave the table until the sum was done. “One hundred and ninety,” he said, but that wasn’t the whole of the total. “Seven,” he yelled in a rage, “one hundred and ninety-seven,” and shoved back his chair to tramp along the hall.

He was preparing to apologise, if hardly to explain, but Tina was outside. “Well, this is a surprise,” he said. “Come in.”

“I won’t, thanks, Teddy. I just came to tell you—” With a frown that Summers felt was aimed to some extent at him, she turned to say “Adam, I told you to wait in the car.”

“I wanted to say goodbye to grandad.”

“Why,” Summers said in bewilderment, “where’s anybody going?”

“Adam will be going home with a friend next week.” Apparently in recompense, Tina added “You’ll still be coming to us for Christmas.”

“You mean I’m not wanted for picking up Adam from school.”

“I’ve explained the situation.”

As Summers managed not to retort that he suspected the opposite, Adam said “Grandad, did you go to school when you were a baby?”

“I wasn’t quite that young. Why do you ask?”

“Grandma said you were a baby when Mr Smart had you at school.”

Elaine had been in the same class—Summers used to thank their schooldays for bringing them together. Now he was almost too enraged to ask “What else did she say about me?”

“We won’t talk about it now if you don’t mind,” Tina said, “and I hope it won’t spoil Christmas either. Just say goodbye to your grandfather till then, Adam.”

“Bye, grandad,” the boy said. “You got something nice from Mr Smart, didn’t you? All the chocolates.”

“I won’t argue,” Summers said and watched Tina shoo Adam back to the car. When he returned to the kitchen the clamour of numbers and emotions in his head robbed him of the ability to think. Turning the calendar over didn’t help, especially since every open door had been flattened shut. He stared at however many identical idiotically grinning faces there were, and the pad swarming with diseased amounts, and all at once his mind seemed to clear. Had Tina freed him? Now that he wouldn't be associated with Adam, surely he could deal with the teacher.

He didn't feel beset by numbers once he went to bed. He slept, and in the morning he was able to ignore the calculations on the pad. He listened to symphonies on the radio until it was time to head for Park Junior, and was in a shelter with a view of the school several minutes before the last bell. When the children streamed out under the grey sky, the explosion of colours and chatter felt like a promise of spring. He was cut off from it, skulking in a corner so that Adam wouldn't notice him. Soon he saw his grandson with another boy, and they set about kicking a ball as they followed a young woman into the park.

As Summers turned his face to the wall to make sure he wasn't recognised, he felt like a schoolboy sent to stand in the corner. Surely Adam hadn't looked happier than he did when his grandfather met him. As soon as the thumps of the football passed the shelter Summers peered towards the school. Suppose the teacher had sneaked away unobserved? Summers hurried to the railings opposite the school but could see nobody he knew. The doors let out some teachers and then even more he didn't recognise, and he was clenching his shaky fists in frustration by the time a man emerged into the deserted schoolyard.

He was thin and bent, and as grey as the sky—his suit, his thinning hair, the smoke of the cigarette he lit before stalking to the gates. For a moment Summers wondered if the teacher was too old to bother with—even old enough to be given some grudging respect - and then he saw that Smart had become the vicious old man he'd resembled forty years ago. Any hesitation felt too much like fear, and he barely managed to unclench his fists as he strode out of the park. "Mr Smart," he said in triumph. "Can I ask you a question?"

The teacher stared at him with no more interest than emotion. "Are you a parent?"

"That and a lot more." Summers was determined to relish the confrontation. "Can you tell me what December adds up to so far?" he said.

"Are you asking for one of my pupils?"

"No, I'm speaking for myself. I've learned to do that." Summers struggled to contain his rage as he enquired "Can you do it in your head?"

"Quite obviously I can." Smart took a measured puff at the cigarette and exhaled smoke, disturbing a stained hair in his left nostril. "It's two hundred and thirty-one," he said, "if that's of any consequence to you."

"Not so sure of yourself for a bit there, were you? That's a taste of what it feels like."

"I fear you have the advantage of me," Smart said and made to step around him.

"You bet I have. It's taken long enough but it was worth the wait." Summers sidestepped to block his way. "Don't you know me yet?" he demanded. "Tortured so many youngsters you've lost count, have you?"

"What on earth do you imagine you're referring to?" Smart narrowed his already pinched eyes at a clatter of cans in the park, where Summers had seen teenagers drinking lager on the swings. "That's what comes of undermining discipline in school," Smart said. "They'd never behave like that if we were still allowed to touch them."

"It's your sort who undermined it. Made everyone who suffered from the likes of you want to make sure nobody ever does again. It's your fault it's so hard to keep discipline now. It's swine like you that lost teachers their respect."

Smart lifted the cigarette towards his face but seemed uncertain where his mouth was. "Did I have you at school?"

"Recognised one of your victims at last, have you? One of the ones you could touch. Do you dream about touching children, you filthy shit? I've often thought that's what your sort wanted to get up to. You took out on children because they made you want to fiddle with them. I bet having them at your mercy worked you up as well." Was Smart's face turning grey just with the winter twilight? "Just remember I know where you are now," Summers murmured. "If I even think you're mistreating anyone I'll make it my business to lose you your job. What are you going to do with your fag? Thinking of using it on me, are you? Just try and I'll stick it somewhere that'll make you scream."

Smart's mouth had begun to work soundlessly, and Summers was reminded of a masticating animal. The cigarette looked close to dropping from the man's fingers, which were shaking the ash loose. Had Summers gone too far? Not unless Smart could identify him, and surely the man would have done so aloud. “Have the Christmas you deserve,” Summers told him and turned away from him.

When he glanced back from the park he saw the teacher standing just where he’d left him. Smart raised his hand as though bidding him some kind of farewell, but he was finding his mouth with the cigarette. “Who’s the baby now?” Summers muttered. “Go on, suck your dummy. Suck yourself to death.”

He felt exhilarated as a schoolboy who’d got away with a prank. He might almost have boasted to the teenage drinkers on the swings. If he had any doubts about how he’d spoken to the teacher, they left him as soon as he saw his old house. It was Smart’s fault that he wasn’t trusted to bring Adam home, and when he reached the apartment block he might have thought the teacher had played another trick. The glare of the declining sun showed him that both doors flanking his had turned green, so that every door on the balcony was the same colour.

“It’s nine, you swine,” he said, he hoped not too loud, and let himself in once he was sure of the number on the door. Smart couldn’t undermine his confidence any longer, and so he tore the calculations off the pad and flung the spotty wad of paper in the bin. The calendar was a trophy, all the more so since Smart didn’t know he had it. He microwaved a cottage pie and a packet of vegetables, and gobbled the lot like a growing boy. He could have thought he was growing up at last, having dealt with the teacher.

How many doors had he already opened on the calendar? He wasn’t going to reopen them; taking chocolates at random was one more way to taunt the teacher. “Unlucky for you,” he mumbled as he crunched the thirteenth sweet, and “That’s how old you like them, is it?” on prising open the tenth door. He might have finished all the chocolates except for not wanting to make himself sick. The best celebration would be a good night’s sleep.

At first he didn’t understand why it kept being interrupted. Whenever he jerked awake he felt as if he’d heard a sound, unless he’d had a thought. He stayed in bed late; he couldn’t be seen with Adam at the school in case Smart took some revenge. What if he’d simply made the teacher even more vindictive? Suppose Smart had recognised him after all and meant to take it out on Adam? A sour stale taste urged Summers to the bathroom. Water didn’t rid him of the taste, and he stumbled to the kitchen, only to falter in the doorway. More compartments than he’d opened on the calendar last night stood open now—six doors, no, seven. Those that had reopened were the five he'd previously emptied. With its upright tabs the calendar resembled a miniature graveyard.

"I wish it was yours, you swine," Summers muttered. He was growing more anxious, and once he was dressed he headed for Park Junior. Soon he saw Adam, though not soon enough for his nerves. The boy was chasing other boys in the schoolyard and being chased, and looked entirely carefree, but had he encountered Smart yet? For a moment Summers had the irrational notion that the teacher was not merely hiding like himself but skulking at his back. There was nothing in the corner of the shelter except a scattering of cigarette butts on the floor and on the end of the bench.

Once the schoolyard was deserted Summers lingered in the shelter, listening for Smart's cold high voice—straining his ears so hard that he thought he heard it amid the scrape of windblown leaves on gravel. The idea that Smart was still at large in the school made him want to storm into the school and report the swine to the headmistress—to say whatever would get rid of him. To overcome the compulsion he had to retreat out of sight of the school. Long before the final bell he was back in the shelter. He hadn't counted the cigarette ends, and so he couldn't tell if they'd multiplied or even whether they'd been rearranged like an aid to a child's arithmetic. He spied on the schoolyard until he saw Adam, who looked happier than ever. Summers hid his face in the corner while the boys and their football clamoured past, and then he turned back to the school. He watched until the doors finished swinging at last, but there was no sign of Smart in the secretive dusk.

Had he been moved to another school? "So long as you're safe, Adam," Summers murmured, but the comment seemed to sum up how little he'd achieved. He was so preoccupied that he nearly tried to let himself into the wrong flat. Of course the number on the door was upside down. He shut his door and tramped along the hall to stare at the advent calendar as if it might inspire him. The shadows of the cardboard markers appeared to deepen the empty compartments, and he was seeing them as trenches when the doorbell rang.

Paul's expression was oddly constrained. "Well, you'll be pleased," he said.

"You're trusting me with Adam again."

Paul took a breath but didn't speak at once. "The teacher you had trouble with," he said, "you can forget about him."

"Why would I want to do that?"

"He's no longer with us." Since Summers didn't react Paul added "He's dead."

"Good heavens," Summers said, although he hoped those weren't involved. "When did that come about?"

"He had some kind of stroke when he was driving home yesterday. People saw him lose control and his car went into the front of a bus."

"That's unexpected." Summers did his best to control his face but thought it prudent to admit "I can't say I'm too distressed."

"I wasn't expecting you to be."

"So I'll be collecting Adam from school tomorrow, yes?"

Paul made another breath apparent on the way to saying "Let's leave it for this week, shall we? We'll sort it out after Christmas."

"Is it you who doesn't want me looking after him?" When Paul was silent Summers said "I didn't know I'd raised you not to stand up for yourself."

His son paused but said "Mum makes it sound as if you didn't for yourself at school."

"Then she'd better know I've changed. Just hope you never find out how much, like—" Summers' rage was close to robbing him of discretion. "Go home to your family. I'll leave you all alone till Christmas," he said and shut the door.

Any qualms he might have suffered over causing Smart's demise were swallowed by his fury with Elaine and Tina and, yes, Paul. He stalked into the kitchen to bare his teeth at the calendar. "I wish I'd been there," he said in a voice that wasn't far from Smart's. "Did you count the seconds when you saw what was coming? It'd just about sum you up." Talking wasn't enough, and he poked a door open at random. "Revenge is sweet, don't you think? Revenge is a sweet," he said and shoved the pair of digits he'd uncovered into his mouth.

Perhaps it was too sweet, the chocolate plaque bulging with numbers. He didn't much care for the taste that filled his mouth once the unexpectedly brittle object crumbled like a lump of ash. As the sweetness immediately grew stale he had the impression that it masked a less palatable flavour. He grabbed a bottle of brandy still half full from last Christmas and poured some into the Greatest Granddad mug Adam had given him. A mouthful seared away part of the tastes, and another did more of the job, but he still felt as if some unpleasant sensation lay in wait for him. Perhaps he was exhausted, both emotionally and by insomnia. He could celebrate the end of Smart with a good night's sleep.

His nerves didn't let him. He kept thinking he'd heard a sound, unless he was about to hear one, or was it too stealthy to be audible? He didn't know how often he'd opened his aching eyes to confront the cluttered darkness before he saw a pair of red eyes staring back at him. They were two of the digits on the bedside clock until one pinched into a single line. It was a minute after midnight, and a day closer to Christmas.

The thought sent him out of bed. While he wouldn't be putting any of the contents of the calendar anywhere near his mouth, perhaps he could relax once he'd located the date and opened the door. As the fluorescent tube jittered alight he could have imagined he glimpsed a flap staggering upright on the calendar. He peered at the swarm of identically mirthful faces in search of the date. How many of the doors were open? Seven, or there should be, and he prodded them while counting them aloud. However often he added them up there was one more, and it was today's.

Could he have opened the door and forgotten? Was that a blurred fingerprint on the chocolate? He grabbed the calendar and shook the sweet into the bin. He was tempted to stuff the calendar in as well, if that wouldn't have felt too much like continuing to fear the teacher. "Do your worst," he mumbled, still not entirely awake. Throwing the calendar on the table, he sat down to watch.

Before long the lids of some of the compartments began to twitch. It was his debilitated vision or the shaking of the table, if not both. Whenever his head lurched more or less upright, having slid off his fists that were propping it up, he had to force his eyes wide and count the open doors afresh. "Eight," he kept declaring, even when someone thumped on the wall of the kitchen. "Had enough for one day, have you?" he retorted, though he wasn't sure to whom. He didn't notice when the fluorescent glow merged with pallid sunlight, but it seemed to be an excuse for retreating into bed.

It was almost dark by the time he gave up dozing. He had enough food to last until Christmas—enough that he needn't be troubled by the identical doors on the balcony. He ate some of a bowl of cereal while he glared a raw-eyed challenge at the calendar, and then he listened to a carol concert on the radio—it was many years since he'd heard carollers at his or anybody's door. The music lulled him almost to sleep until the choir set about amassing the twelve days of Christmas and all that they brought. Even after he switched off the radio, the numbers kept demanding to be totalled in his head.

Well before midnight he was at the kitchen table, where he stood the bedside clock next to the calendar. The digits twitched into various shapes on their way to turning into eyes, which he could have imagined were refusing to blink because they were determined to watch him, even without pupils. At last—it seemed much longer than a minute—the final digit shrank, but nothing else moved. Didn't that last number look more like an I than a 1? Summers was attempting to ignore it when it crumbled into segments, but he mustn't feel compelled to count them; he had to catch the calendar opening today's door, or see whatever happened. He gripped his temples and dug his thumbs into his cheeks, feeling the bones of his skull. His face began to ache, but not enough to keep him alert, though he didn't know he'd dozed until his head jerked up. "Eight," he said when at last he thought he was sure of the number. He oughtn't to start bothering the neighbours again, and there was a way to avoid it—by tearing all the open doors off the calendar. They and the boxy holes they left put him in mind of a vandalised graveyard, an idea that felt capable of shrinking Smart no larger than an insect. "That's all you are. That's all you ever were," Summers muttered as his head drooped.

When had he eaten last? No wonder he was weak. At least he didn't need to leave the table to find food. He dragged the calendar to him and fumbled a door open. Some instinct must have guided him, since it was the first unopened one—the number of his flat. As he bit the chocolate, the coiled object on the little slab writhed into life. Its tail slithered from between his teeth, and it wormed down his throat as though it had rediscovered its burrow in the earth.

His head wavered up, and he clapped a hand over his mouth. No more doors were open after all—only eight, he was able to believe once he'd counted the gaping compartments several times. The calendar wasn't as close to him as he'd imagined, and he might have been sure he'd dreamed the grisly incident except for an odd taste in his mouth. Perhaps it was merely stale and sweetish, or was there an underlying earthiness? It sent him to gulp brandy straight from the bottle, and he turned back to the table just in time to glimpse a movement. A lid had been lifted, although it was instantly still.

"Caught you," Summers cried. It bore today's date. The prize it had exposed was marked with scratches, as if someone had been clawing at it for want of a better victim. He shook the chocolate into the bin and tore off the date. "Finished for today?" he demanded, but couldn't interpret the lack of an answer. He was sinking shakily onto the chair when he glanced at the clock. The number beside the blind red eyes was his apartment's. No, it was upside down with its tail in the air, but it still showed he'd spent the night in front of the calendar.

He felt as if Smart had robbed him of all sense of time as well as any confidence about numbers. He would be no fun on Christmas Day if he'd had so little sleep. "You won't spoil this Christmas as well," he vowed. Suppose the presents for his family and Tina were ruined somehow? He threw the calendar on its face and pinned it down with a saucepan so heavy that his arms shook. Once he'd returned the clock to the bedside table he fetched the presents from the living room and lined them up in bed before he joined them.

He had to keep reminding himself that the muffled rustling came from the presents, especially whenever it wakened him after dark. His lurches into consciousness were too reminiscent of the Christmas he'd spent dreading next year's days with Smart, far too many to count—shivering awake to realise the worst nightmare wasn't in his sleep. The nights leading up to his retirement had been just as bad, and Smart's fault too. He saw the eyes blink wide to stare towards him, and managed to name the digits next to them. "One and two, that's three to you," he mouthed, and "Happy Christmas" when the right eye narrowed to a slit. He didn't need to go and look at the calendar; surely he would hear if anything happened. He lay awake listening, and tried not to move in case that disturbed the wrappings of the presents, though why should he fear being heard? It was almost dawn by the time he went to look.

The light in the fluorescent tube buzzed and fluttered like an insect and eventually grew still. Summers used both hands to remove the saucepan and then turned over the calendar. It put him in mind of lifting a slab—one from beneath which something might scuttle or crawl. Nothing else stirred, however. That wasn't why he let the calendar fall on its back with a hollow flimsy sound. All the numbers on the remaining doors were blurred beyond any possibility of recognition, while the festive faces were no more than blotches with misshapen blobs for eyes. Had age overtaken the calendar? Summers only needed to open today's door to finish celebrating his triumph. He could open all of them to find it if he had to—but prising one open revealed that the sweet was as unrecognisably deformed as the number on the door. The next was the same, and its neighbour, and he felt as if they were showing how deranged Smart had always been or was now. At last Summers wakened enough to realise that he didn't have to try every door; today's was larger. As soon as he located it he dug his fingertip under the lid.

His nail sank into a substance too firm for chocolate but in another way not firm enough, and then the object moved beneath his finger. As he recoiled, the door sprang up, exposing a greyish piebald surface in which a rounded lump bulged. He was trying to grasp the sight when the lump into which he'd poked his finger blinked again and glared at him. Even though it had already begun to wither and grow discoloured, he knew it all too well.

He swept the calendar onto the floor and trampled on it, feeling more than cardboard give way underfoot. He might have been stamping on a mask, but not an empty one. Once it was crushed absolutely flat he watched to be sure that nothing crept from beneath it, not even a stain, and then he retreated to the bedroom.

Suppose he'd set the madness free? He didn't like to keep the presents so close to the remains of the calendar. In any case it might be wise to set off for his old house—he was afraid it could take him some time to find. At least he hadn't undressed for bed. He clutched the presents to his chest and hurried onto the balcony, beyond which a greyish light was starting to take hold of the world. He gazed at his door until he succeeded in fixing at least the shape of the number in his mind. "You're the one with your tail hanging down," he said.

It was daylight now, however grey, and he did his best to hasten through the streets. He shouldn't be distracted by trying to count Christmas trees in windows, let alone Christmas lights. Today's date ought to be enough for him. "Two and five and you're alive," he told some children before they fled across the road. He mustn't frighten anyone. Among the reasons he'd retired had been the fear of needing to resemble Smart so as to teach.

He came to his old road at last, only to feel as if someone had gone ahead of him to jumble all the numbers. He just had to locate his old home, not remember which number it was. He didn't have to count his way to it, and he was surprised how soon he found the wrought-iron porch. He hugged the presents—one, two and another—as he thumbed the bellpush. "Two and five and you're alive," he carolled until the boy ran to open the door. Summers was about to hand him the presents when the boy turned his back. "I don't know what he wants," he called. "It's some old man."

The Address

First published in Cut Corners Volume 1, 2011

Fraith did his best to stay amused as long as he could. At the car park into which he wandered almost before realising he had, nobody even knew there was a railway station. Presumably this meant it wasn't along the road, and he tramped back into the forest, where the rusty colours were starting to lose their appeal. An October wind cold enough for winter met him, and then a muddy couple tugged by two Labradors did. They disagreed over directions while the dogs joined in, and eventually the man tried to send Fraith back to the road. Further down the path that was restless with leaves, the mother of two children about the ages of his daughter's daughters took pity on him. "Out by yourself today?" she said.

"I very often am. I'm just giving the family a breather."

"They look after you, do they?"

Fraith wasn't sure how much of her sympathy was reserved for him. "More like the other way round," he retorted.

"I know."

Her tone had turned more soothing, not unlike a nurse's by a bed. Fraith managed to say only "Can you tell me where the station is?"

"Was that the big place, mummy?" the boy said at once.

"That was a school," his sister informed him with all the disdain earned by her age or gender.

"There hasn't been a school for a long time. Be quiet about it." Since the woman was still gazing at Fraith, he could have thought this was addressed to him. "I'm sure I saw the sign you want," she said. "Carry on where we've come from and I think it's the next side path."

"I don't suppose either of you two saw a train."

"They haven't. Not today." With enough force to be rebuking Fraith the woman added "Just do as I said and you'll find what you asked for."

"I hope so." Fraith could sound like that too. "I need to get back to my daughter," he said. "She hasn't anybody else."

He hoped his return would be as welcome as his decision to go walking by himself had seemed to be. Were there really no walks closer to the house than a train ride away? Perhaps Carla had wanted a few hours by herself with the girls. He was doing all he could to help—enough for two people now her mother wasn't with them—but perhaps he seemed too interfering. He would ask Carla once the girls were in bed, though she disliked admitting to feelings like those, just as her mother had. Before he knew he meant to speak he said "Have you anyone like me?"

"We had," the woman said.

"He went to live with all the other granddads," the boy informed him.

Fraith could do without knowing what this might be a euphemism for. "I won't be doing that just yet," he said and strode into the woods.

He must have overlooked the sign she'd mentioned. Though the sun was lying low behind the trees, it wouldn't be dark for hours. The light transformed foliage into masses of orange flame and spilled between the trees to lend leaves on the path a tinfoil glare. The concrete path wasn't admitting to its destination; every few hundred yards another curve obscured the way ahead. While he hadn't counted the bends, it took more of them than he remembered to bring him back to the next junction, where nothing like a signpost was to be seen.

The woman must have mistaken the place, which surely ought to mean the next path wasn't far. He knew the station wasn't to the left—he'd come that way earlier—and the trail ahead curved rightwards. He zipped up the last inches of his padded jacket against the wind despite starting to sweat with exertion. "Best feet forward. You've a pair each," he would have said if Carla's daughters had been with him.

Soon the path straightened out, levelling the sunlight at him. For minutes he was as bad as blind. At last the path strewn with leaves like shards of mirrors veered to the right again, and he blinked his patchy vision clear, to be rewarded by the sight of a junction ahead. Or were those only gaps between the trees on both sides of the track? No, there was a transverse path, but it was entirely unmarked.

He halted at the crossing and stared around him. His skin was as clammy as his mouth was dry, and at first the reverberations of his heart wouldn't let him think. Where had he gone wrong? He'd set out to follow a circular route from the station, but one of the bridges across the railway had been fenced off, and since then he'd lost the main path. If only Carla had reminded him to take his mobile phone, except that even if he hadn't left it by his bed he didn't suppose it would have helped him now. Should he return to the car park while he still knew where it was, in case someone could direct him? He was turning back when he heard voices on the right-hand path.

They weren't speaking English. Like many people in the street these days —sometimes enough to make him feel he was losing his grasp of his own language—the young men were from somewhere in the heart of Europe. They looked friendly enough, and stopped at the junction when Fraith held up a hand. "Did you come by the railway?" he said.

Two of them smiled while their companions frowned, and all four shook their heads. "Railway," Fraith repeated to the same effect and pumped his arms like pistons while puffing as hard as he could, only to realise that he could have been portraying an exhausted athlete. "Choo choo," he tried hooting and shoved his fists out hard enough to pummel an opponent. "Choo choo."

The men gazed at him as if they wondered where he'd been let out from— as Carla's daughters did too often while he was exerting himself to amuse them. "Station," he urged, shading his eyes to peer along each path in turn. "Station."

Three men shrugged. Their companion, the oldest, sketched a cross on himself before kissing his thumb, and Fraith wondered if this was a gesture to greet the deranged. He'd thought of nothing more to say by the time the men turned along the path he had been following. As he hesitated the oldest man looked back and waved him away. "No," he said and jabbed a finger at the path to Fraith's left. "Station."

He pronounced it so deliberately it might have been two separate words. Surely that could be the right path—if the men had passed the railway they would have figured out Fraith's performance. All the same, as he turned that way he felt as if he were being dragged by his shadow. His heart sounded like a cheap effect in a film, and his mouth was growing parched again. He'd reached a bend that showed him more path and trees with their tips ablaze—his crooked silhouette was jerking along the unkempt verge, putting him in mind of the second hand of a decrepit clock—when he heard another voice.

Though it was blurred, not just by distance, he knew where the woman was. The man's voice that had greeted the train at the station had been distorted too. "Keep talking," Fraith urged and tramped faster along the path.

She fell silent at once. He could almost have fancied she was as contrary as Carla's girls. His shadow was veering around a bend as if in search of the direction by the time she spoke again. As far as he could make out she was publicising a special service, which seemed unlikely to concern him. Straining his ears only turned his heartbeat up, and he did his best to breathe more evenly as the bend showed him another deserted stretch of path. Wasn't that the red-brick station beyond the furthest trees? He was halfway to it before he could be sure it was a mass of autumn foliage.

He'd seen no other path since meeting the four men, but he'd begun to wonder if he was still right for the station until he heard the voice apparently announcing the first train due and the next ones. The wind threw the words about like a young animal worrying some kind of toy, so that Fraith couldn't locate the voice. At least he was closer to it. Surely that wasn't just an effect of the wind.

He'd passed another extended bend before she spoke again—something about the track and a delay. At least that should give him more of a chance to catch the train, but he kept on almost fast enough to lose his footing on the sodden leaves. As the wind flung the words away from him he could have imagined the treetops were groping to retrieve the message, not necessarily on his behalf. All at once a phrase made him falter. Could she just have announced the last train?

It shouldn't be due for hours yet. There was still enough light to trap his silhouette among the glistening shadows of trees. He made for the voice almost fast enough to leave his breath behind, though not the uneven drumbeat of his heart. Was he hearing about a mail train now—one that carried sacks? Presumably the public was being advised that it didn't take passengers. Fraith could see the building through the trees at the next bend, at least until he came close enough to realise it wasn't solid enough. The distant shape wasn't overgrown with leaves, it was composed of them. He was almost at the bend by the time the voice spoke again. It was behind him.

It was to his left as well, among the trees. As he strained his eyes to find a path he'd overlooked, he heard a rhythmic clatter and a brief high sound. The mail train must be racing through the station, whistling to warn commuters. He'd thought the voice had just mentioned relaying the track, but this couldn't be affecting the trains. He was facing the sounds now, and he shouldn't waste any more time looking for a path.

The way through the trees wasn't as straightforward as he hoped. The forest was humpy with mounds of earth much taller than he was. None of the trails leading over or between them looked man-made, even inadvertently. The first route he followed brought him into a muddy hollow full of stagnant pools disguised by leaves, and he was on his knees by the time he clambered out of it. After that he did his best to stay on the mounds, no matter how treacherous they proved to be. Would they never let him glimpse the station? He might have thought its voice was mocking his progress, not least since it had grown even less comprehensible. Perhaps the bits of it that reached him on the wind were talking about prices and the next train, but what had it said about some form of support? "Doesn't matter," Fraith panted, "just don't shut up," and almost lost his balance on a scree of leaves as he laboured up a slope. He grabbed a scaly tree-trunk to haul himself onto the top of the mound, and a soggy lump of bark crumbled in his grasp. He sucked in a breath so as to release it, letting out a sound he would have preferred not to make. He could see where he'd been hearing from, and it had no connection with the railway. The building obscured by trees was a school.

The main building was long and wide and red. Two wings extended from it to enclose a schoolyard, beyond which distant figures stood around the edges of a field, watching others run. At once a great deal made sense. It was a sports day, nothing to do with support. The voice had been talking about prizes, not prices—about a sack race and a relay, and announcing the winners in numerical order.

For an irrational moment Fraith was tempted to retreat to the main path. He'd already begun to feel like a child lost in a maze, and besides, he had loathed sports at school. "Don't blubber, Blubber," the gym master took delight in saying, though Fraith hadn't been especially overweight and had never let anyone see him weep. Only sweat had trickled down his face, not to mention down the rest of him, as he'd panted to the finish in everybody else's wake, urged on by the teacher's ironic cheers that too many spectators had emulated. They surely weren't allowed to treat children like that now, even in a school as remote as this one. If the way Carla's girls behaved was any indication, there were no longer many rules at all.

Someone at the school would be able to direct him to the railway, and he slithered down the mound. Now he couldn't see the building, but the announcer—no doubt the games mistress—was still audible with some words about the head. If the organiser of the games was anything like Carla, the competitors would be having an easy time. She could very well be firmer with his grandchildren, but perhaps she thought he'd been too strict with her at their age.

He wasn't going to risk the shortest route to the school—he couldn't afford a broken bone or even a sprain just now, if ever—and so he settled for the least hazardous. From the top of a mound the school blocked his view of the playing field. The next time it rose into sight, only the roof was visible above the high thick hedge that boxed the grounds in. He had to find his way around a copse webbed with ivy before he was able to reach the hedge.

A track led beside it, or at least a penumbra of mud that fringed the shadow of the forest. The hedge was several times Fraith's height and at least twice as thick as the width of his rotund stomach. It was far too thoroughly entangled for even the smallest child to squeeze through, and not just full of vicious thorns but bristling with them. Surely nothing like it would be allowed on school property these days, and he wondered how long ago it had been planted to have grown so much.

Since he couldn't see the school gates, he made his way along the soggy track towards the field. The windows he glimpsed through the hedge were as dark as the depths of the woods. Either the woman with the microphone hadn't often used one or her shrillness was distorting the transmission. Perhaps she was pretending to be excited, because Fraith couldn't see much to inspire her as he came in sight of the field.

The sack race was over. Several man-sized bags were propped against the schoolyard wall. Fraith's head was swimming with exertion, and he might have imagined that the contestants had stayed in their sacks, which were jerking with the wind. In fact the bags couldn't have been used in the race—they must be full of rubbish, given how stained they were. He was glad to see that the sports day wasn't too rigorously organised; some of the young spectators on the far side of the field were playing a game of their own, throwing a ragged rugby ball or baseball to one another. Perhaps the amplified voice had grown shrill in a bid to reclaim their attention for the official event, such as it was. Fraith could see just one runner on the field, dashing along a track composed of muddy footprints in the not especially neat grass. Whatever kind of competition this might be, Fraith hadn't time to wait for it to finish. "Excuse me," he shouted through the widest gap—thinner than his thumb—he could find in the hedge. "Can you help?"

Perhaps nobody could see him, but none of the spectators facing away from him turned to look. Surely the hedge couldn't have made him inaudible. Perhaps the children had been told to ignore anyone outside the grounds. In any case he would do better talking to an adult, and he advanced along the unofficial track. He hadn't identified a single grown-up, not even the one with the microphone or loudhailer, when he caught sight of the gates past the front of the school.

They were open, though not fully. He would have to make his way around two sides of the grounds to them, but at least he wouldn't be yelling through the hedge. As he turned away he glimpsed the solitary runner stumble and fall. Half a dozen spectators ran to help him up, quite the opposite of how Fraith would have been treated at school. Fraith was alongside the brick wing that enclosed the schoolyard when he thought he heard the amplified voice calling him back.

It was saying somebody was back at school, although surely not the competitors. Now that Fraith thought about it, the lone runner hadn't looked too youthful. Might that explain what Fraith had heard earlier? Perhaps this was a special day, the kind schools sometimes put on, where roles were reversed and it was the teachers' turn to compete. Even the amplified voice might belong to an adolescent boy, since Fraith heard it crack as it enthused about a game of catch.

Sunlight poked jagged holes in the hedge as he came abreast of the front of the school. A drive led through the woods to the gates, but it was blocked by fallen trees. In any case the gap between the spiky wrought-iron gates was too cramped for any vehicle to pass through. Twigs were entangled around the hinges, and the ground was stained rusty where the gates had settled into the mud. Fraith was wondering if he'd chanced upon a reunion at a defunct school, in which case the spectators might well be the children of the pupils, when he was distracted by a rhythmic clatter and a terse shriek that resounded across the field.

It had to be the railway. So it was beyond the far side of the playing field, but he still didn't know the way to the station. Someone must, and Fraith hurried through the lockjawed gates and up the weedy gravel drive. The low sunlight met him with such a fierce glare that all the windows through which it was shining looked unglazed. Once he was past the front of the school he had to fend off the light with his hand. Even shading his eyes didn't give him much of his sight back. He blinked like an animal just rousted from its lair as he stumbled alongside the school.

He could almost have fancied the commentator was talking about trains—about laying the track. Perhaps his confusion had lent the voice a mocking quality unless, since it was speaking of teachers now, that was how it actually sounded. Fraith dabbed at his eyes and then held the hand in front of them, but had to raise it to see the field, where another isolated runner was sprinting across the grass. He was heading for a gap between the spectators, some of whom appeared to be edging towards it; no doubt they were preparing to welcome the competitor. Fraith raised his hand beside his face and turned to peer along the schoolyard edge of the field.

He couldn't see a single adult among the spectators, insofar as he could make them out at all. The large sacks tied up with frayed cord and propped against the schoolyard wall were continuing to twitch, although he couldn't feel a wind. Not just the sacks but the untended turf around them were stained a colour that he did his best to find autumnal, and he was surprised if not uneasy that the watchers hadn't moved away from them. He was straining his eyes to distinguish even one face when all the onlookers leaned forward to gaze across the field.

Fraith peered under his hand into the sunlight and still had to narrow his eyes. There was no longer a gap in the mass of spectators along the far side of the field. At first he couldn't locate the runner, and then he saw a figure sprawled on the muddy grass, apparently having veered towards one corner of the hedge. In a moment several onlookers converged to haul him to his feet and march him out of competition, so enthusiastically that Fraith thought he glimpsed the man's feet attempting to run in the air.

Were they presenting him with a trophy just for joining in? Someone by the distant hedge stepped forward, holding up a slim item against the sun. A dismayingly familiar sound greeted the gesture—a rhythmic clatter somewhere in the audience. Fraith had to peer about to locate a group of boys who were knocking cricket stumps together in a salute that seemed not merely improvised but primitive. The clatter continued as the pointed object rose high and parted its hefty blades before swooping at the figure held by spectators. The savage drumming ceased, isolating another sound—an exhausted shriek that was cut off at once. Spectators closed around the activity, which appeared to involve a good deal of exertion and repetition. Perhaps Fraith hadn't been wholly mistaken in thinking of a trophy, because in a while a group of boys darted away, lobbing their prize to one another. It was about as rounded as the other ragged ball had been.

Fraith tried to concentrate on just one thought in the hope it was the truth: that all the onlookers were so intent on the spectacle they hadn't noticed him. His mouth tasted sour and dusty, every heartbeat seemed to make his entire body quiver, but as two boys dragged a limp incomplete shape to join several more beside the far hedge he managed to free himself of his appalled fascination and set about backing towards the school. He was still in the open when he saw movement by the schoolyard wall.

The metal object glinted as it rose to shoulder height and higher. It was an old loudspeaker held by someone halfway along the line of figures beside the wall. The sunlight must be interfering with Fraith's vision, since the face behind the built-in microphone had a distinctly makeshift look. Its words were plain enough, despite a shrillness that sounded no less senile than childish. "Teach them," it screeched while the megaphone added a rusty distortion. "Pay them back."

At once too much else that Fraith had heard it saying became clearer. Perhaps it was the school rather than the day that was special, though he would rather not learn how. If he'd chanced upon some kind of reunion or revival, it was best left uninvestigated until he could alert the authorities. The sun had started to hide its face behind a forest mound beyond the playing field, and he could have wished it weren't restoring his eyesight as the figures by the schoolyard grew more distinct. He even had the grotesque fancy that the harsh shrill voice belonged to the megaphone itself, given how temporary the commentator's mouth looked. As if provoked by the thought, the figure swung the megaphone towards him. "There's another," it cried in a voice that seemed to scrape the loudspeaker.

All the spectators along the wall turned to find Fraith, who struggled not to see their ramshackle faces clear, because he had a sense that doing so would leave him unable to move. "I'm not," he protested, having understood too much. "I'm like you. I was, I promise."

This earned him a response, not just from all the onlookers beside the wall. He'd never heard anyone laugh in unison before, a piercing noise that sounded as much like a chant as mirth. It almost blotted out the answer of the megaphone. "Aren't now," the strident voice said.

Fraith thought he had one chance to run for it, and swung around. Half a dozen former pupils of the school had made their stealthy way behind him. Whoever used to look after the grounds must have had quite a collection of implements, from which the figures waiting for Fraith had brought an impressive selection. If this wasn't daunting enough, he could see the figures in detail now—their torn muddy clothes, their toothless childish faces that put him in mind of rotten fruit. They weren't simply in danger of wizening; wrinkles kept appearing and being swallowed up like ripples in a pool, along with patches of discolouration. He backed away, almost falling in his haste not merely to keep his distance but to make a last appeal to the organiser of the events. "I'm only looking for the train," he pleaded.

He was afraid to hear the laughter again, but silence answered him—how eager or expectant he couldn't tell. The figure lifted the megaphone without speaking and thrust it forward, indicating the farther left-hand corner of the field. Perhaps that concealed a short cut to the station, invisible at such a distance. Fraith knew only that he mustn't run, or they might think he was like all those who had. He took a breath that pumped up his heartbeat and parched his mouth, and then he set off along the trampled course across the field. He mustn't look at the spectators—mustn't meet whatever they might have for eyes—but he found himself wondering whether Carla's daughters would have cheered him on if he'd given in to running. If he'd ever been too harsh with them, he prayed he could take it back, supposing that would save him. Then the sun went out, and he felt as if the world had.

2012

The Moons

First published in The Devil's Coattails, February 2012

I might have seen the children once again.

I never wanted to see them at all. I would have been happiest up in my room, but my mother said "You haven't seen your chums since Christmas."

She'd only taken to talking about chums since we moved house, as if she had to bring her language up in the world. She used to call my friends in our old neighbourhood a gang. "I saw Claude and Ludwig on Sunday," I tried saying.

"Only on their way to church. You know what I mean." I thought she was about to say I should follow their example until she added "You've spent no time with them since your party."

As far as I was concerned it hadn't been mine, and I didn't want to be blamed for it. She kept saying how polite all the guests had been, though I wondered if she knew. The party had been her idea for earning me new friends, and she'd served the kinds of refined sandwiches and cakes her parents used to dish out when they owned the house. I'd told her nobody would bring a present, but all four of them did, and to my hot-faced embarrassment she gave each of them an envelope containing a ten-pound note. They'd thanked her so profusely that I'd felt even worse. "I was going to write a story," I said. "Or I might read. Don't you want me to read?"

"Stories aren't the whole world, Stuart," she said, though she worked as a book bunny at the local branch of Texts. "You need to play out as well."

At thirteen I was far too old to do anything of the sort or at least to call it that. "Maybe they're out," I said. "Maybe they've gone to some church thing."

"Don't start taking after your father. He would never make an effort if he wasn't certain he'd succeed." She was searching the carpet for scraps of needles that the Christmas tree might have left behind. "Give them a ring if you can't just walk along the road," she said, "and then you won't be under my feet."

She was always cleaning in case any of the neighbours came to call. I hoped she might have cleared away the cordless phone somewhere we wouldn't find it, but it was among her mother's china cats on the granite mantelpiece. She'd stored the number for Claude's and Ludwig's house, and far too soon I heard the kind of music business phones put on while you wait for anyone to answer. It meant somebody at the house was listening to music. "It's Stu," I said.

"Don't say that, Stuart," my mother said. "You're not a plate of food."

"Stuart." Mr Smith might have been correcting me as well. "Did you have a splendid festival with all the trimmings?"

"It was good." When he didn't find this worth answering I had to say "Are Claude and Ludwig there?"

"Indeed they are, and their friends you so kindly invited to your celebration. Do give us our turn to play host." Before I could speak he called "Young Mr Armstrong is imminent, everyone" and was gone.

"I didn't even speak to them," I complained. "It was just their dad telling them I was going."

"Off you go where you're wanted, then."

I don't suppose she meant I wasn't wanted at home, but it gave me an excuse to flounce out of the room before snatching my padded anorak from the stag's horns her father had made into coat hooks. "Let me know when you'll be back," my mother said, having hurried to see me off.

The sun was just above the detached houses across the road, as high as it would rise this early in the year. The stone menagerie in our garden had shadows more than twice their size lying down behind them. I never knew if my mother kept the ornaments because she'd inherited them from her parents or in case the neighbours expected it of her. The shadow of her Mini on the drive was almost the size of the car I wished we had. The pines beyond the houses opposite clung to the roofs with dozens of shadowy fingers. A path between two houses led through the forest to the beach. The face of a ranger on the path was blurred by the low fierce light, but I thought he was watching me. I wasn't going to let a ranger make me feel out of place, and I stared at him before turning away from the path.

The Smiths lived in front of a magpie's nest a quarter of a mile away down the long straight road, past gateposts with marble bowling balls balanced on them and bushes politely clipped into sculptures. A Mercedes kept a Renault company beside the Smiths' weedless turfy lawn. A local artist had designed the ceramic plaque that said WELL-TEMPERED beside the solid oak front door. As I pushed the marble button in its shiny brass surround, all of which put me in mind of fingering the kind of nipple you saw on magazines, a magpie's chatter seemed to answer for the bell. I dragged a comb through my unruly hair and was about to thumb the button harder when Mr Smith opened the door. "Stuart," he enthused before he lowered his plump ruddy face on its swelling jowls towards me. "See if you can make a difference."

It sounded like a test, and I didn't know what kind. I kept my mouth shut as I followed him along the wide hall, which was panelled like an old museum and hung with paintings of naked people in groves. He opened a door at the end and announced "Ladies and gentlemen, the newcomer."

Sunshine through the windows that were most of one wall found me like a spotlight in an interrogation room. I had to narrow my eyes to see the boys and the Turner sisters, Verona and Valencia, who lived between the Smiths' house and mine. Besides the floppy suede chairs where everyone was sitting there was a jigsaw half made up, and an electronic keyboard, and a sketch pad on a table by the windows. I thought someone had drawn a cage on the pad until I saw it was the view of the pines beyond the back garden. For a moment I fancied a ranger was watching from the top of the slope above the garden wall, but I couldn't locate him, and the trees were too thin to hide a man. Mr Smith shut the door and went back to his music, and I realised that everyone was gazing not at me but at eight-year-old Valencia. "What's wrong?" I said.

The others stared at me in distaste, though I was only trying to fit in. "I lost my bracelet," Valencia wailed.

"It was only cheap." Verona was three years older and determined to show it. "It wouldn't have fallen off otherwise," she said.

"You bought it for me." Valencia blinked wet-eyed and said "It had all the moons."

This seemed to be my chance to join in. "All which?"

"The phases of the moon," Ludwig said with a fourteen-year-old's haughtiness. "They're what it was made of."

"For purgatory's sake," Verona said to her sister. "If it means that much to you I'll buy you another."

"It won't be the same. I coloured all the moons," Valencia said and burst into sobs.

Ludwig sighed like a parent. "Well, now nobody's going to be able to work."

"Not us." Claude seemed to think I needed to be put right, even though I was a year older than him. "Mother and father are writing their lectures," he said, "and Mr and Mrs Turner are doing their day with the homeless. And father's already asked Valencia if she could be quiet once."

"Does she know where she lost it?" I said.

Valencia stopped sobbing long enough to mumble "On the beach."

"Couldn't we go and see if it's there?"

Ludwig shoved himself off his chair and marched out to knock on a door. "Father?"

In a moment the door opened, spilling a wave of music. "What is it going to be this time?" Mr Smith seemed not to want to know.

"Stuart's proposing a search party to look for Valencia's jewellery."

"There can't be any harm in it if they take their phones," a woman said, "and see they're back well before dark."

"Mama has spoken," Mr Smith said. "Harmlessness is guaranteed."

Ludwig came back and stared at me before saying "We're to go down to the beach."

"What do you say, Valencia?" Verona said.

"Thank you, Stuart," Valencia said, which didn't seem to please anyone but me.

I was wearing my coat. While they all went to fetch theirs I remember wondering if I still felt watched because I was unwelcome—I'd decided that Mr Smith had meant I would make a difference by being out of place. Ludwig opened the windows and locked them again with a code on a keypad, but I didn't look in case anyone thought I was planning to rob the house. He keyed more numbers at the gate in the wall at the end of the long garden, and then he led the way up a slope so strewn with needles that I imagined my mother complaining if I brought any home on my shoes. A magpie uttered its rattling call, and Valencia laughed as it soared out of its nest. She'd stopped crying as soon as Ludwig said we were going to the beach. Now I wish that nobody had listened to me—that I hadn't been there at all.

Just then I was only uncomfortable with hearing Verona nag her sister. "Don't slide," she said as we went down the far slope, and "Don't kick the needles, you'll spoil your shoes." Once she'd been told not to run either, Valencia looked about for something else. "We're walking on a big tiger," she said.

"It's a bit like one, isn't it?" I saw she meant the shadows on the brownish slopes. "All the stripes," I said.

To my surprise she took my hand. Hers was hot despite the winter chill, and sticky as a sweet. "The trees," she said before she had to pause for thought, "they're insects standing up."

As I saw the stubby branches protruding like insect legs from all the pines Verona said "Who are you trying to impress, Valencia? Paul and Diana aren't here." Apparently those were their parents. "Hurry up if you're looking for your bracelet," she said without even glancing at me.

Perhaps she hoped her sister would leave me behind, but Valencia pulled me along with all her strength, to a road along which a ranger's truck was hauling a cart piled with used Christmas trees. Nobody else passed us on the road, where the trees on both sides put me in mind of a cage like the sketch on the pad. I could have imagined someone peering between the bars, waiting to be let out. Beyond the dunes at the end of the road rangers were using Christmas trees to build a barrier against erosion, and a few people were throwing sticks for dogs beside the sea. "Where are we supposed to be going?" Verona asked her sister.

"Where everybody is."

All our shadows helped Valencia point along the beach. Half a mile away a crowd was bunched together near a car park among the dunes. People were throwing balls or kicking them or riding fat-wheeled motor tricycles or trying to fly kites that soon fell flat as if their shadows had brought them down. "You don't imagine they'll have left it, do you?" Ludwig said.

He meant the people who used the other road. I felt Valencia's fingers struggling to make a fist. Her eyes were turning wet again, so that I was in a hurry to say "Why don't we ask if anyone's handed it in?"

"I'm asking," Claude declared and marched over to the rangers. "Excuse me, has a bracelet been given in?"

All of them shook their heads, and one said "Is it valuable?"

"It is to her," I said.

The ranger gave Valencia a sympathetic look. "Keep asking if you like, love, and we'll keep an eye out."

The last high tide had brought shells and seaweed almost to the edge of the dunes, and I was afraid it might have carried off the bracelet. As Valencia tugged me along the beach the crowd ahead receded like a mirage. The distance had made them seem closer together than they were, and the people with kites were leaving the beach in defeat. Once I fancied someone had carried off a recycled Christmas tree, but when I looked up at the dunes above us there was no sign of the green shape I'd seemed to glimpse. I could have thought Valencia was moving not much faster than the shadows of the dunes, except when she darted to pick up objects that always turned out to be shells. Her sister kept telling her to keep up but never spoke to me. She and Claude and Ludwig had almost reached the entrance to the car park when four boys who'd been chasing birds at the edge of the sea converged on them.

They wore track suits and trainers. Some of them might have been old enough for their tattoos, and even those who weren't had them. The oldest and bulkiest boy was about as old as Ludwig. "What you lost?" he said.

"Nothing that need concern you, thank you," Ludwig told him. "We'll manage by ourselves."

"Can't stop us looking," said a wiry boy in a baggy mauve suit. "Snot your beach."

Valencia hauled at my hand so fiercely in her haste to head them off-that she almost pulled me over. "Don't let them get it, Ludwig," she cried.

Another stringy boy stared at him and laughed so hard he spat. "You called Ludwig?"

"Will you please leave us alone," Claude said. "You've been politely asked."

The boy wiped his mouth to some extent and looked ready for a bigger laugh. "What's your name, then?"

"It's of no possible interest to you," Ludwig said. "Now for the last time will you please be on your way."

The fourth newcomer said nothing, and I wondered if he was as beside the point as me. Ludwig glanced at the crowd, but there wasn't one; the tricycles had sped away, and the scattering of adults still on the beach were too distant to help. A truck started its engine near the Christmas trees, and then another did. Ludwig beckoned to the rangers, who must have thought he was waving, unless they found the gesture too presumptuous. The trucks vanished into the dunes, taking all the rangers with them, and Valencia yanked at my hand as if she wanted me to intervene. My only thought was that if I didn't try to sound like Ludwig he might think I sounded too much like the intruders, or even if I tried. I did my best not to make too much noise in clearing my throat, but everyone stared at me—everyone except Verona, who suddenly bent double. I thought nerves had made her sick until she straightened up and slipped an object into her pocket. "I've found it," she said.

"Oh, let's see," Valencia cried.

"Oh, do let's," said the boy with spit around his mouth.

"It's safe now," Ludwig told Valencia. "Let her keep it for you till we're home."

As soon as he made for the road where the rangers were, the boys in track suits followed him. He turned at once and headed in the opposite direction. "That's the wrong way," Valencia protested.

"It's where there'll be grown-ups," I said.

I thought my remark might drive away our unwanted companions, but it only earned a scowl from Ludwig. As they followed us Verona told them "You weren't going this way."

"Changed our mind," the bulky boy said.

Ludwig twisted around to confront them. "Would you like me to phone someone?"

"Go for it," the bulky boy said like a gunfighter. "Mobiles don't work down here."

'You don't know if ours do," Claude blurted.

"They'll be worth having, then," said the boy with the wet mouth.

Ludwig might have glared at Claude for giving them more reason to come after us, but he was striding to the car park. The boys fell behind as we hurried to keep up with him until he halted on the path between the dunes. Fewer than a dozen vehicles were parked in a gravelled area the size of a football field, and not a single human being was to be seen.

We were halfway across the car park when gravel clattered at our backs. While the boys weren't throwing it yet, they were following us at speed. As we carried on towards the road through the woods we heard a car on it. I hoped it was a ranger's truck, but it was a jeep full of more big dogs than people. Ludwig stood in its way and held up one hand like a policeman. "Will you tell these people to go away, please?"

"What's wrong with them?" the driver said. "They've as much right to be here as you, son."

"We live round here."

"We don't," the woman with the driver said, "so you'll just have to put up with us all."

"I shouldn't have expected any better," Ludwig said.

I wanted to tell the couple in the jeep that it was only how he'd been brought up, but I don't suppose it would have helped. The driver revved the engine to make Ludwig step aside, and as the jeep coasted alongside the boys I heard the driver say something to them. He sounded as though he was joking. Ludwig looked ready to remonstrate with him, but Claude said "Look, there's someone who'll help."

I was just in time to glimpse a figure in green who'd emerged from the pines at the bend. He vanished beyond it before anyone could attract his attention. "Quick," Claude said even more urgently and demonstrated how we should run.

Ludwig didn't quite, instead stalking after Claude with exaggerated strides that earned him sniggers from the boys in the car park. The rest of us followed, running whenever Verona told Valencia to keep up. We turned the bend to find Claude and Ludwig stranded in the middle of the road. "I saw him," Claude complained.

The road stretched straight for at least half a mile between mounds of sandy earth. There was no sign of anybody on it or among the trees that occupied the mounds. I heard footsteps leave the car park and start along the road. "This way," Ludwig said at once.

He stuck his arm out like a guard at a school crossing while we dashed up the nearest piny slope. From the top I saw pines beyond pines beyond pines, and hollows strewn with needles between the long high irregular mounds. The sun was so much in my eyes that I hardly noticed all the outstretched shadows until I slithered with Valencia down the further slope. For a moment I'd thought someone had abandoned a topiary sculpture in the woods, but when I looked for it I couldn't even locate the green shape. Ludwig tramped up the next mound and frowned to make everyone follow. As I helped Valencia down that one I checked my mobile for a signal. Because of the dazzle I had to hold the phone close to my eyes before I was certain it was useless. Everyone else's was more sophisticated, even Valencia's, but they had no signal either. By the time this was established we'd left several mounds behind, but we still heard the boys on the road. They'd stopped at the bend to wonder aloud where we were, and threateningly too. "Keep quiet," Ludwig muttered. "Keep down."

I don't believe I was alone in holding my breath. Valencia's fingers squirmed to take a firmer grip on mine. We heard no more from the direction of the road, and eventually Ludwig pointed downhill. He might have been playing a platoon leader in a war film. I thought he was enjoying himself, and even I began to until I heard a whisper in the chill piny silence. "They're there."

Whoever was speaking must have crept up on us. Ludwig brandished his hand at the platoon and stiffened into a crouch. Valencia was digging her small nails into the back of my hand by the time anyone relaxed. It seemed the boys hadn't found us after all. We stole down the slope and were equally careful about climbing another. From the top the road was entirely out of sight, and so were the boys. We were in the next hollow, where the shadows looked unnaturally pallid with the dazzle that stuck to my eyes, when the soft voice repeated "They're there."

It sounded secretive but also somehow lulling, so that I could have fancied it was saying "There, there." Claude sprinted up the next mound and grabbed a fallen branch. "Come on," he shouted.

He might have been challenging the boys or urging Ludwig if not me to do so—perhaps even all of that. "Stay with your sister," I whispered to Valencia and ran to join Claude as his brother frowned at both of us and then tramped after us. The sun glared into my eyes, and I was peering about not much better than blindly for a weapon when a voice said "Now who's this who's lost in my woods?"

At first I couldn't see him. His voice came straight out of the low sunlight that seemed to pinch the trees as thin as blackened matches. As I wiped my eyes he appeared between the trees and descended the mound opposite ours swiftly but silently. He was a ranger in uniform, taller and broader than he'd looked at first, with unexpectedly small and delicate features in a broad jowly face. His short black hair wasn't much less spiky than the pines, and his lips were almost as pale as his cheeks and ridged forehead. By the time he climbed up to us he'd developed a puckish grin. "Why, it's you," he said.

Ludwig's eyes narrowed. "Do we know you?"

"You're the Smith boys, aren't you? And these are the Turner girls." The ranger cocked his head and gave me a bright-eyed blink. "And here's Mrs Armstrong's lad."

"I'm sorry," Ludwig said, "we still don't know who you are."

"Don't I look familiar?" The ranger seemed disappointed. "Woodward by name and by nature as well," he said. "I'm just up the way from you."

"I've seen you," Valencia said and let go of my hand.

"There's one pair of sharp eyes for me," Woodward said and turned to Claude. "Who did you think you were going to fight?"

"Some boys are chasing us," Verona told him. "They want to steal our phones."

"And my bracelet," Valencia protested.

"Don't bother Mr Woodward with that now. You know it's safe."

"As safe as you all are," Woodward said. "Shall I show you the quickest way home?"

"We aren't supposed to go anywhere with people we don't know," Claude said and seemed unsure what to do with his stick.

"You won't be," Woodward told us. "I'll be busy making sure nobody finds you."

"Can't you come with us?" Valencia pleaded.

"Don't worry, they'll never know where you are." Woodward's voice was growing softer as if to ensure that the boys wouldn't hear. "Nobody can find my way if they're not shown," he said.

This sounded like a fairy tale to me, but it impressed Valencia. "Is it the rangers' special way?" she said.

"It's anyone's who belongs there. Straight through and carry on in that direction," he said, pointing all the long thin fingers of one hand at a gap between two mounds. "Just see you don't stray from the track if you want to be where you should be before dark."

I was wondering what accident had left him so little in the way of fingernails—not even indentations where the nails should be. When Ludwig tramped down to the gap we trooped after him, and Valencia took my hand again. I glanced back to see Woodward perched on the ridge, clasping his long hands together. "Homeward bound, the famous five," he said in a low voice that nevertheless reached us. "Leave everything to the lone ranger."

The path beyond the dunes wasn't quite as straight as he'd made it sound. It led between mounds several times the height of the tallest of us—Ludwig. Whenever it turned a bend it confronted us with the sun, which seemed to have grown even colder and fiercer as it sank. The mounds never cut off the sunlight long enough for my eyes to recover, but I glimpsed side paths wandering into the unnaturally pallid gloom. "We're in a maze," Valencia said.

She was trotting beside me, though there was barely room. "Just concentrate on keeping up," Verona told her if not me as well.

This silenced Valencia for a few turns of the path, and then she said "We're in his cage."

Perhaps not being able to see the way clearly had put her sister on edge. "What are you prattling about?" she demanded.

"The tiger's cage. See all the bars."

She meant the shadows, but perhaps Verona didn't care to understand. "Can't you just walk instead of trying to make things into things they aren't?" she said rather than asked.

Valencia stuck out her tongue at her sister's back as Ludwig led the way into a glade hemmed in by mounds. The sun was lying low among the trees and almost blotted out the ground we were walking on, where all the fallen needles glared like tinfoil. The trees framing the sun looked charred to the bone, except they weren't even that substantial—more like their own shadows standing on end. "It's scaly," Valencia whispered.

I supposed she meant the ground, but I wasn't especially anxious to know. Ludwig shaded his eyes and stared ahead. "Mr Woodward said straight on," he reminded everyone. "He must have meant there."

"It's the nearliest," Valencia said.

Neither of the gaps between the mounds on the far side of the glade was exactly opposite us. When we followed Ludwig through the right-hand gap it seemed not to matter that he'd chosen that path, since it soon veered left between the hillocks. The sun was beside us now, sending shadows even longer than the trees were tall down the slopes to mark the path like a board for some game. Valencia held my hand so that she could hop from patch to patch of the track boxed in by shadows. The path curved until the sun was at our backs, but she kept hopping as if she could still see the pattern. Her shadow hopped alongside Verona, who swung around. "Oh, it's you," she said with an odd edge to her voice. "Just try and walk like an ordinary person."

Valencia performed a defiant hop. "Give me my bracelet and I will."

"When we're home, so that's why you should hurry up."

"I want to see it," Valencia said, staying where she was. "Show me."

"There isn't time now," Verona said and turned her back. "Wait till we're home."

"You haven't really got it, have you? You just pretended so those boys would go away."

Ludwig glanced at Verona, and I saw he'd already known the truth. I was afraid that Valencia would burst into tears or run back the way we'd come, but she marched forward. "I don't care," she said. "I'll find it. We're going to the beach."

"We can't today," Claude told her. "It'll be dark."

"Well, we are," Valencia said not stubbornly but with satisfaction. "It's taking us."

I thought she meant the path, and I couldn't judge if she was right. I had no idea how long we'd been following it, and yet I felt we should have been home by now or within sight of home. "Of course it isn't," Ludwig said and tramped more purposefully along the path.

The sun was directly at our backs now. The shadows of the pines stretched ahead as if they were helping the mounds wall in the path. Every individual needle underfoot seemed to have its own shadow. The practically supine light emphasised the outline of each footprint, Ludwig's and Claude's and Verona's and whoever's had preceded them. "They're my stars," Valencia said.

Verona turned her head without looking around. "What are you making up now?"

"I'm not. I don't. They're my shoes." Valencia stood on one leg and tugged at my hand. "Aren't they, Stuart?"

She was showing me the sole, which bore a pattern of two large five-pointed stars. There was no mistaking the prints of her shoes, and they weren't only behind us; they extended out of sight ahead. "We've already come this way once," I had to admit.

"That's just—" Ludwig peered at the sole and the prints behind Valencia, and at last stared at the prints ahead.

"That's—" he said before lurching up the nearest slope to shade his wincing eyes and narrow them. "I see where we must have gone wrong," he said. "Let's go back."

The sun was still glaring in our eyes when we came to a place where the path forked. I supposed I must have been too distracted by Valencia to notice it before. Ludwig took the right-hand path and we followed him almost blindly. On the mounds caged by shadows the lurid pines looked as artificial as Christmas trees, and too insubstantial with the dazzle that still lay across my eyes. All at once Ludwig halted in a gap between two mounds. "There's my stars again," Valencia said.

There were footprints on a track that crossed the one we were following, and some were unmistakably hers. Ludwig stared both ways along it and swung around. "We turned off too soon, that's all."

I felt as if the sunlight had blanked out my brain as I trudged after him. The path curved, and a mound cut off the light. The dazzle clung to my eyes, so that all I could distinguish were the huge recumbent shapes that loomed above the track. Around the bend I almost collided with Verona, who'd stopped because the Smith boys had. "This can't be right," Claude protested.

"I know that," Ludwig said more savagely than he might have liked their parents to hear.

We were back at the glade, and yet we hadn't passed the fork, unless we'd been too dazzled to notice. The glade was strewn with fallen needles and with footprints, which seemed so numerous that I could have imagined we'd crossed it more than once. Against the sun, which was only just above the mounds, the trees looked like sketches waiting to be filled in. I'd had enough of Ludwig's leadership; I was almost the oldest one there, after all. "Wait here, Valencia," I said and ran up the nearest mound.

I thought I'd find the way from the position of the sea, which had to be close. It was nowhere in sight, nor even audible, and I couldn't see or hear anything like a road. On every side mounds crowned with trees receded into an impenetrable distance. The forest seemed far larger than it ought to be, and it was as silent as a picture of itself. I couldn't panic when I'd taken the lead. "We'll have to phone," I said. "There must be a signal by now."

Ludwig gave me an unimpressed look. "Whom do you suggest calling?"

"Your parents will be closest, won't they? If they shout from the house we'll hear them."

"Maybe Stuart's right," Verona said.

Ludwig performed an extravagant shrug as if he was sloughing all responsibility. When he saw Claude reach for his mobile he snatched out his own, and then a voice intervened. "I didn't think you were the sort to make a noise in our woods."

Verona squealed and tried to look as if someone else had, while Claude and Ludwig stiffened to make sure nobody thought they'd been startled. Woodward was striding out of the sunlight across the glade, but I couldn't see where he'd come from; I hadn't even heard him until he spoke. It left me feeling useless as an observer or a pathfinder. Only Valencia seemed delighted. "How are you being so quiet?" she cried.

"You can be too. I'll show you how."

Valencia ran to take his hand. "Have you found my bracelet?"

"Don't bother Mr Woodward with that now," Verona said.

"The other rangers said we had to ask," Valencia protested with some pique.

"It wasn't there, Valencia," her sister said. "We all had a good look."

I didn't think I had, and I felt more excluded than ever. "Then someone must have taken it," Valencia said.

"Or something from the woods did," said Woodward.

"A magpie," Valencia cried.

"Something like that. They'll steal your eyes if you don't watch out. You won't believe what you find in the treetops."

"I'm sure it's very interesting, Mr Woodward," Ludwig said, "but we need to get home before dark."

"I'll take you. I'm going there now," Woodward said, and the sun went out behind him.

It felt as though the woods had swallowed the light. The sun was still behind the mounds, of course. At once the green of Woodward's uniform was several shades darker. As he led Valencia to the next path out of the glade, her sister and the Smith boys trooped after him. It was the path Ludwig had rejected, which was the best reason I could think of to use it. The track snaked between mounds too high and too close together to see beyond. Darkness appeared to be seeping out of the mounds to creep up the spiky trees, which might almost have been glowing from within. Valencia gazed up at them and said "Are we going to find my bracelet?"

"I'll make sure it shows up for you," Woodward said and gazed at her. "There are jewels everywhere in the woods if you look."

When I glanced about I seemed to see what he had in mind. Patterns had begun to glimmer on the mounds that flanked the path. The fallen needles were spangled with frost and beads of icy dew. The more I looked, the more the glittering patterns grew visible. They might have composed a single design too vast and complicated to grasp, leading away into the darkness that was closing in. The impression made the woods feel boundless, and I couldn't help blurting "Are you sure we're going home?"

Woodward turned his head so smoothly that I was reminded of an owl, by his round-eyed gaze as well. "I'm seeing you do," he said.

Perhaps I was jealous because Valencia had so readily transferred her trust from me to him, but I no longer liked the look of him. His face seemed more heavily jowled, almost froglike, and his diminutive features looked somehow separate from it, as if they were emerging from a lair of flesh. I could almost have imagined that the dusk had added to his bulk. I was keeping up with him and the others only because I didn't want to lose sight of them. As I tried to concentrate on the path and ignore the patterns in the twilight I had the notion that although the shadows of the pines weren't visible, they were all around us-—that we were walking into a cage we couldn't see. I couldn't have said so or anything like it, not least because I would have sounded like Valencia. There was silence except for muffled footsteps until a chatter as dry as a rattle of bones came from the treetops. "Magpies," Valencia cried. "Can we see if they've got my bracelet?"

The trees had given up their hold on the last of the light, and she peered towards the noise, looking for a side track. "Not there, Valencia," Woodward said.

I wasn't sure why I blurted "How do you know?"

Verona and the Smith boys scowled at me as if I'd betrayed how tactless I was. "That isn't the way home," Woodward said. "Come along, Valencia, or you won't see the secret way I take my friends."

"Do as Mr Woodward says," Verona told her. Valencia raised her eyes to him and then turned back to the path. Everyone seemed relieved that she'd decided to go along with him—everyone except me. They must have been happy for him to say whatever might take us home quickest. As I watched the thickset figure lead Valencia along the twisted path between the looming mounds into the woods that appeared to be drawing the dusk towards us, I had the notion that his ranger's uniform was greener than it ought to be—as green as moss, and glowing like it in the dimness. I even thought his jacket had too much of the texture of moss. Suspicion or confusion made me call out "Aren't you supposed to have a badge?"

"Am I being questioned?" Woodward let go of Valencia's hand while he reached inside his jacket to lift out a rectangular plaque on a cord around his neck. "Here I am for all to see," he said.

I barely glimpsed the badge before it swung against his chest. All I'd seen was his last name and a blur where a photograph should be—a blotch like moss or fungus. "I didn't see that properly," I objected.

"We did," said Ludwig, "and we don't want any more delays."

He was making me sound as young as Valencia. I wasn't even sure that he'd had time to examine the badge or that anyone else had. Woodward recaptured Valencia's hand before he led the way beyond a mound. As the others followed him I noticed that the trees beside the path were carved with names. That ought to have made the path feel more frequently used, but then how could it be a secret route? I was about to draw everyone's attention when I heard Woodward say "There it is for you, Valencia. There, up high."

She cried out, and I ran around the hillock onto a crooked stretch of path. Valencia was clinging to Woodward's hand while she tilted her head to gaze into the treetops. "It's just like my bracelet," she cried.

The full moon was nesting among the highest branches ahead. It was as pale as Woodward's face but growing brighter, as though only the sun had held it back. At first I thought it was all Valencia meant, and then, as I followed the twisted path, I saw something that choked off my breath. Other shapes in the treetops had crept out of hiding. Lined up behind the silhouetted branches were all the phases of the moon.

There were crescents at each end of the pallid parade, and gibbous moons on either side of the full one, and every incomplete form of the moon in between. "Can you see?" Valencia urged everyone.

"It's the moon," Ludwig said, and Claude agreed with him.

"Don't stop," Verona told her. "You can look at it while we're walking."

I almost wished that I could borrow their unawareness if it would somehow keep me safe. I might even have tried to believe that Valencia's imagination had inflamed mine if Woodward hadn't murmured "Wait till they're up there, then they'll see."

While I didn't understand this, it disturbed me even more than the sight of all the thirteen moons. I was opening my mouth with no idea what to say when I heard a sound I would never have expected to welcome—a clash of glass. It came from the direction where we'd heard the chatter of the magpies, and it meant that the recycling bins full of Christmas bottles all along our road were being emptied. "We're going the wrong way," I said not as loud or as steadily as I would have liked. "There's home."

Everybody had to stop and turn to see where I was pointing, but Woodward only swivelled his head. It looked as if an extra moon had sunk to earth and was spinning slowly in the air beside Valencia. Nobody moved to join me, even when another clatter of glass came through the woods. "You can hear that," I almost begged. "They're collecting bottles on our road."

"Nothing of the kind," said Woodward. "They'll be boys like the ones who were chasing you, dumping rubbish in my woods."

"Then you'd better go and stop them," I dared to say. "We'll come too."

"I'll see to all of you first," Woodward said and turned owards the frieze of moons entangled in the branches. "Come along, Valencia. We don't want you anywhere near that sort of boy."

"Hold my hand, Valencia," I called in desperation if not panic. "You did before."

"Keep hold of Mr Woodward's," Verona said at once. "He's in charge."

She and the Smith boys gave me a backward glance that felt like a dismissal. Too late I realised that I should have taken Valencia's hand without announcing my intentions. "I'm going this way," I declared in the hope that my determination would infect the others, but I must have sounded childishly petulant. As I stalked off the path I was met by the chattering of magpies and the clash of a binful of bottles landing in a wagon. Behind me Woodward called "They're all waiting for you." I kept on and didn't look back, and then I heard no sound of any kind.

I told myself that if Valencia cried for help I would go back—if anybody did—but I felt shamefully relieved when the woods stayed as silent as the moon. When I looked back at last I couldn't even see the path. The moon—just a full one—outlined the mounds and showed me the way ahead.

Eventually I found that the rattle of bottles had brought me to the track that ended almost opposite my house. I sneaked across the road like a burglar. I was hoping to retreat to my room and put off any questions, but as I opened the front door my mother silenced the vacuum cleaner. "Did you have a good time with your chums?" she said.

"They went off in the woods with a ranger."

"Wipe your feet, Stuart." When she was satisfied at last she said "Why didn't you stay with them?"

"I didn't like him." My face felt capable of betraying my feelings, and my words almost let me down. "They didn't like me," I blurted on the way to my room.

Apart from the last remark, all this was some of what I told Mr Smith when he rang hours later, and Mrs Turner when she came to the house, looking like the headmistress she was and determined to establish the truth. At first she didn't seem to think it could be serious. The police did by the time they visited the house, because they interrogated me at length. I told them I'd been suspicious of Woodward and had tried to warn the others, who hadn't wanted to listen to somebody like me. I did my best to describe him, growing more nervous as I realised what I was describing—a face as jowly as the Smiths had but with features as small and delicate as Verona's and Valencia's. He didn't look like any of the photographs the police showed me. The sketch they made looked more like him, but it didn't help. Nobody called Woodward or of his description had ever worked as a ranger. The police never found a trace of him, nor any of the children who'd followed him into the woods at dusk.

For a while we had quite a few visitors, and then we had none at all, and nobody even spoke much to us. I felt blamed for returning alone from the woods, as if I didn't already blame myself enough, but what was I supposed to have done? I think everybody's mute reproof made my mother feel worse still, and by the summer she'd put the house up for sale. Before Christmas we were living in a house not much more than half the size in the next town.

She kept encouraging me to make new friends, but I was afraid to. I'd seen what happened when I tried. I did my best to lose myself in schoolwork instead, and aside from that I wrote stories in my room. I did well enough at my new school to come to university, hundreds of miles from the woods, but that hasn't helped me either. Everyone regards me as an outsider, because I've made sure I am. My room in the hall of residence is several storeys higher than my bedroom at home, but it makes no difference. It hasn't stopped the dreams, if that's all they are. I still hear the voice at night, just outside my window.

I want to think I never heard it, even on the day before we moved house—especially then. I don't know what I hoped to achieve by returning to the woods. I only knew I had to look, and I told my mother I was going for a last walk on the beach. I left her in the house so full of cartons that it felt as if she'd tried to box up every trace of clutter and only made another kind. I was glad nobody was in sight as I headed for the path.

I wandered through the woods for hours and found nothing at all. I couldn't even find the glade from which Ludwig had led us onto the path that turned back on itself. The woods were as silent as a secret waiting to be discovered. The only sign of humanity was the occasional name carved on a tree-trunk. The late October sun sank towards the mounds as if the pines were lowering it into its grave, and I turned homeward before nightfall. All that kept me peering about at the multitude of trees was the notion that I'd overlooked something in the dusk. Where had I seen it, or had I heard it? I could think of nothing I'd encountered that day—and then, with more unease than relief, I knew what I'd heard. It hadn't been that day, however. I was remembering Woodward's final words: "They're all waiting for you." At last I realised that he hadn't been talking to me.

As if the realisation had opened up my mind I glanced to the left and saw a path where I'd thought there were only random gaps between mounds. Names and dates were carved on the trees that flanked it, which seemed to prove that ordinary people used it. In any case it appeared to lead homeward. It took me around a series of hillocks, each one more steeped in darkness than the last. The declining light inked in the letters and numbers carved on the trees, and I saw that each name was followed by two dates—two years separated by a hyphen. Directly ahead of me were four names I knew all too well, the boys to the left of the path, the girls on the right. The second of their years was the same for everyone—that year.

As the sight held me as immobile as any of the trees I sensed that I was being watched. Perhaps my dread had brought him. He was almost hidden by a mound—I could have thought he was sprouting from it—but I saw enough of his greenish silhouette among the trees. This time he was only starting to have a face, and I guessed he still hadn't bothered with fingernails. I might have been forced to look closer if I hadn't heard a voice.

It wasn't his. It was Valencia's. "Up here," it called so softly that I might not have heard it except for the silence. I was afraid that if I raised my eyes I would see the multiplied moons, but what I saw when I couldn't keep my gaze down was yet more terrible. Valencia and Verona were there, and Claude and Ludwig too, in the midst of many other bodies turning sluggishly in the treetops.

I didn't know if they were dangling like the contents of some creature's larder or hovering of their own unnatural accord. I couldn't grasp the expression that every face bore—in the gathering twilight I couldn't even tell whether they were blind. They were aware of me in some way, because as all the bodies swung in unison towards me they stretched out their arms to me. I was struggling to believe I'd seen none of this as I let out a savage cry and fled.

I don't know how I found my way to the road—perhaps because I'd been let go for the moment. I was able to take refuge in my room before my mother saw me, and I managed to pretend at dinner that nothing was wrong or at least not to say what was. The next day I started trying to forget, and years later I practically had until I heard that vandals had destroyed the woods—set fire to them during this summer's drought. None of the things I remembered were found, but where does that mean they've gone? The trees outside are as high as my room, and the wind in them sounds like a voice. If I look out, will I see the faces turning blindly in the air? "Up here," the voice whispers, but I already am. I would only need to step onto the sill and out of the window into the moonlight to be one of them at last. Perhaps then my mother would be proud.

The Callers

First published in Four For Fear, June 2012

Mark's grandmother seems barely to have left the house when his grandfather says "Can you entertain yourself for a bit? I could do with going to the pub while I've got the chance."

Mark wonders how much they think they've entertained him, but he only says "Will grandma be all right coming home on her own?"

"Never fret, son. They can look after theirselves." The old man's hairy caterpillar eyebrows squirm as he frowns at Mark and blinks his bleary eyes clear. "No call for you to fetch her. It's women's stuff, the bingo." He gives the boy's shoulder an unsteady squeeze and mutters "You're a good sort to have around."

Mark feels awkward and a little guilty that he's glad he doesn't have to meet his grandmother. "Maybe I'll go to a film."

"You'd better have a key, then." His grandfather rummages among the contents of a drawer of the shaky sideboard—documents in ragged envelopes, rubber bands so desiccated they snap when he takes hold of them, a balding reel of cotton, a crumpled folder stuffed with photographs—and hauls out a key on a frayed noose of string. "Keep hold of that for next time you come," he says.

Does he mean Mark will be visiting by himself in future? Was last night's argument so serious? His mother objected when his grandfather offered him a glass of wine at dinner, and then her mother accused her of not letting Mark grow up. Before long the women were shouting at each other about how Mark's grandmother had brought up her daughter, and the men only aggravated the conflict by trying to calm it down. It continued after Mark went to bed, and this morning his father informed him that he and Mark's mother were going home several days early. "You can stay if you like," she told Mark. Was she testing his loyalty or hoping he would make up for her behaviour? While her face kept her thoughts to itself his father handed him the ticket for the train home like a business card, one man to another. Mark's mother spent some time in listing ways he shouldn't let anyone down, but these didn't include going to the cinema. Wearing his coat was among the requirements, and so he takes it from the stand in the hall. "Step out, lad," his grandfather says as Mark lingers on the pavement directly outside the front door. "You don't want an old crock slowing you down."

At the corner of the street Mark glances back. The old man is limping after him, resting a hand on the roof of each car parked with two wheels on the pavement. Another narrow similarly terraced street leads into the centre of the small Lancashire town, where lamps on scalloped iron poles are stuttering alight beneath a congested late April sky. Many of the shops are shuttered, and some are boarded up. Just a few couples stroll past deserted pristine kitchens and uninhabited items of attire. Most of the local amusements have grown too childish for Mark, though he might still enjoy bowling or a game of indoor golf if he weren't by himself, and others are years out of bounds—the pubs, the clubs waiting for the night crowds while doormen loiter outside like wrestlers dressed for someone's funeral. Surely the cinema won't be so particular about its customers. More than one of Mark's schoolmates has shown him the scene from Facecream on their phones, where the girl gets cream squirted all over her face.

As he hurries past the clubs he thinks a doorman is shouting behind him, but the large voice is down a side street full of shops that are nailed shut. At first he fancies that it's chanting inside one of them, and then he sees an old theatre at the far end. While he can't distinguish the words, the rhythm makes it clear he's hearing a bingo caller. Mark could imagine that all the blank-faced doormen are determined to ignore the voice.

The Frugoplex is beyond the clubs, across a car park for at least ten times as many vehicles as it presently contains. The lobby is scattered with popcorn, handfuls of which have been trodden into the purple carpet. A puce rope on metal stilts leads the queue for tickets back and forth and twice again on the way to the counter. When Mark starts to duck under the rope closest to the end of the queue, a man behind the counter scowls at him, and so he follows the rope all the way around, only just heading off two couples of about his own age who stoop under. He's hoping to avoid the disgruntled man, but the queue brings Mark to him. "Facecream, please," Mark says and holds out a ten-pound note.

"Don't try it on with me, laddie," the man says and turns his glare on the teenagers who have trailed Mark to the counter. "And your friends needn't either."

"He's not our friend," one of the boys protests.

"I reckon not when he's got you barred."

Mark's face has grown hot, but he can't just walk away or ask to see a film he's allowed to watch. "I don't know about them, but I'm fifteen."

"And I'm your sweet old granny. That's it now for the lot of you. Don't bother coming to my cinema." The manager tells his staff at the counter "Have a good look at this lot so you'll know them."

Mark stumbles almost blindly out of the multiplex. He's starting across the car park when somebody mutters behind him "He wants his head kicked in."

They're only words, but they express his feelings. "That's what he deserves," Mark agrees and turns to his new friends.

It's immediately clear that they weren't thinking of the manager. "You got us barred," says the girl who didn't speak.

"I didn't mean to. You oughtn't to have stood so close."

"Doesn't matter what you meant," she says, and the other girl adds "We'll be standing a lot closer. Standing on your head."

Mark can't take refuge in the cinema, but running would look shameful and invite pursuit as well. Instead he tramps at speed across the car park. His shadow lurches ahead, growing paler as it stretches, and before long it has company, jerking forward to catch up on either side of him. He still stops short of bolting but strides faster. He's hoping passers-by will notice his predicament, but either they aren't interested or they're determined not to be. At last he reaches the nightclubs, and is opening his mouth to appeal to the nearest doorman when the fellow says "Keep walking, lad."

"They're after me."

The doorman barely glances beyond Mark, and his face stays blank. "Walk on."

It could be advice, though it sounds like a dismissal. It leaves Mark feeling that he has been identified as an outsider, and he thinks the doormen's impassive faces are warning him not to loiter. He would make for the police station if he knew where it is. He mustn't go to his grandparents' house in case they become scapegoats as well, and there's just one sanctuary he can think of. He dodges into the side street towards the bingo hall.

The street looks decades older than the main road and as though it has been forgotten for at least that long. Three streetlamps illuminate the cracked roadway bordered by grids that are clogged with old leaves. The glow is too dim to penetrate the gaps between the boards that have boxed up the shop fronts, because the lanterns are draped with grey cobwebs laden with drained insects. The only sign of life apart from a rush of footsteps behind Mark is the amplified voice, still delivering its blurred chant. It might almost be calling out to him, and he breaks into a run.

So do his pursuers, and he's afraid that the bingo hall may be locked against intruders. Beyond the grubby glass of three pairs of doors the foyer is deserted; nobody is in the ticket booth or behind the refreshment counter. His pursuers hesitate as he sprints to the nearest pair of doors, but when neither door budges, the gang closes in on him. He nearly trips on the uneven marble steps as he stumbles along them. He throws all his weight, such as it is, against the next set of doors, which give so readily that he almost sprawls on the threadbare carpet of the foyer.

The caller seems to raise his voice to greet him. "Sixty-three," he's announcing, "just like me." The pursuers glare at Mark from the foot of the shallow steps. "You can't stay in there," one girl advises him, and the other shouts "Better not try."

All the gang look determined to wait for him. If they don't tire of it by the time the bingo players go home, surely they won't dare to let themselves be identified, and so Mark shuts the doors and crosses the foyer. The entrance to the auditorium is flanked by old theatrical posters, more than one of which depicts a plump comedian with a sly schoolboyish face. Mark could imagine they're sharing a joke about him as he pushes open the doors to the auditorium.

The theatre seats have been cleared out, but the stage remains. It faces a couple of dozen tables, most of which are surrounded by women with score cards in front of them and stumpy pencils in their hands. The stage is occupied by a massive lectern bearing a large transparent globe full of numbered balls. Mark might fancy that he knows why the posters looked secretly amused, because the man in them is behind the lectern. He looks decades older, and the weight of his face has tugged it piebald as well as out of shape, but his grin hasn't entirely lost its mischief, however worn it seems. Presumably his oversized suit and baggy shirt are meant to appear comical rather than suggest a youngster wearing cast-off clothes. He examines a ball before returning it to the globe, which he spins on its pivot. "Three and three," he says as his eyes gleam blearily at Mark. "What do you see?" he adds, and all the women eye the newcomer.

At first Mark can't see his grandmother. He's distracted by a lanky angular woman who extends her speckled arms across the table nearest to him. "Lost your mammy, son?" she cries. "There's plenty here to tend to you."

For an uneasy moment he thinks she has reached for her breast to indicate how motherly she is, but she's adjusting her dress, her eagerness to welcome him having exposed a mound of wrinkled flesh. Before he can think of an answer his grandmother calls "What are you doing here, Mark?"

She's at a table close to the stage. He doesn't want to make her nervous for him if there's no need, and he's ashamed of having run away. The uncarpeted floorboards amplify every step he takes, so that he feels as if he's trying to sound bigger than he is. All the women and the bingo caller watch his progress, and he wonders if everybody hears him mutter "I went to the cinema but they wouldn't let me see the film."

As his grandmother makes to speak one of her three companions leans forward, flattening her forearms on the table to twice their width. "However old are you, son?"

"Mark's thirteen," says his grandmother.

Another of her friends nods vigorously, which she has been doing ever since Mark caught sight of her. "Thirteen," she announces, and many of the women coo or hoot with enthusiasm.

"Looks old enough to me," says the third of his grandmother's tablemates, who is sporting more of a moustache than Mark has achieved. "Enough of a man."

"Well, we've shown you off now," Mark's grandmother tells him. "I'll see you back at home."

This provokes groans throughout the auditorium. The woman who asked his age raises her hands, and her forearms sag towards the elbows. "Don't keep him to yourself, Lottie."

The nodding woman darts to grab a chair for him. "You make this the lucky table, Mark."

He's disconcerted to observe how frail his grandmother is by comparison with her friends, though they're at least as old as she is. The bingo caller gives him a crooked grin and shouts "Glad to have another feller here. Safety in numbers, lad."

Presumably this is a joke of some kind, since quite a few women giggle. Mark's grandmother doesn't, but says "Can he have a card?"

This prompts another kind of laughter, and the nodding woman even manages to shake her head. "It's the women's game, lad," the caller says. "Are you ladies ready to play?"

"More than ever," the moustached woman shouts, which seems somehow to antagonise Mark's grandmother. "Sit down if you're going to," she says. "Stop drawing attention to yourself."

He could retort that she has just done that to him. He's unable to hide his blazing face as he crouches on the spindly chair while the bingo caller elevates the next ball from the dispenser. "Eighty-seven," he reads out. "Close to heaven."

The phrase earns mirth and other noises of appreciation as the women duck in unison to their cards. They chortle or grunt if they find the number, grimacing if they fail. Nobody at Mark's table has located it when the man at the lectern calls "Number forty, old and naughty."

"That's us and no mistake," the moustached woman screeches before whooping at the number on her card.

"Number six, up to tricks."

"That's us as well," her friend cries, but all her nodding doesn't earn her the number.

"Forty-nine, you'll be fine."

The third woman crosses out the number, and flesh cascades down her arm as she lifts the pencil. "He's that with bells on," she says, favouring Mark with a wink.

He has to respond, though the smile feels as if his swollen lips are tugging at his hot stiff face. "Three and twenty," the man at the lectern intones. "There'll be plenty."

Mark's grandmother hunches over the table. He could think she's trying to evade the phrase or the coos of delight it elicits from the rest of the players, but she's marking the number on her card. She seems anxious to win, staying bent close to the card as the bingo caller consults the next ball. "Six and thirty," he says, and a roguish grin twists the left side of his mouth. "Let's get dirty."

He pokes at the grin with a finger as if he wants to push the words back in, although they've raised appreciative squeals throughout the auditorium. The fleshy woman falls to her card so eagerly that every visible part of her wobbles. "That'll do me," she cries.

Presumably she means his suggestion, since she hasn't completed her card. Mark sees his grandmother glance nervously at it and then stare at her own as though striving to conjure up a number. "Four and four," the caller says and almost at once "There's the door."

The moustached woman rubs her upper lip so hard that Mark fancies he hears the hairs crackle. "Never mind that," she tells the caller.

He blinks at her and stares around the hall. Mark feels more out of place than ever, as though he's listening to jokes too old for him—beyond his comprehension, at any rate. The caller's drooping face grows defiant as he identifies the next ball. "Ninety-five," he says. "Leave alive."

This brings no laughter, just a murmur that falls short of words. At least Mark's grandmother has found the number on her card. She needs three more to win, and he's surprised by how much he hopes she will. He puts the wish into his eyes as he gazes up at the stage. "Number fifty," the caller says in a tone that seems almost as mechanical as the dispenser. "He'll be nifty."

"Aye," several women respond, and the quivering woman gives Mark another wink.

"Eighty-one, nearly done."

"That's me," the nodding woman agrees, bowing to her card as if the motion of her head has overtaken the rest of her.

Perhaps she means her age, since the irregular cross she makes doesn't finish off the card. "Twenty-nine," the caller says, keeping his eyes on the ball he's raised between the fingertips of both hands. "See the sign."

If the players do so, they keep quiet about it, not even greeting the number or bemoaning their luck. The caller displays the next ball like a magician and puts a finger to the edge of a grin that's meant to appear mysterious. "Sixty-three," he says. "Time to flee."

The murmur this provokes is unamused, and he concentrates on the ball that rolls out of the dispenser. "Twenty-four," he says. "Can't do more."

His gaze is drifting towards Mark when the fleshy woman emits a shriek that jabs deep into the boy's ears. "We're done," she cries. "It's mine."

The caller shuts the globe and extends a hand. "Give us a look."

As she mounts the steps to the stage a series of tremors passes through her body, starting at her veinous legs. Having checked her numbers against those that came up, the caller says "We've a winner."

She snatches the card and plods back to the table, where Mark sees how the crosses resemble sketches of gravestones, at least until she turns the card the right way up. She lowers herself onto her creaking chair and says "I claim the special."

The caller doesn't look at her or anywhere near her. "It's not time yet," he tells whoever needs to hear.

While he leans on the lectern to say so he puts Mark in mind of a priest in a pulpit, though the comparison seems wrong in some way Mark doesn't understand. He's distracted by his grandmother, who lays down her pencil next to the card scattered with the kind of crosses all the women have been drawing. "I'll do without my luck tonight," she says and grasps his arm to help her stand up. "Time someone was at home."

"Don't be like that," the fleshy woman says. "You can't just go running off."

"I won't be running anywhere." As Mark wonders whether that's defiance or the painful truth his grandmother says "I'll see you all another night."

"See us now and see yourself." The speaker nods so violently that her words grow jagged. "You're still one of us."

"I'm not arguing," Mark's grandmother says and grips his arm harder. "Come along now, Mark."

He doesn't know how many women murmur as she turns towards the exit. While he can't make out their words, they sound unhappy if not worse, and all of them are closer than the exit. Nobody moves as long as he can see them, and he finds he would rather not look back. His grandmother has almost led him out, clutching his arm so tightly that it throbs, when the lanky woman who first greeted him plants a hand on her breast again. Though she could be expressing emotion, Mark has the unwelcome fancy that she's about to bare the wizened breast to him. His grandmother hurries him past, and the doors to the foyer are lumbering shut behind them when a woman says "We aren't done."

Mark hopes she's addressing the man on the stage—urging him to start the next game—but he hasn't heard the caller by the time he and his grandmother emerge onto the steps. The street is deserted, and he suspects that the couples who followed him from the cinema are long gone. Outside the clubs the doormen keep their faces blank at the sight of him and his escort, who is leaning on him as much as leading him. She's quiet until they reach the shops, where she mutters "I wish you hadn't gone there tonight, Mark. We're meant to be responsible for you."

He feels guiltier than he understands. She says nothing more while they make their increasingly slow way home. She's about to ring the doorbell with her free hand when Mark produces the key. "Isn't he in?" she protests.

"He went to the pub."

"Men," she says so fiercely that Mark feels sentenced too. She slams the door by tottering against it and says "I think you should be in your bed."

He could object that it isn't his bedtime—that he doesn't know what offence he's committed—but perhaps he isn't being punished, in which case he isn't sure he wants to learn her reason for sending him to his room. He trudges up the narrow boxed-in stairs to the decidedly compact bathroom, where every item seems too close to him, not least the speckled mirror that frames his uneasy face. The toothpaste tastes harsher than usual, and he does his best to stay inaudible while spitting it into the sink. As he dodges into the smaller of the two front bedrooms he sees his grandmother sitting at the bottom of the stairs. He retreats under the quilt of the single bed against the wall beneath the meagre window and listens for his grandfather.

He doesn't know how long he has kept his eyes shut by the time he hears the front door open below him. His grandmother starts to talk at once, and he strains to catch her words. "Did you send Mark to fetch me tonight?"

"I told him to stay clear," Mark's grandfather says not quite as low. "What did he see?"

"It isn't what he saw, it's what they did."

"Are you still up to that old stuff? Makes you all feel powerful, does it?"

"I'll tell you one thing, Len—you don't any more." Just as righteously she says "I don't remember you crying about it too much when it was your turn."

"Well, it's not now."

"It shouldn't be our house at all." This sounds accusing, especially when she adds "If there's any talking to be done you can do it."

Apparently that's all. Mark hears his grandparents labour up the stairs and take turns to make various noises in the bathroom that remind him how old they are. He finds himself wondering almost at random whether they'll take him to the celebrations tomorrow on the town green; they have on other May Days. The prospect feels like a reward if not a compensation for some task. The door of the other front bedroom shuts, and he hears a series of creaks that mean his grandparents have taken to their bed.

For a while the night is almost quiet enough to let him drift into sleep, except that he feels as if the entire house is alert. He's close to dozing when he hears a distant commotion. At first he thinks a doorman outside a club is shouting at someone, perhaps a bunch of drunks, since several people respond. There's something odd about the voice and the responses too. Mark lifts his head from the lumpy pillow and strives to identify what he's hearing, and then he realises his efforts are unnecessary. The voice and its companions are approaching through the town.

Mark does his best to think he's misinterpreting what he hears. The voices sound uncomfortably close by the time he can't mistake them. "Seventy-four," the leader calls, and the ragged chorus answers "Knock on his door." Mark is additionally disconcerted by recognising that the caller isn't the man who was on the stage. However large and resonant it is, it's a woman's voice.

"Number ten," it calls, and the chant responds "Find the men." The chorus is nearly in unison now, and the performance puts Mark in mind of a priest and a congregation—some kind of ritual, at any rate. He kicks the quilt away and kneels on the yielding mattress to scrag the curtain and peer through the window. Even when he presses his cheek against the cold glass, all of the street that he can see is deserted. His breath swells up on the pane and shrinks as the first voice cries "Sweet thirteen" and the rest chant "While he's green."

They sound surer of themselves with every utterance, and they aren't all that troubles Mark. Although he knows that the houses opposite are occupied, every window is dark and not a single curtain stirs. Is everyone afraid to look? Why are his grandparents silent? For a few of Mark's breaths the nocturnal voices are too, but he can hear a muffled shuffling—the noise of a determined march. Then the caller announces "Pair of fives," and as her followers chant "We're the wives" the procession appears at the end of the road.

It's led by the fleshy woman. As she advances up the middle of the street she's followed by her moustached friend and the nodding one, and then their fellow players limp or trot or hobble in pairs around the corner. The orange glow of the streetlamp lends them a rusty tinge like an unnatural tan. Mark doesn't need to count them to be certain that the parade includes everybody from the bingo hall except the man who was onstage and Mark's grandmother. As his grip on the windowsill bruises his fingers the fleshy woman declares "Ninety-eight."

She has a handful of bingo cards and is reading out the numbers. "We're his fate," the procession declares with enthusiasm, and Mark sees eyes glitter, not only with the streetlight. The moustached woman wipes her upper lip with a finger and thumb while her partner in the procession nods so eagerly that she looks in danger of succumbing to a fit. "Eighty-nine," their leader intones as if she's reading from a missal, and the parade almost as long as the street chants "He'll be mine."

They're close enough for Mark to see the fleshy woman join in the response. He sees her quivering from head to foot with every step she takes towards him, and then his attention is caught by the lanky woman in the middle of the procession. She's by no means alone in fumbling at a breast as though she's impatient to give it the air. That's among the reasons why Mark lets go of the curtain and the windowsill to huddle under the quilt. Once upon a time he might have believed this would hide him, but it doesn't even shut out the voices below the window. "Twenty-four," the caller shouts and joins in the chant of "Here's the door."

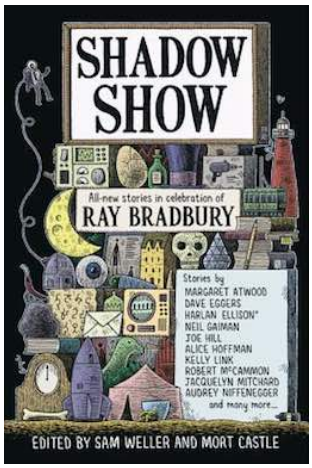
This is entirely too accurate for Mark's liking. It's the number of the house. As he hugs his knees with his clasped arms and grinds his spine against the wall he hears a muffled rumble close to him. Someone has opened the window of the next bedroom. Mark holds his breath until his grandfather shouts "Not here. Like Lottie says, you've been here once."

"That was a long time ago, Len." Mark can't tell whether this is reminiscent or dismissive, but the tone doesn't quite leave the fleshy woman's voice as she says "It's either you or him."

After a pause the window rumbles shut, and Mark finds it hard to breathe. He hears footsteps padding down the stairs—whose, he doesn't know—and the front door judders open. This is followed by an outburst of shuffling, first in the street and almost at once to some extent inside the house. As it begins to mount the stairs Mark hears the caller's voice, though it's little more than a whisper. "Number one," she prompts, and a murmuring chorus responds "Let's be mum." Is it proposing a role to play or enjoining secrecy? Mark can't judge, even when the procession sets about chanting in a whisper "Mum, mum, mum..." The repetition seems to fill the house, which feels too small for it, especially once the front door closes behind the last of the procession. The chorus can't blot out the shuffling, which sounds like the restlessness of an impatient queue. All Mark can do is squeeze his eyes so tight that the darkness throbs in time with his pulse, and he manages not to look until he hears a door creep open.

The Page



"...my wife and I spent two weeks in Rhodes. As we sunbathed I turned over ideas in my mind for a Bradbury tribute, and on a windy day one blew along—the sight of a man in pursuit of a page that a gust had torn out of the book he was reading on the beach. Thank heaven I always take a notebook with me!"—Ramsey Campbell, Afterword to the story in Shadow Show

First published in Shadow Show: All New Stories In Celebration Of Ray Bradbury, July 2012

That day the Aegean might have been a nest of dragons with teeth of white foam. The leaping waves were scaly bodies blue as metal, and the noonday sunlight lent them glittering reptile eyes. The wind from the sea was their breath so hot it turned its spittle into a desiccated spray of sand. "The dragons are back, Joyce," Ewan said.

"That's right, dear."

He couldn't tell if she recalled her flight of fancy here on the beach all those years ago or was simply humouring him. Perhaps she hadn't even heard him for the wind, which flapped his shirt and her long silken shawl on the backs of the sunbeds as though equipping the couple with wings. It had already felled several umbrellas, strewing them alongside the tideless sea. Just a few determined tourists were staying on the beach, fat novels clamped open in front of their faces with both hands, while the most adventurous souls braved the waves. Surely Joyce wouldn't, and Ewan was sinking back with an obese best-seller when he heard a cry. "Stop there, stop."

The voice was almost indistinguishable from the wind. Ewan had to sit up to locate the man, who'd dashed onto the beach at the westward end of Ikonikos, where the sunbeds gave out and the clusters of clifftop apartments fell short of a few isolated villas. The wind tugged a linen suit taut on the man's thin frame and made an unruly halo out of his white hair. He was chasing a page that the wind must have torn out of a book. "Joyce," Ewan said.

She peered at him while the wind disarranged the greyest of her locks before hitching herself around on the sunbed. "What do you want me to see?"

"It was just a chap running after a bit of his book."

The man and his papery game had disappeared around the rocks that screened the next inlet, and Joyce settled back with a sigh. "That wasn't worth it, Ewan."

He would rather feel accused than risk emphasising the effort she'd had to make. He was silent as she retrieved her book, which needed to diet as much as his did. The wind tousled the pages, and before long Joyce let her novel drop on her venerable canvas bag. "I'm going in."

On days like this Ewan was all the more aware of never having learned to swim. "I wouldn't mind some lunch."

"Don't you ever think of anything except your stomach?" Joyce gave the sagging bulge a wearily indulgent glance. "Jump up, then," she said. "Give it a chance to behave."

No doubt she meant the weather. Ewan struggled to his feet and managed to wriggle into his playfully fluttering shirt in time to offer Joyce his arm. She mustn't want to seem to need it, since she let go too soon, almost falling on if not across the bed. "I can manage," she protested when he clutched her yielding waist, and wouldn't let him carry the bag.

At least the Philosophia was just above their section of the beach. The waiters had lowered a plastic sheet to protect the taverna from the wind. The sheet blurred the view like a cataract and palpitated loudly throughout the meal. Joyce helped finish several dishes and more than half of the carafe of wine, by which time the sea was rearing as fiercely as ever. "Will you get the towels?" she said. "I think I'll have a nap."

Once she would have done so on the beach. Ewan retrieved the towels and clambered up the unequal steps embedded in the cliff. On the road that had sprouted apartments and hotels since the couple had last stayed in Ikonikos, Joyce took his hand. He suspected she needed more support than she would admit on the uphill road.

The Mnemosyne Apartments were near the middle of the village. Children too young for school or absent from one were keeping the play area beside the bar alive. Ewan knew Joyce hoped to see the grandchildren there or somewhere similar. As he fumbled in the bag he experienced the familiar panic at losing a key. "For heaven's sake let me," Joyce complained.

She took longer than he already had. A good deal of heat was occupying their room. Ewan switched on the air-conditioning as Joyce lay down. She reached out a hand for him to squeeze while he took his place on the other narrow bed. As soon as he closed his eyes he saw the man chasing the page along the beach. How important had it been? Had its owner recaptured it? The questions kept sleep well out of reach, and before long Ewan swung his legs off the bed. "I'm just going out. You rest."

Joyce put out a slack hand and thought of opening her eyes. "Can't you wait for me?"

"I only want to try and find the shop that had our favourite olives."

She released a breath so protracted he heard it begin to give out—the kind that always made him breathless until he heard another. "Don't be long," she eventually said.

He didn't mean to be. They weren't often apart now that they'd retired, but whenever they were he grew anxious until he saw her again. She stirred as he let a blaze of sunlight in. The sight of her frail shape under the thin sheet was dismayingly suggestive of a memory he was trying to commit to mind. "Go if you're going," she mumbled, and he had to close the door.

He made for the cliff path where the running man had come from. In the past the dusty roads had boasted just a few tavernas, but now those were outnumbered by bars full of Brits watching football on huge flat screens like paintings brought to life. The wind had ripped blossoms from trees and shrubs and vines, strewing the roads with them—even cactus flowers had been torn loose, and the spiky clubs of leaves. The spectacle put Ewan in mind of the wake of a parade—not of a funeral, not that kind of wake.

He couldn't see the man at any of the villas outside Ikonikos, all of which were white as tombs and gave as little sign of life. Instinct, if even that, took him down the cliff path. The sea was still helplessly restless, although at the horizon it appeared to be promising peace. The wind drove Ewan along the beach and unfurled veils of sand for him to walk on. Beyond the rocky outcrop the next bay was unpopulated. Nothing moved except the waves and, trapped by the wind in a crevice of the cliff, a lively piece of paper.

Ewan picked his way to it as the wind set it beckoning. More than once his sandals missed a foothold on the slippery rocks, so that he was afraid of twisting an ankle or worse. His bare legs were stinging with sand and salt spray by the time he grabbed the piece of paper. It was the last page of a book called Sending Them to God.

Other than the title it contained just four words: "but there is none." Why had the man been so desperate to retrieve it? How reassured would he have felt if he had? The words had no such effect on Ewan, who was inclined to give the page back to the wind. He might encounter the man, and he slipped it into his shirt pocket. He was peering at some odd marks in the crevice—they looked as if fingers had been groping ineffectually for the page, though they must have been made by the wind on the sand that was plastered to the cliff face—when the phone in his hip pocket emitted a clank. The message was from Joyce. where, it said.

Coming back. Ewan typed this as swiftly as he could without misspelling, and added Thought asleep. Even using less than complete sentences felt like abandoning responsibility—the kind they'd both shown while they were teaching. As he sent the message he wondered if Joyce could have been asking where she was. Surely neither of them had reached that state yet, if they ever would, but the thought revived his panic at being separated from her. He would have dashed up the cliff path if he'd felt capable. Instead he struggled into the wind along the beach.

As he opened the apartment door Joyce turned over beneath the sheet to welcome him—but her bed was empty, and the sheet was stirring in the wind. Ewan managed to postpone some of his consternation while he lurched across the room. She was on the balcony, gazing between two hotels at the sea. "Were you successful?" she said.

"I didn't find the shop." For fear of straying any further from the truth he said "I found the page the chap was after on the beach."

Joyce sighed and turned her hands up as though weighing the wind. "What do you think you have to prove to me, Ewan?"

"What would you like me to?"

"Don't make it sound as if it's my fault."

They were on the edge of the kind of argument that would take them beyond knowing where it had begun. Perhaps Joyce saw this, because she said "Show me what's so important, then."

She seemed indifferent to holding the page safe and gave it an unimpressed glance before letting Ewan retrieve it from her and the wind. "I don't see how that could mean much to anyone."

"I'll keep it with me in case we see him."

"You aren't going to spend our holiday looking when I don't suppose he even cares about it anymore."

"I won't be taking time to look for him."

"You did for that and never even told me you were." Before Ewan could think of an answer to risk she said "I was looking forward to those olives."

He should have realised this might be important to her when so much else had changed. "We'll look for them together."

They tried on their way to dinner. Perhaps the shop had turned into one that sold leather or T-shirts or silver or trinkets, some of them Greek. Several tavernas had become Chinese or Indian for the benefit or otherwise of British visitors. Last night Joyce and Ewan had located an old favourite, but the years appeared to have shrunk the portions and dried up the food while extracting much of its taste. The wind dropped as they decided which taverna to chance. The slitted sun peered like a dragon's solitary eye over the horizon, and a final breath ruffled the sea.

They were right to trust the restaurant, but Ewan felt Joyce didn't trust him. Whenever he glanced at passersby she gave him a sharp look. He did his best to talk about places they could revisit, though the discussion felt like a show they were performing, a sketch of a marriage. Later they sat on their balcony as the sky grew stars. Two nearby discos were competing at full volume, and Ewan couldn't grasp the peace the sky seemed to offer. When he and Joyce retreated into the apartment, the thumping beyond the window sounded even more like a pair of irregular hearts.

He waited until Joyce drew the sheet over herself before he hid the page beneath his pillow. Some instinct, unless it was just an effect of the retsina at dinner, made him feel he should keep the page safe. He switched off the light and found Joyce's hand. When it slackened he turned over. The wind fumbling about the balcony didn't keep him awake, and the disco beats seemed to fade into the distance. When he drifted out of sleep they'd fallen silent, leaving the wind to make what little noise it could. It wasn't the wind, since it sounded closer to him than the window, which he saw under the curtains was shut tight. The hint of activity wasn't enough to rouse him, but perhaps it disturbed Joyce, since as he settled back into slumber she tried to take his hand. He might have imagined the wind was attempting to do so, and how could she have found the hand when it was resting on his pillow, closer to the window than to her? Before the sensation was able to grow more substantial it left him, and he lacked the energy to drag himself awake.

Hours later the impression wakened him in daylight. Who had been groping at the pillow? He sat up and twisted around to lift it. The last page of the book was lying slightly crumpled on the wrinkly sheet, but he couldn't judge whether the page or the pillow had already been moved. Joyce levered herself up on a shaky elbow to gaze at him. "Why were you keeping that there?"

"So I knew where it was."

She might think him forgetful or worse, if she didn't assume he was making sure she didn't steal the page. He limped to the safe and locked up the page with the passports and travellers' cheques. "Now we know where it is."

During breakfast on the balcony a pair of magpies did most of the chattering. Joyce was first onto the beach, having let go of Ewan's arm, and soon in the sea. He was grateful to see other swimmers near her in case she needed help. Between looking for her in her swimsuit as orange as a sunset he tried to immerse himself in the novel at least two other people were reading on the beach, but even once Joyce returned he couldn't concentrate. "Will you be all right for a while?" he eventually said. "I just want to look something up."

"Why shouldn't I be?"

He glanced back until he could no longer see her as he made for Zorba's Bar. A few customers were drinking beer with their English breakfasts while their children played on computers. Ewan bought time on a terminal and searched the Internet for Sending Them to God, but there was very little information. The novel was by Jethro Dartmouth, a name that meant nothing to him. It seemed to be the author's only work, and nobody was offering a copy for sale online. Insurgery Books, who had published it at the end of the previous century, no longer existed—they appeared to have brought out just that book.

This wasn't much for Ewan to tell Joyce or to justify leaving her alone on the beach. He took his time on the road but failed to think of anything to add. The concrete grew soft underfoot with the ragged rug of sand that yesterday's gale had spread over the end of the road. Joyce was on the beach to his left—she ought to be, but he couldn't see her.

Nobody seemed interested in his panic as he stumbled between the sunbeds. There was his meaningless book, a lump of paper lying inert on the bed draped with his towel, and within arm's length of it Joyce's paperback occupied her empty lounger in the shadow of the umbrella. He was staring apprehensively at the swimmers in the sea, none of whom was wearing orange, when somewhere above him her voice said "Ewan."

As he swung around he had the disconcerting notion that he still wouldn't be able to see her. She was gazing down at him with amused impatience from a table in the Philosophia. Before he'd finished clambering up the path he gasped "What on earth are you doing in there?"

"I fancied some olives, since you didn't get any." Quite as defiantly she said "It's like being away all on my own."

He mustn't argue. Too many of their recent disagreements were so trivial that he felt they were reducing him and Joyce, shrivelling their intelligence and drying up their affection. "Are you ready for lunch, then?"

"I've been ready for a while. Were you looking at your bit of paper all this time?"

"No, finding out about it."

A waiter bringing olives interrupted him. Ewan thought Joyce was content to be quiet once they'd ordered lunch until she said "Get it over with if you're so anxious to tell me."

"The author wrote just that one book. I wouldn't be surprised if he published it himself."

"What's it supposed to be about?"

"Nobody was saying."

"Do you even know who it's by?"

"A person by the name of Jethro Dartmouth."

"Never heard of him."

"I got the impression pretty well nobody has."

"Excuse me, some have, yes."

This came from the waiter, and Ewan thought one of them must have misheard. "Sorry, I don't think I caught what you said."

"Mr. Dartmouth came to live here in Ikonikos."

"How do you know that?" Joyce asked or objected.

"His daughter told us who he was."

Ewan waited while the man poured two glasses of wine and set down the carafe. "Would you happen to know which his house is?"

"He called it Villa Biblion," the waiter said, gesturing beyond the village.

Joyce emitted a snort at the name. Otherwise she was silent until the waiter moved away, and then she murmured "You aren't thinking of giving him that bit of paper."

"If you'd seen him you'd understand how much he wants it."

"Well, I don't understand," Joyce said, making sure Ewan knew this included him.

During lunch he felt as though Dartmouth was loitering close by, all the more insistent for being unseen—the subject of him and his page, at any rate. It followed them to the beach in the form of their uneasy silence. Joyce spent some time in arranging herself and her various items on and around the sunbed before glancing at Ewan as if she'd forgotten he was there. "Go on your mission if you're going."

"I don't like to leave you down here by yourself."

"For pity's sake," she cried and dragged her legs so vigorously off the bed that it almost toppled over. "Take me to the room if you need to think I'm safe."

He hadn't meant that, or perhaps he had. On the uphill road he thought she resented having to take his arm. As he let them into the apartment he caught sight of the safe at the back of the doorless wardrobe. For an instant he was certain the display above the keypad said ERROR. The letters vanished as he stepped into the room. "Did you see that?" he blurted.

"What now, Ewan?"

"It looked as if someone just tried to open the safe."

"I didn't see anything like that at all."

Perhaps the sunlight had outlined the message, although when he tried to recapture the illusion it stayed stubbornly invisible. He typed the year of their marriage and opened the safe. Hadn't he laid the page flat? Part of it was resting against the door, and unfolded to meet him. Rather than point this out to Joyce he said "Are you sure you wouldn't like to come with me?"

"I'm very sure, Ewan. You do whatever you feel you have to."

"I'll try not to be long."

"We've plenty of time. We've eleven days yet." With a frown that seemed to tug the corners of her lips towards a smile she said "Just stop worrying about me."

When he glanced back from the doorway she looked defiant, close to insulted by his concern. As he made all the speed he could uphill the page fluttered in his hand. He might have imagined someone was trying to snatch it, and he slipped it into his breast pocket, where it struggled to unfold before lying still.

The Villa Biblion wasn't on the outskirts of Ikonikos. Every house he passed took him another minute's walk or more from Joyce. He was on the edge of going back to her when he saw the name on the gatepost of a villa in an olive grove beyond high spiky railings. He thumbed the bellpush below the nameplate, and in time a grille emitted a metallic rattle and a woman's voice. "Hello?"

"I've something that belongs to Mr. Dartmouth."

The response was a clatter that sounded ominously final. As Ewan looked for a security camera to show the page, the door of the villa opened and a woman strode down the wide marble drive. She was tall and thin with a long face and cropped pale hair. She wore shorts with many pockets and a T-shirt that bestowed on her small breasts the slogan NET ASSETS. Ewan was swallowing a giggle when she demanded "What was it you said?"

"I found this on the beach. I brought it back."

She gazed at the page and then at him for some moments before opening the gates. "Come and tell me about it," she said, extending a hand several degrees cooler than the afternoon. "I'm Francesca Dartmouth."

"Ewan Hargreaves." As he followed her up the drive he said "Your father must be doing well to live here."

"I bought it." She turned to point at the words on her T-shirt. "There's a fortune to be made in properties abroad."

She led the way through a broad marble hall into a large white room furnished with a plump black leather suite. "What will you have to drink?"

"Do you mind if I don't? I'd rather not leave my wife on her own longer than I have to."

"Just let me hear your tale, then."

"I saw someone chasing this on the beach in all that wind and later on I found it. Am I right to think he was your father? I believe his book's quite rare."

"Pardon me a minute," Francesca Dartmouth said and hurried out of the room.

Ewan heard her open a door across the hall and utter a muffled cry. A window slid shut, and her footsteps hesitated before she reappeared, carrying a book as carefully as she might have handled a baby. The bulk of the pages had been torn away from the rear flyleaf, exposing their bandaged spine. "The wind got in," she said almost to herself. "It blew this off his desk."

Ewan held out the loose page, hoping it might lessen her distress. "Your father can get it bound again, can't he?"

She gazed at the page and clutched the book harder. "He can't, Mr. Hargreaves."

Ewan wasn't sure he wanted to establish why. Instead he asked "What's the book about?"

Francesca Dartmouth raised her eyes to his and held out the book. "See for yourself."

Ewan was moved to be trusted with it. He laid the page on a low table before carefully leafing through the book. It was the tale of Tom Read, a man with a mission to change those who were doing most harm to the world—to persuade them or, failing that, execute them. Was he inspired by God or deranged or both? Some of his intended victims were political leaders, others ruled religions, and one was a media mogul. Read never learned who sent an assassin to kill him in the end, where Ewan thought another page might be missing, but there was only the one he'd retrieved. "I'm not sure I understand," he said.

"My father didn't either. He didn't realise the people he was satirising had so much power. The media man made sure nobody would stock the book, and then he used one of his companies to buy up all the copies and destroy them. My father sent out the ones he had left to the media the man didn't own, but nobody so much as mentioned them. He kept just that one copy and hid himself here. He didn't want anyone to find out where he was living. He was afraid they might try and do away with him as well as the book."

"But you told someone in the village he lived here."

"Not while my father was alive."

Ewan felt he'd already known that answer. He shut the cover, which bore just the author's name split by the title on a black background. The letters were in various fonts, the most prominent of which could be read as spelling TO SEE GOD. He turned the book over and gazed at the photograph on the back. "That's the man I saw chasing the page on the beach."

"I believe you." Francesca Dartmouth took a long breath and said "He used to say he wouldn't really be destroyed while there was still even one of his books."

At once Ewan realised "The last line needn't mean there's no God. It could be saying there's no end."

"I never thought of that before." Even more gratefully she said "I think you've seen the truth."

Ewan was making to replace the page in the book when she said "Why don't you keep that? I'd say you've made it your own."

In some confusion he protested "Don't you think—"

"I think you should have it when you've given it a meaning. Maybe it means something special to you, or it will." She held Ewan's gaze while she said "If it does, my father won't be altogether gone."

Ewan could find nothing to say to this. As she saw him onto the drive he said awkwardly "You won't be short of olives."

"Would you like some? They used to sell ours in the village till the shop turned into a bar." She went into a side room and returned with a little wicker basket heaped with chubby olives. "You and your wife enjoy them," she said. "And your lives."

She waved as the gates met behind him, and he was hurrying past the railings when he seemed to glimpse a man among the trees. In a moment the figure was gone, as if it had needed only to turn sideways to vanish. Ewan looked for it as the villas gave way to apartments, but there was no further sign of it. The page from the book lay quiet against his heart.

He thought better of knocking at the door of the apartment in case Joyce was asleep, and eased it open, lifting the wicker trophy to show her if she was awake. He needn't have taken so much care, because she wasn't in the room.

The balcony was deserted too. He called her number, only to hear the phone start to ring in the room. It was next to her bed, pinning down a scrap of paper on which she'd written Gone for swim followed by a single X with one bar practically upright. He ran to the balcony and peered between the hotels. Far out to sea a figure no larger than a charm on a bracelet was swimming. Except for the orange swimsuit he wouldn't have known who it was.

He closed the window and stood the basket on Joyce's bedside table. He read Jethro Dartmouth's last words as he laid the page in the safe, and then he made for the beach. Though the little swimming charm was as distant as ever, the sight seemed to concentrate a peace he hardly dared express to himself. He left his sandals next to Joyce's under the sun-bed occupied by her book. Every step took him deeper, but ripples kissed his skin. "There's none," he murmured as he forged onwards to tell Joyce. "There's none."

At Lorn Hall

First published in Nightmare Magazine Issue 2, November 2012

Randolph hadn't expected the map to misrepresent the route to the motorway quite so much. The roads were considerably straighter on the page. At least it was preferable to being directed by a machine on the dashboard, which would have reminded him of being told by Harriet that he'd gone wrong yet again, even when he knew where he was going. Although it oughtn't to be dark for hours, the April sky beyond a line of lurid hills had begun to resemble a charcoal slab. He was braking as the road meandered between sullen fields of rape when he had to switch the headlights on. The high beams roused swarms of shadows in the hedges and glinted on elongated warnings of bends ahead, and then the light found a signpost. It pointed down a lane to somewhere called Lorn Hall.

He stopped the Volvo and turned on the hazard lights. The sign looked neglected except by birds, which had left traces of their visits, but Lorn Hall sounded like the kind of place he liked to wander around. The children never did, complaining to Harriet if he even tried to take them anywhere like that on the days he had them. They loved being driven in the rain—the stormier the better, however nearly blind it made him feel—and so he couldn't help feeling relieved that they weren't with him to insist. He could shelter in the mansion until the storm passed over. He quelled the twitching of the lights and drove along the lane.

Five minutes' worth of bends enclosed by hulking spiky hedges brought him to a wider stretch of road. As it grew straight he glimpsed railings embedded in the left-hand hedge, rusting the leaves. Over the thorns and metal spikes surrounded by barbs he saw sections of an irregular roof patrolled by crows. Another minute brought him to the gateway of Lorn Hall.

He couldn't have given a name to the style of the high broad house. Perhaps the stone was darkened by the approaching storm, but he thought it would have looked leaden even in sunlight. At the right-hand end of the building a three-storey barrel put him in mind of a clenched fist with bricks for grey knuckles. Far less than halfway from it on the unadorned frontage, a door twice as tall as a man stood beneath a pointed arch reminiscent of a mausoleum. Five sets of windows each grew smaller as they mounted to the roofs, where chimneys towered among an assortment of slate peaks. Even the largest of the ground-floor windows were enmeshed with lattices, and every window was draped with curtains that the gloom lent the look of dusty cobwebs. Apart from an unmarked whitish van parked near the front door there was no sign of life.

The signpost had surely been addressed to sightseers, and the formidable iron gates were bolted open, staining the weedy gravel of the drive. One of the gateposts in the clutch of the hedge had lost its stone globe, which poked its dome bewigged with lichen out of the untended lawn. Ivy overgrew sections of the lawn and spilled onto the drive. The shapes the topiary bushes had been meant to keep were beyond guessing; they looked fattened and deformed by age. If Harriet had been with him she would have insisted on leaving by now, not to mention protesting that the detour was a waste of time. This was another reason he drove up to the house.

Did the curtains stir as he drew up beside the van? He must have seen shadows cast by the headlamps, because the movements at all three windows to the left of the front door had been identical. Nobody had ducked out of sight in the van either. Randolph turned off the lights and the engine, pocketing his keys as he turned to face the mansion. The sky had grown so stuffed with darkness that he didn't immediately see the front door was ajar.

To its left, where he might have looked for a doorbell, a tarnished blotchy plaque said LORN HALL. The door displayed no bell or knocker, just a greenish plaque that bore the legend RESIDENCE OF CROWCROSS. "Lord Crowcross," Randolph murmured as though it might gain some significance for him if not summon its owner to the door. As he tried to recall ever having previously heard the name he felt a chill touch as thin as a fingernail on the back of his neck. It was a raindrop, which sent him to push the heavy door wide.

The door had lumbered just a few inches across the stone flags when it met an obstruction. Randolph might have fancied that somebody determined but enfeebled was bent on shutting him out, perhaps having dropped to all fours. The hindrance proved to be a greyish walking boot that had toppled over from its place against the wall. Several pairs grey with a mixture of dried mud and dust stood in the gloomy porch. "Don't go any further," Harriet would have been saying by now, "you don't know if you're invited," but Randolph struggled around the door and kicked the boot against the wall. As he made for the archway on the far side of the porch, light greeted him.

Little else did. His approach had triggered a single yellowish bulb that strove to illuminate a large room. Opposite the arch an empty chair upholstered in a pattern so faded it wasn't worth distinguishing stood behind a bulky desk. Apart from a blotter like a plot of moss and earth, the desk was occupied by a pair of cardboard boxes and scattered with a few crumpled pamphlets for local attractions. The box that was inscribed HONESTY in an extravagantly cursive script contained three coins adding up to five pounds and so thoroughly stuck to the bottom that they were framed by glue. The carton marked TOUR in the same handwriting was cluttered with half a dozen sets of headphones. As Randolph dug in his pockets for change, his host watched him.

The man was in a portrait, which hung on the grey stone wall behind the desk it dwarfed. He stood in tweed and jodhpurs on a hill. With one hand flattened on his hip he seemed less to be surveying the landscape in the foreground of the picture than to be making his claim on it clear. The wide fields scattered with trees led to Lorn Hall. Although his fleshy face looked satisfied in every way, the full almost pouting lips apparently found it redundant to smile. His eyes were as blue as the summer sky above him, and included the viewer in their gaze. Was he less of an artist than he thought, or was he meant to tower over the foreshortened perspective? Randolph had guessed who he was, since the C that signed the lower left-hand corner of the canvas was in the familiar handwriting. "My lord," Randolph murmured as he dropped coins in the box.

The clink of metal didn't bring anyone to explain the state of the headphones. They weren't just dusty; as he rummaged through them, a leggy denizen scrabbled out of the box and fell off the desk to scuttle into the shadows. "That's very much more than enough," Harriet would have said to him in the way she did not much more often to their children. If you weren't adventurous you weren't much at all, and the gust of wind that slammed the front door helped Randolph stick to his decision. Having wiped the least dusty set of headphones with a pamphlet for a penal museum, he turned them over in his hands but couldn't find a switch. As he fitted them gingerly over his ears a voice said "You'll excuse my greeting you in person."

Nobody was visible beyond the open door beside the painting, only darkness. The voice seemed close yet oddly distant, pronouncing every consonant but so modulated it implied the speaker hardly cared if he was heard. "Do move on once you've taken in my portrait," he said. "There may be others awaiting their turn."

"There's only me," Randolph pointed out and stared with some defiance at the portrait. If Lord Crowcross had taught himself to paint, he wasn't the ideal choice of teacher. The landscape was a not especially able sketch that might have been copied from a photograph, and the figure was unjustifiably large. The artist appeared to have spent most time on the face, and Randolph was returning its gaze when Crowcross said "Do move on once you've taken in my portrait. There may be others awaiting their turn."

"I already told you I'm on my own," Randolph protested. The headphones must be geared to the listener's position in the house, but the technology seemed incongruous, as out of place as Randolph was determined not to let the commentary make him feel. "I'm on my way," he said and headed for the next room.

He'd barely stepped over the stone threshold when the light went out behind him. "Saving on the bills, are we?" he muttered as he was left in the dark. In another second his arrival roused more lights—one in each corner of an extensive high-ceilinged room. "This is where the family would gather of an evening," Crowcross said in both his ears. "We might entertain our peers here, such as were left. I am afraid our way of life lost favour in my lifetime, and the country is much poorer."

The room was furnished with senile, obese sofas and equally faded overweight armchairs, all patterned with swarms of letters like the initial on the portrait. A tapestry depicting a hunt occupied most of the wall opposite the windows, which Randolph might have thought were curtained so as to hide the dilapidation from the world. Several decanters close to opaque with dust stood on a sideboard near a massive fireplace, where cobwebbed lumps of coal were piled in the iron cage of the hearth. Had the place been left in this state to remind visitors it had fallen on hard times? Everyone Randolph knew would be ashamed to go in for that trick, whatever their circumstances. Quite a few were desperate to sell their homes, but all his efforts as an estate agent were in vain just now. He turned to find his way out of the room and saw Lord Crowcross watching him.

This time his host was in a painting of the room, though this was clearer from the positions of the furniture than from any care in the depiction. Sketchy figures sat in chairs or sprawled languidly on the couches. Just enough detail had been added to their faces—numerous wrinkles, grey hair—to signify that every one was older than the figure in the middle of the room. He was standing taller than he should in proportion to the others, and his obsessively rendered face appeared to be ignoring them. "Do make your way onwards whenever you're ready," he said without moving his petulant lips. "I fear there are no servants to show you around."

"No wonder the place is in such a state"—or rather the absence of servants was the excuse, and Randolph was tempted to say so. By now Harriet would have been accusing him of risking the children's health. He loitered to make the voice repeat its message, but this wasn't as amusing as he'd expected; he could almost have fancied it was hiding impatience if not contempt. "Let's see what else you've got to show me," he said and tramped out of the room.

All the lights were extinguished at once. He was just able to see that he'd emerged into a broad hallway leading to a staircase wider than his arms could stretch. He smelled damp on stone or wood. By the dim choked glow through doorways on three sides of the hall he made out that the posts at the foot of the steep banisters were carved with cherubs. In the gloom the eyes resembled ebony jewels, but the expressions on the chubby wooden faces were unreadable. "Do continue to the next exhibit," Crowcross prompted him.

Presumably this meant the nearest room. Randolph paced to the left-hand doorway and planted a foot on the threshold, but had to take several steps forward before the light acknowledged him. Fewer than half the bulbs in the elaborate chandelier above the long table lit up. "This is where the family would dine in style," Crowcross said, "apart from the youngest member."

The table was set for ten people. Dusty plates and silver utensils stained with age lay on the extravagantly lacy yellowed tablecloth. Like the upholstery of all the chairs, every plate was marked with C. Doilies to which spiders had lent extra patterns were spread on a sideboard, opposite which a painting took most of the place of a tapestry that had left its outline on the stone wall. Although the painting might have depicted a typical dinner at Lorn Hall, Randolph thought it portrayed something else. Of the figures seated at the table, only the one at the head of the table possessed much substance. The familiar face was turned away from his sketchy fellow diners to watch whoever was in the actual room, while a servant with a salver waited on either side of him. "Subsequently the situation was reversed," Crowcross said, "and I made the place my own."

Was the painting meant to remind him of the family he'd lost—to provide companionship in his old age? Randolph was trying to see it in those terms when the pinched voice said "By all means make your way onwards." He could do without a repetition, and he made for the hall. As the chandelier went dark he glimpsed somebody turning the bend of the staircase.

"Excuse me," Randolph called, moving the earpiece away from his right ear, but the other didn't respond. If they were wearing headphones too they might not have heard him. He'd only wanted to ask whether they knew what time the house closed to the public. At least he wasn't alone in it, and he picked his way along the hall to the kitchen, where part of the darkness seemed to remain solid as the weary light woke up.

It was a massive black iron range that dominated the grey room. A dormant fragment of the blackness came to life, waving its feelers as it darted into one of the round holes in the top of the range. How long had the kitchen been out of use? Surely nobody would put up with such conditions now. Chipped blotchy marble surfaces and a pair of freezers—one a head taller than Randolph, its twin lying horizontal—might be responsible for some of the chill that met him. A solitary cleaver lay on a ponderous table, which looked not just scored by centuries of knife strokes but in places hacked to splinters. Randolph looked around for a portrait, but perhaps Crowcross felt the kitchen was undeserving of his presence. "My father enjoyed watching the maids at their work," he said. "Red-handed skivvies, he called them. I did myself. Since then the world has changed so radically that their like have been among the visitors. Perhaps you are of their kind."

"Not at all," Randolph objected and felt absurd, not least because he suspected that Crowcross might have disagreed with him. He was searching for some trace of the people who'd worked here—initials carved on the table, for instance—when Crowcross said "There is no more to see here. Let us move on."

He sounded like a parody of a policeman—an officious one used to being obeyed. Randolph couldn't resist lingering to force him to say it again, and might easily have thought a hint of petulance had crept into the repetition. The light failed before Randolph was entirely out of the kitchen, but he glimpsed a door he'd overlooked in the underside of the staircase. As he reached for the heavy doorknob Crowcross said "Nothing of interest is kept down there. I never understood its appeal for my father."

Perhaps Randolph did, assuming the servants' quarters were below. He wondered how his guide's mother had felt about the arrangement. The scalloped doorknob wouldn't turn even when he applied both hands to it. As he looked for a key in the thick dust along the lintel Crowcross spoke. "I have told you nothing has remained. Let us see where I was a child."

His petulance was unmistakable. No doubt the basement rooms would be unlit in any case. Randolph was making his way past the stairs when he heard whoever else was in the house shuffling along an upper corridor. He wondered if there was more light up there, since the footfalls were surer than his own. They receded out of earshot as he pushed open the door of the turret room.

The room was lit, though nothing like immediately, by a single bare bulb on a cobwebbed flex. The round aloof ceiling caught much of the light, and Randolph suspected that even with the curtains open the room might have seemed like a cell to a child. It was furnished with a desk and a table in proportion, each attended by a starkly straight chair. While the table was set for a solitary meal, it had space for a pile of books: an infant's primer on top, a children's encyclopaedia many decades old at the bottom. Even when Randolph made the children read instead of playing, Harriet rarely agreed with his choice of books. The stone floor was scattered with building blocks, a large wooden jigsaw depicting a pastoral scene, an abacus, a picture book with pages thick as rashers, open to show a string like a scrawny umbilical cord dangling from the belly of a pig spotted with mould. The desk was strewn with exercise books that displayed the evolution of the omnipresent handwriting; one double page swarmed with a C well on its way to resembling the letter that seemed almost to infest the mansion. "This is where I spent the years in growing worthy of my name," said Crowcross. "In our day parents hired their delegates and kept them on the premises. Now the care of children is another industry, one more product of the revolution that has overtaken the country by stealth."

Above the desk a painting showed the room much as it was now, if somewhat brighter and more insubstantial. Crowcross stood between rudimentary impressions of the table and the desk. His arms were folded, and he might have been playing a teacher, except that nobody else was in the room—at least, not in the picture of it. "If you have learned everything you feel entitled to know," he said, "let us go up."

Did Randolph want to bother going on, given the condition of the house? Harriet certainly wouldn't have, even if the children weren't with them. He'd had nothing like his money's worth yet, unless he retrieved the payment on his way out. Perhaps the person upstairs might know more about the history of Lorn Hall, and Randolph didn't mind admitting to a guilty fascination, not least with the companion at his ear. "If you have learned everything you feel," Crowcross said and fell silent as Randolph left the room.

He was on the lowest stair when he noticed that the cherub on the banister had no wings. Somebody had chopped them off, leaving unequal stumps, and he couldn't help suspecting that the vandal had been Crowcross, perhaps since he'd found himself alone in Lorn Hall, the last of his line. He had the uneasy notion that Crowcross was about to refer to if not justify the damage. "If you have learned," the voice said before he could let go of the shaky banister.

From the bend in the stairs he saw the upper corridor, just about illuminated by the dimness beyond several doorways. Whoever he'd glimpsed on the stairs wasn't to be seen, and no light suggested they were in a room. Presumably they were at the top of the house by now. Barely glancing at a second mutilated cherub, Randolph made for the nearest room along the corridor.

Its principal item was an enormous four-poster bed. Burdened by plaster sloughed by the ceiling, the canopy sagged like an ancient cobweb. More plaster glistened on an immense dressing-table and an upholstered chair that must once have looked muscular. Most of the light from the few live bulbs in the chandelier fell short of a side room, where Randolph was just able to distinguish a marble bath with blackened taps and a pallid hand gripping the side to haul its owner into view, but that was a crumpled cloth. "You are in the master bedroom," Crowcross said tonelessly enough to be addressing an intruder. "Would you expect the master to have left more of a mark?"

His portrait showed him gripping the left-hand bedpost. As well as declaring ownership he gave the impression of awaiting a companion—watching with feigned patience for someone to appear in the doorway at Randolph's back. His imperiousness was somewhat undermined by crumbs of plaster adorning the top of the picture frame. "Will you know what robs a man of mastery?" he said. "Pray accompany me along the corridor."

Randolph couldn't help feeling relieved not to be given the tour by his host in the flesh. He suspected the commentary had been recorded late in the man's life—when he was turning senile, perhaps. The chandelier in the next room contained even fewer bulbs, which faltered alight to outline another bed. Its posts were slimmer than its neighbour's, and the canopy was more delicate, which meant it looked close to collapsing under the weight of debris. Had a fall of plaster smashed the dressing-table mirror? Randolph could see only shards of glass among the dusty cosmetic items. "Here you see the private suite of the last Lady Crowcross," the voice said. "I fear that the ways of our family were not to her taste."

He held a bedpost in his left fist, but it was unclear which bedroom he was in. His depiction of himself was virtually identical with the one next door. A figure identifiable as a woman by the long hair draped over the pillow lay in the sketch of a bed. Randolph couldn't judge if Crowcross had given her a face, because where one should be was a dark stain, possibly the result of the age and state of the painting. "Please don't exert yourself to look for any signs of children," Crowcross said. "They were taken long ago. My lady disagreed with the Crowcross methods and found another of our fairer counterparts to plead her case."

"I know the feeling," Randolph said, immediately regretting the response. There was no point in being bitter; he told himself so every time he had the children and whenever he had to give them up. As he caught sight of the bathroom shower, which was so antiquated that the iron cage put him in mind of some medieval punishment, Crowcross said "You'll have none of the little dears about you, I suppose. They must conduct themselves appropriately in this house."

While Randolph thought his and Harriet's children might have passed the test, at least if they'd been with him, he was glad not to have to offer proof. As he made for the corridor he glimpsed a trickle of moisture or some livelier object running down a bar of the shower cage. "That's the style," said Crowcross. "There's nothing worthy of attention here if you've taken in my work."

It almost sounded as though the guide was aware of Randolph's movements. To an extent this was how the commentary operated, but could it really be so specific? He was tempted to learn how it would react if he stayed in the room, but when the lit bulbs flickered in unison as though to urge him onwards he retreated into the corridor.

The adjacent room was the last on this side. Shadows swarmed and fluttered among the dead bulbs as the chandelier struggled to find life. All the furniture was stout and dark, the bedposts included. One corner of the laden canopy had almost torn loose. The room smelled dank, so that Randolph wouldn't have been surprised to see moisture on the stone walls. "This was the sanctum of the eldest Crowcross," the voice said. "His wife's quarters were across the corridor."

Presumably the portrait was meant to demonstrate how the room had become his. He was at the window, holding back the curtain to exhibit or lay claim to a version of the landscape in summer. His eyes were still on his audience; Randolph was beginning to feel as if the gaze never left him. He was meeting it and waiting for the next words when he heard a vehicle start up outside the house.

The bedposts shook like dislocated bones as he dashed across the room, and debris shifted with a stony whisper. The gap between the curtains was scarcely a finger's width. They felt capable of leaving handfuls of sodden heavy fabric in his grasp, and he knew where at least some of the smell came from. As he dragged them apart the rings twitched rustily along the metal rail. He craned forward, keeping well clear of the windowsill, which was scattered with dead flies like seeds of some unwelcome growth. The grid of cramped panes was coated with grime and crawling with raindrops, so that he was only just able to make out the grounds. Then, beyond the misshapen bloated topiary, he saw movement—the van near which he'd parked. Its outline wavered as it sped along the drive and picked up speed on the road.

Was Randolph alone in the house now? In that case, how had the driver sneaked past him? As the van disappeared into the rainswept gloom Crowcross said "Will you see the woman's quarters now? Everything is open to you, no matter what your pedigree."

How distasteful was this meant to sound? Randolph might have had enough by now except for the weather. He felt as if he was ensuring he outran the voice by hurrying across the corridor. A few bulbs sputtered alight in their cobwebbed crystal nest to show him yet another dilapidated bed. A hole had rotted in the canopy, dumping plaster on the stained bedclothes. Crowcross was holding a bedpost again, and a careless scribble behind him suggested that someone had just left the sketched bed. "Any little treasures would be barred from all these rooms," he said. "Have any found their way in now? Do keep an eye on their behaviour. We don't want any damage."

"I think you're having a bit of a joke," Randolph said. How senile had the speaker been by the time he'd recorded the commentary? Had he been seeing his home as it used to be? The light stuttered, rousing shadows in the bathroom and enlivening a muddy trickle on the initialled tiles above the marble trough. "If you have had your pleasure," Crowcross said, "the eldest breathed their last next door."

"My pleasure," Randolph retorted, and it was a question too.

The chandelier in the adjacent room lacked several bulbs. In the pensioned light a pair of four-posters occupied much of the cheerless space. Although the canopies were intact, the supports showed their age, some of the thinner ones bowing inwards. "They came here to grow as old as they could," Crowcross said. "Tell any little cherubs that, and how they had to stay together while they did."

Randolph thought the commentary had turned childish in the wrong way, if indeed there was a right one. He'd begun to feel it was no longer addressed to him or any listener, especially once Crowcross muttered "And then older."

The beds were flanked by massive wardrobes almost as dark outside as in. Both were open just enough to let Randolph distinguish shapes within. The figure with a dwarfish puffy head and dangling arms that were longer than its legs was a suit on a padded hanger. Its opposite number resembled a life-size cut-out of a woman drained of colour—just a long white dress, not a shroud. Nobody was about to poke a face around either of the doors, however much Randolph was reminded of a game of hide and seek. He'd never prevented the children from playing that, even if he might have in Lorn Hall. As he did his best to finish peering at the wardrobes Crowcross said "Are you still hoping for diversions? They await your judgement."

Randolph was starting to feel like the butt of a joke he wasn't expected to appreciate, since Crowcross didn't seem to think much of his visitors, let alone their views. When a pair of the lamps in the next room jittered alight, a ball on the billiard table shot into the nearest pocket. Of course only its legs had made it look as large as a billiard ball. Packs of battered cards were strewn across a table patched with baize, and cobwebs had overtaken a game of chess, where chipped marble chessmen lay in the dust beside the board. "This is where games were played," Crowcross said, "by those who had the privilege. Mine was waiting, and in the end I won."

He might have been talking to himself again, and resentfully at that. "We haven't seen your room yet," Randolph said and wondered if all of them had been. "You aren't ashamed of it, are you? It's a bit late to be ashamed."

He was heading for the turret room when Crowcross said "Eager to see where I was visited by dreams? Since then they have had the run of the house."

After a pause the room was illuminated by a stark grubby bulb. A bed with no posts and less than half the size of any of the others stood in the middle of the stone floor. The only other furniture was a wardrobe and a comparably sombre dressing-table with a mirror so low it cut Randolph off above the waist. Perhaps the soft toys huddled on the pillow had at some stage been intended to make the room more welcoming, but that wasn't their effect now. The pair of teddy bears and the lamb with boneless legs had all acquired red clownish mouths that contradicted their expressions. So much paint had been applied that it still resembled fresh blood.

They were in the portrait, where their sketched faces looked disconcertingly human. Perhaps the alterations to the actual toys had been a kind of preliminary study. Crowcross stood at the sunlit window, beyond which a distant figure stooped, hands outstretched. "I used to love watching the keepers trap their prey," Crowcross said. "They are put here for our pleasure and our use."

As Randolph turned away he saw what the painting didn't show. The toys on the pillow almost hid the clasped pair of hands protruding from beneath the quilt, which was blotched with mould. No, they were wings, none too expertly severed from the body—a pair of wooden wings. "This could have been a child's room," Crowcross mused. "We always raised our children to be men."

"Don't we talk about girls? I thought I was supposed to be unreasonable but my dear lord, my wife ought to listen to you," Randolph said and seemed to hear a confused violent noise in response. The window was shuddering under an onslaught of rain. He turned his back to all the eyes watching him —the portrait's and those of the disfigured toys, which were exactly as blank—and heard soft rapid footfalls on the stairs above him.

They were shuffling along the top corridor by the time he reached the staircase. "Excuse me, could you wait?" he shouted, raising the other headphone from his ear as he dashed upstairs so fast that he couldn't have said whether one cherub's face was splintered beyond recognition. Whenever he grabbed the banister, it wobbled with a bony clatter of its uprights. In a few seconds he saw that the top corridor was deserted.

None of the rooms showed a light. Perhaps whoever was about was trying to fix one, since otherwise their presence would have triggered it. Perhaps they were too busy to answer Randolph. Had the driver of the van been in the house at all? Presumably the person Randolph had glimpsed earlier was up here now. They couldn't have gone far, and he made for the turret room in the hope of finding them.

He saw he was alone once the meagre light recognised him. A lectern stood beside an imposing telescope that was pointed at the window. Astronomical charts—some crumpled, others chewed or torn to shreds—lay on the floor. "I never saw the appeal of the stars," Crowcross said, more distantly now. "I've no wish to be reminded of the dead. They say that's how old their light is. I preferred to watch the parade of the world. The glass brought it close enough for my taste."

He could have used the telescope to spy on the grounds and the road. Beyond the blurred fields Randolph saw an endless chain of watery lights being drawn at speed along the horizon. It was the motorway, where he promised himself he'd be soon, but he could finish exploring while he waited for the rain to stop, particularly since the family wasn't with him. He left the turret room with barely a glance at the portrait in which Crowcross appeared to be stroking the barrel of the telescope as if it were a pet animal.

The next room was a library. Shelves of bound sets of fat volumes covered every wall up to the roof. Each volume was embossed with a C like a brand at the base of its spine. More than one high shelf had tipped over with the weight of books or the carelessness with which they'd been placed, so that dozens of books were sprawled about the floor in a jumble of dislocated pages. A ladder with rusty wheels towered over several stocky leather armchairs mottled with decay. "This might be tidier," said Crowcross. "Perhaps that could be your job."

What kind of joke was this meant to be? Randolph wondered if the last lord of Lorn Hall could have pulled the books down in a fury at having nowhere to hang his portrait. He couldn't have done much if any reading in here unless there had been more light than the one remaining bulb provided. It was enough to show that Randolph was still alone, and he dodged across the corridor.

An unshaded bulb on a cobwebbed flex took its time over revealing a bedroom. All four bedposts leaned so far inwards that they could have been trying to grasp the light or fend it off. The canopy lay in a heap on the bed. Although Randolph thought he'd glimpsed clothes hanging in the tall black wardrobe as the light came on, once he blinked at the glare he could see nothing except gloom beyond the scrawny gap—no pale garment for somebody bigger than he was, no wads of tissue paper stuffed into the cuffs and collar. "This could be made fit for guests again," Crowcross said. "Would you consider it to be your place?"

He sounded as furtively amused as he looked in his portrait, which showed him standing in the doorway of the room, gazing at whoever was within. It made Randolph glance behind him, even though he knew the corridor was empty. "I wouldn't be a guest of yours," he blurted, only to realise that in a sense he was. Almost too irritated to think, he tramped out of the room.

Next door was a bedroom very reminiscent of its neighbour. The fallen canopy of the four-poster was so rotten it appeared to have begun merging with the quilt. The portrait beyond the bed was virtually identical with the last one, and the light could have been competing at reluctance with its peers. Nothing was visible in the half-open wardrobe except padded hangers like bones fattened by dust. Randolph was about to move on when Crowcross said "This could be made fit for guests again. Would you consider it to be your place?"

The repetition sounded senile, and it seemed to cling to Randolph's brain. As he lurched towards the corridor Crowcross added "Will you make yourself at home?"

It had none of the tone of an invitation, and Randolph wasn't about to linger. Whoever else was upstairs had to be in the last room. "Have you seen all you choose?" Crowcross said while Randolph crossed the corridor. "See the rest, then."

The last room stayed dark until Randolph shoved the door wider, and then the lights began to respond—more of them than he thought he'd seen during the rest of the tour. The room was larger than both its neighbours combined, and graced with several chandeliers that he suspected had been replaced by solitary bulbs elsewhere in the house. They were wired low on the walls and lay on the floor, casting more shadow than illumination as he peered about the room.

It was cluttered with retired items. Rolled-up tapestries drooped against the walls, and so did numerous carpets and rugs, suggesting that someone had chosen to rob Lorn Hall of warmth. Several battered grandfather clocks stood like sentries over wooden crates and trunks that must have taken two servants apiece to carry them, even when they were empty of luggage. Smaller clocks perched on rickety pieces of furniture or lurked on the floorboards, and Randolph couldn't help fancying that somebody had tried to leave time up here to die. Crouching shadows outnumbered the objects he could see, but he appeared to be alone. As he narrowed his eyes Crowcross said "Here is where I liked to hide. Perhaps I still do."

"I would if I were you," Randolph said without having a precise retort in mind. He'd noticed a number of paintings stacked against the wall at the far end of the room. Were they pictures Crowcross had replaced with his own, or examples of his work he didn't want visitors to see? Randolph picked his way across the floor, almost treading on more than one photograph in the dimness—they'd slipped from unsteady heaps of framed pictures which, as far as he could make out, all showed members of the Crowcross family. Even the glass on the topmost pictures in the heaps was shattered. He'd decided to postpone understanding the damage until he was out of the room when he reached the paintings against the wall.

Though the light from the nearest chandelier was obstructed by the clutter, the image on the foremost canvas was plain enough. It portrayed Crowcross in a field, his arms folded, one foot on a prone man's neck. He looked not so much triumphant as complacent. The victim's face was either turned away submissively or buried in the earth, and his only distinguishing feature was the C embossed on his naked back. It wasn't a painting from life, Randolph told himself; it was just a symbol or a fantasy, either of which was bad enough. He was about to tilt the canvas forward to expose the next when Crowcross spoke. "The last," he said.

Did he mean a painting or the room, or did the phrase have another significance? Randolph wasn't going to be daunted until he saw what Crowcross had tried to conceal, but as he took hold of a corner of the frame the portrait was invaded by darkness. A light had been extinguished at his back—no, more than one—and too late he realised something else. Because the headphones weren't over his ears any more he'd mistaken the direction of the voice. It was behind him.

The room seemed to swivel giddily as he did. The figure that almost filled the doorway was disconcertingly familiar, and not just from the versions in the paintings; he'd glimpsed it skulking in the wardrobe. It wore a baggy nightshirt no less pallid and discoloured than its skin. Its face was as stiff as it appeared in any of the portraits, and the unblinking eyes were blank as lumps of greyish paint. The face had lolled in every direction it could find, much like the contents of the rest of the visible skin—the bare arms, the legs above the clawed feet. When the puffy white lips parted Randolph thought the mouth was in danger of losing more than its shape. As the figure shuffled forward he heard some of the substance of the unshod feet slopping against the floor. Just as its progress extinguished the rest of the lights it spoke with more enthusiasm than he'd heard from it anywhere else in the house. "Game," it said.

2013

Holes For Faces

"Holes for Faces was one of those ideas that clamour to be written and seem to come with an almost ready-made development. Some years ago we visited Naples for a few days. I think it was on the first full day that we found the catacombs of San Gaudioso under the church of Santa Maria della Sanità, which is located as described in the tale. The corpses are indeed displayed in that fashion. Need I say more? I was writing notes as soon as we left the tombs. Pretty well all the excursions we made in and around Naples appear in the story, macabrely transformed. The restaurant is based on our favourite, the Osteria da Antonio on Via Depretis. Writing all this makes me want to book us the next flight back."—Ramsey Campbell, Introduction to the story in The Mammoth Book Of Best New Horror 25

First published in Holes For Faces, August 2013

As Charlie turned away from the breakfast buffet his mother gave a frown like the first line of a sketch of disapproval. “Don’t take more than you can eat, please.”

He didn’t know how much this was meant to be. He put back one of the boiled eggs that chilled his fingers and used the tongs to replace a bread roll in its linen nest, but had to give up several round slices of meat before her look relented. “Come and sit down now, Charles,” she said as though it had been his idea to loiter.

His father met him with a grin that might have been the promise of a joke or an apology for not venturing to make one. “Who wants to go to church today, Charlie?”

It wasn’t even Sunday. Perhaps in Italy it didn’t have to be. “At least we won’t be robbed in there,” his father said.

“You’re safe in Naples, son,” the man at the next table contributed. “We’ve always been.”

“How old will you be?” his equally bulky wife said.

“I’m nearly eight.” Since the frown looked imminent, Charlie had to say “I’m seven and nine months.”

“That’s three quarters, isn’t it,” the man said as if Charlie needed to be told.

“Just you stay close to your mummy and daddy and mind what they say,” said his wife, “and you’ll come to no harm.”

It was Charlie’s mother who was fearful of the streets. When they’d arrived last night after dark she’d refused to leave the hotel, even though it didn’t serve dinner. His father had brought Charlie a sandwich in the room, and the adults had made do with some in the bar. He’d been too nervous to finish the sandwich, instead throwing it out of the window and hoping birds would carry off the evidence. Going back to the buffet might betray what he’d done, and he did his best to take his time over his plate while the adults introduced themselves. “Don’t miss the catacombs,” Bobby said as he pushed his chair back.

“Unless anything’s going to be too much for someone,” his wife Bobbie said.

“Nobody we know,” said Charlie’s father.

“Teeth,” his mother said to send Charlie up to the room, where she inspected herself in the mirror. She’d plaited her long reddish hair in a loop on either side of her face, which was almost as small and sharp as his. His father’s hair reminded Charlie of black filings drawn up by a magnet that had tugged his father’s face close to rectangular. His mother gave Charlie’s unruly curls a further thorough brush and insisted on zipping his cumbersome jacket up, all of which struck him as the last of her excuses to stay in the hotel.

The street was just as wide as it had seemed last night, and many of the buildings were as black, but shops at ground level had brought most of them to life. While the broad pavements were crowded Charlie couldn’t see any criminals, unless any if not all of the people chattering on phones were arranging a crime, since even the women sounded like gangsters in cartoons to him. Reaching the opposite pavement was akin to dodging across a racetrack—no traffic lights were to be seen. Charlie’s mother tried to hold his father back, but she was already clutching the boy’s hand with one of hers and her handbag with the other. “It’s how the locals do it,” Charlie’s father said. “We won’t get anywhere if we don’t show a bit of pluck.”

There were bus stops around the corner near the harbour, and gusts of April wind that made Charlie’s mother zip up the last inch of his jacket. On the bus she clung to her bag with both hands and sat against him. At least he was by the window, and had fun noticing how many cars were damaged in some way, bumpers crumpled, wings scraped, side mirrors splintered or wrenched off. His father looked up from consulting the Frugoguide to say "Underworld next stop."

Wasn't that where gangsters lived? A pedestrian crossing proved to lead across the road to a lift beside the pavement. A face peered through the little window as they reached the lift, and Charlie's mother didn't quite recoil. "We'll be fine down there, won't we?" Charlie's father asked the attendant. "You wouldn't be taking us otherwise."

The man waved his hands extravagantly. "No problem."

When the lift came to rest at the foot of the shaft the doors opened on a view like a secret the city was sharing with the visitors—a street of shops and tenements hidden from the road above. Between the tenements clothes on lines strung across the alleys flapped like pennants. "Come on, Maur," Charlie's father urged. "It doesn't get any better than this."

Charlie didn't know if she was frowning at the prospect or at disliking the version of her name. As they followed his father out of the lift she took a firmer grip on Charlie's hand. "Is that the church you brought us to see, Edward?"

Charlie thought his father was trying not to sound let down by her response. "I expect so."

The stone porch under a tower that poked at the pale grey sky was at least as tall as their house. Beyond the lumbering door a marble silence held the flames of dozens of candles still. At the far end of the high wide space a staircase with carved babies perched on the ends of the banisters framed the altar. The floor looked like a puzzle someone must have taken ages to complete, and Charlie wondered what a puzzle was supposed to have to do with God. His mother released his hand and seemed content to stroll through the church, lingering over items he couldn't see much point in. As he tried to keep his footsteps quiet his father came back from consulting a timetable. "We need to go down now," he murmured.

A pointer that didn't quite say CATACOMBS sent the family along a corridor. An old woman with a face like a string bag of wrinkles was sitting by a door. "No English," she declared and shook her head at Charlie, who thought she was barring him and perhaps his parents too until he realised she meant they didn't have to pay for him and couldn't expect her to speak their language. As his father counted out some European coins a man rather more than called “Don’t go without us.”

“Well, look who it never is,” his wife Bobbie cried. “We thought we’d take our own advice.”

As soon as Bobby handed the guide the notes he was brandishing she stumped to open the door. At the bottom of a gloomy flight of steps a corridor led into darkness. “Will you look after me, son?” Bobbie said. “Don’t know if I can trust him.”

Charlie wasn’t sure whether this was one of those jokes adults made. While the corridor wasn’t as dark as it had looked from above—the round arches supporting the brick roof were lit the amber of a traffic light—the illumination didn’t reach all the way into the alcoves on both sides of the passage. “You could play hide and seek if nobody was watching,” Bobby told him.

Hiding in an alcove didn’t appeal much to Charlie. Suppose you found somebody already was? Dead people must be kept down here even if he couldn’t see them, and who did Bobby think was watching? Charlie stayed close to his parents as the old woman shuffled along the corridor, jabbing a knuckly finger at plaques and mosaics while she uttered phrases that might have been names or descriptions. The movements in the alcoves were only overlapping shadows, even if they shifted like restless limbs. “You’ve not seen the best yet, son,” Bobby said.

This sounded less like an adventure than some kind of threat, and Charlie was about to ask whether it was in the guidebook when Bobby whispered “Look for the people in the walls.” As though the words had brought it to a kind of life, Charlie saw a thin figure beyond the next arch.

It was standing up straight with its hands near its sides. He thought it was squashed like a huge insect and surrounded by a stain until he made out that it seemed to be a human fossil embedded in the plaster. There was more or rather less to it than that, and once he’d peered at the ill-defined roundish blotch above the emaciated neck he had to blurt “Where’s its head?”

The old woman emitted a dry wordless stutter, possibly expressing mirth. “Maybe it’s hiding in the hole,” Bobby said. “Maybe it’s waiting for someone to look.”

The skeletal shape implanted in the wall had indeed been deprived of its skull. Perched on the scrawny neck was a hole deep enough for a man's head to fit in. "Don't," Bobbie said as if she was both delighted and appalled.

Charlie had to follow his parents under the arch as the old woman poked a finger at the gaping hole and let out a stream of words he might have taken for a curse or an equally fervent prayer. Now he saw bodies in both walls of the passage, and wished he didn't need to ask "Who took all their heads?"

"Maybe it was someone after souvenirs," Bobby said. "I don't suppose this lot were too tickled with losing their noggins. Watch out they don't think we're the ones that did it."

"They can't think. They've got no brains left."

"You tell him, son," Bobbie enthused just as his mother said "Charles."

He'd felt as if his words had robbed the figures in the walls of power until her rebuke gave it back to them. He could imagine the headless bodies peeling themselves loose from their corpse-shaped indentations and the stains that must have been part of them once, to jerk and stagger rapidly towards him. Far too soon some of them were at his back while others surrounded him, and there were surreptitious movements in the holes they had for heads—glimpses like animals retreating into their burrows to hide until people had gone by. Surely those were just the shadows of the visitors, and Charlie was making himself look closer when Bobby said "Don't stick your hand in, son. You never know what's waiting."

"Don't touch, Charles," his mother said at once.

"I wasn't going to."

"And," she said, "please don't speak to your mother in that fashion."

"Take no notice, son," Bobbie advised. "He was just having a joke."

"I'd like us to leave now, please," Charlie's mother said. "I think everyone's seen enough."

When Charlie turned to follow her he caught sight of a movement above the neck of the embedded body beside him, as if a face like a featureless stain had swung to watch. She must be causing it, there and in the cavities the other fleshless bodies had in place of heads. He tried not to look, especially back, while he trotted after her. It was only his father who was close behind him. The church was meant to be a refuge, and no footsteps other than the family's were clattering across the stone floor to the exit, however many echoes there might be. Outside all the clothes on the lines might have been miming agitation that his mother was trying to conceal. "I think we've been down here long enough," she said.

Long enough for what? Rather than ask, Charlie hurried after her to the lift, where the sight of a face peering through the small window had lost some of its appeal. As the lift creaked upwards his father consulted the guidebook. "They took the heads somewhere for safety," he said.

As Charlie wondered who was being kept safe and from what, his mother said "I'd like to put them behind us, thank you, Edward."

"How far?" Charlie blurted.

"I've been surprised at you today, Charles. I hope you won't let us down any more."

She strode to poke the button for the traffic lights, and his father hung back to murmur "They thought something might be catching, Charlie. That's why they took the heads off, to protect people."

Who might something catch, and why? As Charlie made to ask, his mother doubled her frown at them. "Come on, Charlie," his father muttered. "We don't want you ending up in more trouble."

Once they'd joined the queue at the bus stop Charlie's mother grasped her handbag every time a moped raced through the increasingly gridlocked traffic. The bicycles buzzing like wasps didn't bother Charlie, but he could have done without the face that kept looming at the window of the lift across the road. Very eventually a bus appeared in the distance, and less than ten minutes later it arrived at the stop.

From the bus he watched cars inch past one another, their drivers reaching to pull side mirrors inwards. The ruse would have amused him more if he hadn't seen one reflected face swell up like a worm emerging from a hole as the driver hauled at the mirror. Having leafed through the guidebook, his father said "Who'd like to go up to a park?"

"Let's," Charlie's mother said at once.

The picture in the book showed a railway platform made of steps alongside an equally steep train. When the bus came to an official stop at last and his father led the way to the station, however, Charlie saw an ordinary horizontal platform leading to a tunnel, where he tried to enjoy the sight of a blank-faced train worming its way towards him out of the dark. At first there wasn't much to see when the train moved off, though a toddler in the next carriage kept poking her head up to peer at him. Her breath on the window between the carriages blurred her face and turned it grey. He tried to focus his attention on the tunnel, where he couldn't see any holes in the walls—nowhere that anything could creep or struggle or bulge out from.

A wind boarded the train when, having escaped into the open, it reached the stop of a hill, and Charlie's mother tugged his zip under his chin. At a restaurant between the station and a park they had a pizza big enough for the three of them. Plastic sheets around the dining area didn't just obscure the view but made the face of anybody who came near seem to take shape only gradually and not quite enough.

There were views from all sides of the park. The guidebook fluttered like a captured bird while Charlie's father named buildings and piazzas and streets. The boy was more taken with Vesuvius, a hump the colour of its own dark smoke across the bay. "Would you like to use the telescope, Charles?" his mother said, but the notion of looking through a hole that brought things closer didn't tempt him. As she pocketed the coin for the slot machine he saw a face struggling through a gap in a mass of foliage behind her. Only the leaves were active, and the statue was on the far side of the bush.

"We can take a ferry tomorrow," Charlie's father said on the way back to the hotel, "to somewhere your mother should like." Charlie thought she'd heard more than was intended—perhaps a rebuke. Nobody spoke much until they were up in their room. As soon as his father started looking in the Frugoguide she said "I'd like to eat wherever's nearest."

"I hope that won't be its only merit," said his father.

"I hope some things mean more to you than your stomach." Her glance at Charlie made it plain what should. "Time for a rest before we go out," she said to bring all discussion to an end.

Charlie tried to lie still on his bed while his parents did on theirs beside him. He might have liked to see their faces, which were turned away from him. His father's hand lay slack on top of the side of his mother's waist, and Charlie had a sense that it was inhibited from moving, just like him. He struggled not to think this might be how it would feel to be embedded in a wall. You'd have to move eventually, however you could. He strained to keep his restlessness discreet, but once his bed had creaked several times his mother said wearily "We may as well go for dinner."

The nearest restaurant was just two doors away from the hotel. It was an osteria which sounded too much like a word for panic. Two mirrors the length of the side walls multiplied the room full of small tables. A waiter set about befriending Charlie, calling him signor and pouring him a sip of lemonade to taste as Charlie's father sampled the wine. He told Charlie that his choice of spaghetti Bolognese was the best dish on the menu, so that the boy felt obliged to finish it, though it wasn't much like his mother's recipe. As his parents drank the liqueur that came with the bill she said "I'll be happy to come here every night."

"Seconded," Charlie's father said, though Charlie didn't think she had been inviting a vote.

The boy might have shared their enthusiasm except for the word for the restaurant. It was engraved on the frosted window, and the O was a transparent oval like a hole a face would have to squash itself through. From the table at the back of the restaurant the letter resembled a hollow full of the darkness outside, and Charlie had glimpsed more than one face in it during the meal. Perhaps they'd belonged to people with an eye to dining, though they hadn't come in. "And I'm sure you'll want to see your friend again, Charles," his mother said.

She hurried him back to the hotel and up to the room, where she said "Face and teeth." Once he'd washed the one and brushed the others she dealt him a kiss so terse it was barely perceptible, and his father squeezed his shoulder. As Charlie lay under the quilt with his eyes shut he heard his mother say "I'm quite tired. You go down to the bar if you want, of course."

"No need for that," his father said before the low voices moved to the bathroom, where Charlie heard him murmur "Don't keep making that face." He imagined putting a face together like a jigsaw, a fancy preferable to the dreams he felt threatened by having. Eventually his parents finished muttering and went to bed. They weren't with him as he tried to find his way home through the town, where all the signs were as incomprehensible as the answers people gave him. In any case he didn't like speaking to anyone he met, however expensively dressed they were; they looked too thin inside their elegant costumes, and he couldn't make much of their faces. Perhaps there were none to be seen—not yet, at any rate. When they began to squirm up from the holes in the collars he stuffed the quilt into his mouth to mute his cries. Having to explain to his parents would be even worse than the dream.

At breakfast the English couple came over. "Bobby has something to say to you," Bobbie said.

"I'm sorry if I caused any upset down below."

"Don't be saying things like that at breakfast. In the catacombs, he means," Bobbie said as though apologising for a child. "Did he go too far, son?"

"He was joking. You said."

"So long as you don't forget," Bobbie said and turned to Charlie's mother. "We've been putting you down for a teacher."

"We both are," his father said.

At least all this helped distract them from how little the boy ate. After breakfast the family walked down to the harbour, to find the sea had grown so boisterous that the ferries had been cancelled. Now that Charlie saw all the windows in the boats he was happy to stay on land, even though he hadn't noticed any faces at them. "There's always Pompeii," his father said.

Opposite the main railway terminal was a kind of market, men hoping to sell shabby items that cluttered the pavement. One peddler had a dog, presumably not for sale. Its bony piebald face poked out of a discoloured plastic cone around its neck, and it bared uneven yellow teeth in a silent snarl. On the train Charlie tried to forget it and anything it brought to mind. The clocks on the stations were some help, since every one showed a different incorrect time. "They've stopped time," his father said as Charlie imagined he might have told the delinquents he taught creative writing in the unit at the school. Perhaps because modern history was her job, his mother didn't seem to think much of the idea. Charlie wasn't sure how to feel about the notion, but then this was true of much in his life.

Beyond the gates to Pompeii, where a woman's face nodded forward in the ticket booth, was an entire ruined town. Sightseers clustered like flies around the nearest buildings, where the open fronts were covered with wire mesh as if to cage the occupants—figures that Charlie wished he could mistake for statues lying on shelves. “Not more mummies,” his mother protested.

“They aren’t, Charlie. They’re just casts.”

Weren’t those the husks worms left behind where they crawled out of the earth? “What does that mean?” Charlie had to ask.

“They’re plaster.” This seemed reassuring until his father added “They’re the shape of whoever was there when the volcano caught them. All that was left were hollows where they’d been, and that’s what the plaster was put in.”

Too many if not all of the contorted figures looked about to writhe and creep towards their audience, and the idea of dead shapes that had grown in holes didn’t appeal to Charlie either. He followed his parents into the town, where the streets were the colour of bone—of the shapes in the cages. The face that poked out of an unglazed window belonged to a girl somebody was photographing. After that Charlie kept alert for cameras, which often brought faces out of holes in the walls. He was glad his parents had forgotten to bring their cameras because of disagreeing over what to pack.

Lunch was no excuse to leave, since they’d bought sandwiches and drinks on the way from the station. They picnicked in the amphitheatre, where Charlie’s father attempted to entertain him with a speech about someone called Spartacus who’d lived in Vesuvius and set people free. The passing spectators seemed more amused than Charlie’s mother did, and Charlie didn’t know which of his parents to side with. “Sorry if that was too much like school,” his father eventually said.

“Perhaps Charles thinks it hasn’t anything to do with him.”

“All history does, Charlie. It isn’t just behind us, it’s part of us.”

Charlie didn’t care for either of his father’s notions, which stayed with him as he trudged through the crumbling skeleton of a town. His father wanted to show him and especially his mother frescoes and mosaics recommended by the Frugoguide, but the boy was distracted by more faces at windows than there were amateur photographers. He wished he’d thought sooner to unzip his jacket, since as soon as he did his mother said “I think that’s the best of the day.”

He hoped that didn’t mean worse was to come. He felt as if the clocks on the stations were holding time back. He couldn’t see the dog in the market opposite the terminal, but if it was about, what else might he have overlooked? Despite the gathering dusk, his father made a detour on the way to the hotel.

The inside of this church was high and pallid, with pillars like polished bones. As the twilight blurred the figures outlined in the windows, their blotchy faces seemed poised to nod forward. Did he glimpse a face beyond the door of a confessional? The box made him think of an upright coffin in one of the kinds of film he wasn't allowed to watch. When he peered towards it the face was snatched into the gloom, and he heard a bony rattle. "Have you had enough for one day, Charlie?" his father said.

In a number of ways the boy had, but he confined himself to admitting "I'm a bit tired."

In the hotel room he felt as if his parents were waiting to catch him not just being tired, and he turned his back so that they couldn't see his face. At the restaurant the waiter gave them the same table and asked if the signor wanted his favourite. Charlie thought it safest to say yes, along with please when his mother's frown began to gather. A different dish might have been even harder to finish while he was aware of the O on the window. He kept thinking a face was about to peer in at him, and far too often faces did, retreating into the dark before he could distinguish any features they might have. When he tried to ignore the gaping oval he began to fancy that one face too many was hidden in the repetitive reflections on both sides of him.

"Face and teeth," his mother said upstairs with a toothy grin as a demonstration if not a joke. As well as the mirror on the bathroom wall a round one stood on a shelf above the sink. It magnified Charlie's reflection, and when he lurched to turn it away he saw his face swell up like a balloon, baring its teeth. He couldn't help taking the sight to bed, where he was visited by faces that grew bloated, parts of them bulging out of proportion as the heads struggled to emerge from their lairs. Each time he woke he had to jam the quilt into his mouth.

He might have left his plate at breakfast empty if his parents wouldn't have wanted to know why. When he returned to the table four people were watching him. "Were you disappointed you couldn't go on your boat?" Bobbie said.

He wasn't sure how much of a lie to tell. "A bit," he said.

“It’s your last day, Charles.” Perhaps his mother didn’t mean this to sound ominous, because she added “Would you rather not spend five hours on a ferry? Tell the truth.”

“Don’t mind.”

It was rather that he couldn’t think what he would prefer. When his mother raised her hands like a weary victim of a hold-up his father said “Would you like a surprise for your last day, Charlie?”

The boy wished they wouldn’t keep using the phrase. “If you like,” he couldn’t avoid saying.

“Aren’t I allowed to know either, Edward?”

“We don’t want to give it away, do we, Maur?” Charlie’s father covered the side of his face while he mouthed at her, and Charlie hoped she’d winced only at his dropping half of her name. “That’ll be a thrill for him,” Bobbie said.

Surely the surprise wasn’t more of Pompeii, though the family boarded that train. The clocks on the stations made Charlie feel as if time had abandoned him. His father stood up when the train reached Herculaneum. Weren’t there supposed to be mummies there too? It was only when his father bought bus tickets from a bar outside the station that Charlie realised his treat was Vesuvius.

As the bus climbed out of the town he saw a fair beside the road and felt guilty for wanting to be there instead. The nearer the volcano came, the less of an adventure it seemed likely to be. It loomed above the road like a storm rendered solid while his father read out from the guidebook that the Romans used to believe volcanoes were entrances to hell. Why would he take Charlie anywhere like that? Did the boy deserve it somehow?

Beyond a ticket booth a man was handing out sticks at the foot of the route to the crater. Much of the track consisted of loose flat stones, which made footsteps sound bony and thin, especially all those at Charlie’s back. The path kept promising and failing to grow less steep, and whenever he tried to take more of a breath the wind assailed him with the stench of the volcano. It smelled as if the earth were farting, and if he’d been with other boys he might have been able to laugh.

Near the summit the path led between souvenir stalls. Among the trinkets Charlie noticed skulls, which gave him the unwelcome notion that someone might have brought the heads up from the catacomb to sell. The crater wasn't reassuring—a vast hollow in which fumes crept out of the black earth, he couldn't see exactly where, to crawl about as though groping for their own shapes. Charlie didn't like to wonder what kind of creature Spartacus had been to live here, never mind what he'd set free.

He did his utmost to look pleased with the treat for his father's sake and to give his parents one less reason to disagree. At last his father asked if he'd seen enough. As they passed between the stalls again a cloud like an emanation of the crater massed overhead. Charlie felt walled in by skulls, which were no less ominous for being plainly manufactured. When a wind followed him down from the summit he could have thought more than the stench of rot was after him. Some of the people toiling uphill had tugged hoods around their faces against the wind, which yanked at the material so that their features thrust up at Charlie. More than one of them bared their teeth, surely only at the wind.

The bus had almost reached the station when Charlie's father turned to him. "I know something else you'll like."

He meant the fair. It had a roundabout Charlie went on twice, and a dog with a ruff around its neck, prancing on two legs while its front legs clawed at the air. There was a target gallery where neither Charlie nor his parents could shoot quite straight enough, and a stall where you flung wooden balls to knock grinning faces backwards, leaving dark holes. He didn't want to try that, and he hurried past to an attraction screened by trees. At once he wished he hadn't seen it, but his parents already had.

Two life-size figures were painted on a board taller than his father. No doubt they were meant to be comical. The man sported a clownish costume so baggy it made him look puffed up by gas, while his partner wore a spangled dress that bared her bony hirsute legs. They had no faces, only holes for them, filled just now by the dark swollen sky. Charlie was about to thank his parents for the treat and flee towards the road when a man bustled over, gesticulating with a camera. "Go on, Charles," his mother said. "Put your head through, then at least we'll have one photograph."

The surge of dread was worse for being undefinable. The prospect of causing an argument between his parents dismayed him as well. "You and dad first," he said in desperation.

As soon as they stepped behind the board he felt he'd risked them to save himself. They seemed unconcerned when they put their faces through; they even produced grins, though his mother's resembled her habitual patient expression, while his father's looked hopeful. The boy was able to respond, having thought of an excuse not to go near. "I won't reach."

"Of course you will," his mother said, letting her grin subside now that the camera had whirred twice. "Lift him up, Edward."

She pulled her face out of the hole to watch until he had to venture behind the board, to see only his parents and its unadorned back. His father took Charlie's waist in both hands and raised him like an offering to the hole in front of them. "Gosh, there isn't much of you," he murmured. "We'll have to feed you up."

Charlie saw his mother give them both a resentful look. He kept his head back until the photographer motioned vigorously for him to bring it forward. As the edges of the skull-sized orifice loomed around his face he saw the blurred misshapen body he'd acquired. The camera whirred and whirred again, and he thought the ordeal was over until his mother said "I'll take him, Edward. You deserve a turn."
He couldn't let her see him hesitate to go to her. "You aren't so skinny," she said as she hoisted him with her arms under his armpits, so that he wondered if she'd just wanted an excuse to weigh him. When his head came level with the hole she said "Don't do what you did with your face."

Had she noticed his reluctance? He jerked his head forward and did his best to grin. As he realised that his body had become the scrawny thing in a dress, the camera went off. He struggled to hold his face still while the shutter sounded once more, and then he made himself heavy so that his mother put him down. The photographer beckoned them all to a caravan, where he indicated a printer and moved his hands apart to specify the size of photograph. The machine quivered and rattled and eventually disgorged six large prints. Only the pictures of Charlie's parents were clear. In the rest, presumably because nervousness had made him move without realising, the boy's face was an indistinct bulge with a bony slit for a mouth.

"I think that's quite enough expense," his mother said when the photographer flourished the camera. His father paid and was handed the pictures in an envelope. The way out of the fair led past the painted board, and Charlie almost managed not to look, but couldn't resist glancing over his shoulder. Although nobody had been behind or even near the board, two swollen blotchy faces were dangling through the holes. They looked as if the process of emerging had come close to pulling them apart, given how much of them drooped over the edge of the holes. In the instant before he succeeded in wrenching his gaze away, Charlie saw that the effort had bared not just their teeth.

He clutched both his parents by the hands, apparently to their surprise, and dragged them towards the road. On the train he sat next to his father, away from the window, and couldn't tell where it was safe to look. The walk to the hotel felt like an omen of worse—the pavement market where the dog with its head in a hole might be lurking, the church with the box for faces to peer from, the restaurant where a head ducked towards the O of the engraved sign to grin out at him. He just managed to suppress his cry, having recognised the waiter who'd befriended him.

As his father unlocked the room Bobbie looked out of the one across the corridor. "Having a good last day?"

"I'd say so," Charlie's father said.

"We've an early start tomorrow. If you two want some time to yourselves after dinner we'll be in our room."

"You can ring us if there's any problem, son," Bobby said.

"You don't mind, do you, Charlie?" said his father.

Admitting his fears out loud seemed likely to make them more real. Perhaps only his silence about them was keeping them away. Besides, he felt responsible for the tension between his parents, especially since they couldn't discuss it in front of him. "I'll be all right," he prayed aloud.

"He'll behave himself, don't worry." He gathered Bobbie meant her husband. To Charlie's parents she said "We'll keep an eye."

He was unwillingly reminded that the faces in the holes hadn't been too good at keeping theirs. Once he was in the room he knew he wouldn't be able to lie still; trying would only make him shiver. "Can I read?" he pleaded.

"I said he ought to have brought some of his books, Edward."

"Can't I read the one about here?"

"I certainly don't see why not," his father said not even mainly to him, and passed him the guidebook.

Charlie was looking for reassurance, but there wasn't much. Spartacus had been a rebel slave who'd set up camp on Vesuvius six years before it erupted. Lot's wife in the Bible had probably been turned into a kind of mummy by a volcano. Charlie could have lived without learning this, never mind that some of the headless remains in the catacomb had been painted on the walls where the bodies used to be. Even if this explained the uneven outlines he'd mistaken for stains, it made the figures far too reminiscent of the ones at the fair, and what had happened to the bodies? The guidebook left that out as if it would do people no good to know. He was gazing at the page rather than read on when his father said "Too much for you, Charlie? Time for a feed."

In the restaurant the task of grinning at the waiter made the boy's face feel as constricted as it had by the board at the fair. He managed to avoid looking whenever anything loomed at the oval in the window. He took all the time he could over the meal the waiter assumed was his favourite, and succeeded in eating some of it as long as he forgot how the mirrors could be hiding an intruder. Eventually his mother said "Time to say goodbye, Charles."

The other couple must have heard them come upstairs, because Bobby called "Ready" as if he were playing hide and seek. Charlie hurried to the bathroom, hoping to outdistance his mother's night-time phrase, but she called through the door "Face and teeth." At the sink he shut his eyes so as not to see his bulbous face in the magnifying mirror. His parents delivered their signs of affection and waited for him to climb into bed. "We won't be any longer than we need to be," his mother said.

As soon as he couldn't hear their footsteps Charlie lurched out of bed to switch on the nearest light and then the rest of them. He tried watching television with the sound turned low, but he couldn't find any programmes in English, which made him feel as if the people on the screen were saying things it was vital for him to understand. They reminded him of his parents and the secrets he suspected were about him. He didn't want to read the guidebook in case it contained more information he wouldn't want to be alone with, and the sight of the photographs from the fair would be worse. He read every word in the folder about the hotel and tried to avoid looking at the spyhole in the door; every glance at it felt too much like inviting a response. He'd lost count of how often he'd read through the folder by the time he heard a fumbling at the door.

Was it one of his parents? Whenever they drank a lot they seemed to have trouble climbing the stairs at home—but the noise was too shapeless, almost not there and yet more present than he liked. With more reluctance than he'd ever previously experienced Charlie tiptoed to the door and stretched up to peer through the spyhole. When he glimpsed a shape so ill-defined it looked incomplete, vanishing from sight like a worm withdrawing into the earth, he managed to stay at the door long enough to jam the end of the chain into the socket. Once he'd shot the bolt as well he retreated to his bed and dragged the quilt over the whole of himself.

He was in a nervous fitful doze when he heard the fumbling again. He pressed the quilt against his ears so hard that he didn't hear the voices and the rapping on the door until they must have gone on for some minutes. He floundered off the bed and ran to let his parents in. Bobbie and her husband were watching from across the corridor. "Who on earth do you think you are, Charles?" his mother demanded. "This is our room."

He thought of an answer he hoped would placate her. "I didn't want any robbers to get in."

She only shook her head as if she had an insect in her hair and gestured him into the room, not even glancing at the other couple as his father murmured to them. From his bed Charlie heard his parents muttering at length in the bathroom. If they'd resolved their differences while they were without him, he'd spoiled that now. He heard his father declare "I'm not saying what I think has made him like this."

Eventually his parents went to bed. Their silence felt as ominous as the cloud above Vesuvius, and weighed on the dark. Charlie listened for signs that they'd fallen asleep, which might relieve at least some of the foreboding even if it left him by himself, but he didn't know whether they'd drifted off by the time he did. He dreamed they were at the door again, although when he managed to unchain it and open all the bolts and locks, the faces that poked at him out of his parents' heads weren't theirs. He clutched at the pillow to blot out his screams as his jolt awake almost flung him off the bed. The quilt dragged the pillowcase back so that the pillow bulged into his face. The pillow was lumpier than he remembered, and the irregular padding that covered the lumps was unhelpfully thin. Feathers must be spilling out of the pillow to make it feel as though fragments were flaking off. Charlie was pulling his head back, disliking the dry sour taste, when his thumbs dug into the contents of the linen sack—into something hinged, where an object stirred like a worm. In the faint light from the corridor he saw that his bed-mate had widened its withered eyes and bared its mottled teeth.

His shrieks brought Bobby to pound on the door while Bobbie blinked across the corridor. "Just a nightmare," Charlie's father said, perhaps with desperate optimism. Charlie's mother rubbed the boy's shoulders with more vigour than affection, not looking at his face. There was nothing in his bed or under it, which only made him wonder where the extra guest had gone. His mother shook the pillow when it was clear that she thought it was time he lay down. He almost hoped some unexpected contents would appear for his parents to see.

Even when he held the end of the pillowcase shut with both hands under the quilt he was afraid something would wriggle forth if he slept. Whenever he jerked awake from a few seconds' forgetful doze he clutched the pillowcase harder. At last it was time for breakfast, where he felt as if Bobby and Bobbie had left early because of him. He took as little from the buffet as he thought he could get away with taking while everyone in the room seemed to be aware of him, but he couldn't even eat that much. "I expect you're eager to be home," his father said, not really as if he believed it himself.

The day was so sunlit Charlie might have thought it was celebrating his departure. The light was pretending there was nowhere anything he dreaded could hide. In the taxi to the airport a face spied on him through the mirror. Knowing that it was the driver didn't comfort him, any more than the way the women at the check-in desk and the boarding gate scrutinised him. Very eventually he and his parents were allowed to shuffle onto the plane, where he stared at everybody seated further down the cabin until his mother said "Sit down, Charles. That isn't how you've been taught to behave."

He watched people filing along the aisle to sit behind him and in front of him. The procession was slow enough for a funeral, and made him feel breathlessly trapped. The face that had followed him out of the catacombs could hide anywhere—wherever his parents wouldn't believe it was. He craned around to peer between the seats at his mother, hoping she'd forgiven him for causing last night's scene, but she met him with a frown. "Turn round, Charles, please. You've shown us up enough."

"Look out of the window," his father urged, and Charlie couldn't let them sense his fear. As he ducked towards the cramped pane a blotch of a face swelled up to meet him—his own. At once he understood everything. His mother kept telling the truth about him, about the face and teeth, and his father didn't want to say what had made him how he was. The past was indeed part of him. The ground moved began to move before his eyes as the plane headed for the runway, and when he sat back the blurred face retreated into hiding—into him. He closed his eyes in the hope his father wouldn't make him look again, but it didn't help him forget. He couldn't leave behind the horror his parents were bringing home.

The Last Revelation Of Gla'aki

First published as the novella The Last Revelation Of Gla'aki, June 2013

For Steve and Mandy—
Have you room on a shelf?

The most famous Victorian rarity may be a stamp—the Penny Black—but it is several times more common than the rarest Victorian book. It is possible that no copy of The Revelations of Gla'aki still exists anywhere in the world.

The only printed edition was published in nine volumes in 1865, by the Matterhorn Press of Highgate in London. A spurious "Liverpool edition" is unrelated to it, and consists of text fabricated by modern gamesters for use in role-playing games. The Matterhorn set was published for subscribers, supposedly numbering fewer than two hundred, most of whom are thought to have belonged to cults or occult fellowships. It appears to have been the only work published by Matterhorn Press. The founder of the publishers may have been connected with the Ghost Club of Cambridge University, revived in London in 1862.

The nine volumes are described as "edited, organised, and corrected by Percy Smallbeam." The name is almost certainly a pseudonym. The text is reputedly founded on the contents of eleven volumes composed over an indeterminate period by members of an obscure cult founded at Deepfall Water near Brichester in Gloucestershire. While the original text is said to have been understandably haphazard, it is uncertain how much the Matterhorn edition was rewritten rather than simply reorganised. For instance, the occult writer John Strong claimed that Smallbeam dropped the apostrophe from the name Gla'aki to make for ease of reading.

The original content was apparently provided by an unidentified defector from the Gla'aki cult, though some sources maintain that the man responsible had been charged with propagating the material. He appears to have approached the Ghost Club for help with publication but was turned down by religious members of the society. Among its founders was E. W. Benson, later Archbishop of Canterbury and father of several writers of supernatural tales, including E. E and A. C. Benson. In his Life of his father, A. C. comments that he "was more interested in psychical phenoemna (sic) than he cared to admit, but would have no truck with the dissemination of occult secrets. A dupe who approached him for aid in the publication of a grimoire or the like was swiftly shown the door." Some have cited this as a reference to the cultist from Brichester.

The Matterhorn edition attracted no significant comment at the time. It would not be noticed by the public until the 1920s, when the campaign against Aleister Crowley ("the wickedest man in the world") by John Bull and the Sunday Express was at its height. A set of the books had been observed in Crowley's library, and Crowley described it as "an inspiration, the source of many secret truths." John Bull proceeded to attack it as "the most evil book ever published" while the Express exhorted its readers to burn every copy they could find. While the attacks were very largely if not entirely speculative, showing no acquaintance with the content of the books, the journalists were able to condemn the titles of two volumes, On the Purposes of Night (which was reviled as betraying the furtiveness of anyone associated with the books) and in particular Of the Uses of the Dead.

Most of the edition may have been destroyed as a result of the campaign. Subscribers who were still alive no doubt felt vulnerable and could have been easily influenced, and few if any descendants of the original owners would have cared to be associated with the books. Since then no copies have come to light, and in an unrelated incident the set held by Brichester University was among the volumes destroyed by a student at the turn of the last century. The most evil book, or a lost contribution to the literature of occultism? Like the contents of the Library of Alexandria, it may have passed into legend.

Leonard Fairman
Archivist, Brichester University
(guest columnist, Rarae Aves: Bookhunter Monthly, May 2012)

As the coast road brought him in sight of Gulshaw, Fairman thought this was how a writer must feel: you never knew where anything you wrote might lead you. The fat grey bricks of the small town looked as though the September sky had settled to the earth and grown solid. Beyond a wide church with tall thin arched windows and a squat tower, a line of stocky hotels overlooked a half-mile curve of beach. Behind them houses crowded uphill towards a wood, both ends of which reached down almost to the shore. At the near end of the promenade a town sign stood on stilts over an arrangement of large shells embedded in the pavement. WELCOME TO GULSHAW—SO MUCH MORE THAN SEA! There certainly was, Fairman thought, for him.

Just now the town seemed to be slumbering. A few families lay on towels on the beach as if they were hoping to bring out the sun. Old folk in wheelchairs drifted along the promenade while parents pushed children in buggies at the pace of the somnolent waves. At the ends of several pedestrian crossings Belisha beacons exchanged somnolent blinks. A Crazy Golf course was in use, though the players weren't much livelier than the statue that appeared to be shading its eyes to watch them as it gazed stonily out to sea. Beyond the hotels Fairman saw amusement arcades jittering with multicoloured lights, souvenir shops wearing bunches of hats, a fish standing as tall as a man to hold a menu in its fins. Close to the far end of the woods a string of cars crawled up the incline of a roller coaster, and a big wheel turned sluggishly for a few seconds before reverting to stillness.

Fairman slowed down as he passed the Church of the First Word. Though he hadn't been speeding, he felt as if he had, and in any case he needed to find his hotel. There was the Staymore, the Toprooms, the Seaside Dreams, the Kumbak... Eventually he located the Wyleave, a hefty structure with three storeys and a stained-glass awning, near the middle of the row. Across the road graffiti were attempting to bring a Victorian shelter up to date. Fairman drove around the Wyleave to the car park, where half a dozen vehicles took up almost half the space, and trundled his overnight bag into the hotel.

He suspected that the wallpaper along the corridor leading to Reception had been there before he was born. It was embossed with a pattern of fish leaping out of equally stylised waves, an image no doubt meant to evoke the seaside. The pattern flocked into the lobby, where a woman with silvery curls and a long heavy suntanned face sat behind a massive counter of dark wood. For an instant she looked drowsy, and then she stood up from her desk, her pearl necklace emitting a tiny chatter as it shifted on her embroidered white blouse. "Mr Fairman?" she said, and with a widening smile "I'm Mrs Berry. Call me Janine. Welcome to the Wyleave."

She held out a hand that proved to be soft and moist and possibly frail, so that Fairman refrained from taking too much of a grip. "I've given you a view," she said. "Can you put your details down for us?"

He was surprised by how much the registration form required: not just his name and address and the registration number of his car but date of birth, occupation, even next of kin and where to phone them—his father's name and the number of the retirement home. "Such a lot for just one night," Janine Berry said. "Won't you give us more of a chance?"

"I'd be happy to, but my holiday's arranged."

"So what's brought you to us?"

"Books."

"Of course," she said as though it had been less a question than a joke.

"We librarians do have other interests too, you know."

"I expect so," she said, though with a blink that looked a little puzzled, and slapped the nipple of a bell on the counter. "Tom, can you show Mr Fairman up to six."

The porter was a pudgy youth whose tan put Fairman in mind of batter on a fish, quite possibly a staple of Tom's diet. As he carried Fairman's luggage up a staircase enclosed by the omnipresent wallpaper Fairman tried asking "Been away for some sun?"

"Not likely," Tom said without turning to him.

Did Fairman sense resentment? Perhaps the tan was artificial. Tom was silent until he unlocked a room on the first floor. "We've got you here."

As soon as the door opened Fairman could see all the way to the watery horizon. Heavy purple velvet curtains scragged by bands of the same material framed the extensive window. A mauve plush chair sat by a dressing-table surmounted by a wide oval mirror, which was flanked by massive wardrobes of the same dark wood as the reception counter. The double bedspread and the plump headboard kept up the empurpled look. At least the wallpaper was pale blue, and decorated with stylised waves but no fish. While Fairman could live with all this, he was taken aback by the absence of a bathroom. Perhaps the porter saw him frown at the sink in the corner, because he pointed along the corridor at a pair of doors marked WC and BATH. "You'll not be sharing long," he said.

Once Tom had dumped the case at the foot of the bed Fairman pressed a pound coin into his hand. The clammy palm yielded so much that he thought he'd been too forceful, but the porter didn't react. "Call us if you need us," he muttered before retreating into the corridor.

Fairman sat on the bed, which emitted a creak and a scent of lavender. As he took out his mobile he heard the sea, a sound like a great protracted sleepy breath. The breath was held while a phone rang somewhere in Gulshaw, and then a mellifluous male voice said "Home of the Gulshaw Players. How can we help you?"

"Could I speak to Mr Lunt?"

"I'm your man and no other, and I believe I may be speaking to Mr Fairman."

"That's so," Fairman said, wondering if he had more of an accent than he imagined. "I'm in town. When might it be convenient for me to come by?"

"No better time than now. Toddle over whenever you're ready. Anyone will tell you where we are."

Fairman rather hoped the fellow wouldn't prove to be even more effusive in the flesh. He let himself out of the room and dawdled on the stairs to search for a pocket that might accommodate the brass baton attached to the key. "Don't go lugging that about with you," Mrs Berry protested. "We're always here. If you need us, wake us up."

"Could you direct me to the Shaw Theatre?"

"Our only one. Along the front and turn up by the Goodnight. You're on your mission, then." As Fairman granted that, she said "You'll have a look round too, won't you? There's so much more to see."

Was that a joke about the town slogan or a slip of her tongue? Fairman forgot about it before he reached his car. He couldn't recall having passed a Goodnight, and he found it at the far end of the row of hotels, on the corner of a street that separated them from the amusement arcades. The theatre was halfway up the street, which it divided into lanes that passed on either side. As Fairman parked below it, a couple leading their children by the hand plodded uphill towards him. The boy and the equally sleepy-eyed girl watched him feed coins into a machine that performed a routine of clicks and whirs before producing a coquettish ticket. The children even seemed to find him worth watching while he stuck the ticket inside the windscreen, and he wasn't unhappy to leave them behind as he made for the Shaw.

A dormant neon sign identified the squat grey building, but not by its original name. The lingering outlines of letters betrayed that it had once been called the Gulshaw.

On either side of the glass doors a poster advertised THE GULSHAW PLAYERS IN FOR YOU TO SEA, which Fairman thought made no sense. As he tried to open the nearest door a young woman crossed the foyer to admit him, miming more speed than she achieved. "Mr Fairman?" she said with a smile that multiplied creases on her plump tanned face. "Mr Lunt is ready for you. You're to go straight through."

Beyond the ticket counter a corridor was decorated with posters older than Fairman. He'd squinted at just a couple—the grudging light and the befogged glass within the frames blurred the outlines of the faces—when the door at the end of the corridor swung inwards. "Mr Fairman," the manager boomed. "Frank Lunt. Welcome to the Shaw."

He was a small man capped with glossy black hair. He wore a lounge suit and a white shirt stretched so tight over his prominent stomach that dark hairs peeked between more than one pair of buttons. His bow tie was as black as his neat moustache, which appeared to be sharing its gloss with his round face. His handshake was somewhat prolonged for Fairman's taste, since it was damp and pliable. "Step in," he urged. "Will you have a drink to celebrate?"

"I'd better not when I'm driving. Being here is enough of a celebration for me."

"Not for you alone, sir." Lunt lowered himself into a venerable leather chair behind his broad squat desk while Fairman sat on a pudgy stool. "It's good to meet someone who knows all about our book," Lunt said.

"I wouldn't say quite all. Only what you read." When the manager looked politely unconvinced Fairman added "Do you mind if I ask how you came by the book?"

"Father gave it me."

That was brusque enough to be a warning, especially since it didn't sound like the man's style. Perhaps Fairman had touched on a family secret, in which case he shouldn't pry. "I don't doubt he was right to trust you," he said.

"I'll say as much for you."

Fairman supposed he should feel vindicated, but he said "Would you like to see some identification?"

"No need." Lunt might even have been offended. "Nobody's doubting who you are."

"Well then, may I see what you've been looking after?"

"My privilege." Lunt stood up as if he were stretching after a rest, but gestured Fairman to stay seated. "It's here for you," he said.

Fairman had expected to be taken somewhere else. The safe to which Lunt turned behind his desk seemed hardly large enough to hold nine books, though Fairman had learned from a nineteenth-century auction catalogue that the volumes were small quartos. Having typed on the keypad, the manager pressed a final key so hard that his thumb appeared to swell and flatten, and then he stood back as the door swung ajar.

The safe was full of papers and, as far as Fairman could make out, nothing else. He had to restrain himself from craning for a better view as Lunt hauled the door wide and reached in. For a few moments that felt longer than a breath Fairman had the odd impression that the man was extending his arm quite a distance. He let out the breath as Lunt produced a small black volume from the safe. "All yours now, Mr Fairman," he said.

Fairman must look as if he were bowing in obeisance as he rose in a crouch to take the book that Lunt passed him with both hands. It was bound in soft black leather, with a colophon embossed on the front cover. At first Fairman took the image for a spider clutching a ball of its eggs, and then he saw that it showed the world held aloft by a claw with many digits, unless those were meant for the limbs of some creature lurking on the far side of the globe. He was cataloguing the volume in his mind—it was indeed a small quarto, measuring about seven inches by a little over three—but despite his attempt to stay professional, his pulse was quickening. The spine was devoid of any title, and as he turned the cover towards him again the colophon appeared to rise out of its own blackness. "Thank you, Mr Lunt," he said. "You can't know how much this means to me."

"Just so it's in the right hands, Mr Fairman. That's all we need."

As Fairman opened the book a musty odour reminiscent of stagnant water rose to greet him. In a breath it dissipated, giving way to the familiar aroma of old paper, though the pages had hardly yellowed. He seemed to taste both smells on the long breath he took as he read the title page.

Of the World as Lair
Tome III of the Revelations of Glaaki edited, organised, and corrected by Percy Smallbeam

His hands grew a little clammy, and the covers felt as if they had, while he turned to the first page.

> How many secrets hath the world! Some are hid by water, and so Glaaki may be known to few men but in the dreams He sends ...

It occurred to Fairman that scarcely anyone alive might have read these words. He could imagine himself reading to the end without looking up, but he mustn't presume on Lunt's hospitality. He regained some professionalism by noting that while the subscribers weren't named or numbered, this volume belonged to the sixty-first set. He shut the book and saw Lunt closing the safe. "May I have the rest now?" he said.

"A rest," Lunt said and gazed at him.

"All the rest." Fairman added a laugh to take responsibility for the mistake. "The others," he said. "The other books."

"There's what I told you I had, Mr Fairman."

For a moment Fairman was as bewildered as the fellow seemed to be, and then he was able to laugh afresh. "I don't mean different ones. Forgive me, I'm talking about the rest of this set."

"We know that."

"You mean," Fairman said more sharply than he was able to control, "this is all?"

"I hope you don't think you'd have been brought here if it wasn't worthwhile."

"Please don't think I'm ungrateful," Fairman resigned himself to saying. "It's a more than welcome acquisition. I'll see that you're named as the donor."

"No need to single me out, Mr Fairman."

"Whatever you're comfortable with, Mr Lunt." When this brought no response Fairman said "I suppose we'll never know what happened to the rest, then."

"You will."

Fairman had to take a breath before he asked "How shall I?"

"Go to Dr Stoddart. He's got something for you just like me.

"You don't mean the rest."

As Lunt gave him a slow grin Fairman felt as if he'd been made the butt of a ponderous joke. Perhaps it was a local brand of humour if not simply Lunt's, and Fairman couldn't really call it malicious. A number of questions came to mind, but he only said "Would you know his number?"

"It'll be the surgery, but he's shut for the night."

"I'd like to try calling to be sure."

"It's your time." Lunt intoned the number and said "Tell him you're at Frank's."

A receptionist answered, though only on a tape that hissed like waves. Once she'd recited the surgery hours she provided an emergency number. Fairman didn't feel justified in using this, especially when it mightn't connect him with the person he was after. "Dr Stoddart, I'm Leonard Fairman of the Brichester University archive," he said. "Mr Lunt has just presented me with his valuable addition and says you'll be able to complete it. Let me leave my number and I'd appreciate your giving me a call."

He looked up just too late to interpret Lunt's vanishing expression. He would have felt presumptuous to call him Frank after so brief an acquaintance. "Thank you once again for your generous bequest," he said and stood up.

"We've another present for you," Lunt said and handed him a slip of paper that had been lying on the desk.

It was a ticket for the Gulshaw Players on Thursday night. "That's very kind of you, Mr Lunt," Fairman said, "but I don't imagine I'll be here by then."

"You mustn't run away from us, Leonard. There's so much more to see."

Fairman didn't know which peeved him more—the lurch into familiarity or the mangling of the slogan. He thanked Lunt once more as the manager held the door open for him. In the foyer the young woman did, and gave Fairman's prize a look not far short of reverential. Presumably Lunt had told his staff about the book. Outside the theatre Fairman might have fancied that everyone trudging uphill towards him was aware of it. Of course he was simply mindful of how vulnerable it was out here in the open, and he hurried to unlock the car.

He'd brought nine stout cartons filled with excelsior. As he made space in one for the book and covered it up, quite a few passers-by stared at him. At least one man slowed down to watch, humming some old melody under his breath. Was Fairman betraying how valuable the book was? He made haste to stow the carton in the boot and lock the car before driving back to the hotel.

Janine Berry glanced over the reception counter at the solitary item in his hands. "I hope you don't think Gulshaw's let you down, Mr Fairman."

"Don't worry." He'd told her he was here for more than one book, of course. "I've more to look forward to before I go home," he said.

In his room he opened the safe that was hidden in the left-hand wardrobe. While there was nowhere near enough space for nine cartons, of course he wouldn't need it; he would be driving back to Brichester as soon as he took charge of the rest of the books. He laid the carton in the safe and typed his birthday—5475—on the keypad. Once he'd made certain the safe was secure he went out for dinner.

He didn't want much. He was eager to spend time with the book. He walked along the promenade, overtaking the occasional stroller. The sun had gone down, though he couldn't judge exactly where, given the grey haze that merged the horizon with the sea. Beyond the hotels he was met by the clamour of the amusement arcades: the electronic jingles of fruit machines, the repetitive ditties of toddlers' rides, the robot voices of video games. Between two of the arcades a giant fish stood on its tail in a pool of mossy light from the green tube in the window of Fishing For You. As Fairman let himself into the fish and chip shop the proprietor, an unexpectedly scrawny woman in a white uniform not unlike a nurse's, said "The word's out, then."

"Sorry, I'm not with you."

She gave that a look he could have thought was skeptical. "The word about the best fish dinners," she said. "You've come a distance."

Presumably Fairman's accent had betrayed him again. "Everybody's favourite," she said as she perched a battered fish on top of a heap of chips on a sheet of greaseproof paper. "See if you aren't back for more."

He didn't bother saying that he wouldn't be in Gulshaw long enough. She wrapped the package in a page of the Gulshaw Gannet and wiped her glistening hands on a towel before she gave Fairman his change. He took the hot package across the road to a bench overlooking the beach. Could people really still be swimming in the sea? He had to squint into the gathering dusk to be sure that the restless shapes were large jellyfish. As he unwrapped his dinner a wind fluttered the newspaper; in the dimness it looked as if the fish was struggling to demonstrate some kind of life. The batter was crisp, and though he might have called the fish a little rubbery, it tasted as he remembered cod tasting in his childhood. He ate most of it and nearly all the chips, and stuffed the remains into a concrete bin that appeared not to have been emptied for some time. He was turning back towards the Wyleave when an old phone began to trill.

Although he wouldn't have been surprised to see a vintage phone box on the promenade, the sound was in his pocket. He was hoping Dr Stoddart had returned his call, but the phone display showed him Sandra's name. "Sorry," he said. "I ought to have called you by now."

"You're there, I take it."

He heard affection underlying that, but he didn't know if anybody else would have. "I have been for a little while," he said. "It feels longer, somehow."

"That's a bit imprecise for you, Leonard."

"I'm sure it's because I'm away from you." He imagined her making the face she kept for compliments—almost too deprecatory to betray appreciation—but when he heard no response he said "It reminds me of the kind of holiday I never had as a child."

"I didn't realise you preferred that kind."

"I don't. I'm looking forward to ours. Art galleries and churches are fine as far as I'm concerned."

"So have you acquired your prize?"

"I've made a start."

"You either have it or you haven't, Leonard."

"I thought the chap who emailed me had all nine volumes. You saw yourself what he said." When she gave him a silence to interpret, Fairman told her "It turns out he just had one."

"So you'll be on your way after breakfast, I suppose."

"Not quite so soon. I'm waiting to hear from the fellow who has the rest of the set."

"Why on earth would they split it up?"

"To tell you the truth, I didn't enquire. I don't think the chap I saw was anxious to discuss its history. We can't expect everyone to care about books as much as we do, can we? I'm just happy it still exists."

"Don't let them take advantage of you, Leonard."

"How is anybody going to do that? It's not as though I'm being asked for payment. We ought to appreciate how generous that is."

"Unless they're glad to see the last of it. Perhaps the man who gave you the book didn't want too much of that kind of thing in his house, and that's why he had only one volume."

"It wasn't in his house, it was in his office safe."

"There you are, then."

She could be imprecise when it suited her, Fairman thought as he retorted "It doesn't matter what he thinks of it, does it? It's our job as archivists to preserve books like those."

"That doesn't mean we have to promote what they represent."

"Nobody's promoting anything. I've hardly even started reading it."

"Do you really need to, Leonard?"

"I wouldn't be much of a librarian if I didn't know my stock."

"In that case I'd better leave you to get on with your job."

"I'll give you a call when I'm about to start back if you like." When she let him assume her response he said "Have a good night."

"I expect I shall." As he began to think the call was over she said "I hope you do as well."

He'd learned to find fondness in her voice, since she hadn't much time for nicknames or other expressions of intimacy. The conversation had brought him to the shelter opposite the Wyleave. In the open cabin four benches formed a cross. On the bench that faced the sea the names MELANIE and SETH were united by a heart so inexpertly rendered that it looked malformed. Another seat bore misshapen figures merged by the enthusiasm of the cartoonist, while the bench facing the hotel was covered with initials bunched closely enough to resemble words, especially since they could have been scrawled in a single hand. Fairman found himself attempting to pronounce the gibberish in his head, if only to prove the graffiti weren't words, as he crossed the promenade to the hotel.

Mrs Berry was rising from behind her desk when he stepped into the lobby. He might have thought she'd been waiting up for him. His key gave a hollow rattle as she retrieved it from its pigeonhole. "Ready for bed, Mr Fairman?"

"I've some reading to do first."

"Of course," she said as though he'd reconfirmed her notion of the typical librarian. He was heading for the stairs when she murmured "Dream well."

"I don't really go in for it."

"We all do, Leonard." She touched her forehead, and the patch of brow as well as her fingertip grew momentarily pale. "If you don't," she said, "you'll never know what's in there."

That was the kind of observation Sandra had least patience for, he thought as he climbed the stairs. She hadn't even let him finish telling her what he knew about Deepfall Water, although it wasn't a great deal. He'd found none of it worth mentioning in the essay that had ended up online.

Had a cult ever really made its home beside the unfrequented lake? In the 1960s the notion had been revived after Thomas Cartwright, a minor artist specialising in fantastic and occult themes, moved into one of the lakeside houses and died as the result of some kind of attack. A police investigation had proved inconclusive, and a family who were supposed to have abandoned the house before Cartwright took it over had never been tracked down. If the houses had at some stage been served by a private graveyard, no identifiable trace was found, though some tales suggested that the stone tombs had been pulverised beyond recognition. We Pass from View, an occult book by local author Roland Franklyn, even claimed that they'd been destroyed by the police.

Fairman had thought this unsuitable for mentioning in Book Hunter Monthly, and Sandra hadn't wanted to hear any more. She would have liked his other anecdotes even less—schoolboy stupidity, he imagined she would call them. They dated from his days at Brichester High, a quarter of a century after the Cartwright business. The lake had become a place you dared your friends to visit after dark, and he'd assumed his fellow pupils had borrowed the idea from films, though the originator of the challenge had lived on the edge of Brichester nearest the lake. Those who ventured there brought back increasingly extreme stories: the lake had begun to throb like an enormous heart, or a procession of figures as stiff as bones had been glimpsed among the trees on the far side of the water, or a globular growth on a stalk in the middle of the lake had turned so as to keep a party of teenagers in sight, and they'd realised it was an eye. How could any of this have been visible at night? At the time Fairman hadn't been surprised that the adventurers had ended up with nightmares, but once the headmaster learned of the visits to the lake he'd forbidden them. Apparently his fierceness was daunting enough, since the lake reverted to the status of a rumour. Since then, so far as Fairman knew, it had been visited mostly by the kind of people who tried to plumb the depths of Loch Ness, and they'd found just as little evidence of anything unnatural.

He didn't think he would ever tell Sandra that he'd visited Deepfall Water. He'd hoped to bring his essay more to life, but perhaps he also meant to prove that he wasn't quite the bookish introverted fellow his schoolmates had thought him. He could see no reason to go at night, and even on a February afternoon the place had seemed unnecessarily dark, no doubt because of the trees that stooped close to the unpaved track from the main road as well as surrounding the lake. They overshadowed the row of three-storey houses that huddled alongside a cobblestone pavement at the edge of the water. All six roofs had caved in, and some of the floors were so rotten that they'd collapsed under the weight of debris. Great leaves of blackened wallpaper drooped off the walls of a house in the middle of the terrace, and Fairman had wondered if this was the one most recently occupied, nearly half a century ago. None of the windows contained even a fragment of glass, and he suspected his old schoolmates might have been at least partly responsible. The buildings seemed to gape at the expanse of water like masks lined up to demonstrate they had no identity of their own. He'd found the thought oddly disturbing as he went to the edge of the lake.

The murky water stretched perhaps half a mile to the trees where some of his schoolfellows had claimed to see a procession that shouldn't have been walking. He doubted you could see that even with a flashlight, given how close together the trees grew. The depths of the lake were even harder to distinguish. It was fringed by large ferns, but he'd made out just a few inches of the stalks beneath the surface, which was so nearly opaque that he might have imagined the mud was being stirred up by some activity in the lake. In fact the water had been absolutely stagnant, and he'd peered harder into it as though he was compelled to find some reason to have visited Deepfall Water. He'd had the odd impression that around it all the trees were craning to imitate him, enclosing the lake with an iris of darkness that was capable of shrinking the sky overhead. That must have been an effect of his concentration, along with the idea that his scrutiny could waken some presence in the depths; in fact, a sluggish ripple had begun to spread from the middle of the lake, followed by another and another. They'd advanced so slowly that their lethargy had seemed to take hold of him; he could have fancied that the waves of his brain had been reduced to the pace of the hypnotic ripples. The thought had jerked him back to consciousness, not least of the unnaturally premature dark. As the ripples grew audible he'd turned his back and retreated to his car. He'd heard water splashing the edge of the pavement by the time he'd succeeded in starting the engine. Of course the ripples must have been caused by a wind, since all the trees around the lake had bent towards the water.

Besides these impressions, he'd seemed to take something else home. Like Sandra, for whom it was a reason to be proud of her rationality and control, he didn't dream or at least never remembered having done so, but for some nights after visiting Deepfall Water he'd been troubled by wakeful thoughts. Whenever he drifted close to sleep he'd found himself thinking of the investigators who had tried to search the lake. The notion of sounding it had brought to mind a disconcertingly vivid image of a vast shape burrowing deeper into the bed of the lake, raising a cloud of mud so thick that it blotted out the denizen. No doubt this betrayed how preoccupied he was with the impossibly rare book, but he'd been assailed by the vision several times a night, until he'd begun almost to dread attempting to sleep. If dreaming was like that, it wasn't for him.

By the time he'd completed his essay the vision had left him, which surely proved they were related. He didn't mention it to Sandra, and he supposed he should be grateful that they'd been living apart. Perhaps this might change soon, along with her view of his find here in Gulshaw. Surely no librarian could be unaffected by the sight of one of the rarest books in the world.

He locked the door of his room and hurried to the safe. When he typed his birthday digits he was assailed by a panicky notion that the safe wouldn't open, as though the book might be too precious to release. But the black door edged open, and he reached into the dimness to cradle the box in his hands, laying it on the bed to lift the book out of its papery nest. The leather covers felt unexpectedly chill, as he thought a reptile's hide might feel. He sat on the solitary chair and opened the book as carefully as he might have handled an infant. "How many secrets hath the world..."

Was he exhausted after the long drive from Brichester to the northern coastal town? Perhaps not only tiredness was affecting his concentration. Whatever the incantatory prose might be meant to achieve, he wouldn't call it lucid. To what extent had Percy Smallbeam rewritten the material? Certainly the style read like a single author's. Fairman felt as though he wasn't so much interpreting the text as waiting for it to take shape in his brain, an experience that seemed unnecessarily similar to dreaming, and he turned the stiff pages in search of some reference his mind could fasten on. What was Gla'aki meant to be, for instance? Perhaps that was made clear in an earlier volume, but around the middle of this one he found a reference to Brichester.

The theory appeared to be that certain areas of the world were foci of alien or occult forces—the book made no distinction. Whether this was a result of magical practices performed there over many centuries, or whether the sites had initially attracted the practices, was left unclear. Massachusetts around the town of Arkham was such a place, and other American locations included the Sesqua Valley and the Castle Rock area of Maine. In Britain the Yorkshire moors near Marske were mentioned, along with Caerleon and Liverpool, where the chronic overcrowding of the slums at the time the book was published "allowed the ancient denizens to flourish unremarked save by those who had carnal recourse to them." As for Brichester, the book suggested that the surrounding Severn Valley area was a node of occult activity and the lair of creatures far older than humanity. Supposedly some of the latter had survived beneath the village of Clotton, a name no longer on the map, "where they ape the voice of the blind waters that pour into the abyss beneath the earth." Other legends spoke of Temphill, where an attempt to render an ancient site Christian had merely given sustenance to the forgotten things that were drawn to a subterranean vault, and Goatswood, in Roman times a place of worship of an inhuman entity the Romans called the Magna Mater. In the forest that gave Goodmanswood its name you might encounter a man composed of insects that would swarm into your brain. And here at last was a reference to Gla'aki, although spelled in Percy Smallbeam's way. "So steeped in arcane power was the valley that it acted as a beacon to which Glaaki guided His stone cocoon across the gulfs of space."

Fairman hadn't realised that the area around his home town had given rise to so many myths. Perhaps they were simply delusions of the cult that had written the original text, or Percy Smallbeam might have elaborated on them; who was to know? Nevertheless Fairman had an odd elusive sense that he'd already been aware of some of them. It felt as he imagined trying to recall a dream would feel, and he was gazing into his own bemused eyes in the mirror when his phone rang. He might almost have been jerking awake as he saw the number was unidentified. "Hello?"

"Leonard Fairman? I believe you want me."

"I might if I knew who you were."

"It's Dennis Stoddart, Leonard. You left me a message."

"Dr Stoddart." Fairman couldn't quite bring himself to match the familiarity, and hoped this conveyed that he didn't welcome it either. "Thanks for calling back. Mr Lunt said—"

"I'll bet he said a lot and at least half of it worth hearing. That's our Frank and it's how we all like him." The doctor cut a chortle short and said "But if he told you where to find your sacred item, that's the truth."

While Farman might have demurred about the sacred-ness, especially if Sandra had been there, he said "When could I—"

"As soon as you like in the morning. Sleep sound," the doctor said—it could almost have been medical advice— and rang off.

No doubt Mrs Berry would be able to direct Fairman to the surgery. The front cover of the book he'd placed on the dressing-table had begun to twitch upwards as though it and its reflection were beckoning to him. He no longer felt sufficiently awake to concentrate, and returned the book to its carton, which he locked in the safe. Slinging a towel over his arm, he ventured into the corridor.

He might have preferred the hotel to be somewhat less quiet. He'd been inhibited in public toilets ever since his childhood. He flushed the shared toilet before using it and hoped that his uncontrollably intermittent pouring would be drowned out by or at least indistinguishable from the filling of the cistern. He waited for that to finish so that he could pull the chain, the handle of which wore a mauve sheath that matched the shaggy cover of the lid and the curtains at the dinky window. At last he was free to dodge next door to the bathroom.

Apparently the previous user had left the light on beyond the frosted glass that was additionally obscured by condensation. Fairman pushed the door open and recoiled so hastily that he lost his grasp on the handle. "Sorry," he gasped.

"My fault." It was a woman's voice, though until she spoke he wasn't sure it would be. "Forgot to bolt," she said. "Just getting in shape for the night."

"You carry on. Don't hurry for me. I can do without the bathroom."

He still couldn't see her except as a blurred shape under the steam on the mirror. The bathroom had an oddly stagnant smell; perhaps she had lingered too long in the bath. Fairman was retreating when the door shut, though the imprecisely outlined figure in the mirror hadn't seemed to move. No doubt she'd used her foot to close the door, though it must have been quite a stretch. Presumably the door was still unbolted, a thought that hastened him back to his room. He washed his face and brushed his teeth at the sink, above which a small mirror showed him his back above the dressing-table. He could do with keeping himself in better shape; perhaps he ought to use a gym, as Sandra did.

Outside the window the streetlamps blanched the promenade and blackened the graffiti in the shelter. The pale glare illuminated just a narrow strip of the beach, so that he couldn't be sure whether there were jellyfish in the receding sea. He unlatched the sash and pushed it up, which didn't help him to distinguish the indistinct restless shapes from the movements of the waves. As he leaned over the sill a wind brought him the smell of the sea—at least, the smell of Gulshaw beach. It hadn't previously occurred to him that the place didn't smell as the seaside should; he was reminded of the stagnant smell he'd noticed in the bathroom. Although he believed it was healthier to sleep with the bedroom window open, he dragged the sash all the way down.

The stagnant odour seemed to linger in the dark. It held him back from sleep, and so did thoughts of the book. The reference to a stone cocoon kept catching at his mind, and he found himself visualising an enormous stone oval suspended in outer space, an object that resembled a monstrous egg or an island torn loose from its world to wander among the stars. As it plummeted towards a familiar planet he had a sense that it was being held together from within and reinforced against the friction that would have consumed a lesser meteor. What kind of entity could exert so much control over matter? The vision troubled him like the one he'd experienced after visiting Deepfall Water, and made him feel as he had while reading the book—that he was reaching for memories he hadn't known were his. He was glad the image of the cocoon went no further, and eventually it let him sleep.

Daylight wakened him, and so did an idea. While it might be too much to hope that each volume was indexed, he ought to check. He opened the safe and the carton, and leafed to the end of the book. "Good God," he said with very little sense of what he was expressing.

There was no index. The text was followed by the flyleaves, which were covered with handwriting. However nearly illiterate the sprawling script looked, it might be senile or written under some influence. Fairman didn't think it could be Lunt's, though it must be relatively recent, having been written with a ballpoint. Do not trust all which is herein, it said. Some visions were imperfectly set down, and some came damaged at the source. Some were spoiled by the minds employed to convey them, while others were misinterpreted by the editor. Not the bible nor the Quran is so worthy of restoration.

By the time Fairman had read this he no longer thought the book had been defaced. If anything the comments seemed to make the copy rarer still, but how could anyone establish what the original text had been? The set would be available for experts to decipher if they could, and Fairman was content to be its guardian. He closed the book more carefully than ever and returned it to its nest in the safe before he emerged from the room.

A smell of breakfast greeted him in the corridor, and he heard voices murmuring downstairs. He flushed the toilet and then used it while the fattened lid nestled against his lower back. The stagnant smell had departed from the bathroom, and the shower he took didn't revive it, though condensation turned the mirror into a block of fog. Once he was dressed he reassured himself that the safe was locked and went down to the breakfast room.

Two teenage girls in grey track suits were on their way out while their parents told another family "See you next year." The seated party were the only breakfasters just now. They were a stocky lot, consisting of a dumpy son and daughter who resembled their parents so much that Fairman was reminded of those wooden dolls that unscrewed to produce miniatures of themselves. As he sat by the window, beyond which a whitish haze was curtaining the sea off from the beach, the mother twisted her top half around on the chair to face him. "First time?"

"Forgive me, I'm not sure what you mean."

Her husband squirmed around to stare at him. "We've not seen you before," he said in a Lancashire accent at least the equal of his wife's, "she's saying."

"Just here for the night," Fairman said.

The man gave a grunt that might have been doubling as some kind of laugh. "There's not many do that in Gulshaw."

Fairman was wondering if this deserved an answer when Mrs Berry bustled into the room, though not at much speed. "Good morning," she cried. "Any dreams?"

As the boy and girl opened their mouths in unison Fairman said "Nothing I'd call one."

"What would you call it, then?"

The question seemed all the more unwelcome for coming from the stocky man. "Just night thoughts," Fairman resented having to explain.

Apparently it was the mother's turn to speak. "It can bring them, right enough."

"We'll leave them there for now, shall we?" Janine Berry said. "Are you having our big breakfast, Leonard?"

"That'd set anyone up for the day," the stocky man declared.

"Thank you, Mrs Berry," Fairman said. "I'll indulge myself this once."

The parents turned their back to him as Mrs Berry left the room, but the children continued to gaze at him as if he were some kind of specimen until they were told to eat up. As soon as they'd both wiped their glistening mouths the family took leave of Fairman. "Make the most of your stay," the man advised him, and his wife added "So much more to see."

Was everybody in on that joke, supposing it could be called one, or was nobody capable of reading the slogan? The family plodded away before Fairman could find a response. He watched people tramp down to the beach, vanishing into the haze that the sunlight had turned more opaque, until Mrs Berry brought his plateful. "There's a Gulshaw breakfast for you," she said.

It certainly seemed regional. The yolks of the pair of fried eggs were unusually large and pale, and oddly irregular. Both sausages were almost the colour of the slices of white pudding, and all these were tinged patchily purple, like the mushrooms and the bacon. Fairman mightn't have been ready to sample his breakfast if Mrs Berry hadn't lingered to watch. In fact it tasted as it should, so that he was able to reward her with an enthusiastic smile, and then he thought to say "I need to see your Dr Stoddart."

"Already?" Mrs Berry said and rubbed her mouth as if to erase the word—rubbed so hard that the skin around her lips looked bruised. "Oh, you mean —"

"He has something for me."

"Of course. I'm going to say it's a book."

"I hadn't realised I was so predictable."

"Nobody's laughing at you, Mr Fairman. You mustn't think you're anything but welcome."

She seemed close to offended. As she turned away he said "I was going to ask if you have a directory I could find him in.

"I can tell you where he is, of course. Eat up," she said not unlike a mother, "and I'll show you where you have to go.

Fairman was surprised to find how hungry the mouthfuls he'd taken had made him for more. People stared towards him as they lagged along the promenade, possibly looking for vacancy signs. He'd just laid down his knife and fork when Mrs Berry returned. "Here's what you need," she said.

It was a map of Gulshaw with the slogan from the town sign along the upper margin. On the back were advertisements for local attractions: the Shaw, the Bywood Zoo, the Promenade Ballroom, the Woody Ramble forest trail, the Ridem amusement park. "That's his surgery," Mrs Berry said, flattening a fingertip close to the sketch of the woods. "Past all the fun and up Bywood Road."

"I should think he might be keeping what he has for me at home."

"That's where he lives as well, Leonard," Mrs Berry said with an indulgent smile. "He's always there. We have to go to him. Dennis will do all he can for you, never fret."

"I'd better see him before I overstay my welcome with you.

"Don't you bother giving that a thought," Mrs Berry said.

Bywood Road was at the opposite end of the promenade from the church. As he drove past the Ridem rides Fairman saw how the haze that fringed the sea was helping the woods to enclose the town. At the ballroom he turned uphill past a number of large houses with their backs to the trees. The doctor's house displayed a nameplate on a gatepost, where the name was followed by so many unpronounceable clumps of letters that Fairman was reminded of the graffiti in the shelter. He parked on the street and let himself in through the grey stone porch.

In the wide hall beyond the massive door that gleamed white as marble, a receptionist sat behind a desk outside a closed room opposite an open one. She wore a voluminous flowered dress that covered nearly all of her without disguising how disproportionately small her head and hands were. Cropped spiky silver hair framed her face, which might have been more delicate until it had grown padded. "Mr Fairman," she said in a familiar voice rather younger than she looked—of course, he'd heard it on the answering machine. "You're here already, then."

He was bemused by being recognised, and spoke more sharply than he meant to. "The doctor said I should come as soon as I liked."

"He'd have meant before surgery. He's got his patients now."

Fairman felt as if he had to struggle past the professionally bland expression that hadn't changed since he'd come in. "What am I supposed to do? I haven't much time left."

"I'm sure you have more than some of us, Mr Fairman." Before he could clear up her mistake, if indeed she had made one, the receptionist said "You can wait with the others by all means."

"Couldn't you ask the doctor if that's what he wants?"

She was giving this her fixed expression when a man lurched out of the doctor's office behind her. His patchily empurpled face and the disconcerting flexibility of his gait suggested that his trouble might have to do with drink. As the man fumbled to open the front door Fairman said to the receptionist "Can't you ask him now?"

While her expression didn't waver, she pressed the key on a vintage intercom, an action that pulled back her cuff and sent a quiver up her pale inflated arm. Fairman heard a rasping buzz, and then a muffled voice said on both sides of the door "I'm afraid Mr Fairman will have to follow my patients, Doris."

"Doctor says—"

"I understood what he said," Fairman informed her, the nearest he could come to expressing his dissatisfaction, and tramped across the hall into the waiting-room.

All the people seated on straight chairs against the walls stared at him as a harsh metallic rattle appeared to announce him. The buzzer above the lintel was summoning the next patient, a young woman whose baby squirmed so vigorously in her arms that its one-piece suit had almost abandoned its shape. The infant favoured Fairman with a sleepy blink that he would have been foolish to mistake for recognition, and he was working on a responsive smile when the mother carried her exuberant burden out of the room.

A solitary table strewn with copies of the Gulshaw Gannet squatted in the middle of the dun carpet. Fairman took one to a chair, but the content was so trivial—graffiti on the seafront shelters made the front page under the headline RESIDENTS CONDEMN VANDALISM—that the paper might have been designed to reassure visitors that nothing very untoward ever happened in Gulshaw. He'd read all sixteen pages and forgotten virtually every one by the time the buzzer called the next invalid, a pasty-faced man who flattened his hand against the wall at each step he took. That left nine patients, and Fairman found some of them difficult to ignore—a woman with grey swellings reminiscent of fungi on her legs, a man whose chin seemed to merge with his spongy throat whenever he was overcome by an apparently uncontrollable nod, a woman whose every protracted breath sounded like a renewed task. If everyone was seated in order she would be the last to see the doctor, and Fairman didn't think he could endure her sounds for however long that would entail—perhaps an hour. He dropped the newspaper on the table and made for the hall. "I'm nearly at your zoo, aren't I?" he said. "I think I'll kill my time there if you don't mind."

There was no reason why the receptionist should, and her unassailable expression might have been telling him so. "Would you mind letting me know when the doctor's free?" he said. "I'll give you my number."

"We have it, Mr Fairman."

As he stepped out of the porch he saw the zoo at the top of the hill. He thought he wouldn't care to live so close to it, but perhaps the neighbours took it as part of living in a holiday resort. Or perhaps they were determined to ignore it, since all the windows he passed were curtained, as if there had been a death or the houses were occupied by night workers catching up on their sleep.

The signboard for the zoo had broken out in lumps of moss, one of which transformed the name into Byword. Beyond a small gate in the wire fence a man sat in a wooden booth that was piebald with lichen. His long pointed chin rested on his gloved hands, and he wore a floppy hat so nearly shapeless that he might almost not have known how to fit it to his cranium. As he saw Fairman he lifted his head, which seemed to elongate while his eyes took their time over widening, and the hat sagged backwards to reveal the slogan GULSHAW BY GUM. Fairman was reaching in his pocket for the fee posted on the booth when the man waved at him so vigorously that his fingers appeared to writhe—just the glove, of course. "Sorry?" Fairman said.

"Keep it." The fellow poked a greyish tongue between his lips as if rediscovering his mouth and muttered "It's on the town."

Perhaps this was a concession they made at the end of the season. Before long Fairman thought he wouldn't have been too happy if he'd paid. The exhibits weren't identified by signs, so that he couldn't tell what he was supposed to look for in the cages and concrete pits beside the winding mossy paths. Did the pits contain bears or big cats? None of those were visible, and the trees along the paths blocked off so much of the hazy sunlight that he could see nothing except darkness inside the bunkers in the pits. If the cages were for apes or monkeys, why weren't the enclosures roofed? Fairman could imagine their occupants leaping from the trees into the forest to make their escape. Even the windowless aquarium and reptile house didn't offer much; once his eyes adjusted to the dimness he had to conclude that most of the glass cases were presently disused, unless their tenants were lurking behind the rocks inside. Several panes bore large greyish fingerprints or more probably some other kind of marks, since they lacked whorls and appeared to be on the other side of the glass. He couldn't help recoiling when a boneless hand stretched out its pallid fingers to him from behind a submerged rock, but of course it was a squid or octopus, even if he couldn't see any suckers on the tentacles that darted back as though imitating his retreat. He shivered with the stony chill of the building and made for the open air.

It was less open than before. The haze had crept closer, dousing the grey sun. No wonder the animals had taken refuge wherever they could. He'd pretty well abandoned looking for them, and had begun to think of returning to the surgery, when he glimpsed movement in a cage. An ape was hiding behind a tree, gripping it with a large grey hand disconcertingly reminiscent of the object that had seemed to gesture at him from the tank in the aquarium. As he peered at it the fingers wormed away around the trunk. He watched for it to reappear until he grew cold with the dank stagnant air, and then he headed for the exit. He'd taken just a few steps when he seemed to hear a murmur behind him. "So much more to see," it said.

Nobody else was on the path. Were those fingertips or fungi on the glistening tree trunk in the cage? He needn't care, and he was making rather faster for the gate when a voice called out somewhere ahead. "Mr Fairman."

"Yes?"

"Leonard Fairman."

"Yes," Fairman yelled and put on speed until he saw the pay booth. The man in the misshapen hat was craning his top half over the counter and around the side of the booth at an angle that looked decidedly painful. "There you are," the man said. "Doctor's ready for you now."

Fairman could only assume the receptionist thought it was cheaper to phone the zoo than call him on his mobile. "Thank you," he said as the man's upper body shrank with a sinuous motion into the booth. "I'm afraid I didn't see very much."

"They're shy, some of them. You mightn't want to be seen in that kind of a shape." When Fairman frowned at this the man said "They're getting on or they're not well."

Fairman hadn't time to question this. He hurried past the dormant houses and let himself into the doctor's. When he thanked the receptionist for the call her expression didn't change, and he could have thought it was hiding bemusement if not convicting him of sarcasm, though he didn't see why it should do either. She bent her dwarfed head towards the intercom. "Doctor __"

"That's all right, Doris. Send in our visitor."

The moistness of the brass doorknob reminded Fairman of the atmosphere at the zoo. Beyond the door, chairs and a sketchy bed with a screen beside it faced a desk across a large white room. The man behind the desk rose from gazing at a computer monitor to extend a hand to Fairman. His bald head was rendered more egg-like by jowls, and his shoulders were so broad that Fairman had a grotesque sense that they'd slumped outwards. Presumably he'd acquired his tan abroad or in a studio. "Glad to meet you in the flesh, Leonard," he said. "What did you make of our zoo?"

His handshake was resolutely firm but clammier than Fairman cared for. "I couldn't see much," Fairman said and at once felt unreasonable; the doctor had nothing to do with the menagerie, after all. "Don't tell me," he said, "there's so much more to see."

The doctor raised his almost hairless brows, and his heavy eyelids crept back from his pale protruding eyes. "So much more than sea."

"I know that's how it's meant to go."

"We'll let it lie for now." Dr Stoddart wrinkled his wide nose, an action that twitched his thick lips. "What would you like me to prescribe?"

No doubt this was a sort of joke. "Just the books," Fairman said. "They're why I'm here."

"Nobody's forgetting that, Leonard. You don't know how much you're appreciated."

Embarrassment made Fairman change the subject. "Can you tell me anything about them?"

"They've been waiting for someone just like you."

Fairman had meant where the books had come from, but it needn't matter. "May I take possession, then?"

"All yours," the doctor said, reaching for the left-hand drawer. The desk quivered as the drawer emerged with a prolonged cavernous creak, and he lifted out a book that was the twin of the one Fairman had. The black cover was embossed with the image of a hand contorted in an occult gesture, the second and fourth fingers curving inwards while the others arched bonelessly backwards and the thumb jutted up from the palm. Fairman opened the book to find it was the first volume, On Conjuration. "The tongues of men reduce the world to words..." He shut the book before he could be tempted to linger over reading and looked up at the doctor, who was resting his hand on the open drawer. "Forgive my haste," Fairman said, "but may I trouble you for the others?"

The doctor shut the drawer and gave him an oddly distant look. "That's my contribution, Leonard."

Fairman tried not to feel let down; he had two considerable rarities for the archive, after all. "You mean there are just the two volumes."

"Just that one. That's all I ever had."

Fairman didn't bother to clear up the misunderstanding. He held the book in both hands as he rose to his feet. "Was it in your family?"

As Dr Stoddart made to open the door he said "Father gave it me."

He had his back to Fairman, who could almost have imagined that the doctor had borrowed someone else's words. Perhaps they betrayed how local he was, much as Fairman's accent seemed to place him. "Do you know your way around our town yet?" Dr Stoddart said.

"I don't mean to be rude, but why should I need to do that?"

"Because now you'll want to see Don Rothermere."

Fairman waited until the doctor turned to face him, having opened the door. "To what end?"

"For the same reason you've seen me."

"Another volume of the book?" Less enthusiastically and with some unease Fairman said "Just one?"

"That's how it's going to be, Leonard."

"But why has it to be? Why do I need to go through all this?"

His outburst was unprofessional, and he regretted it as Dr Stoddart and the receptionist gazed distantly at him. "It isn't for you, Leonard," the receptionist said.

Fairman might have expected her to be rebuked for being too familiar. He supposed she must think she was defending her employer. "So who's this Mr Rothermere?" he said. "Where shall I find him?"

"It's Suit Your Book on Station Road," the doctor said. "If you ask anyone —"

"I've got a map. I assume he's a bookseller."

"Our only one," Dr Stoddart said, and the receptionist added "Your kind of person, Leonard."

Fairman hoped so. Most booksellers would surely have completed the set of books by now and sold it for a considerable profit. Once the first volume was safely boxed in the car boot he consulted the map and drove uphill. Below the menagerie he turned right along Tree View, a name that made him feel as if he were following some kind of diagram. Beyond a sloping junction the twin terraces of small houses, which looked as if they'd been squeezed fat and grey, met Station Road. Cast-iron awnings set with coloured glass overhung the shops, and halfway along the road a railway station was composed of the omnipresent stone. Families were dragging luggage across the forecourt with a ponderous thunder of wheels while they did their best to hasten for a train. Suit Your Book was almost opposite the station, next to a doorway bristling with nets on canes and hung with plastic buckets. Fairman parked in a side street, where Vacancy signs dwindled downhill to the hazy promenade, and tramped up to the bookshop.

The window display wasn't encouraging. All the books— hardcovers of various sizes and a scattering of paperbacks—had plainly spent years in the sun, leaving them almost as pale as the haze above the sea. As Fairman stepped into the shop a bell sprang its clapper above his head, and a man hastened over to him. "Leonard Fairman?" he said, if it was even a question. "Don Rothermere. Kindred spirits, eh?"

Presumably the doctor had phoned ahead. The bookseller was a lanky man who moved as loosely as his grey suit hung on him. His face looked as if the dewlaps at his throat had drawn it narrower, and it was topped by an outburst of hair that might almost have leached colour from his skin so as to stay reddish. Prodigious glasses magnified his blinking eyes, and his pale lips kept twitching at a smile. "I'd hope we are," Fairman said.

Rothermere thrust out a long hand to hold Fairman's in a clammy grasp while he jerked his head to indicate the contents of the shelves—new or at least unread volumes along the side walls and in the middle of the floor, secondhand books at the back. "We don't read many books in Gulshaw," he said.

"Not the best place for you, then."

"I've got all I want to read." Apparently grasping that Fairman hadn't meant this, the bookseller said "And it isn't much of a trot to the post office."

Fairman wondered how much postal business Rothermere could do, given the state of his stock. "Have you been reading much here?" the bookseller said.

"Just the new acquisition."

"Of course." Rothermere's eyes widened, filling the lenses. "How's it affecting you?" he said.

"I wouldn't say it is."

"We mustn't deny it, Leonard."

Fairman was uneasily aware of being in the presence of some kind of believer. It hardly seemed possible for the eyes behind the lenses to have opened further, but he had the unpleasant fancy that they weren't far from touching the glass. "Have you read yours?" he felt compelled to ask.

"How couldn't I? It changes everything."

Fairman was loath to enquire into this. "Could I have it, then?"

"It's yours," the bookseller said and made for the back of the shop.

His office was between the shelves of second-hand books. Most of these were jacketless, a state Fairman used to describe as in their shirtsleeves until Sandra made her unamusement plain. The office was unlit, but he was able to distinguish a large heavy desk surrounded by piles of books. Without switching on the light Rothermere retrieved a volume from the desk. "Yours," he said again.

Fairman stayed in an aisle of shelves to bring the man out of the gloom. With the book held in both hands Rothermere looked rather too much like the celebrant of a ritual. As he came forward Fairman could easily have imagined that some of the darkness had clung to the book. The colophon represented a hand that bore a lantern from which black rays were streaming. "Which one is this?" Fairman said.

"On the Purposes of Night" Rothermere said with reverence.

Fairman had asked so as not to linger over examining the book, but he couldn't help adding "Did you never want to find out what you could get for it?"

"I got everything it needs, Leonard."

"I meant," Fairman said more sharply, "had you no interest in discovering what it could fetch?"

"We did." Before Fairman could think of any answer he might risk, the bookseller said "If you're asking whether I'd have sold it to the highest bidder, that wouldn't have entered my mind."

"Would you care to say why?"

"The book says it for us."

When Rothermere stretched out his hands as though yearning to reclaim the book, Fairman said "Never mind, I'll look into it later."

"I can tell you what it says." The bookseller's gaze seemed to turn inwards if not somewhere else entirely. "Let none read who will not understand," he said like a priest intoning a sermon. "Let the great secrets be kept close lest they grow blurred by the unshaped minds of the uninitiated."

"That's what Percy Smallbeam said, do you think?"

"One solitary mind speaks through the book." It wasn't clear if the bookseller was still quoting, nor when he said "The world will know the book once it has done its work."

"What work would that be?" Fairman demanded.

"You'll come to know it, Leonard. Will you promise one thing?"

"That will have to depend."

"Never put any of it online, will you? You heard what it said."

"I've no intention of scanning it," Fairman told him and was so anxious to be gone that he almost forgot to ask "Can you tell me whom I need to see next?"

"Heidi Dunscombe. She represents our town."

"Represents in what way?"

"I thought you'd know more about us by now. She's our tourist officer."

"And where can I find her? No, don't tell me." Fairman saw Rothermere take this for an admission of knowledge, and felt bound to add "I have to get back."

Rothermere's earnestness seemed to befog his glasses. "You aren't leaving us, Leonard."

"Back to the hotel. They can direct me. Thank you for keeping this safe." Having reached the door, Fairman couldn't resist adding "You haven't told me there's so much more to see."

"There's no need." The lenses looked not merely blurred now but smeared. "You're beginning to," the bookseller said.

Fairman let that go. As he stepped out of the bookshop, triggering the bell again, he glanced back. The bookseller had withdrawn into his office and was fitting the spectacles to his face, no doubt having wiped the lenses. Fairman barely glimpsed the naked eyes, but they appeared to glimmer at him out of too much of the face, so that he could have imagined that the lenses were plain glass. He had an unwelcome impression of a creature watching him from the depths of its lair. Then Rothermere emerged from the gloom, blinking through his glasses at the light, and Fairman reassured himself that the illusion had been brought on by too little sleep. It wasn't why he hastened to his car.

He was tramping up the passage to the lobby of the Wyleave when Mrs Berry called "Don't put yourself out, Mr Fairman. No rush at all."

She was waiting at the counter. "We've given you another day," she said. "We knew you couldn't leave us so soon."

"I don't mean to be any longer than that."

"We'll have to see, won't we?" Mrs Berry said and gave the cartons he was cradling a slow nod. "More for our collection?"

This was a different kind of familiarity, one that he found patronising too, but he only said "Can you tell me where to find your tourist office?"

"Up in the square," Mrs Berry said and spread out a map on the counter. He supposed she had recently painted her nails, since the one she was using to point glistened like the surface of a lake. "Heidi will see to you," she said. "She'll give you what you need."

Fairman wished that were the case rather than just a single book. He hurried upstairs in time to see a chambermaid leaving his room. She wheeled a trolley next door as he let himself into the room, to find she'd been so eager to finish her work that she'd left the wardrobe open an inch—the wardrobe that contained the safe. The sight made him feel worse than careless, unworthy of the trust that had been placed in him, however irrational his reaction was. He planted the cartons on the bed and threw the wardrobe door wide.

The safe was locked, but as he typed the combination he saw marks on the black metal beside the keypad—the prints of a pair of moist hands. He could only think the chambermaid had left them, although they were larger than he'd seen her hands to be, as if they'd been pressed so fervently against the door that they'd spread to nearly twice their size. Presumably their clamminess had magnified the prints, which faded and vanished as he peered at them. He thought of confronting the girl or informing Mrs Berry, but what could he possibly say? Surely all that mattered was for the book to be there in the safe.

It was, and he unpacked it to make sure. The three cartons darkened the inside of the safe so much that he could almost have imagined there was space for nine of them. He wouldn't need it—he would be going home tomorrow. When he shut the safe he thought he heard a stealthy movement, as if the books were settling into their nests. He typed the code and was on his way out of the room until he remembered there was a call he ought to make. However important his search was, he shouldn't let it occupy quite so much of his mind.

The distant phone took some time to respond, which was how the head librarian treated any question. "Nathan Brighouse," he said at last.

"Nathan, it's Leonard Fairman. I thought I should report in.

"So glad you have, Leonard. All secured?"

"Up to a point, certainly."

"That'll be a negative, will it? Where's the hindrance?"

"I've acquired several volumes but the set has turned out to be somewhat scattered."

"Yes, Sandra Byers was telling me as much. Odd business, I must say. You haven't made the opportunity to assemble the set, then."

"I'm sure I will have by tomorrow."

"I'd be glad if that were the case. I'm sure the archives can survive without you for another day, but much longer and it may have to be put down as annual leave. You know how strict I'm forced to be in these straitened times."

"I assure you I'm doing all I can," Fairman told him, by no means as resentfully as he felt entitled to, and hurried downstairs to leave the key at Reception, where Mrs Berry was waiting. "Keep up the good work," she called after him.

As he drove onto the promenade Fairman saw that the haze had receded across the sea, giving the impression that the horizon had been drawn closer to the town. Before he came abreast of the theatre he turned uphill to the town hall, a massive grey edifice as plump as the statues of dignitaries that stood guard on either side. Perhaps the town didn't have much of a budget for the upkeep of monuments, since the stone faces were fattened by masks of lichen. He parked on the forecourt in front of an annexe, where the automatic doors of the tourist office deferred to him with a faint glassy squeal.

The walls were decorated with vintage posters, all of which showed the seafront very much as it still was. IMMERSE YOURSELF IN GULSHAW and BREATHE IN GULSHAW were two of the slogans that caught Fairman's eye, but the one that provoked a wry laugh said SO MUCH MORE TO SEE. So the townsfolk hadn't been mistaken after all, and perhaps he should take more notice of them. He was making for the counter at the far side of the room when a woman called "With you right now, Mr Fairman."

She was beyond a door at the end of the counter, applying makeup or retouching it so vigorously that she might have been trying to squeeze her cheeks smaller. They looked as carelessly expansive as the rest of her, most of which was contained by a loose blouse and a capacious overall. Unruly auburn curls framed nearly all of her round face, which stayed sleepily jovial as she waddled to the counter, sticking out a hand. "Heidi Dunscombe," she said, "as if you didn't know."

Her grasp felt slippery, no doubt with makeup. "What have you made of our town so far, Leonard?" she said.

"I should think that's your job."

It had taken her so little time to turn familiar that his reply was sharper than he liked, but she only said "What's that?"

"Making the most of your town."

"We'd love to have your thoughts."

Did she think he was being too unfriendly? Though her face stayed so genial that she might almost have been lost in a dream, Fairman said "Forgive me. I've been having rather an odd day."

"There's the night to come as well."

He might have expected such a comment from the bookseller, not from her. "May I have the book you're holding for me?" Of course.

Fairman thought for a moment that she was repeating herself, except that someone else he'd met had used the phrase. She waddled to a wall safe behind a desk in the office and then swung around languidly to ask "What do you think was odd?"

For a disconcerting moment Fairman had a sense of being watched from an unexpected distance, not just across her room. "Someone I met," he said.

"You'll get used to us, Leonard," Heidi Dunscombe said and turned ponderously away to spin the wheel on the safe. "What was odd about him?"

"He seemed to believe in the book he had. I don't imagine you do."

The safe lumbered open, gaping with darkness, a lump of which Heidi Dunscombe brought forth. She hugged it to her breast while she shut the metal door and twirled the wheel. As she advanced to the counter she said "It's belief that makes us what we are, Leonard."

Despite her equable expression, he assumed this was a rebuke. When she handed him the book, her breasts seemed to swell as if she were taking an enormous breath. The cover of the volume was imprinted with unfamiliar constellations, presumably somehow illustrating the title, Of the Secrets behind the Stars. "Thank you," Fairman said and hesitated. "May I ask how you came by it?"

"The same as everybody. From our father."

The wording unsettled Fairman, and so did the remoteness of her gaze. "Can you tell me whom I should see now?" he said.

"Of course." Her pause might almost have implied that he should know as well. "Rhoda Bickerstaff," she said. "She looks after our old folk."

"Not all of them, surely."

"Just the worst ones, Leonard." Her face suggested she had taken his bemused comment as a joke. "We like to think our town's a healthy place," she said.

She added a heavy nod, not just for emphasis. When Fairman looked where she was indicating he saw a brace of joggers down on the promenade. He assumed she had them in mind rather than the people plodding uphill, though even the joggers didn't seem especially energetic. "You'll find Rhoda at the Leafy Shade," Heidi Dunscombe said.

"Would you happen to have the number? I ought to let her know I'm coming."

"If you think so," Heidi Dunscombe said and told him the number.

As he keyed it he was conscious of her watching him across the dormant book on the counter. Her gaze seemed as remote as the bell that began to ring in his ear—to ring at considerable length. He was preparing to leave a message on a machine when at last a woman's voice said "Leafy Shade."

She sounded at the very least harassed. "Could I speak to Rhoda Bickerstaff?" Fairman said.

"Who is it?"

"Don't you know?" Fairman almost retorted, having come close to thinking everybody knew about him in advance. "I'm from the Brichester University archive," he said. "Is that Ms Bickerstaff?"

"What do you want, Mr Fairman?"

So she did know who he was, in which case she didn't need to ask this question either. "I believe you have a book for me," Fairman said.

"I can't talk about it right now."

Her voice was growing more agitated, while her breath seemed in danger of falling short of her words. "No need to," Fairman said. "Just tell me when I can collect it. I'd appreciate the soonest you can manage."

"I told you, not now."

Although he didn't think she had, arguing would waste time. "Forgive me if I've caught you in the middle of a crisis, but when is it likely to be convenient?"

"I don't know. Not today."

"It really won't take long at all." When this failed to earn a response Fairman said "Couldn't you leave it with someone for me to pick up and then I wouldn't need to trouble you?"

"Who?" This came out not unlike a gasp, but she found enough breath to add "I can't. You'll have to wait for me."

He supposed whatever problems were preoccupying her could involve her staff as well. "Then could you just tell me whom else I can see while I'm waiting?"

"I can't. You'll have to wait. You've got enough to occupy your mind."

"You mean you—" Fairman said, only to find he was talking to waves of static.

Heidi Dunscombe hadn't even glanced away from him. "Isn't she ready?"

"Apparently not," Fairman said and couldn't restrain his frustration. "She won't give me a time and she won't say who else there is to see. Can you?"

"She's next, Leonard."

"Yes, but I can get the other volumes in the meantime. Who has them, do you know?"

"I can't tell you."

He was angered not just by her words but by the jovial expression that seemed independent of her distant gaze. "Can't or won't?" he blurted.

"You'll understand us better soon, Leonard."

He was almost furious enough to give this the answer it deserved. The glass doors had squealed shut by the time he muttered "I hope I never need to." Perhaps his muted outburst was the reason people stared at him as he marched to his car. While he drove along the promenade he looked out for signs of the healthiness Heidi Dunscombe had wanted him to notice, but he couldn't see much. A man sitting rather less than upright in a wheelchair was waving one floppy hand beside a wheel as though to urge it to turn faster. Several people were walking dogs whose faces seemed almost to scrape the pavement, and at least one owner's could compete for pendulousness. There were joggers, but none of them appeared to be capable of overtaking the walkers or the chair. Their energy seemed to flag even further as they came abreast of his hotel.

The thump of the club attached to his key greeted him as he made for the reception counter. "Another one for the vault?" Janine Berry said, pressing her brow pallid with a fingertip.

"You could put it that way if you like," Fairman said despite thinking that somebody other than her might have—Frank Lunt, for instance, or the bookseller. All the way to his room the key rattled against the carton as though eager to unlock the secrets within. The wardrobe and the safe inside it were shut tight, and no marks were visible on the metal door. It didn't matter that the safe had space for just one more carton; he was determined to be back at the archive tomorrow with the entire set of books. He removed the four volumes from their cartons and lined them up on the dressing-table, where they seemed to bring too much darkness into the room—because the mirror doubled them, of course. Presumably this was what people called daydreaming, and he ought to be examining the books, but not until he'd made a call.

By the time Sandra answered he'd begun to wonder if she had switched her mobile off. "Are you only just starting out?" she said.

"Hasn't Nathan kept you informed? I hear you've been discussing me."

"It was library business, Leonard. You surely don't object to that"

"Not in the slightest. Keep him posted by all means. He already knows I won't be back today, though."

"You mean you told him but not me."

"I'm telling you now, Sandra." Fairman wasn't going to be made to feel unreasonable. "And he might have passed the information on to you," he said.

No doubt her pause was a form of rebuke. "So what's keeping you where you are?"

"What else except the books?" He'd turned towards the window, but seemed to feel their massed blackness behind him, making him impatient to read. "I still have to lay my hands on some of them," he said. "I will tomorrow."

"I don't understand. How many are you leaving until then?"

"About half. Well, just more than half." With mounting irritation Fairman said "I told you they're being held by a number of people. The one I have to see next isn't available today."

"I'm not grasping this at all. Why can't you deal with the others while you're waiting?"

"Because apparently it isn't done like that. Don't bother asking me why." This left him feeling so inadequate that he blurted "If you talk to Nathan you might like to know he's suggesting I'll have to take my time here as leave."

"But you haven't any left this year, Leonard. Our holiday is all you have."

"You don't need to tell me that." In a bid to make up for his abruptness Fairman said "You might try to use your wiles to change his mind."

"I really don't believe we have that kind of relationship."

"Then maybe you should work on having one for both our sakes." When she gave him another silence to construe Fairman said "I'll call you tomorrow as soon as I'm done here."

"Meanwhile you'll be enjoying the sort of holiday you wish you'd had, will you?"

"No," Fairman said, not seeing why he should feel accused. "I'll be doing my job."

He gazed through the window as he ended the call. Several old folk had their backs against the graffiti in the shelter on the promenade, hiding the unreadable clumps of letters. Dozens of people were sitting or lying on the beach, and there were even swimmers in the sea despite the greyish haze that enclosed it. The haze made the more distant ones hard to distinguish, but the most unstable of the shapes among the waves had to be jellyfish. In any case he ought to be attending to the books.

It made sense to start with the first volume, but he found himself lingering over the colophon. He wasn't far from imagining that the inhumanly distorted hand could conjure up some idea in his mind, and perhaps this had been the book designer's aim, since the volume was On Conjuration. "The tongues of men reduce the world to words..." Was that supposed to mean that gestures achieved something else? In that case, what was the point of this book entirely composed of words? Surely he oughtn't to expect it to make too much sense. Ah, here was some kind of enlightenment further down the page. "Let no man utter the secret words who has not first prepared his mind and spirit in the occult ways, for otherwise the words shall batten on him and shape him to their liking..."

"No chance of that," Fairman said and was glad that Sandra couldn't hear him talking to himself. He stared at his reflection as though holding it responsible, and it stared at him across the inverted volume in its hands. He glimpsed it ducking its head to read "The beliefs to which the mass of men cling are the foes of revelation" and imagined it reading not just the words but all the letters in reverse. "The prating of the prophets chatters down the centuries without beginning to encompass the truths which shape the world. Still less can the gewgaws of religion challenge forces older than the universe we know. In his enfeebled Christian travesty of Al-Hazred, John Dee speaks of a glowing cross which appeared above the sabbats to confound the summoned powers. Say rather that the sabbats were no more than puerile parodies of ancient rituals, so mired in the tradition of the celebrated Jew that the biblical bauble could be misapprehended as a talisman..."

Fairman took a few moments to consider the Dee allusion. It referred to the alchemist's unpublished English paraphrase of the Necronomicon, which survived only in the form of fragments held by the British Museum, together with a fifteenth-century Latin translation, and Fairman couldn't have said why it left him feeling oddly vulnerable. His reflection gave him a conspiratorial nod as he bent his head once more to the book.

"And what shall be said of the star-signs which some claim as protection against entities no less immemorial than creation? How blurred the ancient truths become in the minds of the uninitiated What are these signs but imperfect renderings of a stage in the formation of the universe? None but the ignorant seek to invest them with power, and only the most imbecilic of the old survivals may mistake them for a hostile charm, to be cowed by them for a short while. Let the star-signs never be confused with the secret gesture of the Children of the Moon, whose true nature is disguised in many a fairy-tale. Whereas to the rudimentary minds of lesser entities the star-sign may appear to threaten a return to primal chaos, and on occasion may temporarily interfere with the ethereal sendings of the dormant masters of our world, the gesture of the Children recalls that paradisiacal state of fluidity which the Bible bids to deny with its fabricated tales about the father of the Jew. Even these betray their imperfectly veiled secrets to the initiate, for the serpent in the garden is but a symbol of fluidity, an occult promise that the upstart race and its beliefs cannot wholly trammel the potential of the world..."

Was the image on the cover meant to illustrate the gesture? Fairman had the irrational thought that it was just a human approximation; perhaps that was the kind of thing the book was meant to put into your mind. He held up his left hand and could only laugh at his pathetic attempt to describe the sign. His reflection did no better, but at least its fingers didn't twinge. It watched him until they bowed their heads over the book.

The more he read, the less he seemed to grasp, and yet he felt close to understanding, as if the incantatory prose were leading him in that direction. Of course this wasn't the original text, it was whatever Percy Smallbeam had made of it. How much did that matter? Why should it matter to Fairman at all? He could almost have imagined that he was dreaming the material, letting it take shape in his head. He had no sense of how long it took him to read to the end, where he found he was eager to continue, in case the next volume helped him understand. He shut the book and saw that darkness had gathered behind him.

Night was at the window. It had fallen more than an hour ago, according to his watch. He couldn't recall switching on the standard lamp beside him, though why should a librarian feel troubled by having been engrossed in a book? He should at least eat, and he returned the books to the safe without boxing them up. Once he'd pressed his hands against the metal door to reassure himself that it was locked, he let himself out of the room.

Janine Berry was waiting at the counter by the time he came in sight. "Will you be having our dinner?" she said.

"Would you excuse me if I just nip out for something quick so I can get back to work?"

"The work you're doing here, you mean."

"Examining what I've acquired." In case this was unclear Fairman added "Yes."

"Then we've nothing to excuse." As she took hold of the bludgeon attached to his room key her fingernails glistened, and he thought the skin around them did; she must have been painting them again. "There won't be much difference," she said. "It's all our own produce."

The glare of the streetlamps blanched the promenade and blackened the cars parked outside the hotels but left the buildings as grey as the fog that had crept back across the sea. For the moment the seafront was deserted, though Fairman heard a metallic rattle that might have belonged to a restless car on the roller coaster or a shutter at a shop window, if it wasn't the sound of the bars of a cage. He made his way past Fishing For You to another such establishment among the noisily wakeful arcades. "Trying us tonight?" said the blubbery man at the counter of Fish It Up, dabbing the infirm pallid ridges of his brow with a paper napkin. "It's the only thing to have while you're here."

"Seaside food, you mean? I expect you're right. Fish and chips for me."

He was relieved not to see the man touch the food, instead using a spade like a child's seaside toy to scoop chips out of the fryer and employing tongs to crown them with a fish. At first he'd thought the man was wearing plastic gloves, since his rudimentary nails were virtually indistinguishable from the stubby fingers. He was careful not to touch the man's hand when he paid—he still remembered vividly how the coin with which he'd tipped the porter had seemed to sink into the moist palm—and took the package from the sweating metal counter.

When he crossed the promenade to a bench he was surprised to see how many people were still on the beach, but he supposed he wasn't behaving entirely unlike them. Most were seated, which made them look as if they were protruding from the pebbly sand, and a few were lying down. He saw none of them move even slightly while he ate his dinner; in the pasty light he could have taken them for dummies that had strayed out of a waxworks. The meal was very much like last night's, with the same odd texture to the fish, but he felt as if he wasn't quite able to grasp the familiar taste. Perhaps he was too anxious to be back at the books, though he was also distracted by the sight of a supine figure on the beach lurching upright at the waist as though roused from a dream. The man's face was covered by a floppy hat, which had slipped so far down the head that Fairman could easily have imagined it had taken the face with it; there certainly appeared to be an unreasonable amount of greyish brow beneath the glistening hairless cranium. He finished his dinner as quickly as digestion would allow, while the figure stayed half upright with the hat dangling from the unseen face, and then he made some haste to the hotel.

As he reached it a chorus bade him good evening from the shelter opposite. The voices were feeble enough to add up to a single one, and they belonged to several old folk— surely not the same ones he'd seen earlier—who sat facing the Wyleave. For an absurd moment he wondered if they were about to address him by name. "Good night," he called and felt as if the chilly fog had lurched across the seafront after him.

The thump of the metal club on the counter reminded him of a gavel. "Here for good now?" Mrs Berry said.

"In for the night, if that's what you mean."

"That's good." As Fairman took the key she said "You know who to ring if you need anything at all."

Perhaps he was making too much of this, but he blurted "Isn't Mr Berry with you?"

"We don't leave Gulshaw, Mr Fairman. I think you saw him at the zoo."

Fairman was so embarrassed by his own question that he could only protest "I didn't see very much."

"The season's over for this year." As if she were reassuring a disappointed child Mrs Berry said "We promise you won't miss them."

"I appreciated your husband's help," Fairman said to leave his peevishness behind. "Please do thank him for me."

He wasn't expecting this to be met with a stare so distant he couldn't identify an expression. "Dream well, then," she said as he moved away. "Try and lose yourself."

He wondered if the state of the man in the booth at the zoo was her excuse for seeking solace elsewhere. In any case she mustn't look to Fairman. Once he'd checked the safe he hurried to the bathroom. He couldn't hear a sound in the hotel, and the silence seemed so expectant that it made him even more conscious of the noise he tried to muffle by flushing the toilet. As soon as he was able he retreated like a culprit to his room.

He left the first book in the darkness of the safe and lined up the others in front of the mirror before opening the second volume, On the Purposes of Night. "What is daylight but the ally of brutish creation, the progenitor of mindless growth? Let the night be celebrated as friend to the true possessors of the world. Let its powers be roused that it may reveal the nocturnal truth which lies even within men."

Did this refer to dreams? It would take more than a book to rouse any within him, although while reading he did feel as if the night was growing not just darker but more substantial—the fog, of course. The book wasn't capable of persuading him that the night was pregnant with secrets, let alone teeming with creatures best left unseen, but he was quite glad to reach the final page. He'd finished the third volume last night—however little of it he recalled, he felt as though its burden had lodged somewhere in his head—and so he turned to Of the Secrets of the Stars, the fourth book. "Cry out the names of the ancient constellations ..."

The night was always beyond the sky, however bright the sun strove to appear. The infinite darkness was older than time, and the stars were simply playthings that its avatar had shaped and scattered in patterns to which the universe was in the process of reverting. Fairman understood this much; at least, he saw the meaning of the words, although the further he progressed the more he felt that the book was a kind of reverie, incomprehensible to a waking mind. By the time he reached the end he was little better than asleep, and the reflections of the trinity of volumes in the mirror made him feel as if the books were dreaming of companionship. He laid the books to rest in the safe and stumbled to the window.

The old folk in the shelter raised their heads as he dragged up the sash. The beach was still peopled as well. Most of the occupants were supine, but Fairman saw a woman stand up and waddle away from the edge of the sea, leaving a rubbery cushion on which she'd been seated. The roundish object glistened and stirred feebly, having been caught by a wave. As Fairman shut the window and turned away, unenlivened by the stagnant smell he'd let into the room, he saw a man carrying a large plastic bucket down a ramp to the beach.

Fairman went to bed expecting to be kept awake by thoughts of the books, but the vision that was waiting for him to lie down in the dark came from somewhere earlier. Once more he was beset by the image of the stone cocoon, but this time he imagined the end of its wanderings. He saw it blaze like an enormous coal as it plummeted into the depths of a forest, blasting a crater many times its size and setting fire to the surrounding trees. He had to watch as it cooled and split open, a spectacle too reminiscent of the hatching of an egg. Through the fissure he glimpsed a whitish spongy lump that must be some species of face, since eyes reared up from it to peer in all directions from the crack in the meteor—two eyes and then another. He managed to avoid imagining its size until the meteor tumbled apart in huge fragments to let its contents crawl forth. The ovoid body was as vast as a cathedral, a similarity that was brought to mind by the spines protruding all over the ponderous bulk. As it used the spines to scrabble deep into the earth Fairman could almost have been watching a cathedral bury itself, and he had an uneasy sense that the idea was how his mind coped with the vision, which surely derived from one of the books he'd read. He was relieved not to see more of the face as it sank into the earth; the other sight was bad enough—the eyes withdrawing like a snail's out of the glare of the forest fire. Then there was only the expanse of disturbed earth surrounded by great flames, but it was imbued with a dreadful sense of waiting. At last the notion of settling into the earth merged with the prospect of subsiding into sleep, and that was all he knew.

A thumping sound roused him. It seemed to gain definition, growing less large and loose, as he struggled awake. Somebody was at the door. "What is it?" Fairman demanded, trying to control his slack voice. "What's wrong?"

"It's only Janine, Mr Fairman. Just wondered if you wanted to miss breakfast."

Fairman fumbled at the bedside table for his watch. From the greyish light that seeped into the room he would have taken it to be not much later than dawn, and he had to blink his eyes clear before he could believe it was almost eleven o'clock. "Good God, I've slept in," he called. "I meant to be up hours ago."

"Don't you worry even the tiniest bit. It's ready when you are."

Did he have time for breakfast? As his panic faded he saw that he would almost certainly need to stay overnight to complete the set of books. It might very well have been necessary even if he'd wakened when he should have. The thought left him feeling almost lethargically calm, no doubt because he hadn't quite woken up.

Nobody was in the bathroom or the toilet, and the corridor was deserted, though he seemed to recall having heard quite a few people come upstairs last night while he was intent on the books. Of course they would have been up and about today long before him, unless he'd imagined hearing them, and could he really have seen anybody lying or otherwise occupied on the beach last night? The breakfast room was empty, and just one couple was checking out at the desk. "See you next year," the man told Fairman, and the equally rotund wife joined in.

Fairman mumbled ambiguously and made for his breakfast table by the window. A thick curtain of fog was trailing its hem in the sea about half a mile from the promenade, and he couldn't locate the sun. Just now the sea looked no wider than a lake. As he saw that the fog had sent the old folk away from the shelter, Mrs Berry arrived with a plateful very similar to yesterday's. "Here's your favourite," she said.

He thanked her before saying "I'm afraid I'll need the room tonight as well."

"No need at all to be afraid."

She closed her mouth and then rounded her lips, suggesting that she'd realised she had more to say. If she meant to bring up dreams again, Fairman wasn't anxious to discuss them. "Would you excuse me?" he said and took out his phone. "I should make some calls."

"You do what you have to, Leonard."

The bell shrilled in his ear and continued shrilling. At last a reluctant voice said "Yes, Mr Fairman."

"Good morning, Ms Bickerstaff. Have things improved for you today?"

"Some have and some haven't. It's always like that for us here."

"Well, I'm glad to hear some have. When should I pay you a visit?"

"I still can't say."

"I thought you said the situation—"

"Nothing's changed there."

"I'm sorry to hear it. I'm obviously sorry, but I really do need—"

"Don't attempt to bully me, Mr Fairman. Some of our residents have tried that on, but it doesn't work."

"I give you my word I don't mean to, Ms Bickerstaff, but I would ask you to appreciate that I've come quite a long way on the understanding that these books will be made available to me."

"That isn't what Frank said, is it? He just wrote to you about his one."

"It's what I've been led to believe by everybody else." Fairman felt as if the argument had grown as slow as trying to run in a dream. "The sooner I take charge of the book," he said, "the sooner it'll be one less responsibility for you."

"I don't shirk any of my responsibilities, Mr Fairman."

"I'm sure I didn't say otherwise. I'm simply trying—"

"I haven't got time for this. As you say, I have responsibilities," Rhoda Bickerstaff said and immediately rang off.

As Fairman listened to the hiss of static, which he could have mistaken for the long breaths of the sea, Janine Berry came into the room. "Have you gone past your appetite?" she said like a reproving mother, and when he frowned at her "Don't keep it to yourself. We don't do that in Gulshaw."

"I'm finding someone isn't as forthcoming as everybody else has been."

"That won't do at all. We mustn't have anyone giving you trouble."

"It's Rhoda Bickerstaff. She's in charge of your Leafy Shade Home."

"I know that." With a look so distant it made her face resemble a mask, Mrs Berry said "Don't let her use that as an excuse. You go up there and don't take no for an answer."

"She does have plenty to deal with as it is, I suppose."

"Then like you said, she'll have less when you take what's yours." Before Fairman could object to having been overheard, Mrs Berry turned maternal again. "Just you eat up," she said, "and then I'll show you where to go."

Fairman gazed out at the fog while he ate, and had the fanciful notion that he was tasting it. A watery hint seemed to underlie every mouthful, though the textures were firm enough. The taste grew more indefinite as he fetched his coat and took the town map to the reception counter. "You go straight there now," Mrs Berry urged, but called him back as he headed for the car park. "You'll be thinking we don't trust you," she said and twisted the key off the ring on the metal club, so vigorously that her fingernails became indistinguishable from the flesh around them. "Now you can come and go like all of us."

Fairman pocketed the key on his way to the car. He was glad to leave the promenade where the stagnant greyish light appeared to seep into every face, not that the pavements were anything like crowded. He drove up a lane between the Kumbak and the Seesea, across the shopping streets to Edgewood Row, where several large houses had apparently lost their boundaries to form the Leafy Shade. While the single garden wall they shared beside the pavement had been cared for, the wall that backed onto the hazy colonnades of the woods was in some disrepair; more than one gap was wide enough for residents to wander through. As Fairman parked on the road, he saw that one of the vehicles in the grounds was a police car.

Presumably the crisis was at least as serious as Rhoda Bickerstaff had made it sound. He couldn't justify adding to her problems, however frustrated he might feel; surely even Nathan Brighouse wouldn't expect it of him. He was restarting the engine when a woman hurried out of the central building of the Leafy Shade complex. "Mr Fairman," she shouted. "Leonard Fairman."

Her gangling run emphasised how tall she was. Her head was disproportionately large, though with a small mouth and miniature chin. She wore a padded coat over a billowing black dress that exposed ankles thicker than he would have thought to see and black shoes too big for the elegance they aimed for. As Fairman left the car she unlocked the tall iron gate. "Mrs Bickerstaff," he said. "I'm sorry, I didn't realise—"

"No call for an apology. I'm not Rhoda Bickerstaff."

"Even so, I'm sorry if I'm adding to your difficulties."

"You're doing nothing of the kind." This sounded closer to an accusation than a reassurance, and her tone didn't change as she said "I'm Eunice Spriggs."

Her gaze went with the tone, but in a moment it relented—receded, at any rate. "I'm the mayoress," she said.

Did a wig come with the title? The hairline above the chubby brows that overshadowed her sizeable eyes seemed unusually regular, while the black hair that hung straight down beside her cheeks looked as inert as the grey light through the ceiling of fog. As she offered Fairman her disconcertingly small hand she said "Thank you for everything you're doing for us."

"I'm just doing what's expected of me."

"I wish some others of us would. Please accept my apologies on behalf of the town for the hindrance." Before he could tell her they weren't necessary the mayoress said "Do come and take over."

Fairman refrained from wiping his hand until she turned along the gravel drive. "Are you visiting someone?"

"Regrettably I had to," she said and stalked loosely although purposefully towards the central building. "Rhoda Bickerstaff."

Beyond a wide hall a pair of broad staircases not unlike pincers framed the entrance to a room full of old folk in armchairs. French windows let in the murky daylight, which seemed to tint all the ageing flesh. One old man was opening his mouth wide and circular to expose his greyish gums, and several of his companions joined in, as though they were competing to produce the roundest mouth. An old woman was dangling her arms on either side of her chair to touch the carpet, and Fairman might have thought her hands were too long for the arms. Outside the windows a number of apparently unsupervised residents were shuffling and wobbling about the grounds; several had gathered to stare through a gap in the wall into the ill-defined depths of the woods. Fairman didn't want to distract anyone from keeping an eye on the residents, but Eunice Spriggs was gesturing him towards a room to the left of the stairs. She didn't bother knocking on the door.

A dumpy woman stuffed into a suit not much greyer than her face and hair sat behind a desk on the far side of the office. If she wasn't grimacing, a good deal was wrong with the left side of her face. Her lips were drawn towards it, and that eye was half shut, while the cheek harboured a purplish tinge. She was flanked at a distance by a policeman and a woman in the identical uniform. Fairman could almost have taken them for twins, not least because their rounded faces bore the same blank determined look. "Here he is at last," Eunice Spriggs said. "I believe someone owes you something, Leonard."

She gazed at the woman behind the desk, and then the police did. Since none of this broke the silence, Fairman felt he should. "Thank you for making time for me, Mrs Bickerstaff."

The woman sat forward and folded her arms with a thump on the desk. The sound seemed to echo, but the repetitions grew louder as they continued to reverberate. Fairman felt as if the floor were growing unstable, even when he realised that she was drumming a heel beneath the desk. "Rhoda," the mayoress said.

Rhoda Bickerstaff dug her fingers into her upper arms as she raised her head. "I've got to say I'm sorry, Mr Fairman."

"I'm sure I understand." When her eyes denied it Fairman said "Why should you?"

"For not scurrying to let you have your book like everybody else."

"I don't think anybody's quite done that."

"Then you don't know much about our town."

Fairman almost retorted that he knew there was so much more to see; it was like hearing a chorus in his head of all the voices that had told him. This time the mayoress brought a silence to an end. "Safe, Rhoda," she said. "Safe." Though it could have been a reassurance, Fairman thought it was an order. Rhoda Bickerstaff's eyes remained defiant while the drumming of her heel seemed to dissipate through the floorboards, and her gaze seemed to retreat without leaving him. She lurched to her feet so abruptly that her suit bunched up around her midriff, and Fairman could have thought her flesh had. The floor shook again as she paced to the safe behind the desk. She spun the combination wheel and hauled the door wide, leaving the interior in darkness, so that Fairman couldn't see the book until she clutched it to her breast. As she swung around her face twisted further to the left, and she seemed to find it hard to work her mouth. "I hope you're ready, Leonard," she said indistinctly. "There's your next step."

He had to extend both hands—he might almost have been reaching to take charge of an infant—before she relinquished the volume. As he took it she let out a breath that sounded capable of leaving her entire self hollow, and he saw the mayoress relax. It was the sixth volume, Of Things Seen by the Moon, with a colophon depicting a full moon where a lunar sea resembled the pupil of an eye. "Thank you," Fairman said, which seemed inadequate. "I hope your crisis will be resolved soon."

Rhoda Bickerstaff's face twisted leftward so convulsively that it seemed to drag the hairline of her greying curls askew. "Don't you really know what's going on here, Leonard?"

"The book was the only crisis," Eunice Spriggs told him. "Rhoda got a bit too used to looking after it, that's all."

"Is all this necessary?" Fairman said and stared at the police. "You mustn't think I'm being unprofessional, but when it comes right down to it, it's just a book."

"You're the last one I'd hope to hear saying that, Leonard."

He was disconcerted not just because it was Rhoda Bickerstaff who told him so but by a sense that at least one other person in the room might have. "I assure you I'll take care of it," he said, not without resentment. "Who's next on my list?"

"Eric Headon. He's our local historian."

This time it was the mayoress who spoke, but Fairman kept his eyes on Rhoda Bickerstaff. "You couldn't have told me that yesterday."

"That's not how things are done here, Leonard," Eunice Spriggs said.

"Why not?" Fairman demanded and turned on her. "How much do you know about all this?"

"All I need to," she said with an odd faraway look. "You will when it's time."

He oughtn't to be loitering, not least since the police had brought blank looks to bear on him. "Can someone give me Mr Headon's number?"

He had no idea who might respond until Rhoda Bickerstaff scrawled the information on the back of a Leafy Shade card that bore the slogan REST IS BEST. He was hurrying along the drive, and acutely relieved to have left the episode behind, when he glimpsed movement out of the corner of his eye. Had one of the residents fallen out of bed? Beyond a ground-floor window to his left a quilt was sprawling towards the floor. The pale shapeless object floundered out of sight beneath the low sill before he could distinguish it more clearly, but he couldn't have seen arms and legs protruding from it; nobody's limbs could be so unequal, in length as well as thickness. All the same, the bed was empty, and an occupant might have been entangled in the quilt. As Fairman thought of alerting someone, a uniformed nurse came into the room. His face grew blank as he saw what was there, and Fairman headed for his car.

He boxed up his prize and locked the boot, and then he hesitated. However uncomfortable the intervention of the mayoress and the police had made him, they'd helped him secure the book. Suppose the historian was as unforthcoming as Rhoda Bickerstaff had tried to be? Fairman might appreciate some official help, and so he phoned from outside the Leafy Shade. A somnolent hiss gave way to the simulation of a bell before a man mumbled "Yes."

There were fewer consonants to it than there might have been—perhaps none. "Mr Headon," Fairman said.

"Miss a fair un."

Was Headon drunk? He seemed to find it hard to shape his words. "That's who I am," Fairman nevertheless said.

"Goo to he fum you. Reach me alas."

"Good to speak to you. I'm sorry that I couldn't reach you sooner. Is it convenient to see you now?"

"Seem eel layer. Attach oh."

"I'm sorry, I didn't quite catch that."

"Lair. Lair." With a distinctly peevish effort Headon succeeded in pronouncing "Later. You'll be at the show."

"I may be, but couldn't you possibly—"

"I have Tourette's." As Fairman wondered how much this might explain, Headon added a resentful translation. "Have to rest before the show."

"You're involved in it, you mean."

"I'm image all wry." Headon's words were growing worse than blurred again. "Arrest him," he muttered, "when you caw."

"Forgive me, I didn't catch that either."

"I said," Headon complained, "I was resting when you called."

"I'm sorry, I didn't realise." Fairman had a distinct impression that Headon thought he should have. "I don't suppose," he said, "before I go you could tell me who else—"

"Seethe am altar night. See you deny," Headon said so indistinctly that his voice seemed to merge with the static as he rang off.

Had he really believed Fairman was asking who else would be onstage tonight? At least Fairman had done all he reasonably could, and he had a book to examine. As he drove downhill he saw that the haze had advanced to the near edge of the sea and blocked off both ends of the promenade, which the grey light helped to resemble an old faded image of itself. Near the Wyleave the people on the seafront reminded him of the posters in the tourist office, since they appeared to be moving hardly at all.

Not to be met by Mrs Berry felt like a form of acceptance, though not one he needed to welcome. He unpacked the carton once he'd checked the contents of the safe. From the window he saw that despite the fog on the beach, people were sitting at the water's edge. They were so blurred that he couldn't be sure how scantily dressed they might be. Were those the same old folk as yesterday in the shelter? It was impossible to tell, given the scarves they'd wrapped around the lower sections of their faces, presumably to keep out the fog. Fairman ought to be making a call, and he took out his phone. "Leonard," Brighouse said. "Surprise me.

"I'm past the halfway mark."

"You mean you've nearly as far to go? What's the obstacle this time?"

"Some of the people with the books have been keeping me waiting."

"Perhaps you shouldn't let them. Do you think they're sufficiently aware of the importance of our acquisition?"

"I don't believe that's the problem. I'm sure they know how much the books mean."

"And what about the other people? Have you contacted them all?"

"I can't do that." Fairman braced himself for the reaction as he said "I have to collect the volumes in a certain order."

"Why on earth are you bothering to do that?"

"Because that's what everyone wants me to do."

"And you're letting yourself be dictated to in that fashion? It sounds to me as if somebody is amusing themselves at your expense."

Fairman felt defensive not just on his own behalf. "I honestly don't think that's the situation."

"Well, perhaps you know best." Brighouse's tone fell short of supporting the notion. "Is there any point in asking when you'll have completed the task?"

"I don't think I can say just now," Fairman said and heard himself echoing some of the townsfolk.

"I'd remind you what I mentioned yesterday about leave."

"If that's all the university thinks these books are worth—" For a breath Fairman was on the edge of threatening to resign. "They're the most significant acquisition we'll ever make," he said.

"No need to proselytise, Leonard. I'm just as aware of their rarity as you."

Fairman felt as if he'd meant more than this but couldn't put it into words. Either this or Brighouse's attitude infuriated him so much that he blurted "Would you mind not telling Sandra I'm further delayed?"

"I can't imagine why you'd think I would."

"You've been discussing me, haven't you? I'd prefer to let her know myself."

After quite a pause Brighouse said "I'd like to see you here as soon as practicable. There are issues that may need to be clarified."

Had Fairman jeopardised his position after all? "I'll be back as soon as the books let me," he said, and once he was rid of Brighouse the situation at the university seemed too remote to trouble him. Surely his acquisitions would protect him against dismissal, and he sat down with Of Things Seen by the Moon. "How many fools dismiss the moon as borrowing its illumination from the sun! In truth its light reveals more to the mage's eye than the sunlight of midsummer..."

The book went on to peer behind lunar myths. The transformation of the werewolf was "but the brutish display of the changes which are wrought on every aspect of the world by the illumination the night brings." Some old tales of the fairies named them as the Children of the Moon because their shapes mutated with its phases. At the time Percy Smallbeam compiled the edition, some women were apparently still afraid to conceive or give birth on nights of the full moon in case they produced a mooncalf, "a thing whose shape betrays how life was formed in the infancy of the universe." Other sections of the book suggested that "the mage shall learn to see as the moon does", but if the pages that followed were meant to instruct, Fairman seemed incapable of grasping so much as a word. The prose grew meditative and mystical, presenting the dark side of the moon as a symbol of concealment; surely the notion that it "swarms with monstrous and inhuman life, as does the underside of any stone" was metaphorical, despite the unappealing detail in which it was discussed at length. Then the book proposed that "what is closest is most hidden", but Fairman felt as if the paragraphs that followed were taking refuge in his mind without entering his consciousness. Whenever he glanced up he was met by his own gaze, so remote that it must be betraying the incomprehension that lay like a weight in his brain as he finally closed the book. He didn't need to understand; his mission was simply to keep the books safe. Wasn't there something else he ought to do? He let out a sigh like one of the waves at his back as he realised who he'd neglected to call.

She sounded wearily resigned. "I won't ask, Leonard."

"Nathan hasn't spoken to you, then."

"Not about you, no." When Fairman only gazed into the depths of his own eyes Sandra added "What would he have said?"

"I'm still where you've gathered I am, and he's talking about leave again."

"You don't seem very anxious about it."

"I'm anxious to be with you, if that's what you mean." With an inspiration that hardly felt like his Fairman said "Of course if you wanted I could be soon enough."

"How are you proposing to achieve that?"

"You've the weekend off, haven't you? If I haven't finished here by tomorrow you could join me."

"I'm sure you'd be surprised if I did."

"Pleasantly so, yes."

"It sounds to me as if you're having a pleasant enough time by yourself. You certainly don't seem to be in a hurry to leave."

"We can't hurry these books."

Fairman saw a hand besides his own come to rest on the black volume. No, it was his hand in the mirror, where he looked as if he were about to swear an oath or use the book in some other solemn ritual. "Then I won't try to hurry you any more," Sandra said with nothing like enthusiasm.

He could speak to her again tomorrow. Perhaps sleep would bring some kind of change. Once they'd said their goodbyes he saw that he had nearly an hour to spare, though he wouldn't have guessed that from the muffled light outside the window. He had the irrational notion that it might be hard to judge when the moon replaced the sun behind the fog. He had time to walk to the Shaw and for a quick dinner as well. He returned the book to the safe and took an empty carton with him.

Joggers were trotting doggedly along the promenade. They looked as if they were struggling to forge their way through the befogged twilight, and Fairman could have imagined that he felt the medium weighing him down. Certainly the joggers needed exercise; some were so obese that every step sent a flabby wobble upwards through the whole of them, even quivering their faces. Each of them raised a hand to greet Fairman, and more than one used theirs to mop their foreheads with such vigour that he could have thought the flesh was quaking like tripe. He was surprised that any of them could find breath to hum snatches of an old tune, whatever it might be.

The Shaw appeared not to be open. The lobby was as dim as any of the glass cases he'd seen at the zoo. As he crossed the junction with the promenade he had to dodge a pushchair wheeled by a young but pudgy mother. The plastic cover that protected the chair from the elements blurred the occupant's wide flat face so much that it looked featureless apart from the eyes, which the plastic distorted until the left one seemed twice the size of the other. Fairman could have thought the toddler was naked as well; presumably the plastic and the clogged twilight were lending its skin and its one-piece suit the same greyish pallor. He'd seen people complimenting parents on their offspring when they met them in the street, but he couldn't think of anything appropriate to say. In any case the woman's distant stare didn't strike him as inviting a remark.

The machines in the arcades were jingling and prattling, while video games carried on shouting in unnatural voices meant to pass for human. Fairman could have fancied that the show was being put on just for him, to persuade him that Gulshaw was lively even so late in the season. The plastic eyes of a horse outside an arcade glistened with moisture, and as its innards burst into electronic song he might have been reminded of the kind of life that swarmed in corpses or on the hidden side of the moon, according to the Revelations. Was that still the sun behind the fog? He was growing unduly fanciful—he didn't need to think that the murk was capable of hiding a vast presence—though as he tramped past the arcades their mindless clamour crowded all thoughts out of his head.

The proprietor of Fishing For You was in her hospital uniform, or at least the outfit that made her resemble a nurse. "Decided in our favour?" she said.

"I've had no better since I've come to town."

"You won't, either." Presumably this was a boast, even if her eyes held back from admitting to it "The usual?" she said.

He supposed this meant everybody's preference, since she could hardly know his. "That's fine with me."

As he sat at a picnic table on the tiled floor she said "Eating in? You've not got used, then."

"To this weather? I don't think I'd want to be."

"Don't be too quick to think."

No doubt that kind of advice went with her blunt accent. He'd found no more to say by the time she brought him fish and chips in a squeaky polystyrene container. As she planted it in front of him, leaving moist marks on the table, the lid shuddered upwards as if some of the contents were making an ineffectual bid to escape. Fairman was disconcerted to observe that her thinness ended well above the waist, suggesting that much of her flesh had sunk to be held up by her extensive hips. Once she returned to the far side of the counter he fed himself a mouthful with the plastic fork. The increasingly familiar taste made him ask "Is this actually cod?"

"It says fish, doesn't it?" Having poked a long finger at the menu on the wall, she said "It's our kind."

"Don't think I'm complaining, but what kind is that?"

"The kind we have here. The kind that brings everyone back."

Fairman gave up and reverted to eating while the proprietor hummed under her breath. It sounded like a folk song, especially once she added a few words about someone coming home from the sea. When he heard shuffling he glanced up to see that the woman was performing a kind of dance on the spot. He found it disconcerting, not least because her eyes were shut, revealing how flat the lids were, hardly distinguishable from the skin around them. He left quite an amount of his dinner and was easing himself off the bench when her eyes sprang open, bulging at him. "We'll be seeing you," she said.

Fairman nearly asked who else she thought she was speaking for. The streetlamps had come on, appearing to draw the fog inland. He felt as if it was shutting him in with the arcades, where the shrill piping of the fruit machines and the challenging roars of the games had begun to put him in mind of a zoo. As he turned uphill towards the theatre the lights were switched on in the lobby, and Frank Lunt emerged onto the marble steps to wait for him. "Here's our audience," the manager announced.

"Not all of it, I hope."

"Enough for us." Lunt's black moustache and clipped hair glistened as if they shared the moistness of his unavoidable handshake. "So long as we don't disappoint," he said.

"To be truthful, I'm mostly here for Eric Headon."

At once Fairman felt tactless and ungrateful for the complimentary admission, but Lunt's face remained enthusiastic. "They're all the stuff stars are made of," he said releasing Fairman's hand at last. "You'll see."

He made for the auditorium with a wallowing gait that reminded Fairman of a sailor just home from the sea. Beyond the double doors a wide aisle divided at least thirty rows of seats, every one of them unoccupied. "Have I got the time wrong?" Fairman blurted.

"Nothing's wrong that shouldn't be." Lunt bowed towards the curtained stage like a priest making obeisance to an altar. "Sit wherever you like," he said. "The closer the better. You won't be on your own long."

Despite if not because of having slept so late, Fairman felt less than entirely awake. He would prefer not to be singled out from the stage, and so he chose an aisle seat halfway down the auditorium, which he hoped was close enough to placate Lunt without being too conspicuous. "Now we'll let you see some of our gifts," the manager said. "We aren't just a sleepy town."

"I've never said you were," Fairman protested, but Lunt was already making for the foyer. The doors shut with a muffled plushy thud, and then Fairman heard a noise somewhere ahead of him. It sounded oddly reminiscent of the murmur of an audience before a show, but it was beyond the curtains. Or was it more like a chant—some formula to inspire the performers? He was straining to identify any words—he could have thought they were too unfamiliar to grasp—when the lights went out, flooding the auditorium with blackness dense as earth.

Fairman sucked in a breath that felt like inhaling the dark. As his eyes began to ache with his bid to see even a hint of light, he heard a sluggish movement ahead of him. Something of considerable size was being dragged across the floor, and the idea that it was advancing towards him robbed him of breath. It had split in two, dividing like some primitive form of life, and the halves were crawling to either side of him. They hadn't halted when lights blazed up to reveal that he'd been hearing the curtains, between which Frank Lunt stepped forward, holding out his hands as though to present the struggle of the buttons of his dress suit to restrain his midriff. "Welcome to the last show of the season," he said. "I give you the Gulshaw Players. A century and half another one of artfulness."

Fairman assumed this meant the skills had been passed down the generations, though the observation wasn't addressed just to him. As the curtains stumbled to a standstill, light from the foyer had spilled into the auditorium, and he heard people taking their seats at the back. The movements subsided as Lunt wallowed backwards and a performer sprang onstage to either side of him.

They were acrobats in white leotards, and they brought a merry march with them. Presumably the band was recorded, because a technical problem was warping it out of tune, if so slightly that Fairman couldn't quite grasp where the music had gone wrong. Another pair of acrobats joined their fellows as Lunt swayed into the wings. No doubt all the pale faces were meant to resemble pierrots, though their costumes failed to sustain the notion. Despite the tightness of the leotards, Fairman couldn't identify their gender, and the identical caps of cropped black hair didn't help. The acrobats leapt and tumbled and stacked themselves on top of one another while their small brightly smiling faces remained as changeless as four masks from the same mould. He was unsettled by their sinuousness, which along with their pallor reminded him rather too much of the squirming of grubs, and he had to fend off the idea that whenever they stood on one another's shoulders, their toes grasped like fingers, extending to sink into the flesh. His need for sleep must be forcing fancies that resembled dreams into his waking mind. Now the topmost of the tower of acrobats was bending backwards in an arc, and one by one the others did until the performer who'd stood highest was able to flatten his cranium against the stage. Each of them regained their feet with a somersault, and as Fairman applauded he heard moist puffy handclaps break out behind him. "So much more to see," the acrobats chorused as they ran in pairs into the wings, and he thought they were echoed from the back of the auditorium.

As soon as the stage was deserted a newcomer lurched into view. Was he meant to be drunk? Having floundered to the centre of the stage, he tried to tell a joke about falling into water that he'd thought was solid ground, but by the time he reached the punch line, which involved telling his wife where he'd been, he was so effortfully incoherent that Fairman couldn't understand a word. The comedian's struggles with articulation seemed to drag his lanky body more lopsided, and his helpless gestures grew increasingly extravagant until they unbalanced him, throwing him on his face. Apparently this was the joke, and Fairman felt a duty to laugh, which prompted everyone behind him to join in. He was disconcerted to see the comedian leap to his feet and go through the entire routine again, not by any means just once. Each time his language ended up less speakable, until Fairman was reminded of the graffiti in the shelter opposite the Wyleave. At the end of every repetition the man fell flatter on his face, and took to pointing at the pallid slab it appeared to have become. Fairman had to laugh in order not to be dismayed, especially by the finale, where the comic wiped his hand across his face to demonstrate how level the surface was. "So much more to see," the mouth in it declared as he made way for a juggler.

At first she seemed conventional enough, if almost painfully thin. The indefinably dissonant band had fallen silent during the comedian's act, but now it was back. Surely only the juggler's swiftness made her arms appear to stretch to unequal lengths to catch the airborne objects— balls, skittles, knives—unless the illusion was another symptom of sleeplessness. At times Fairman imagined that her hands had grown unduly long as well, perhaps an effect of the light, which was dimmer than he would have expected stage illumination to be. She ended with the Gulshaw slogan, and her place was taken by a pair of contortionists so unnervingly supple that Fairman wondered why they needed to contort their faces too. He wished their mouths and nostrils and especially their eyes wouldn't gape so wide; less than half would be more than enough. He was glad that the contortionists were eventually ousted by a mind-reader with a black cloth covering the top half of his face, though less happy to be chosen as a subject by the man's assistant, who extended her forefinger quite some distance towards Fairman. He was putting together something very large, the blindfolded man told him. Fairman supposed that was true—the set of books, not to mention their importance—as true as the suggestions that he couldn't tell when he was dreaming and that his head contained more thoughts than he knew. He wondered why the performer needed to be blindfolded to come up with all this, until the assistant who had led him onstage untied the cloth to reveal that above the man's mouth was a single nostril twitching in a featureless expanse of pallid flesh.

Fairman was acutely relieved to see the man ushered into the wings once he'd uttered the familiar slogan. He'd scarcely vacated the stage before it was occupied by a troupe of singers, the foremost of whom swelled his chest like an amphibian to perform a solo. Was it a folk song or an unfamiliar hymn? Fairman had heard it before, but now he realised he hadn't quite caught the words; the refrain was "Thou great inspiration, come in from the sea." The woman behind the counter at Fishing For You might also have been practicing the dance with which the troupe supported the soloist. Fairman took it for a folk dance, a spiky jig interspersed with tortuously fluid movements and describing patterns on the stage too intricate for him to follow. The melody seemed related to the tune the band had played, and as hypnotic as the dance was proving to be—so mesmeric that when the performance ended, having grown slower on the way to stillness, he wakened himself by starting to clap. How long had he been asleep? Longer than he'd realised, to judge by the faces of the performers who crowded onstage to bow to him; they might almost have been honouring him, though surely that would have to be ironic. At least his having dozed must explain some of the spectacle he'd imagined he was seeing, even if he wasn't sure how much. As the players made their various ways offstage, the blindfolded man resting his fingertips on his assistant's arm, Fairman heard the audience depart, isolating uneven imprecise footsteps close behind him— Frank Lunt's footsteps. "What did you make of us?" the manager said.

"Most impressed." Fairman might have liked to leave it there but added "I hope everyone will forgive me. I've been up late with the books and I did nod off a little."

"So long as you dreamed of us."

Fairman wasn't about to admit it. He could have asked why the manager was counting himself in—it seemed to be a local trait—but said only "I wasn't expecting so much home-grown talent."

"Some of it is. Some came and stayed." Lunt motioned to him, crooking or rather curving a forefinger. "You'll be wanting Eric," he said.

Fairman could have thought they were alone in the building. Certainly the audience had gone, unless they were keeping quieter than made any sense. He couldn't help wondering somewhat uneasily which of the players he was about to meet. Lunt preceded him into the office and beckoned him again with that uncommonly flexible finger. "Eric, this is Leonard."

The man who rose with ponderous suppleness from a chair in front of the desk was the solo singer. Up close his expansive whitish face looked as though it needed all its chins to prevent it from collapsing out of somnolence. As he swallowed, his throat swelled so much that Fairman could have thought he was about to burst into song. "Leonard," he said. "Allow me to thank you personally for the part you're playing."

His handshake was as moist as any Fairman had been offered—perhaps that had something to do with the Gulshaw air—and oddly imprecise. At least his voice was more defined than it had sounded on the phone. "You were the stars, not me," Fairman told him. "And I apologise if I wasn't as attentive as I should have been."

"We entirely understand." Headon gazed at him with some kind of appreciation and said "Shall we walk? It's close."

Lunt shut the glass doors after them and stepped back into the sudden darkness of the theatre. Headon turned uphill past the Shaw and then along another deserted street, this one running parallel to the promenade. It included a number of clothes shops: Tall Boy, Lots of Woman, Stout Fellow, Skinny Girl, Fat Lad. Fairman reflected ruefully that he might have to patronise some outfitters like the last one if he ate many more Gulshaw dinners. The shops gave way to terraces of houses, all of them unlit despite the relatively early hour. "People seem to like their sleep round here," he said.

"We all need it, Leonard."

Fairman hadn't meant to seem to be referring to their earlier conversation. Now that Headon's voice was more distinct it was apparent that he wasn't local. "How long have you lived here?" Fairman said.

"Long enough."

"You aren't a native, I mean."

"I am now."

If Sandra had been there she would certainly have queried that use of language, but Fairman only said "What kept you here?"

"The same as you." Before Fairman could address this Headon said "I'm retired."

"I understand you were a historian."

"I still am." With some pique Headon added "It's all in here."

He was poking his forehead to demonstrate. In the inert greyish light, which resembled a luminous distillation of the fog beyond the promenade, Fairman could have imagined that the fingertip had sunk into the ridged flesh. He looked away before saying "You ought to write a book."

"Soon we'll have no more use for those."

Sometimes Fairman was afraid this would indeed be an effect of the internet, but not so long as he worked in the archive. "Better not let Don Rothermere hear you saying that," he said.

"He knows. Everybody has to."

Fairman stopped short of demanding to be left out, instead saying "So what can you tell me about Gulshaw?"

"It's shaped by its history."

"We all are, I should think."

"That's the truest word so far," Headon declared and turned his head to him.

It felt like being watched from an unreasonable distance, and Fairman was grateful to be distracted by noises ahead. Around one uphill corner of a junction he heard a series of soft irregular thuds reminiscent of the impacts of the dancers' feet onstage. When he reached the crossing he saw children at hopscotch in a floodlit schoolyard. Apparently in this version of the game they had to hop simultaneously about various sections of the yard. "Is that peculiar to this part of the world?" he said.

"A lot of things are."

Fairman was on the edge of demanding why the man's responses were so absurdly guarded, and then he wondered if they were. Might Headon be crediting him with too much local knowledge? The schoolyard railings and the shadows of the players confused his vision, so that he could have thought the children were hopping higher than they should and adopting grotesque postures too. The patterns of the game seemed increasingly reminiscent of the Gulshaw Players' dance, and weren't the children chanting a rhyme under their breaths? As he strained to make out the jagged whisper, which reminded him less of the song than of the comedian's unknown lingo, Headon said "Don't put them off, will you? Not far to go now."

In fact his house was just across the junction. Like its neighbours, it was so tall and thin that every front window appeared to have been squeezed narrow. A haphazardly paved path wandered between rockeries, unless they were overgrown heaps of rubble, to the front door. When Headon switched on the hall light, it seemed reluctant to respond. Presumably it was designed to conserve energy, but the glow reminded Fairman of old paper and left the reaches of the house in darkness. The hall and the stairs that climbed from it stretched further than he could see, and the grudging light from a room on the left didn't help. In the room faded armchairs faced a black iron fireplace, and dozens of images of Gulshaw hung on the drab brownish walls—presumably old photographs, unless they owed their sepia tinge to the illumination. "It doesn't change much, does it?" he commented as Headon ushered him into the room.

"It does where it counts. You'll be seeing." Headon stayed in the doorway and murmured "Shall I fetch it to you?"

Fairman found the conversation a good deal too ambiguous. "The book, you mean."

"And everything it brings."

More sharply Fairman said "What are you saying that is?

"Knowledge, Leonard. What we're all waiting for," Headon said and turned away, though not with his whole body at once. Fairman heard him pad into the depths of the house, presumably switching on at least one more light. The large soft footfalls receded into silence, and then a muffled noise might have denoted the opening of a door. Fairman had grown far too used to the moist stagnant Gulshaw smell, but it seemed more apparent in this house, and he felt oppressed by the dimness that resembled an emanation of old paper. He wasn't sure if the smell was intensifying as slow footsteps advanced towards the room, sounding furtive and yet heavier than he would have expected or invited. Apparently all of this signified the care Headon was taking with the book, which rested on his outstretched hands as he paced into the room like a priest approaching an altar. He watched Fairman lay it in its excelsior nest, having ascertained that it was the seventh volume, Of the Symbols the Universe Shows. Headon's throat bulged with swallow after nervous swallow, which made Fairman blurt "You aren't a believer, are you?"

"We're of the same mind, Leonard."

"Speak for yourself," Fairman almost retorted. He wasn't sure what daunted him—surely not the distant gaze that seemed bent on including him. "Well," he said awkwardly, "I'd best be off to keep it safe."

"Nobody would dream of taking any of them away from you." Headon paused to let this gain more weight before he said "And you're going to see the little ones."

"The little ones," Fairman said and felt as though he'd been overtaken by a local tendency to repeat other people's words.

"Our youngsters. The ones at the nursery."

"Why should I need to see them?"

"I expect they'd like to see you." As more of an explanation Headon added "Phyllida Barnes runs the Sprightly Sprouts, and she's got the next book."

"I'd better find out when she can accommodate me."

"I wouldn't trouble yourself, Leonard. Just go over in the morning. Nobody's going to give you any more problems."

Could Headon really undertake this on behalf of the rest of the town? Certainly he didn't seem to be giving voice just to himself. As Fairman emerged into the hall he avoided glancing into the dark that felt unpleasantly like a lair, but sensed it massing at his back all the way to the front door, an impression far too reminiscent of being spied upon. Outside the house he thanked Headon and peered along the deserted street. "Don't worry," Headon told him. "Nobody can be safer than you are."

The children were still hopping or dancing about the schoolyard. The surrounding silence magnified their footfalls, which sounded oddly loose, insufficiently defined. Fairman didn't look towards the yard as he turned downhill to the promenade, beyond which the fog hung like a vast curtain the colour of a dusty cobweb. He was put in mind of a stage with the streetlamps for footlights, and couldn't help recalling the restless anticipatory sounds he'd heard behind the curtains at the Shaw. Of course any presence behind the fog could only be the moon.

The arcades were dark and silent now. The lunar glare of the streetlamps seemed to lend more substance to the fog, which blotted out a good deal of the beach. The visible stretch was deserted apart from a scattering of plastic cushions. Could people have left them to keep their places on the beach? He remembered seeing a woman leave one near the hotel—and then, with a not especially mirthful laugh at his mistake, he saw that the objects were jellyfish.

They didn't belong to any species he recognised. Perhaps it was rare enough to be represented in the Bywood aquarium, if such creatures ever were. They glistened in the pallid light as if they'd just crawled up from the veiled sea. Obviously they were being moistened by the fog, which appeared to trail over them as Fairman advanced along the promenade. It revealed dozens of them, every one as broad as his midriff. They put him in mind of exposed flattened greyish brains, which wasn't their only unappealing aspect; each of them had stretched out gelatinous tendrils as if to help them crawl, tendrils that resembled spines gone translucent and flabby. Quite a few of the tendrils seemed to have ambitions to gain more of a shape, swelling to form excrescences reminiscent of embryonic hands. When Fairman started to fancy that he could distinguish small splayed fingers, in some cases fewer than a hand should have and in others an unpleasant profusion, he did his best to fix his attention on the promenade as he tramped faster towards the hotel.

At last all the inert misshapen lumps were behind him. He refused to imagine that he'd seen tiny greyish nails on any of the finger-like protrusions, still less that he'd glimpsed one gelatinous slab beginning to extrude features that suggested a rudimentary face. He needed sleep, that was all, once he'd spent time with the book. Just now he could hardly control his thoughts, which was why he needed to fend off the notion that all the creatures washed up on the beach were only playing dead. The prolonged slithering noise somewhere behind and below him must be a wave on the beach, but it made him look over his shoulder. As the fog surged towards him, hiding the stretch where he'd seen all the jellyfish, he was sure he glimpsed an utterly deserted beach.

He was about to hurry onwards when he heard the movement again. It sounded close enough for its source to be hidden at the base of the sea wall. Fairman gripped the chilly railing and made to crane over, and then he dodged across the promenade instead. As he hastened past the hotels, all of which were lit only by the streetlamps, he kept glancing behind him. Were lumpy greyish shapes crouching almost flat on some of the ramps that led up from the beach? While he couldn't be sure about that, he was glad to see people seated in the shelter opposite the Wyleave, though the scarves around their faces made them unidentifiable. "Sea wall," their muffled voices called—no, surely they were telling him to sleep well, not even to see that way. As they raised their left hands to wave to him if not to dab at their glistening foreheads, he let himself into the hotel.

Apart from the lobby and the upstairs corridor, it was dark. The silence felt as expectant as a held breath, and prompted him to make even more noise with the plumbing than usual. He was shutting himself in his room when he thought he heard a restless movement, too large and undefined to be anything except a wave, not an indication that all the neighbouring rooms were occupied. Just the same, he couldn't help reminding himself of Headon's reassurance as he sat down with the latest book.

"We are all but symbols of the vagaries of the becoming of the universe. May a symbol read a symbol?" Presumably the book was setting out to convey how that was possible, but Fairman found the text at least as obscure as the colophon, a circle that appeared to be blank until his fingertips traced a series of irregularities that might form a secret diagram or motif. "The old dances conjure the ancient patterns and celebrate the imminence of revelation..." This was among the more intelligible sentences, and even then he felt he hadn't entirely grasped the point. "Most potent are the words of becoming, which shape the voice and the mouth when spoken, and mould the brain which seeks to comprehend them. No wholly human lips may pronounce the language of creation, and the brain must yield its customary form to rediscover the making of the universe..." Beyond this the book might as well have been composed of the language it regarded as unfathomable by the ordinary reader. When Fairman shut the book at last he felt as though it had been a dream he was already forgetting, its details sinking out of reach in the depths of his mind.

He might have liked to think the view from the window was a dream. The denizens of the shelter had entirely covered their faces with scarves, and their hands lay so slackly on their knees that there might have been no fingers inside the whitish gloves. The clumps of hair perched on their heads accentuated their resemblance to waxworks. People were still sitting on the beach in the restless fog, which blurred their outlines so much that he couldn't even tell which way they were facing. Perhaps all the pallid heads were bald, but he had the odd notion that every figure had its back to the sea. The view was enough to send him to bed.

His night thoughts were waiting for him. He saw the monstrous shape as vast and spiky as a cathedral burrowing into the earth, and then all sense of time deserted him. As the passing of ages reshaped the landscape a lake was formed, and perhaps it remained unvisited for at least as long before the inhabitant was roused from its monstrous torpor by wanderers whose dreams had been touched by its reverie. It found a crude way to bind the intruders, injecting them with a trace of its essence through its spines. Fairman had heard rumours of this relatively modern legend, which he'd assumed to be a variant on tales of alien abduction, but now it felt as if the volumes of the Revelations were carrying on a dialogue in his head, composing annotations there. At some point the entity was injured and retreated to its sanctuary beneath the lake. Over the ages it had withered to little more than a seed of itself, but now it rediscovered its primal substance, extending its spines through the land. Or was this yet another symbol—a veiled account of how it was reaching for the world? It was just a dream, Fairman reassured himself, or rather it would have been one if he were asleep. At some point he was, since daylight wakened him.

Not just the greyish light did, nor even the suspicion that he could have been mumbling in his sleep. He'd had an idea during the night, and his gaze drifted towards the safe. Had he been less thorough than he ought to be? He lined up the books on the dressing-table before he opened the first volume at the rear flyleaf. The breath he released felt like starting awake once again, and he saw his eyes widen in the mirror. The book and all the others had been annotated on the flyleaf.

The addition that he'd previously seen wasn't in the same handwriting as the others, although they looked similar. They were even more loosely scrawled than the first example had been. Perhaps the writers had been drunk or half asleep, which might explain the vagueness of the annotations too. "The mage need not speak the words nor shape them in his mind, for reading them has made of him a conduit for their power." This had been added to On Conjuration, while On the Purposes of Night now ended by exhorting "Embrace the night, that the old dreams may walk by day" and Of the Secrets of the Stars had acquired an extra scrap of wisdom. "Gaze not upon the stars but into the gulf beyond, where you may glimpse the eternal watchers whose sport is the shrivelling of worlds." Fairman was distracted by a knocking—more a series of loose flat thumps—at the door. "Mr Fairman?" Janine Berry called. "Leonard?"

His lips were unexpectedly difficult to wield, and he saw his mouth try out shapes beyond the books. "One moment," he said indistinctly.

"Don't go hurrying yourself. We know you're busy. Only wanted to make sure you know breakfast's whenever you're ready."

He couldn't have guessed the time from the clogged daylight, but his watch showed it was nearly ten o'clock. "I shouldn't be long," he called, and his lips mimed the words in the mirror.

He hadn't heard the landlady depart when he turned to the next book. The Revelations told how Gla'aki roamed the universe, the annotation said. "His great mind guided the vessel, but even He could not revive the denizens of the dead city which formed its carapace. The city and its secrets far older than humanity were destroyed as the vessel fell to our earth." The scrawl at the end of the following volume seemed to continue the theme. "The disciples of Gla'aki have described the dead city which lies in the depths of Deepfall Water, yet none of His evangelists have understood the greater wonder. What is the apparition of the vanished city but a token of His power to shape His domain through His dreams?"

"What indeed," Fairman muttered. He turned his back on his twin once they'd both shut their books, and carried a trinity of volumes to the safe. Had he learned anything at all from the annotations? They felt to him as if the books had been talking to themselves. He locked the other volumes in the safe and headed for the bathroom.

Someone had been in it recently. The mirror was befogged, and a trickle of water was snaking into the plughole of the bath. Fairman made the plumbing muffle his noises next door and ambled downstairs once he was dressed. He'd hardly taken his place by the window, outside which the fog hovered wakefully above the beach, when Mrs Berry appeared with a trayful of breakfast. As she transferred the plate and the other items to his table she said "We saw you at the theatre last night."

Fairman was distracted by the sight of the occupants of the shelter opposite the hotel. Could they really have been there all night? Their faces were still hidden, suggesting that they could be asleep if not worse. When he saw one of them stir, flexing his floppy gloved fingers on his knees, Fairman said "What did you think of the show?"

"What you did, that's all that matters."

"Surely not all." His response seemed to drive her gaze further back in her eyes, and Fairman said "You have to be impressed by how much they can do."

"You've not seen the half yet."

He had no idea what to say to this. The empty tables all around him prompted him to murmur "I'm sorry to be putting you to trouble."

"You aren't at all, Leonard. None of us."

"Eating after everybody else, I mean."

"You're not. You're our only one."

"Haven't your other guests eaten? Someone was in the bathroom before me."

For an instant Mrs Berry hesitated. "What makes you say that?"

"It was steamed up."

"I expect the fog got in." Before he could argue she said "Look at me keeping you from your meal. That isn't what I'm for."

She stumped away softly but rapidly, returning as Fairman downed the last pliant mouthful. He was gazing at a bunch of sluggish joggers who might almost have been imitating animals from the zoo, some with their fists raised in front of them like paws while others dangled their arms from a simian crouch. "We all need to keep ourselves in shape," Mrs Berry said.

Rather than admit this Fairman said "Could you tell me where I'll find Phyllida Barnes?"

"You'll be seeing our littlest ones, of course. She has them up on Haven Way."

"Not quite the smallest, surely? They'll be at your hospital."

"We've none of those in Gulshaw."

"The nearest one, I mean. The nearest maternity."

"We like to keep it here. Us Gulshaw women don't need all that paraphernalia."

"Some people must, surely."

"If what we drop can't get on without that kind of help, it isn't meant."

Fairman wasn't anxious to learn how much she might be drawing on her own experience, and made haste to fetch his coat instead, together with a carton for the next book. The old folk in the shelter had partly uncovered their faces; the scarves had sagged below their eyes, at any rate. "Good day," they called, two syllables so muffled that he could easily have thought a less commonplace word.

The light was more stifled than ever. The icy disk of the sun gleamed for a moment before vanishing into the wall of fog above the sea as if it had been engulfed by gelatin. No jellyfish were visible beyond the promenade, though at first he had the grotesque fancy that some of the people standing about on the beach were ankle-deep in them. Of course the people were wearing plastic beach shoes, which made their feet look translucent and discoloured and swollen.

A side street led uphill past Gulshaw Face & Body, apparently both a beautician's and a gym. Perhaps this was where the local folk acquired their tan, though Fairman hadn't seen much of that lately; even the ones he'd previously encountered—Janine Berry's, Frank Lunt's—had begun to fade as if there was no further need for such a sham. Though the slope wasn't especially steep, he felt sluggish by the time he reached the top. Not far around the corner was Sprightly Sprouts, a long grey single-storey building that might originally have been some sort of hall. The exterior was painted with large animals so cartoonish that they hardly seemed to belong to any species Fairman recognised. As he closed the gate of the yard, which was provided with miniature climbing equipment and infantile rides, he heard a woman cry "Here's our visitor. Let's see you all shape up."

He felt abashed and resentful of being used as some kind of threat. As he made for the merrily yellow doors, they were flung open by a buxom woman. Her voluminous dun gown hung straight to her feet from her considerable bosom, which quivered visibly inside the material when she took a step towards him. He might have thought her chubby face quaked too, twitching the tips of her fierce smile and almost closing her small eyes, not to mention jerking her greyish nostrils wider. Though her russet hair was parted well to the left, it framed her face with identical waves. "Phyllida Barnes," she said not much less vigorously than she'd addressed the children. "Good to meet you at last, Mr Fairman."

Once he'd accepted the clammy Gulshaw handshake, she made a tremulous bustling movement with her entire body to urge him over the threshold. "No ceremony, Mr Fairman. They're all waiting for you."

He could hear the children beyond the lobby, where dozens of miniature jackets and overcoats hung in an alcove. As he shut the doors behind him the hubbub seemed to swell up, growing shriller. Perhaps his face betrayed some nervousness, because Phyllida Barnes blinked at him. "Don't you care for children?"

"I've had very little to do with them."

"Maybe you should see to that," she said and appeared to realise to some extent that she was being presumptuous. "We know how much you're doing already, but still."

Without waiting for an answer she opened a door opposite the cloakroom. The babble of children subsided, isolating a few wordless sounds, as Fairman ventured into the room. Most of the toddlers were behind dwarfish desks, though a few children, not necessarily the smallest, lay on plastic mats on the wooden floor. Every child was gazing at Fairman, who had an unsettling sense that he was the focus of attention of a single mind. "We like to start them young," Phyllida Barnes declared. "You're never too young to learn, or too old either."

He supposed she was referring to the classroom ambiance. Quite a few of the toddlers were unduly plump while others were equally unhealthily thin. He was restraining any comment when Phyllida Barnes said "Diane?"

Diane was just as stout but more sluggish, and wore a gown like hers. Fairman was disconcerted to observe how similar her hair was to her colleague's, virtually a mirror image with the parting on the right. "Show Mr Fairman your pictures, everyone," she urged.

Perhaps they had recently been to the zoo or gone walking in the woods. He could just deduce that the paintings were meant to represent something like a hedgehog. Even the prostrate infants held up spiky daubs on large sheets of paper. "What do you think of that, Mr Fairman?" Phyllida Barnes cried.

"Very nice." In case this sounded insufficiently enthusiastic he said "All of them."

"There you are, children. See who thinks you're developing." Nevertheless she seemed disappointed by his reaction. "What else would you care to see?" she said.

"If you don't mind, what I came for." When she and Diane added their stares to the children's, Fairman said "The book."

"I'll bring it to you. You'll occupy him while I get it, won't you?

Fairman couldn't tell whether she was speaking to her colleague or the children. As Phyllida Barnes left the room Diane said "What would you like to show Mr Fairman now? What shall we do for him?"

After a general murmur that might have included some words a boy or else a girl piped "Walk."

"That's right, you're good at that," Diane said so instantly that he wondered if she found them daunting. "Show Mr Fairman how well you can."

The children at the desks stood up at once with a flapping of dun overalls, and he was disconcerted by how tall some of them proved to be. Did they have difficulty in walking?

Was that why the woman had made an issue of it? Or perhaps they were demonstrating as they came towards him how complicatedly they could walk. The children on the mats had raised their heads, and now they began to squirm, rustling the plastic. "Yes, go on," Diane told them. "You crawl."

They set about it as the other children shuffled and hopped and sidled to him. All of them wore slippers not unlike the beach shoes he'd seen earlier, and the room resounded with slithering. All their eyes were on him, widening with eagerness if not bulging with some effort, especially those of the infants around his feet. The children only just stopped short of touching him, instead taking elaborate steps backwards. It put him in mind of some sort of dance—even the crawlers on the floor were finding different ways to wriggle—and he heard a whisper of a song or chant that sounded nearly familiar. "Keep that up and you'll be on the stage," he said.

This didn't seem to be what they wanted to hear, since they continued to encircle him while murmuring the chant their soft loose footfalls almost drowned. Quite a few of their eyes had grown so protuberant that he was put in mind of gouts of liquid. He glanced at Diane, but she was standing well back and watching him as distantly as all the children seemed to be. He was about to appeal to her or even call a halt himself—the intricate movements were confusing him so much that he could hardly distinguish the shapes of some of the players—when they all grew still in unison, even the ones on the floor. Phyllida Barnes had come into the room. "Here's his book," she said.

Did she really need to give the pronoun so much weight? He was still more thrown by the children's response. All their mouths grew round as they stretched out their hands to the book—even the crawlers did—and almost deafened him with a cry that might have greeted a present somebody had just unwrapped on their behalf. "It isn't for you," he couldn't help blurting. "There'll be other books."

A shudder took him unawares. He felt as if he'd been assailed by a denial so concerted that its force was close to physical. As the sensation faded Phyllida Barnes gave him a blink that he could have taken for reproach. "Mr Fairman has to put it with the others," she said. "That's where it's going to live."

"Back to your places now," Diane said.

The outstretched hands sank, and the toddlers shuffled to their desks while the prone children slithered to their mats. Fairman couldn't have said whether every child resumed the same position they'd been in when he'd entered the room. He made for the door, but as he held out his hands for the book Phyllida Barnes murmured "Do you want to say something?"

She didn't let go of the volume when he took hold of it. In her grasp the cover felt clammy, even yielding. "Thank you for taking care of it," he said —presumably he was meant to set the children an example. "I'm grateful to everyone who has."

Phyllida Barnes gazed at him so distantly that he couldn't read her feelings. "I expect you'll say more when it's time," she said and relinquished the book.

She was still in the doorway, and there wasn't room to squeeze past her. As he wondered none too happily if more was expected of him, Diane said "What do we say to Mr Fairman?"

He heard an indrawn breath behind him. It was so enormous that he had to remind himself he was hearing a roomful of children. After a pause they spoke almost in chorus, some of them distinctly enough that he couldn't mistake the words. "So much more to see."

"That's right," Phyllida Barnes said. "We don't know how much."

Fairman had no idea what this was supposed to mean or whether it was addressed to him. When she stepped back, twitching her eyes even smaller and quivering her straightened lips towards some kind of smile, he dodged around her. As he lingered to package the book he said "Do you know where I'm going next?"

"Of course we do. You want Bernard Seddon at Stillwater."

"What sort of place might that be?"

"Where we all go in our time." She appeared to think this was plain, and only eventually said "The funeral parlour."

"I imagine you'll be directing me."

"Maybe you should call him first if you don't mind. We know you're not meant to be put to any more trouble, but just in case he's occupied with someone. We've had a few go lately."

Fairman supposed he should be grateful to the mayoress for making arrangements on his behalf. Phyllida Barnes recited the number for him to type on his phone. Before a bell started to ring he heard the murmur of a song or chant in the room he'd just left. A woman's voice interrupted the bell. "Stillwater. How may we be of assistance?"

"Could I speak to Bernard Seddon?"

"Is this Mr Fairman? Bernard's engaged with the departed at the present."

"When could I see him, do you know?"

"As I say, he's at the church. He'll be to and fro with the deceased till this afternoon. He asked me to tell you he'll be here for you by three."

"Three it is. If by any chance he's delayed, here's my number."

"He'll be waiting, Mr Fairman. We know better than to let you down."

Perhaps the hushed respect that had crept into her voice came with the job. As Fairman pocketed the mobile, Phyllida Barnes said "You could have asked him to put them off for you."

"I don't think I should when they can't speak for themselves."

He was trying to lighten the inexplicably oppressive mood, but he thought he'd failed even before she said "We all have a voice, Leonard."

If this was a rebuke it was beyond him. He was emerging into the yard, where the climbing frames and tiny rides were so bedewed with fog that they looked as if they'd been dredged out of water, when Phyllida Barnes murmured "It's yours now."

"It's the university's," Fairman said, but her distant look left him more confused than ever.

His route to the promenade took him past Gulshaw Face & Body, where several bald customers were exercising in the gym. They had plenty of reason, given their lumpy shapes. Some were throwing themselves backwards and forwards on bicycles to nowhere, stretching their arms and then their legs in some form of therapy unfamiliar to him. Others were running or striding on conveyor belts, and Fairman could have thought they were elongating their legs rather too vigorously at each pace. He might even have imagined that the indistinct chant that drifted down from Sprightly Sprouts was accompanying if not driving the exercises. Through another window he glimpsed a woman lying supine on a bed for some kind of facial treatment. A hulking overalled masseuse had laid a towel over the customer's face, of course, however much it looked as though she was kneading the pallid surface in order to squeeze features up from it. Fairman didn't linger over the sight but hurried downhill.

The sea had crept out of the fog. Quite a few people were ankle-deep in the water—he could have thought they hadn't moved since he'd passed that way earlier—while others clustered closer to the promenade. The greyish light looked as if it were being strained through gelatin, and lent all the flesh on display a tint unpleasantly reminiscent of jellyfish. A faint song seeped through the fog, and Fairman was near to imagining that it originated somewhere out to sea until he deduced that it came from the church beyond the murk. The congregation must be singing at one of Bernard Seddon's funerals, but could the mourners be dancing as well? Perhaps this was the activity that made the song too intermittent for Fairman to be sure how familiar it was.

As he crossed the road to the Wyleave, the denizens of the shelter raised their left hands, and one man called out. Surely he hadn't used Fairman's name, but Fairman demanded "What did you say?"

"We're saying no need to rush there, lad."

Fairman couldn't tell who had spoken first or now, and it might have been a third participant who said through his scarf "We'll all be there soon."

"The whole lot of us," another said.

Fairman had an unwelcome impression of being not just watched but addressed by a solitary senile consciousness. Presumably they had the funeral in mind. "You're right, no hurry," he said but made swiftly for the hotel.

There was nobody at Reception, and the building was quiet as fog, yet it felt no more deserted than the view from his room. As soon as he looked out of the window, the oldsters in the shelter saluted him. Waves were crawling forward on the beach as if determined to drag the fog closer to the promenade. He wasn't going to imagine that all the figures in the restless murk were facing him. He left the window and took his latest acquisition out of its papery nest. "Nearly whole," he said.

It was the fifth volume, Of Humanity as Chrysalis. At first glance he took the colophon for an anatomical diagram, showing a muscular skeleton next to a body parted down the middle. The stance of the bones suggested that they might have burst forth of their own volition, however, and the bony grin seemed more conscious than it ought to be. Were there eyes in the sockets? They reminded him of the distant gaze he seemed to have encountered too often in Gulshaw, and he turned to the end of the book. The flyleaf was blank.

It made the book feel oddly unfinished. He was so eager to read the text that he grudged the call he had to make. "Leonard," Nathan Brighouse said. "I hardly like to ask."

"I think I'd better plan on being done by tomorrow."

"That's Saturday." Brighouse might have been saying so in case Fairman had lost all sense of time. "Please ensure you're here on Monday," he said, "and we'll see what needs to be talked over."

"I'll do my best, of course."

"I'd expect no less." Brighouse let him interpret this for a few moments and added "I wouldn't like to think it needs assessment at this stage of your career, Leonard."

"Then don't," Fairman said, but only after ringing off. He was more aware of the book on which he and his twin were resting their hands than of still holding the phone. He should let Sandra know the situation, and as soon as she answered he said "It's me."

"I see it is, Leonard." As he grasped that she was referring to the display of his number she said "You aren't on your way, are you?"

"Who told you I'm not?"

"Nobody had to. It's in your voice."

"As it happens you're right." In a bid not to feel at the mercy of his circumstances Fairman said "I'm on my way to putting it together."

"How much do you still have to collect?"

"Just a couple of volumes. Nathan said I might as well stay the weekend."

"I shouldn't think you'll need any company when you have your books."

"I do have some reading ahead of me." Just in time he saw how she might have wanted him to interpret her remark. "You'd be most welcome if you cared to make the journey," he said hastily, "and I'm sure I wouldn't be alone in saying so."

"You can speak for the town, can you, Leonard?"

"I believe they pay someone to do that. But I think I've a pretty good sense of the place by now, yes."

"It's still the kind of place you dreamed of as a child, is it?"

"It's a lot more than whatever that was. There's so much more to see." If that was a joke, he should have known it was beyond her. "Not least the people," he said.

"What are you saying about them?"

"I started off thinking some of them were a little odd, but maybe they're no more so than I am. I'm sure you'd find them welcoming, all the ones you'll meet."

"I wonder if that's because their town is out of season."

"I'm sure they're genuine enough. They speak their mind round here. I was lectured this morning by one of them."

"Good heavens." Sandra sounded amused or ready to be. "What about, Leonard?"

"A lady told me I ought to care more about children."

"Well." Apparently this wasn't a source of amusement. "Maybe you should," Sandra said.

"I didn't know you felt that way."

"Maybe it isn't all you don't know about me."

"Then if you came here for the weekend I might have a chance to find out."

"I wasn't doing much tomorrow." She paused, perhaps to let him wonder about her decision or to attempt to persuade her, and then she said "All right, I'll take the first train in the morning."

"I'll meet you at the station. I'll make sure I'm free," Fairman said but thought it best to add "If the book should hold me up I'll let you know." That made him even keener to resume reading, and his distant gaze out of the mirror seemed to double his impatience. "Looking forward to it," he said and freed his hand to open the book.

"What need of flesh has the sorcerer? Nightly his essence springs forth and capers for glee..." He was surprised how unsatisfactory he found this and the pages that followed. Even if the content was meant only for the initiated, it felt unnecessarily withheld from him. "More curious still is the transformation which overtakes the child of sorcery, a change often too impatient to wait upon the death of the flesh..." This seemed yet more remote from his experience—as remote as the gaze that was waiting to meet his whenever he glanced up. Perhaps the whole book was symbolic, in which case he lacked the knowledge to interpret it; could that be in the volume he had yet to obtain? He was surprised how frustrated he felt by having read them out of order. "Some of the transformed owe their change to pronouncing the words of power, which shapes the body of the speaker to produce them." Might reading aloud help him understand? It seemed only to make him feel overheard inside the hotel and, if he let himself dream anything so absurd, outside too. "Most potent is the transformation which overtakes those who dwell within a territory which an Ancient One has made His own. As He occupies their minds, so the very landscape may revert to the age of primal shaping..." Fairman read to the end and shut the book at last, and as he and his counterpart each rested a hand on the cover he was put in mind of a priest who'd delivered a sermon without having grasped a word.

It was almost ten to three. He added the book to the blackness in the safe and saw the moist print of his fingers vanish from the metal door. As he padded downstairs his footsteps sounded like a muffled heartbeat he'd brought to life. Mrs Berry was behind the counter, but she appeared to be asleep. Her head was tilted back so far that he couldn't immediately distinguish her face. Surely it was only the perspective that made her eyes appear to have sunk inwards, rendering the lids concave enough to fit a thumb in, but there was also the illusion that her features had sunk into the flesh. He was attempting to steal away when she sat up, rubbing a hand over her face so violently that she might have been embarrassed to have been caught sleeping at her post. He could have fancied that he glimpsed her face quivering with emotion or with her treatment. She gazed hard at him before she said "Was there something you wanted to ask me, Leonard?"

For a moment he wondered what she might have been dreaming, and then he didn't want to know. "Just a passing thought," he said.

"All the same."

That could scarcely be an answer to the question he hadn't voiced, and so he said "Actually, it seems I'm to be joined for the weekend. I hope that won't cause any problems."

"Your lady couldn't be more welcome," Janine Berry said with a look he could have taken as coquettish. "We'll see to it she is."

He felt as if his thoughts were too obvious, hardly his own any more. "Thank you for all your hospitality," he said.

He wanted to be in time for his appointment, but he also didn't mind avoiding the tenants of the shelter on the promenade. He drove along the street behind the Wyleave towards the church and came to Stillwater

Funerals at a junction above the promenade. As he caught sight of it he realised that he hadn't asked for directions. He must have noticed the place or the name on the map at some point, though he didn't remember. In any case he no longer seemed to need the map.

The funeral parlour was a single-storey building not unlike an elongated vault with windows, and as grey as the light doled out by the fog above the sea. It was overlooked by the backs of hotels, and as Fairman left the car on the forecourt he saw people seated at several hotel windows. All of them were gazing in his direction, but he couldn't distinguish what was in their eyes, even when they each raised a hand to greet or acknowledge him. While they could hardly have been waiting for him, he would rather not imagine that they spent their days watching the funeral parlour.

Beyond a glass door with a black border, a venerable desk faced an expanse of carpet that yielded underfoot like moss. Two obese black leather couches rested against the walls, where the dark wallpaper seemed to hint at a pattern like stars almost too distant to see. A table scattered with dog-eared brochures bearing the slogan A Better Place squatted in front of each couch. The reception area was deserted, but a hymn hung like mist in the air. At least, Fairman took it for a hymn, so muted that he couldn't grasp the melody. As he strained to identify it and perhaps put words to it he heard soft heavy footfalls approaching down a corridor, and a man in a suit as grey as discretion plodded into the room. "Mr Fairman," he said, rather loudly for the setting. "Bernard Seddon."

His oval face tapered to not much of a chin, and his shoulders sloped so precipitately that his jacket seemed in danger of slipping off. Perhaps that was why he finished buttoning it before he gave Fairman an unctuous handshake, which came with a deferential nod that offered a view of the pallid central parting of his almost monkish tonsure. "Beg pardon for the wait," he said. "The girl's gone for a lie down. Big day tomorrow."

"I should be the one apologising. I wasn't quite on time." As the undertaker's large eyes widened while his small mouth worked on an expression, Fairman said "What kind of congratulations are in order?"

"For the girl?" Seddon's eyes grew wider still, elevating his hairless brows, and seemed to betray some kind of uneasy amusement. "She doesn't need any," he said. "If anyone does it's you, Leonard."

"I'm only doing my job."

"That's us, not you. You don't want a look at mine, do you? See how we all finish up in Gulshaw."

"I really don't think that's necessary, thank you."

Did Fairman sense disappointment before Seddon recaptured his humour? "I don't get many complaints from my customers," the undertaker said. "Even the ones that aren't from here."

"I shouldn't think you would."

Fairman saw his bid to join in the joke fall flat; certainly Seddon's gaze retreated deep into his eyes. "Shall I bring it you?" the undertaker said.

"The book." Since the undertaker seemed to think this didn't call for a reply, Fairman said "By all means."

"I won't be two shakes."

Perhaps this was more of his notion of wit, since he was gone considerably longer. Once the soft footsteps faded along the corridor Fairman reverted to trying to identify the music that seemed to permeate the room. Was there a whisper of voices as well as the murmur of the organ? He didn't know how long he had been left alone when he thought he heard his name. Or might the words have been "Let us see him"? In any case they took him into the corridor.

There were three doors in either wall. Just the furthest on the right and the nearest left-hand door were open. From somewhere came a sound like long slow effortful breaths— the noise of some kind of suction. Fairman couldn't help feeling relieved when a glance through the first doorway showed him no more than a viewing room, where two rows of straight chairs faced an open coffin. Or was it meant for viewing? The underside of the lid reflected the contents; he could make out details of a dark suit, including a breast pocket, but surely other parts of the image were distorted, since the collar and the ends of the sleeves sported greyish masses with nothing he would call a shape. The figure must be part of some kind of display too macabre for Fairman's taste or, he would have hoped, anybody else's. He needn't wonder what the swollen greyish wads resembled, and he was resisting an urge to look in the coffin when a figure with a blurred face and hands lurched into the corridor.

They had to be blurred because they were at the edge of his vision. When he looked he saw Seddon with a book in his hands. "Want to see after all?"

the undertaker said. "We can show you what happens if you like."

"No. No thank you." Fairman turned away from the room, only to sense the contents of the coffin behind him. "I just wondered if you were having difficulty finding the book," he said as he retreated down the corridor.

"Saying goodbye, that was all." Seddon plodded softly after him into the reception area and passed him the book. "I didn't need to, did I?" he said as though he'd seen another joke. "There's no goodbyes round here."

Fairman refrained from interpreting this. As the marks of moist fingertips faded from the cover of the book without exhibiting their prints he saw that the colophon depicted a coffin framed by a pair of open hands that might have been offering it to the reader. The volume was the ninth, Of the Uses of the Dead. Without taking time to think he blurted "You're the man to know."

"What are you making me, Leonard?"

"The chap who'd know about their uses." Fairman was thrown by how eager if not anxious the question had sounded. "That's supposing you think they have any," he said.

"We all have here. You most of all."

"Well, thank you," Fairman said, rather hoping Seddon thought he had the book in mind. "So who's my last custodian?"

"The father. Father Sinclough."

At once Fairman wondered how much was about to grow clearer. "The father," he said. "Did he give you this book?"

"All of us."

Fairman hadn't really needed to be told. "Why?" he said.

Seddon's face quivered as if the question had hurt him. "Seems like he thought he could trust us."

"You've proved him right, but why did he give them out at all?"

"Maybe he'll say. It wasn't up to us to ask."

Fairman suspected that the undertaker was being less than honest, but there was no need to interrogate him. "I'll call now if you have the number."

"It's here," Seddon said, poking his forehead.

Fairman glanced aside as he reached for his mobile. He'd thought Seddon's forefinger was significantly longer and thinner than the glimpse had made it seem. As he typed the digits Seddon intoned he had an odd sense of already knowing them. Of course he'd already encountered the Gulshaw prefix several times. The electronic trilling of a bell invaded the hushed music of the parlour, and eventually a man's uneven voice said "Sinclough."

He sounded short of breath if not of words. "Father Sinclough," Fairman said. "This is—"

"Mr Fairman. It couldn't be anyone other."

"And how about your people with the books?" Something like resentment of being taken for granted so much provoked Fairman to demand "Couldn't they have been either?"

"It should all be clear to you tomorrow, Mr Fairman."

"Why do I have to wait till then?"

"Preparing, Mr Fairman." The priest had begun to sound as if he grudged the breaths he was expending. "I've still got to," he said.

Fairman assumed he was thinking of the Sunday sermon. "You're telling me I can't have the book today."

"I'm sure you'll have enough to digest tonight as it is." Weightily enough to be quoting a sacred text, Father Sinclough said "All shall be ready for you in the morning."

"Where do I find you? What time?"

"My house is in Forest Avenue. Shall we say nine?"

At least Fairman would have the book well before he had to meet Sandra. As he agreed the time he heard the priest take a stuttering breath. "Don't drive, will you?" Father Sinclough said. "There may not be room to park."

"I expect the walk will do me good."

In a moment Fairman thought that a walk in the fog was scarcely likely to improve his health. As the faint music seeped into his ear he realised he was alone on the mobile. He shoved it in his pocket and was opening his mouth when the undertaker said "Don't thank me, Leonard. It's us should be thanking you for bringing it all together."

Did he think the addition to the archive would earn the town some tribute? At least one of the townsfolk preferred not to be named for the donation. "Let's say we all did," Fairman said and saw a response flicker in Seddon's eyes— appreciation, surely, but too distant to own up to its nature.

As he made for the car he felt as if the gelatinous light was gathering on his skin. By the time he'd shut the carton in the boot his skin was crawling clammily enough for fever. Along the route to the hotel all the windows looked as though the surrounding stone had expanded like fungus to coat the panes grey—condensation, of course. Nobody had rubbed them clear, but there wasn't much to see in the deserted glistening streets. He could have thought the entire town had succumbed to slumber, though he didn't blame anyone for staying indoors in this weather.

He was crossing the lobby when Janine Berry came out of the office behind the counter, massaging her cheeks as if to revive their lost tan. "Just fixing my face," she said, though for a moment her vigour had made it look alarmingly lopsided. "Will you do us the honour tonight, Leonard?"

He wasn't sure if he wanted to learn "Which one would that be?"

"Will you dine with us? No charge. Our privilege."

While he didn't relish the prospect of another walk in the fog, Fairman said "With whom?"

"Just our hotel. You're on your own till tomorrow."

"That's very kind. When would you like me?"

"Whenever suits you," Mrs Berry said and gave the carton in his hands a deferential nod. "Before you lose yourself or after if you prefer."

"These aren't the kind of books you lose yourself in." When she looked unconvinced he said "Before might be best."

"Can you give us twenty minutes? If it's less I'll let you know."

He could have thought she was eager for him to begin reading. Though it seemed early for dinner, he didn't like to protest when it was complimentary. Upstairs he transferred the book to the safe, where the mass of blackness reminded him of a lightless void. The tenants of the shelter might have been waiting for him to appear at the window so that they could salute him in unison. He couldn't tell how crowded the beach was in the fog, where every figure appeared to glisten whenever they grew visible. The sight made his mind feel incapable of grasping what was there, and he lay down on the bed until the phone rang beside it— rattled, at any rate. "We're ready for you," Janine Berry said.

She wasn't alone in the dining-room. She was flanked by Tom the porter, whose tan had grown patchy enough for a disease, and the chambermaid. All three bowed to Fairman while keeping their united gaze on him, so that he had to suppress a nervous laugh. Since Tom still wore the suit he'd worn while conducting Fairman to his room, it was perhaps not entirely surprising that the girl was dressed in her chambermaid's uniform. "Here you are by the window," Mrs Berry said as if he mightn't notice the only table that was set. "Wine, Dora," she said. "You'll have red, won't you, Mr Fairman?"

While that was his preference, he would rather not have had it taken for granted; somebody had even pulled the cork in advance. Once he'd tasted it and pronounced it fine despite an underlying ferrous tang, Mrs Berry said "Soup, Tom."

This was a greyish broth that resembled stagnant water with gelatinous fragments floating in it. "Is this seafood?" Fairman said in an attempt to prepare for a mouthful.

"Our very own," Mrs Berry said with some pride. "Brought up from the sea."

When he risked a spoonful Fairman found that it did indeed taste marine, in fact very reminiscent of meals he'd previously eaten in Gulshaw. He might have found it easier to finish if the staff of the Wyleave hadn't watched each mouthful, Dora shuffling forward to replenish his glass whenever he took a sip while Tom was equally dutiful in wielding a jug of water. When at last Fairman laid his spoon to rest in the bowl, Janine Berry said "Ready for our special?"

Fairman said he was but felt somewhat less so once Tom brought it in. The roundish steak was the same grey as the soup, and slithered towards the edge of the plate as the porter playing waiter stumbled on the threshold of the room. "Steady, son," Mrs Berry said.

Tom paid this so little attention that he might have thought she wasn't addressing him. He tilted the plate on its way to the table, and when the action threatened to dislodge the vegetables—potatoes not much more whitish than the beans and carrots—he grabbed Fairman's fork and used it to hook the dangling dewlap onto the plate. "Gently, Tom," Mrs Berry blurted.

"Could I ask what the meat is?" Fairman said, if only to delay the encounter.

"Gulshaw's best," Mrs Berry said. "Our own produce."

He supposed it would be impolite to enquire further. The knife sliced it readily enough once he'd dragged the meat across the plate with the fork. The rubbery texture suggested seafood, and it did taste rather like fish, though he wasn't able to identify the underlying flavour. He could have thought that not just his hostess and her staff but the occupants of the shelter across the road were watching him. The more conscious he became of being observed, the vaster the attention seemed, and he did his best to make short work of the fillet and the vegetables to which it lent its taste. As he laid the utensils together on the glistening plate Mrs Berry said "Pudding?"

"I'll turn into it if I eat any more." Since this failed to amuse his audience, whose gazes grew distant in unison, Fairman added "Thank you enormously, but I honestly don't think I could find room."

"You've done us proud," Mrs Berry said. "You go and finish what you're here for."

Had he drunk too much? Though he'd left wine in the bottle, having gestured Tom away, Fairman's legs felt a little rubbery on the stairs. In the upper corridor he had to support himself for a moment against the wall, leaving a moist handprint on the fishy wallpaper. His skin kept turning clammy, and when he dabbed his forehead with a hand, both of them felt infirm. Perhaps the fog had given him a touch of fever, in which case he might benefit from a bath.

As he stepped into the corridor with a towel over his arm he thought he heard activity in the bathroom. Nobody was visible through the frosted pane, but he was easing the door open when the fluid restless sound was repeated. Surely it was only water trickling into the drain. The bath glistened with moisture, and he saw movement in the plughole. A greyish substance was withdrawing out of sight, and he could have imagined that as it vanished it blinked at him. That was enough to send him back to his room, where he confined himself to splashing water on his face.

He couldn't hear Janine Berry or her staff. He wasn't far from fancying that they were still where he'd left them, standing side by side to watch him plod away replete. The idea seemed to magnify the stillness, which felt as if it were focused on him. He dragged the curtains together without glancing through the window and released the book from the safe. "All life is the instrument of the mage, and remains in his power after the process men call death..."

The volume seemed to promise formulas to revive the dead, to conjure forth their wakeful thoughts, to inhabit their bodies so as to use them as disposable vessels in some form of arcane exploration, even to prevent the newly dead from departing as long as they were useful to the sorcerer. None of these were promises Fairman was anxious to see kept, but he couldn't resist reading on; that was why he was here, after all, though perhaps he was glad not to be able to interpret much of what he read. "The mage shall be known by the summoning of the remains..." Which was the summoned, and which the summoner? If there were occult formulas they must be lying low in the midst of the text, and he found himself trying not to hear his own voice, though the peripheral sight of a mouth shaping every word didn't help. He released a breath as long and slow as any of those he'd kept hearing—the waves outside his room— when the blank flyleaves brought the volume to an end.

Once it was locked away he ventured into the corridor, where the stillness made him feel more observed than ever. Perhaps he ought to blame the eyes of all the fish that were embossed in the wallpaper. He didn't simply flush the toilet as an aid to using it but sang to cover up his activity: "Thou great inspiration, so much more than sea..." Back in his room he couldn't resist going to the window. The tenants of the shelter raised their sluggish floppy hands, but their faces were so much in shadow that he could have thought the featureless grey expanses below their eyes weren't scarves. In spite of the hour and the fog, more people than he could count were on the beach. Some were sitting with their backs to him, but surely it was fog, not the sea, that kept drifting over their outstretched legs. Far too many of the motionless figures, both the seated ones and those on their feet that rubbery shoes had enlarged, were facing the hotel. All their eyes were so wide that they made the other features seem to have dwindled if not shrunk into the flesh.

He couldn't be sure of that—couldn't even tell whether any of the people on the beach had been among those he'd encountered in Gulshaw. He felt as if he were dreaming the sights beyond the window; perhaps he would prefer to be. When he retreated to bed and switched off the light he was afraid that worse fancies were waiting in the stagnant dark—more visions of the denizen of Deepfall Water. He found he was nervous of sleeping, and he didn't think he had by the time Janine Berry's voice roused him.

She was singing or more accurately crooning. At first he thought she was in the lobby beneath his room, and then he realised she was outside the hotel. He floundered out of bed and sprawled towards the window. The watchers in the shelter saluted him before growing as motionless as almost everybody on the beach. He caught Janine Berry in the act of rising to her feet at the edge of the waves. As she stooped to cradle a flabby greyish almost shapeless object in her hands her left breast emerged from her blouse, to such a disconcerting extent that it might have been reaching for the prize she lifted to it. The sea fell silent between waves, so that Fairman was just able to make out her words. "You'll shape up," she said. "You'll last. You won't be like your brother."

So this was what dreams were like, Fairman thought as he found himself back in bed. Another showed him a horde of dancers emerging from the ballroom along the promenade to take their bewilderingly elaborate dance onto the beach. While they chanted a celebratory version of a familiar tune they kicked up their legs, which were bare and unnervingly long. Beyond them, through a momentary break in the fog, he glimpsed gelatinous lumps sidling crabwise towards the woods or crawling with a caterpillar motion. His bedtime reading must have given rise to the sight of the dead slithering out of their coffins through any crack they could find and worming through the earth to cluster at the edge of the sea, extending their arms and their hands that were at least as elongated towards the fog. He might have expected this to waken him—certainly he would have hoped for that to happen—but a nagging impression did. He felt as if he'd been talking in his sleep, and to an audience.

Although he seemed to be flaccid with exhaustion, another thought sent him squirming out of bed to wobble over to the safe. Outside the window the fog was engulfing the dawn. He fumbled to switch on the light once he'd transferred his two most recent acquisitions to the dressing-table. He opened Of Humanity as Chrysalis at the rear endpaper and then, with resignation that felt dreamlike, Of the Uses of the Dead. The pages were no longer blank.

The writing was less recognisable than ever. It looked as though an intruder had been struggling to guide Fairman's hand. The words seemed wholly unfamiliar, having left no discernible trace in his brain. "While Cthulhu makes Himself known to men through their dreams, Gla'aki fastens on their minds so as to make their dreams His own and shape them to His will..." This had been added to the volume on humanity, and Fairman couldn't tell whether it referred to the shaping of dreams or of minds, if not both. Beneath it the sentences were increasingly skewed across the page. "The Ancient Ones are not restricted to Their lairs, since a simple thought of Them may summon Them to seep through the very substance of the world. As Gla'aki came to know the minds of men, so He ceased to need to bind them physically to Him..." In the other volume the handwriting was even less controlled, wandering awry and almost off the flyleaf. "Where the power of Gla'aki has been concentrated He uses all life for His dreams. In these places shall be seen the eldest ways, where whatever lived was uncertain of its form and consumed its like in a bid for vigour..."

This read like an imitation of Percy Smallbeam's prose, Fairman tried to think; all the annotations did. Certainly he found them just as incomprehensible. He wondered if he'd spoken them aloud while scrawling them, and in what voice. As he resisted an urge to try reading them out, the bedside phone emitted its unmelodious clatter. "You're up, aren't you, Leonard?" Janine Berry told him. "Are you breakfasting before you go out?

Fairman was assailed by an excessively familiar taste that rose from somewhere in him. "I think I'm still fed from last night."

"You know best. You fast if you think you should." Before Fairman could find a response she said "We'll have plenty of the special for your lady friend as well. I made it for you myself."

She sounded oddly wistful. Some undefined thought made Fairman's limbs grow rubbery as he stood up, fumbling the receiver onto its stand. He really didn't need to stay in Gulshaw once he'd completed the set of books; he could pick up Sandra at the station and drive straight back to Brichester—it was too late for him to phone and tell her not to come. As he hauled the curtains wide he braced himself to be greeted by the tenants of the shelter, but then his body sagged. The promenade was deserted and so was the beach, as far as he could see for the stagnant fog that made the sea resemble an artificial lake.

Had the weather proved too much for everyone at last? Even the shelter opposite the hotel was empty, and the graffiti glistened as if they had only just been painted; the incomprehensible words appeared to writhe with moisture or with eagerness to be grasped until Fairman looked away. The sense of an unseen audience seemed to have left the hotel. Perhaps he needn't put Sandra off after all, he thought with vague relief. While he wasn't entirely alone— Mrs Berry at least was presumably still in the building—he felt sufficiently at home that he didn't use the plumbing to cover up his noises. Once he'd showered in the already damp bath he dressed and made his way uphill from the car park.

The fog had been waiting for him. The moisture seemed not simply to cling to him but to permeate his glistening skin, which felt feverishly unstable. He climbed the street as fast as he could, though that made him even clammier. The fog might have been ushering him to his destination, leaving its murky mark on every window as it fluttered sluggishly backwards just a few paces ahead of him. All the houses looked as dormant as the empty cars resting half their wheels on the pavements. Did Gulshaw shut down on Saturdays out of season? He could have thought the town was not so much resting from its summer labours as reverting to its ordinary state.

Forest Avenue was indeed beside the woods. Some of the houses on the inland side were so close to them that Fairman couldn't tell where their gardens ended and the woods began. There were no buildings on the opposite side, just a line of trees bordering the cracked uneven road. The priest's house was separated from its neighbours by walls that had partly collapsed, weakened by vines that stretched out of the forest to overgrow most of the garden and clutch at the house. Even the porch between two tall thin grimy windows was adorned with dripping tendrils and beaded leaves. Fairman felt the stone step crumble underfoot as he stepped into the porch to thumb the rusty bellpush.

He had to press so hard that his thumb swelled up around his nail. He was close to trying again by the time he heard footsteps shuffling towards the door, which wavered open to reveal a man whose age had bent him almost a head shorter than Fairman. His floppy slippers must be why his feet had sounded unduly lacking in shape. His black robe emphasised the livid tints of his skin, and his wrinkled face put Fairman in mind of a balloon that had started to deflate; even his bald whitish scalp seemed in danger of subsiding. His large eyes were virtually colourless, and gleamed up at his visitor while his thin faded lips groped for a smile. "Mr Fairman," he said. "Thank you for gracing my house."

His handshake was the loosest yet. His lank fingers writhed in Fairman's grasp as if they were trying to give him a sign, unless they were betraying how age had made them uncontrollable. "Will you sit with me for a little while?" he said.

The hall and the stairs that divided it not quite in half grew darker still as Father Sinclough shut the door. The carpets and the wallpaper weren't much less sombre than his robe, and the additional darkness felt like a weight that had settled into the house. The priest shuffled effortfully into the nearest left-hand room and grabbed the arms of a chair before lowering himself. "Please be at home," he said with the last of a breath.

He hadn't switched the light on. Fairman couldn't even make out the nails of the fingers gripping the chair. The stifled glow through the grubby windows made all the furniture look steeped in fog, though surely it was dust that had risen from the chair when the priest sank into it. A radio that might have been as old as its owner squatted on a chipped marble mantelpiece above a dark hearth strewn with dead leaves that must have fallen from the vines that enshrouded the chimney on the roof. The gloom of the walls was relieved only by a dull glint of glass in frames, all of which had been divested of whatever pictures they'd contained. As Fairman headed for the armchair closest to the window he saw a blurred version of himself slither from glass to glass like an inhabitant of an aquarium.

Having sat down, he edged gingerly forward. The chair felt soft and bloated, and he could have thought it was moist as well, perhaps from its proximity to the fog that loomed at the window. He might have moved if it hadn't given him the best view of the room. Father Sinclough seemed content to be almost somnolently quiet, but Fairman was anxious to be done with any interview. "So," he said, "I understand you're the gentleman responsible."

"I tried to be," the priest said like a sigh. "Mea culpa, I was wrong."

"In what way?"

"I thought the books were best kept apart." With another breath the priest said "You'll appreciate I've learned my error."

"You don't mean the people you gave them to." When Father Sinclough shook his head—in the dimness the pale scalp seemed to wobble—Fairman said "Why those people in particular?"

"I never questioned it." The priest held out his hands as if they were cradling a burden. "We're all one here," he said.

Fairman wanted to protest that he wasn't, whatever the priest's words were supposed to mean. Instead he demanded "And why me?"

"It becomes you, my son." Father Sinclough clasped his hands together; in the gloom they looked near to merging into a single pallid mass. "When Donald Rothermere read your essay we knew you'd take all the care that was called for," he declared. "Do you know what Eunice Spriggs said?"

His eyes were wide enough to be expecting a yes, but Fairman was disconcerted to learn that the mayoress had been involved at such an early stage. "Please say."

"She said she was sure you'd live up to your name."

All this had taken quite a few breaths out of the priest, but Fairman was provoked to try another question. "Forgive my asking, but is Sinclough really yours?"

The priest shook his head slowly, and Fairman told himself its outline hadn't shifted in the process. "It was the first change I made," Father Sinclough said.

Fairman didn't feel the need to interrogate him further, even to learn how it might be spelled. "Anyway, could I trouble you for the book?"

The priest laid his hands on the arms of the chair. "We've led you quite a dance, haven't we."

"Never mind, it's over now."

"Not entirely, Mr Fairman." Father Sinclough took a breath and said "Not here."

Fairman found he had to take a breath himself. "I'm sorry?" he said but didn't feel. "You're telling me the book is..."

"It's at the church."

"Because it's safer there, would that be?"

"It would be safe anywhere in Gulshaw, Leonard."

However much Fairman was failing to understand, it surely didn't matter. "Well then, shall we go?" he said and stood up.

The priest sagged if not sank back into the chair. It looked as though the stagnant gloom had donned a pallid face and hands. "It's waiting for you," he said.

"Perhaps you could tell me where to find it."

"Where else but the pulpit, my son."

"Thank you for your time," Fairman said, which seemed sarcastically inadequate. "Thank you for everything you've done," he tried saying, but the priest's face had grown even less distinguishable. Surely only the dimness was engulfing its features. Just the same, Fairman wasn't slow in letting himself out of the house.

The street was still deserted. "Not a soul," he heard himself murmur before his voice sank without a trace into the fog. There weren't even many cars on Forest Avenue; he could have driven after all. The lethargic fog receded ahead of him as if it was about to unveil the world, and he felt it leave a residue on his skin. The windows of the houses were hardly distinguishable from the grey walls that framed them, and yet he felt watched—enormously so. The street wasn't entirely silent apart from his footsteps; moisture kept dripping from the trees, spattering the wet road and occasionally drumming on car roofs. The shrouded woods put him in mind of a jungle, as if they and the line of trees opposite were reverting to the primitive. He was resisting an urge to sing if not to talk to himself— to add some sound to his muffled footfalls and the intermittent plop of condensation haphazardly accompanied by hollow metallic thumps—when he heard a noise behind him.

It was high up in the trees. It might have been a bird, although he was belatedly aware that he'd seen none in Gulshaw, not so much as a seagull. When the foliage rustled again he glanced back. The branches of more than one tree were shaking against the unseen sky, as if some creature had leapt from one to the other. Fairman couldn't help thinking of the zoo, which—together with the Leafy Shade and Sprightly Sprouts—was somewhere in the murk beyond the priest's house. Another treetop quivered, and at the same time one shook on the opposite side of the road. Whatever was on the move up there sounded larger than a bird, but it was indistinguishable from the clumps of greyish branches. Fairman turned away, and as his suddenly unstable legs threatened to let him down he grabbed the nearest tree. His fingers recoiled, and he tramped faster towards the church. Surely the trunk hadn't squirmed like a wet scaly limb in his grasp, but he didn't touch any more trees. Even when the floppy sounds in the treetops multiplied he refrained from looking back.

The trees gave out as the road brought him to the Church of the First Word. He could have fancied that the grey stone walls puffed up at his approach, just as the fog seemed to swell with a vast breath as it withdrew across the empty promenade and the deserted beach. He lingered between the mossy gateposts to examine the signboard, having noticed that the definite article had been inserted in smaller letters between the two lines of the name. Patches of lichen obscured parts of the sign, but he thought the last two words had been altered, though he couldn't be sure whether they had originally been Saint Mark.

The same grey lichen had run riot on the gravestones surrounding the church. Some of them were so distorted that Fairman could have imagined the fog had infected them with its amorphousness. A stone urn seemed to be sprouting tendrils like a giant seed if not a tentacled denizen of the sea, and the pale mass dangling from an angel's bowed head was less devoid of features than Fairman liked, as if it was on the way to forming a new face. As he hurried down the path from the rusty gate he saw that quite a number of the mounds that extended from the memorials had crumbled seawards. That needn't remind him of anything, and he tramped to grab the encrusted ring on the door within the grey stone arch.

The door lumbered inwards on its massive hinges, scraping the uneven flagstones, and the stagnant Gulshaw smell came to meet him as though the church had let out a moist breath. The interior was so dim that he left the door open. All the arched windows in the side walls and flanking the altar were at least partly overgrown by a greyish fungoid substance, but Fairman couldn't judge whether this or the fog was responsible for leeching all the colour from the stained glass, where the outlines of the figures were so malformed that it was impossible to tell who or what they were meant to be.

As he made his way along the aisle between the pews, all of which were empty even of books, he saw that the form on the cross that overlooked the altar seemed bloated, its ill-defined grey shape drooping forward as though poised to plump on the floor. Whatever Father Sinclough had said, the church was surely no longer in use, at least not in any conventional sense. Had the priest espoused a new faith? That needn't concern Fairman so long as he retrieved the book.

The pulpit stood to the left of the altar. As Fairman climbed the creaky steps, the banisters seemed to turn moist in his grasp. A book was resting on the lectern, and he could have thought it quivered a little with eagerness—his own. The embossed colophon showed a night sky in which unfamiliar constellations hinted at the features of an inhuman face. A stagnant smell that Fairman recognised rose from the pages as he opened it to confirm that it was the eighth volume, Of the Dreaming of Creation. He felt his eyes bulge with the strain of reading in the dimness. "All creation is a dream of itself. The universe dreamed itself into being and continues to do so..."

In that case, he thought, the book must be a dream as well. Perhaps he was on the edge of understanding why his time in Gulshaw had grown to resemble one—and then another thought overtook him. At last he grasped something Father Sinclough had said. Although he no longer had the street map, he could visualise the layout of the town, and he had indeed been led a dance. The route he'd followed to collect the books had described the first steps of the dance he'd watched at the Shaw.

At once he felt as if more than the insight had taken hold of his mind. He heard a huge prolonged dribbling breath behind him. It was surely just a wave that had sprawled onto the beach and lingered over retreating, but it felt like a symbol or an omen. So was the book, unless it was more than that. As he read on he could have taken it for a dream he was having, even if not on his own behalf, and was about to waken from. "Who hath shared the dreams the old stones dream, or those of the earth or the sea? Who hath beheld the sleeping visions of the mountains, or been a party to the reveries of the moon? The Ancient Ones partake of the dreams of the farthest stars, where universe and void consume each other for eternity. Let the mage prepare himself before venturing to invite them into his mind..." This and much more seemed to sink past Fairman's comprehension to root itself in his brain. The unchanging dimness gave him no sense of how long he had been at the lectern when he became aware of activity in the churchyard. A crowd was advancing on the church.

Father Sinclough led the procession, and the mayoress supported him on her arm. Though their progress seemed so furtive that Fairman hadn't noticed them until they were past the gate, their faces suggested that they meant to be respectful. They were followed by everyone who had taken care of the books, even Rhoda Bickerstaff, who looked not quite resigned nor yet just nervously expectant. Behind them came people Fairman had encountered in the town— Janine Berry and her staff, the proprietors of Fishing For You and Fish It Up, the Gulshaw players apart from Eric Headon—and then people he thought he had passed in the street or seen on the beach. It occurred to him that while he was reading at the lectern he'd heard a good deal of traffic on the promenade but hadn't realised its significance. By the time Eunice Spriggs and Father Sinclough crossed the threshold, much of the crowd was still outside the gate.

The priest shuffled to the front pew with the mayoress, where they sat and gazed up at Fairman. As they entered the church he'd thought Eunice was doffing her hat as a mark of respect, but did women do that? Now he saw that the object she'd stuffed into her handbag hadn't been headgear in that sense. Everyone in the crowd uncovered their bald heads as they stepped into the church, the women included. Nobody was wearing beach shoes, despite their appearance and the way their rubbery feet slithered over the stone floor. Too many eyes to count were gazing up at Fairman now; it felt like being observed by a single consciousness, and not only from within the church. He ought to have suspected something of the kind, given all the phrases they had in common. He was watching the church fill up—all the pews were occupied, and newcomers were crowding three deep along the walls—when the priest raised an unstable hand. "Read, my son," he murmured. "Read to us."

To some extent Fairman was glad to return to the book. He'd caught sight of a group of familiar figures in a pew at the back of the church. As they tugged their scarves down, he could have thought they were dragging their faces lopsided or otherwise awry. The townsfolk who couldn't find space inside the church were massing around it, although not at his back, where the waves had grown slower and louder. Some of the spectators had managed to clamber up to the side windows, though he didn't know what they were able to see; the faces flattened against the panes were so blurred that he could have taken them for lumps of the fungus that clung to the stained glass. He did his best to ignore all these sights and concentrate on the book, beginning where he'd left off. Perhaps it conveyed more to the listeners than he was aware of understanding himself, because there was rapt silence except for his voice and the sluggish progression of waves behind him on the beach. At last he came to the end of the printed text and turned to the flyleaf.

"The grimoire is a tool for the unmaking of the world. What are these volumes save a nexus of ancient power? Happy the land which is bounded by them, for it shall be irradiated and transformed. Happy the denizens of that land, for they shall renew the oldest ways of shaping, when all that lived partook of a single creation. More powerful still is the mage through whom the old words find their voice, and happiest is he whose lips Gla'aki uses to address the world. Wherever He is heard He shall manifest Himself to His worshippers..."

Fairman was no longer reading aloud, since the page was blank. He felt as though he was hearing someone else preach—as if the book had found a voice that wasn't his. He had to speak up, because the ponderous slithering of the waves had grown louder. He was about to continue, though he'd no idea what he would say, when he glimpsed a concerted movement in the church.

Everyone in the congregation had bowed their heads. Until he looked at them he was able to take this as a gesture of respect, and then he clutched the pulpit so hard that it seemed to sweat in his grasp. Although every head was lowered so far that he could see the back of every neck, all the faces were still turned up towards him, as if their raptness had dislodged them. They were no longer intent on him, however. All the wide dislocated eyes were gazing past him.

As the protracted cumbersome sound that he'd kept hearing was repeated at his back, he could no longer avoid realising that it wasn't the noise of waves, because it had left the beach. He felt himself tremble, and the pulpit shivered; he thought the entire church did. Perhaps the tremor that spread through the floor and rose up the walls to the gloomy timbers under the roof betrayed how massive the presence was, so weighty that it shook the earth, or perhaps the vibration was a sign of its power. Then the church grew as still as the multitude of unblinking eyes, and Fairman had to turn and look behind him.

He was being watched from beyond the altar. An eye was peering through each of the windows that framed it— an eye as large as Fairman's head. They looked as if they were using the church for a mask. He found himself struggling to feel equal to the sight; perhaps he could survive it, since the eyes were no less blurred than the vast pallid face out of which they were craning. Then a third eye swelled like a moist fleshy balloon through the wall above the crucifix and stooped towards him on a flexible greyish trunk the thickness of a tree. It was followed by the face, which absorbed the cross as it seeped through the stones around it—a whitish spongy moon-shaped face twice Fairman's height, featureless except for the stems of the eyes and a circular thick-lipped mouth. It was followed by a sample of the body, an oval mass bristling with restless spines as long as Fairman's arm, as the face leaned over the altar towards him.

He couldn't move. His hands might have been fastened to the pulpit, and his legs felt as if they would give way if he tried to flee. He did his desperate best to tell himself that he could bear the scrutiny if he closed his eyes, but worse was to come. A breath that smelled like the essence and the source of the stagnant Gulshaw odour overwhelmed him as the face descended to bestow a kiss that engulfed his head.

It made his skull feel malleable, close to gelatinous. As the sensations expanded through the whole of him he felt his flesh squirm like a grub. He even thought his brain shifted wakefully inside his cranium, an insect in a chrysalis. As long as the cold spongy lips lingered on him he seemed to forget how to breathe. At last they withdrew, and he heard a vast body shuffle backwards out of the church.

Was it dread or some other factor that made it hard for him to open his eyes? When he succeeded in raising the rubbery lids he saw that the windows beside the altar were empty, the wall bare except for the figure lolling off the cross. As he turned to the congregation he felt as if something apart from himself was looking out through his eyes; he might even have thought there was movement within them. The sensation wasn't quite enough to distract him from the spectacle before him—the sight of everybody in the church raising their heads to let the faces resume their positions on the skulls like jellyfish sliding down rocks. In a few moments he was almost able to think he couldn't have seen that, since the congregation was so innocently intent on him, as though waiting for a sign. He had no idea how to respond, but perhaps the sight of him was enough, because Father Sinclough was rising to his feet, helped by his companion. The priest shuffled forward and stooped lower still, bowing not to the altar but to Fairman.

Eunice Spriggs followed his example before supporting him along the aisle. His fellow keepers of the books stepped forward to bow, and the other occupants of the front rows did. By the time the entire congregation had done so and left the church Fairman had no sense of how long he'd spent in the pulpit, resting his loose hands beside the book. Even the crowd in the churchyard had bowed in his direction or otherwise inclined their shapes towards him. He'd glimpsed the most uncontrollably misshapen at the back of the crowd before they flopped away towards the woods, he guessed, or wherever else they hid.

When he emerged from the church with the book in his hands he found Father Sinclough waiting outside the porch. He wondered if the priest was clinging to a remnant of his old vocation until Father Sinclough said "We were guided in our choice, my son. I was never the man for the task."

Fairman moved his unwieldy tongue around his mouth until they felt more familiar. "What task?"

"When your books were entrusted to me I wasn't sure how to proceed. I confess it, I was afraid to keep them with me, to take all that upon myself. Until you spoke today I didn't realise why I was guided to distribute them." He seemed to be apologising for some presumption as he said "I'm sure I haven't got your calling. You're the one who can restore the word."

"Edit the books, do you mean?" Fairman felt as if he was trying to recapture his old self too. "You'll want to keep us in Gulshaw, then."

"Not at all." The priest shook his head so vigorously that his scalp wobbled, and so did the bald woman beside him. "We'll still have the benefit," Father Sinclough said. "You go forth and seed the world."

The last cars were departing uphill or along the sea front. The newborn sea glittered beneath a piercing sun all the way to the horizon. While the fog had dissipated as if Gulshaw no longer needed to be veiled, Fairman seemed to feel it on if not within him. Had it impregnated everything it touched? When he made his way along the promenade, clutching the book in both hands like a talisman, he thought he saw the hotels and the buildings beyond them swell up almost imperceptibly as a greyness merged with them.

Perhaps it was just the angle of the sun, although this didn't quite explain how they glistened while his flesh prickled in a feverish response.

In his room at the Wyleave he opened the safe, even though it seemed unnecessary to protect the book. He sensed how the darkness welcomed the newcomer. He shut the door and gazed at the marks his fingers left, moist blotches without whorls. He plodded downstairs to find Janine Berry behind the counter, adjusting the hair on her head. "Would you like us to move you to the honeymoon suite?" she said with nervous coyness.

"I think that might be most appropriate."

"You'll be in there when you've fetched your lady."

"It's appreciated," Fairman said and was accosted by a thought. "Whoever moves me will need the combination of the safe."

"You don't think anybody still needs to be told that, Leonard."

He might have produced some kind of a laugh at his thoughtlessness if his mobile hadn't clanked with an incoming message. "Well," he said, having read it, "Gulshaw does it again. Think of someone and they come."

"You go and get her. Everything will be ready when you're back."

Sandra's message said that she was fifteen minutes from Gulshaw. Coming to collect you, he responded on his way to the car. As he drove uphill he saw that all the shops were open, and the streets were peopled too. It occurred to him that the Gulshaw Players weren't the only townsfolk to put on a performance. He didn't need to tell any of the inhabitants that the town had a new visitor.

He parked on the station forecourt and was on the platform in time to meet the solitary figure who left the train.

She looked unexpectedly vulnerable—too slight and slim by local standards—while the profusion of red hair that framed her small delicate determined face seemed unfamiliar after his days in Gulshaw. He felt himself swell with a new emotion as he strode forward, stretching out his arms, not far enough to daunt her. "Sandra," he said. "Welcome to our town. There's so much more to see."

Find My Name

First published in Fearie Tales, October 2013

Doreen was awake at once and trying to hear why. A dog barked on the far side of the tennis courts, and another yapped from the direction of the golf club, and then she heard noises from Anna's old room. Benjamin was shifting in his crib, a sound both blurred and amplified by the baby monitor. As Doreen prepared to stumble to the next room the sound rustled into silence, and she let her head sink back onto the pillow. Before she closed her eyes she glimpsed midnight on the bedside clock. At the very least she was dozing when she heard a low voice. "You're mine now, Benjamin," it said.

Though she felt as though the night had settled a suffocating weight on her, she managed to open her cumbersome lips. "He never will be. Stay away, Denny, or I'll call the police."

"I'm not the boy's father. His mother had her wish and now it's time for mine."

This had to be a dream—nobody could hear Doreen through the monitor—but she felt pierced by anguish. "What wish did Anna have?"

"Her son till he was a year old."

"And his father abusing her for half of it. You think she'd have wished for that too?"

"That's what she wished away, and I'm the one that made it go. She knew there was a price."

Doreen felt her eyes spill her grief. "She paid for her mistake all right."

"We aren't talking about that." The voice had turned peevish. "Maybe she thought she could cheat me that way," it said. "Nobody swindles me, so don't try it. It's my time."

Doreen couldn't tell if she was struggling to understand or waken. "What time?"

"You've almost had your year of him, so say good-bye while you can, Doreen."

"And what do they call you as long as you know my name?"

"Nobody ever knows." She heard a snigger or the slither of a tongue across the plastic microphone. "I'll see you on his birthday," the voice said. "I'm leaving you a sign."

The dogs began to bark again, and more of them joined in. They were real, and they made her aware that the night was otherwise silent, which allowed her to lapse into sleep. A late April dawn coaxed her awake, and she lay pondering her dream. Was she afraid Benjamin's father would come looking for him while her husband was at the managers' conference? The court had kept Denny away from the child, and if necessary the police would. Perhaps she was uneasy because Benjamin had lost his mother on his only birthday. That ought to be another reason to make his imminent birthday special, and Doreen was thinking of ways when she heard him begin to stir.

His morning ruminations always sounded as if his language was taking time to wake up. "Bid honor revert efforts," she could almost have imagined he was mumbling, not to mention "Font of our reserved birth." Most of thirty years ago she'd enjoyed overhearing Anna's infant monologues, but she tried not to be reminded too much. Now Benjamin was talking to Nosey and Stuffy, the bears that shared his cot. When he started clattering the wooden bars, either playing at percussion or demanding freedom, Doreen made for his room.

He was standing at the bars that faced the door, and she couldn't help being reminded of Anna. His face was almost a miniature of his mother's—blond hair, high forehead, bright blue eyes, small snub nose, full lips, determined chin. In Anna's case the brow had left too much room for brooding, and she'd dyed her hair any number of colors, none of which had placated her partner; apparently few things did. Her eyes had grown dull as stones last year, and the few times Doreen saw her smile it looked more like a plea, even once she'd rid herself of Denny. At least she'd been sufficiently determined to take him to court, but had that left her more afraid of him? Doreen vowed she wouldn't be. "Ready for adventures?" she said to Benjamin.

"Avengers."

“Come on, little parrot,” Doreen said, only to falter. The microphone she always planted on top of the blue chest of drawers was lying on the floor. She’d thought the wire was well out of Benjamin’s reach, and was dismayed to think she hadn’t heard the fall. She felt insufficiently vigilant on his behalf, as if she might be growing too old for the task. As she returned the microphone to the shelf she said “You mustn’t do that, Benjamin.”

He stuck his lower lip out. “Didn’t, Gran.”

“Don’t tease, now. If you didn’t, who did?”

“The man.”

“Which man?”

“Comes to see me.”

“Who does, Benjamin? Not your—” Nervousness had made her blurt that, and she couldn’t avoid adding “Not Daddy. Not your father.”

“Not Daddy,” the toddler said, and laughed.

Doreen wondered if he was simply repeating her words. “Who then, Benjamin?”

His face grew puzzled before he said “Dark.”

“You can’t see him, you mean. You know why, don’t you? He isn’t real. He’s just a dream.”

“Just agree.”

“Sometimes I don’t know when you’re teasing,” Doreen said but didn’t really mean.

Surely he could have dislodged the microphone while he was waking up. He put his arms around her neck as she lifted him over the bars. He was warm as sleep, and eager to walk downstairs and run through all the rooms. Doreen caught him in the kitchen, where she helped him off with his sleeping suit. Once she’d praised his potty performance she gave him a hand with dressing while letting him believe he’d done it virtually by himself. She strapped him into the high chair and readied herself for the day, and then she watched him deal with cereal, spilling very little and hardly daubing his face. As she played the game of mopping him while he tried to squirm out of reach she said “What shall we do this morning?”

"See the trains."

He found plenty to chatter about on the half a mile of wide suburban road. "They're jumping for the ball," he said by the tennis courts, and "There's the little hill car" beside the golf course. "Gone in to read," he said beside the deserted schoolyard, so that Doreen knew he was recalling what she'd told him he would do at school. "Robber jugs," he declared outside the antique shop, and she gathered he was thinking of the tale of Ali Baba she'd read him. He called the hairdresser's customers space ladies because of their helmets, and outside the florist's he said "Where the flowers go," which Doreen tried not to find funereal. As they reached the railway she took a firm grip on his small warm trusting hand. "Red bell," he said.

The bells were indeed jangling as the red lights flashed. The traffic halted as the barriers descended on both sides of the level crossing, and Benjamin's fingers wriggled eagerly in Doreen's clasp. When a train left the station she couldn't resist asking "What does it look like?"

"Lots of stamps."

He was still remembering the ones he'd put on envelopes last Christmas—the strips the train windows reminded him of. At his age Anna had loved licking Christmas stamps. These days you peeled them off the backing, and Doreen wondered if the generation after his mightn't even recall that, if every greeting would be sent by computer. Six trains passed, framed by three performances of the barriers, before he was ready to head home.

Doreen saw to lunch and dinner while he had his nap. After lunch they walked past the Conservative Club and the Masonic hall to the Toddling Tiddlers playgroup. "Here's another of our talkers," Dee Maitland cried as he ran to compete with his friend Daisy at garrulousness. While Doreen wouldn't risk entrusting him to a stranger—she'd taken early retirement so as to care for him—she asked Daisy's mother Jonquil to look after him while Doreen made his birthday cake. "There's nobody I'd rather have," Jonquil said, and Doreen was fleetingly reminded of her midnight dream.

She hadn't realised Benjamin had left quite such a mess at home, where toys were scattered through all the downstairs rooms. He helped her clear some of them away before he set about redistributing them, and Doreen reflected that all too soon he would outgrow them. She would even miss his messiness, and after dinner she was in no hurry to finish cleaning his indignant face. She relented when Hubert rang. “How’s the man of the house?” he said.

“Being looked after by the woman just now.”

“Sorry,” Hubert said, sounding surprised if not defensive. “Something’s wrong?”

“Just used to having you about.”

“I will be on the day that matters most, won’t I? You’re all right otherwise, both of you.”

“Pretty much as you left us.” She could tell that was what he hoped if not felt entitled to hear. “You?” she said.

“Not especially looking forward to three more days of hearing how we can improve the public image of the banks. I’d rather just get on with actually improving them if we can,” Hubert said loud enough to be heard by colleagues who were audible nearby. “Enough of my grumbles. Shall I say good night to the bedtime boy?”

“He isn’t quite that yet,” Doreen said as she switched on the loudspeaker. “Who’s this, Benjamin?”

“The man.” Once Hubert greeted him Benjamin said a good deal more enthusiastically: “Grandad.”

“How’s the youngest and the best? Only three more nights and you’ll be seeing me.”

“Free nights.”

“That’s more or less it, yes. Are you being good for Granny? You look after her and see nothing bad happens to her while I’m at my conference.”

For an instant the toddler looked worried. “Nothing bad.”

“Nothing’s going to,” Doreen reassured him. “Better say good night to Grandad now. I can hear he’s anxious to relax.”

“Good night, Grandad,” Benjamin said so enthusiastically that both his grandparents laughed.

He helped tidy up his toys before bath time. “Hot,” he said gravely as Doreen tested the water, and then “Not.” While she couldn’t call herself religious—even less than her parents, which was why her prayers for Anna had seemed so desperate, falling short of defining their goal—whenever Benjamin came out of the bath he looked and felt as she imagined someone newly baptized would. She toweled him and kissed him and vowed to keep him safe as long as she lived, however much that sounded like a fairy tale.

She helped him into his sleeping outfit and laid him down in the cot. She was turning the pages of Anna's battered old book when the title of a story caught her eye. Of course, that had been Anna's childhood favourite. No wonder Doreen had dreamed something of the kind, but she didn't want to read that tale to Benjamin just now. "'Once upon a time,'" she began instead, "'there was a woodcutter and his wife who had children called Hansel and Gretel...'"

She omitted the oven and the children's threatened fate. The children were rescued just before Benjamin fell asleep. She turned out the light and took the monitor downstairs, keeping it on the kitchen table while she ate dinner. A day of Benjamin had tired her as usual, not that she would want it to be otherwise, and she was soon in bed.

She wakened to find the zeros of the bedside clock staring out of midnight. She was hoping her body hadn't adopted a routine, having been roused at the same time last night, when she heard the voice. It was so muffled that it could have been inside her skull. "It's you again, is it?" she said or thought. "What do you want this time?"

"What I always get."

"You didn't in the story, did you? Not when they found out your name."

"That old thing? Don't believe everything you read."

"Why, isn't your name Rumpelstiltskin?"

"That's just the tale they told." With a snigger not unlike the rattling of small teeth the voice said "Some of it's true. I know when I'm wanted."

"Then you ought to know you aren't."

"Your girl did when she needed a witness."

"Don't you talk about her," Doreen protested before managing to laugh. "Why am I getting worked up? You're just a dream."

"Still think you're dreaming, do you?" The voice sounded grotesquely resentful. "You'll see," it said, "there'll be another sign," and left her alone.

As far as Doreen was concerned there hadn't previously been one. She found she was trying to remember the witness who'd come forward on Anna's behalf. He'd lived below the apartment she'd shared with Denny, and he'd testified that Denny had abused both her and their child. Despite her efforts Doreen was unable to recall his name or even his appearance, except for an impression of somebody smaller than average, close to dwarfish.

The sun was up by the time Benjamin wakened her. She lay enjoying his soliloquy until she began to wonder why his words were even harder to make out than usual. He couldn't very well be muttering "I drub hens for tot forever," nor yet "Her son for furtive debtor." He sounded oddly distant, that was it—so remote that she could imagine he was being carried away from her. She lurched out of bed and almost fell headlong in her dash to the next room.

The door swung inwards just a few inches before meeting an obstruction. At least Benjamin was in the cot, and gave Doreen a sleepy smile as she edged into the room. The plastic microphone was trapped against the door, yards from where she'd placed it on the shelf and at the limit of its wire. When she picked it up she found her hand was shaking. "Who put this here, Benjamin?" she said as gently as she could.

"The man," he said with a touch of defiance. "Man with all teeth."

"What do you mean?"

"Teeths." As if to demonstrate how plural they could be, the boy opened his mouth wide and dug his fingers into the corners to tug it wider still. "Lots," he said.

Doreen wanted to think he was boasting about his own. "What did I tell you the man was?"

"Comes when I'm asleep."

She was making for the cot when a thought halted her. "Can you climb out for me?"

Benjamin stood up but gave her a reproachful look. "Like you lifting."

That needn't mean he was incapable of clambering out, but when he held up his arms Doreen lifted him. She had to restrain herself from hugging him too fiercely; that wasn't how to protect him. She stayed close to him as he stampeded through the rooms, and found she didn't want to leave him alone at all. Once she'd secured him in the high chair she performed her morning necessities as fast as she could. “What would you like to do today?” she said when she’d recovered her breath.

“Change books.”

“That’s a good idea,” Doreen said, having realised what else she could do.

The library was in the opposite direction from the railway, past the nearest of the parks, which she had to promise Benjamin they would visit later. Doreen signed a petition against closing six libraries and watched him grab books from the table in the children’s section. Once he was installed in a miniature chair she hurried to a computer. She could have thought she was growing delusional as the anniversary of her loss came closer, but she found the details for the landlord of Anna’s last address.

At home she read three of Benjamin’s library books to him before he fell asleep. She succeeded in carrying him upstairs to the cot without rousing him, and took the monitor into her room. She listened to her heartbeats, having keyed the phone number, until a woman said “Wesley Properties.”

“I’m trying to find out the name of a tenant of yours.”

“We can’t give out that information, I’m afraid.”

“I see you wouldn’t normally, but he was a witness in court for my daughter Anna Marshall. She lived in the same building. She died nearly a year ago.”

Doreen heard two more of her urgent heartbeats before the woman said “And you were asking for the gentleman’s name because...”

“I can’t remember it and I need it to help me keep custody of my grandson.”

“I’ll have to speak to somebody. Please hold on.”

Doreen’s pulse grew more strident for at least a minute before she was asked to continue holding, after which she heard murmurs that she had to reassure herself weren’t in the monitor. More than another minute was measured by her not entirely constant heartbeats, and then a new voice said “Mrs. Marshall, is it? Tony Wesley. Sorry for your loss.”

“I still have my grandson, Mr. Wesley.”

“So Jane was saying. I do remember your daughter and the sad circumstances. I’d like us to be of assistance.”

"Please do."

"As I say, I wish we could be. I can only think we've suffered a small problem with the system. We've no record of the tenancy you were inquiring about."

For several beats her heart was louder in her ears than his voice. "What do you mean, no record?"

"The period of the letting shows up blank. It was only a few weeks while the lady who lived there had moved out and the lady who has the apartment now took up residence."

"But he was there, wasn't he? You know he was there."

"Of course he was." Wesley sounded defensive, however. "You'll forgive us, but nobody here can remember his name," he said. "Not really anything about him."

Doreen felt as if Wesley had robbed her of more than words—of certainty if not worse. She mumbled thanks she didn't feel and held the empty cell in her unsteady hand. Should she phone the court? Suppose there was no official record of the witness? The possibility deterred her more than she understood. Surely she oughtn't to delay, or was her anxiousness just a symptom of age? She hadn't made the call by the time Benjamin left her in no doubt he was awake.

After lunch they walked to the park. In the deserted playground a seesaw was twitching as though someone had sneaked away at their approach. Doreen thought she closed the gate securely, but more than once it proved to be unlatched after she turned her back. A notice said dogs weren't allowed, and she had the distinct impression that one was somewhere nearby, perhaps lying on its belly and baring all its teeth. She pushed Benjamin on one swing after another and bounced him gently on the seesaw and dodged around the climbing frames to be ready if he fell. Far too often she had a sense that a toothy intruder had crawled into or otherwise invaded the playground and was waiting at her back.

When she took Benjamin home she could have fancied that a visitor was lying low somewhere in the house. Perhaps it had curled up in the oven to peer through the glass door, or was poised to poke its head out from behind a piece of furniture. She might be even more dismayed to find it sitting in a chair like an uninvited guest or, worst of all, in Benjamin's high chair. Of course it was nowhere except inside her feverishly buzzing head, but she found herself urging Hubert to call, and almost dropped the phone as she hastened to answer it. “How was your day?” she said as if this might return hers to normal.

“Oh, professional enough.”

“What have you had to put up with this time?”

“Plenty of ideas that can be put to good use.”

It was plain to Doreen that he didn’t want his real thoughts to be overheard. She felt prevented from reaching him, all the more so when he said “And how was yours?”

“Our day?” She couldn’t admit to her fears or how they’d caused her to behave. “I’m sure you can imagine it,” she said. “Library and park.”

“So long as everything’s in order,” Hubert said, and she heard how much he wanted that. “Shall I speak to the man himself?” When she brought up the loudspeaker he said “Are you looking after Granny for me?”

“Yes, Grandad,” Benjamin said so earnestly that Doreen had to suppress a nervous laugh.

“You make sure you carry on, then. Two more nights and I’ll take over.”

Once he’d gone Doreen said to Benjamin “Would you like to look after Granny a little bit more?”

“Yes,” he said more solemnly than ever.

“You can sleep in my room while Grandad’s away, then. We’ll be company if anyone wakes up.”

Was she being too protective? Sometimes she felt she had been with Anna —felt she’d left Anna vulnerable, even helped to cause her death. Nevertheless Doreen dragged the cot into the main bedroom while Benjamin gave it an energetic push. After his bath she lowered him into the cot and sat on the bed to read him Cinderella’s tale divested of any ugliness, and then she went downstairs with the monitor.

She couldn’t read. She was too aware of the silence in the monitor and throughout the house. Before long she was nervously ready for bed, but she found herself switching on her laptop. Rumpelstiltskin wasn’t the only name to figure in versions of the old tale, and she repeated all the names until they were fixed in her head. She felt close to senile for carrying on like that, but would she really rather think she'd neglected some method of protecting Benjamin? When she was certain of recalling the names she tiptoed up to bed.

Benjamin murmured and grew still as she slipped under the quilt. Doreen suspected she would be unable to sleep, but she opened her eyes on the far side of a darkness that had lasted until midnight. As she read the time she heard the voice. "You've been trying to find my name out, have you? Try all you like."

It was closer to her than the cot—perhaps as close as the inside of her head. When she blinked at the dimness, the cot was the only unfamiliar object she could see. "You'll leave us alone if I name you, will you?" she said so softly she could barely hear herself.

"Try me."

"It wouldn't be Whuppity Stoorie, would it?"

"Not in your lifetime," the voice said in a mockingly Scottish falsetto.

"Tom Tit Tot, then."

"Not on your tits and not on your tot."

"Ruidoquedito."

"Not even if you say it right." Having rejected the rest of the names as well, the voice said "Aren't you going to ask them at the court?"

Doreen was instinctively suspicious. "Why would you want me to?"

"Let them see there's no name in their records and maybe they'll have to reopen the hearing."

That was why she'd felt she oughtn't to call, Doreen realised now. "What difference would that make?"

"Maybe they'd have to tell the father and give him another chance."

"Or," Doreen said in a rage that made her reckless, "you could tell him."

"No chance of that. Nobody else can hear me." As Benjamin shifted in his cot—perhaps Doreen's outburst had roused him—the voice said "I'll leave you a sign, though. Or do you think you're doing it all?"

"I don't—" Doreen began without knowing how to continue, only to realise she was talking to herself. Listening for an intruder in the room kept her apprehensively awake, but at some point exhaustion put out her vigilance until she heard Benjamin's morning murmur. She had to waken fully to recall why it was closer than usual, though that didn't help her to grasp what he was mumbling—hardly "Observe or differ on truth" any more than "Run forever, tots, be hid" and still less "Bred introvert, ooh, suffer." He started chatting to her once he met her eyes, but she couldn't help glancing away in search of a sign. Perhaps it hadn't been left in the room, if indeed the threat wasn't just an elderly woman's fearful dream.

She could see nothing wrong downstairs either. Benjamin was eager to walk to the trains again, though he was untypically mute on the way, so that she wondered if he didn't find anything worthy of a comment. Wouldn't he have remarked on a dwarfish shape that seemed to peer over a net in a tennis court before somehow hiding behind the mesh? Perhaps the tuft like greasy unkempt hair that poked above at least one mound on the golf course was too insignificant, but how about the childish shape that dodged out of sight around the school? Doreen wouldn't have expected to glimpse an apparently unaccompanied child in more than one of the shops, but surely these impressions were symptoms of sleeplessness, like the face that glared out of the antique dealer's window before sinking into a vase. "Robber jug," Benjamin said, having found words at last, and Doreen rather wished he hadn't rediscovered those.

The red lights at the level crossing blazed in her eyes while the clangor of the bells jerked her nerves. Though the trains were almost empty, Benjamin kept repeating "He's looking." Surely he meant the toddler on the opposite side of the tracks—a real child, not one of Doreen's fancies, wheeled in a stroller by his mother. All the same, the phrase Benjamin kept parroting worked on Doreen's nerves. Each train reminded her of a strip of film being drawn through a gate, because she could easily imagine that a face was peering over the lower edge of every window—just the top of a face, but the same one. Six trains had to pass before Benjamin had had enough, by which time Doreen certainly had.

Once he was safe in his cot she lay down on the bed. She didn't mean to fall asleep, but she jolted awake to find him at the bars and more than ready for his lunch. As soon as he'd devoured it and she'd cleaned him up she drove to Jonquil's. "Don't worry and don't rush," Jonquil said as he ran to find Daisy. "You take all the time you need with his surprise."

At home Doreen set about making the cake. It wasn't quite enough to distract her from being alone in the house or from recalling how she'd felt last year. She had been on the train to London when her phone had jangled with Anna's final text:

Sorry, Mommy. You won't understand but he'll get in.

Doreen had certainly never understood how Anna could have left Benjamin with a friend and overdosed on drugs she'd obtained somewhere to supplement the ones the doctor had prescribed. Did Doreen understand at last, or was the memory undermining her mind? She left the cake in the oven and went up to lock the wardrobe; she needn't risk Benjamin finding his presents while he was sharing the room.

The stunted figure that peered out of the cot was only one of the bears. She opened the wardrobe to glance at the presents, and her hand clenched on the wood. She'd arranged the wrapped packages along the back of the wardrobe, but now they were piled in a ramshackle stack against the left-hand corner. So this was the sign, or had she done it herself in her sleep, if not in some more distracted state? Suppose instead that the doubts had been planted in her mind as a distraction? She ducked into the wardrobe to line up the presents and made sure the door was locked. She'd begun to think there was something else she needed to recognise.

Though she took her time icing the cake, the middle of the big blue digit on the yellow sugar carapace betrayed an inadvertent shiver. The day was growing dark when she hurried to the car, so that she didn't immediately notice the small figure in the child's seat. It was all the more unobtrusive for the absence of a head. It was a toy, either a plastic baby or a toddler, and its head had been chewed off; the tooth marks were still glistening. The door was unlocked; perhaps Doreen had been so distracted she'd left it that way. She flung the doll into the rubbish bin on her drive, and once she was able to control her hands she started the car.

Jonquil met her with a momentary frown. "Has everything been all right?" Doreen blurted.

"We've all been having fun. Maybe some of us a bit more than others. He's got a funny notion of hide-and-seek, hasn't he?"

"How funny?" Doreen said without expecting any mirth.

“He kept telling Daisy somebody was doing it. She wasn’t too fond, to tell you the truth.”

“You mustn’t upset Daisy if you want her for your friend.” Doreen waited until Benjamin was in the child seat, which she’d vigorously wiped, before she added “Who was hiding, Benjamin?”

“Mr. Toothy.”

Doreen did her best to withhold a shiver. “Is that his name?”

“I call him it.”

She oughtn’t to have bothered asking. It was pointless to expect Benjamin to give her the real name, supposing one even existed—and then, with a jerk of her whole body that made her stall the engine, she knew what she’d been struggling to realise. “Benjamin,” she said, “what are those things you’ve been saying when you wake up?”

“Can’t remember.” Somewhat indignantly he said “Asleep.”

“I mean,” Doreen said, praying that she would be able to bring them to mind, “where did you hear them?”

“Don’t know. Asleep.”

She was almost sure, and she sped the car home. Nobody was waiting in the high chair, and even Benjamin’s toys seemed not to have been touched. She played with him and watched him dine and cleared up the remains while her head swarmed with words that tumbled over one another to adopt new shapes. They hadn’t revealed anything she would call a secret by the time Hubert phoned. “What are you doing with yourself tonight?” he said.

“Just thinking.”

“Try not to miss anyone too much, yes? I’ll be with you tomorrow as soon as I can.”

“What will you be doing in the meantime?”

“I may take the chance to relax.” He sounded apologetic. “I’ll see to it you can soon,” he said, and when she switched on the loudspeaker: “You take special care of our favourite lady till I’m home, Benjamin.”

There was no sign of an intruder in the bathroom, and the wardrobe was still locked. Doreen’s mind was chattering with words and unmanageable fragments of words, and she read Benjamin the shortest story in the book, about the emperor who didn't know he was exposed. He looked solemn when she'd finished, even while she gave him a good night kiss and another. As she watched him fall reluctantly asleep she thought of staying upstairs—and then she realised how the clamor in her brain had prevented her from thinking. She fetched the monitor and hurried down to the computer.

Had her inspiration given her false hope? The websites that created anagrams didn't deal with groups of words as long as the ones she was desperate to reshape. Eventually she found a site that did, and typed in one of the sets of words she remembered overhearing. In a few seconds she was shown a rearrangement that made her feel both sickened and triumphant. "That's it," she whispered. "There's still magic somewhere." She tried some of the other bunches of words to be certain, and then she got ready for bed.

She didn't expect to sleep, but in case she did she set the alarm and hid the clock under her pillow. She was wakened by activity that felt as if someone was groping for her face. It was the vibration of the alarm. As she fumbled to turn it off a voice came out of the dark. "Are you ready for me?"

She didn't answer until she had quelled the alarm. "Who are you talking to?"

"Who else but the woman that thinks she knows."

"It could be Benjamin, couldn't it? When you said nobody else could hear, you didn't mean only I could."

"Clever woman. You all think you are."

"It's you that thinks he is," Doreen retorted so fiercely she almost forgot to keep her voice down. "You're worse than a child. You thought you could tease Benjamin—you've got so much contempt for us—but you didn't think he could let me know even if he didn't realise."

"Do you even know what you're talking about? Just listen to yourself. Your mind's gone, Doreen."

"Not while I know my own name. Shall I tell you why nobody knows yours?"

"Amaze me. I'm in no hurry now he's mine."

"Because you haven't got one."

She heard a shrill giggle mixed with a grinding of teeth. “Then you can’t tell me and save him.”

“I can tell you what you’re called, though.”

“I’m waiting. I’m all ears except for a mouth.”

“Is it hurt for reversion of debt?”

“That’s not even a name,” the voice said, sounding as sharp as bared teeth.

“I said you’ve never had one. Do they call you furtive horror? Often beds?”

“You’re raving, woman. You’re as mad as your daughter.”

“Because you and Denny made her.” Doreen’s grief came close to robbing her of control, but it mustn’t while she was protecting Benjamin. “Trove of birth ensured for,” she murmured.

“Not even a sentence,” the voice scoffed, but it was growing ragged. “I’ve had enough of you. It’s time.”

“Yes,” Doreen said. “It’s my time and my family’s.” She was tired of taunting him with words the computer had shown her. “They call you devourer of the firstborn,” she said.

A shape reared up beside the cot, howling like a beast of prey. While it wasn’t much taller than Benjamin, it was as squat as a toad. In the dimness she couldn’t distinguish much more, especially about its face, perhaps because it had so little of one. She saw a gaping mouth and the glimmer of far too many teeth, and then the jaws yawned more enormously still. The head split wide as though it was being engulfed by the mouth, and another convulsive gulp made short work of the body. The howl was cut off as though it had imploded, and Benjamin wakened with a cry. As he started whimpering Doreen hurried across the deserted room to hug him. “Happy birthday, Benjamin,” she said.

The Pretence

First published as the novella The Pretence, November 2013

As the taxi drew up outside the terminal the driver said "What time's your flight?"

"In about an hour."

"Where are you flying?"

"To the mainland. Just to Liverpool."

"You'll be home before tomorrow, then."

"I expect so." Though he didn't see why this should concern her, Slater said "I'm sure I shall."

An April breeze like a reminiscence of a summer holiday set palm leaves chattering above him while he paid the fare. As he made for the terminal the glass doors slipped apart, letting out a young woman so wide-eyed that her stare seemed to render her pale face even thinner. She thrust a glossy brochure at him, and he took it for a special offer until he glanced at it, having trundled his suitcase into the departure hall. The cover of the pamphlet showed a clock without hands and urged SEE YOUR TIME in type as thick as blackened matchsticks. It could almost have been directing his attention to the matrix sign that showed his flight was delayed. He wouldn't be home by midnight after all; he mightn't even be on land.

Having failed to locate a handy bin, Slater crumpled the pamphlet in his fist as he led his luggage to the security gates. On the far side of the electronic barrier he retrieved his watch and cash and mobile phone from the tray that emerged from the scanner like a car at the end of a fairground ride. He was putting on his shoes when the guard beside the conveyor belt beckoned to him. "Excuse me, sir, we don't need that."

She meant the brochure he'd left in the tray. "Can you bin it for me?"

"I can't." Apparently he'd ceased to be a sir. "Please take it," she said.

It was her reproachful look that made him blurt "You're a Finalist, are you?"

"We aren't permitted to discuss our faith, sir." Though she'd reverted to professionalism, her eyes hadn't quite caught up, and she leaned across the dormant belt to murmur "If I were you I'd read what you have there."

He already knew what they believed—he imagined nobody could avoid knowing—and he tramped away so fast that his shoelaces lashed the tiled floor. He sat down to tie them before wadding the brochure to lob it into the nearest bin. As he made for the bar through the duty-free court, sunglasses gave him a host of black looks while a multitude of watches showed him the time, the time, the time. Nobody was seated at the bar itself, though a few of the tables were occupied. Slater perched on a stool at the bar and ordered a glass of merlot. "A large one," he said.

The barman was a broad slow fellow with a tentatively amused expression. As he brought Slater the glass he said "Another one held up."

"Me, you mean." The barman could have been referring to the plane, but when he didn't admit to it Slater said "No point in fussing over it. I'll be home when I am."

"You're not holding your breath for the end of the world, then."

"I can't believe anybody is. It's not as if this is the first time that was supposed to happen. It's been meant to end a dozen times in this century alone."

"Maybe it did."

Presumably this was the style of joke the barman had been waiting to deliver. "I don't know why so many people have got it into their heads this time," Slater complained. "You'd think by now they would know better."

"If you ask me it's all the computers. They're meant to be giving us more of a mind but it's got stuff like that in it."

"The internet, you're saying. It contains everything, that's the problem."

"So none of us know what the world's like any more."

"I shouldn't think it's quite as bad as that. My mother has no time for computers but she knows what the Finalists are saying will happen."

"It's like I say, they get in everybody's head."

"She's why I was over here. She and her friends have been working themselves up so much that she had an attack."

"Better now, is she?"

"She is since I got her to talk about it. I did think the care home staff might have."

"I couldn't put my folks in one of those places."

"My parents came to live on the island," Slater said with some resentment, "and that's where she says she wants to stay."

"What we say isn't always what we think. Won't she be fretting about not seeing you tomorrow?"

"I'd already booked the flight. I could have stayed longer with her if I'd known it was going to be late."

"Thought you weren't bothered about that," the barman said as if he'd been presented with a reason for amusement. "Well, it'll all be over by tomorrow."

Slater saw people at the tables lift their heads as if they'd sensed danger. He took hold of his glass, only to find he'd drained it while talking. "Same again," he said. "I'll just find something to read."

As he made for the bookshop, such as it was—the first items he saw in it were earplugs and blindfolds—he took out his mobile and sent Melanie a message. Plane late. Don't know how long. He leafed through the newspapers, which felt oddly out of date, containing not a single reference to the Finalists and their dogged prophecy, though of course that was hardly news any more, if it ever had been. Too many of the paperbacks on display seemed designed to resemble one another—he could almost have taken them for the products of a single mind—and in any case he didn't expect to have time to finish or even get far into one. He bought a music magazine that reviewed new releases, and was returning to the bar when his mobile emitted its version of Beethoven's pastoral hymn. "Hold on," he told Melanie and paid the barman before carrying his glass to a table. "Here I am."

"Where's here, Paul?"

"Still at the airport. On the island, I mean."

"Oh dear. Well, it can't be helped." She let out a breath like a delicate sniff in reverse and said "What's the situation, do we know?"

"Do we know what the delay is?" Slater called to the barman.

"The way I heard it, some of the crew didn't show up for work."

"Let's hope they're ill, then," Melanie said.

This was a decidedly untypical wish, and then Slater understood. "Rather than nervous of flying tonight, you mean."

"So long as there's someone who isn't."

"Of course I'm not," Slater said before he grasped that she wasn't referring to him. As he looked away from a woman who was staring reproachfully at him he felt prompted to ask "How are Tom and Amy?"

"Asleep, I hope."

"You may as well be too. That's to say don't wait till I come home."

"You know I'll be waiting even if I'm asleep." As if she hadn't changed the subject Melanie said "How's Eileen now?"

"I think I've put her right. I just wonder if any of the staff at the home believe that rubbish. Well, they won't for much longer."

"That'll be strange for them," Melanie said. "See you however late you are, then."

"Absolutely, yes. See you then."

He would have added some endearments if he hadn't felt overheard in the bar. He ended the call and was pocketing the mobile when a voice behind him said "Anybody here think we're all stopping at midnight?"

The speaker—a small man who appeared to have concentrated most of his bulk in his stomach—was at a table by himself. A scowl clenched his mottled reddish face, which was decorated with a fading false moustache, a strip of foam from his latest pint of beer. "Don't be shy if you're one of that lot," he urged so vigorously that he left some consonants behind.

Slater supposed his phone call had provoked the outburst. He turned away as other customers lowered their heads or resumed their conversations, but the man wasn't so easily ignored. "Don't any of us read the Bible? Me neither, but they've told us what they say it says."

A sinking movement drew Slater's attention to the window, but it was the reflection of the man's tankard, not a plane. "The Koran too," the man said less distinctly, "and the rest of them fairy tales. Shows how much crap they are when that's all they can agree about."

Was everyone as embarrassed as Slater? The lack of a response only antagonised the man. "Who's keeping quiet?" he more or less pronounced. "Don't tell me there's none of you here. My lad's computer says you're everywhere."

Slater felt the man's gaze on the nape of his neck, though he couldn't tell from the reflection where the fellow was looking. Perhaps the sensation simply proved how much that you took for the external world was happening inside you. It dissipated as the man said "Come to think, they won't be travelling tonight. They're all praying the rest of us are wrong, I shouldn't wonder."

As the man's reflection slumped back in its chair Slater finished his drink. He oughtn't to have any more when he didn't know how soon he might be driving. He leafed through the magazine, but the names of favourite composers and their works didn't sound many notes in his head. He shut his eyes to rest them for a moment—at least, that was all he intended, but he was wakened by the man behind him. "It's here."

A plane was coasting past the window, with Slater's heartbeat for its soundtrack. It glided out of sight, and he felt as if he were a member of a chorus all holding their breaths. Certainly he wasn't alone in breathing aloud when a voice from above invited passengers for John Lennon to the gate. Several people raised a feeble if not ironic cheer, and as the barman called "Safe home" Slater found himself humming a snatch of Imagine as a reminiscence of the singer who'd lent the Liverpool airport his name.

While the bar and then the passage to the gate resounded with a prolonged drumroll of luggage, the elevated voice advised passengers to have their boarding cards and passports ready. No doubt the airline was attempting to make up for the delay, since a uniformed woman had already opened the exit to the airfield. "Come straight to me," she said.

She barely glanced at Slater's documents before she scanned his boarding card. A boxy corridor reverberated with his luggage and led him out beneath a black sky, in which he imagined more stars were visible than he had time to glimpse. At the top of the steps to the plane a woman in a larger version of the airline uniform looked impatient for the passengers to cross the tarmac. A man in a suit that identified him as a pilot ushered Slater to a seat halfway down the aisle, not the place he'd been assigned. "There's just a few of you tonight," the pilot said. "We're seating you for balance."

"Thanks for taking the trouble for us."

"Someone had to. The job's the job."

Slater hoisted his suitcase into the overhead locker and was fastening his safety belt as the pilot found a seat for the last passenger to board, the small big-bellied fellow. The larger stewardess oversaw the man's audibly peevish struggle with his seatbelt while the pilot shut himself in the cockpit, and then there was silence apart from a murmur of music that sounded reluctant to take much shape or to make clear which if any instruments were involved. The steps hacked away from the plane as the pilot's voice set about directing the cabin crew. As soon as the plane began to taxi he apologised for the delay, and then a recorded message prompted the cabin crew to perform their safety mime, which was so familiar that Slater could easily have dreamed it. The small man gave it a loose round of applause while the plane gathered speed, and the tarmac fell away as the plane sailed up into a larger darkness. The wing tilted as if the earth were calling it back, and Slater watched a few illuminated roads dwindle to filaments before the island drifted down the inclined sea into the dark.

He could have been gesturing at the night as he flourished his wrist-watch. It would be midnight in not much over a quarter of an hour. Waiting for the slimmer stewardess to wheel a trolley down the aisle used up several minutes, and obtaining a bottle of water took one more. He sucked at the plastic nipple and then picked up his magazine, but leafing through it felt like trying to recapture information. Did he need to stay awake? Wouldn't it be wiser to catch a little sleep before he had to drive? He closed his eyes and felt the magazine sliding out of his hands until he fumbled it onto the seat beside him. His head drooped and jerked up and sank again, and the low unchanging chord of the engines seemed to expand to meet him. Then they cut out, or rather his consciousness did, and he knew nothing until he came back to himself with a violent lurch.

It felt worse than any panic he'd experienced in his life—worse than the endless minutes he'd once spent searching for baby Tom and lost toddler Amy in the retail park where he worked. He felt as though his innards had dropped out of him, and he was just a shell that ached with emptiness. He wasn't even seated any longer; he'd plummeted into the dark so violently that it had snatched away his vision along with his ability to breathe. He was utterly alone in the midst of a vast silence unrelieved by so much as a heartbeat. He couldn't have said whether it lasted for an instant or longer than he had the means to comprehend before he heard a voice. "Just someone expected word you meant," it said.

Or was it saying that he'd sent someone a worm or that they expected a firmament? He had to struggle to grasp who was speaking, and then he managed to deduce that the pilot was apologising for some unexpected turbulence. As he risked opening his eyes his sight returned, unless the uncontrollable lurch of the aircraft had put out the lights in the cabin at the moment he'd jerked awake. How could the voice be declaring "Police state sees to damned"? No, it was telling the passengers "Please stay seated and keep your belts fastened. Justify caution. No cause for alarm."

The last words let Slater understand that the pilot had said it was just a precaution. He could have thought the turbulence had dislodged his perceptions, which might explain why he felt so alone in the cabin. The lights were dimmer than he remembered, and they appeared to be showing him row after row of empty seats. He was absurdly grateful to hear a blurred voice. "Christ, give us a drink."

The tops of heads rose above half a dozen seats, and Slater glanced around to see faces leaning into the aisle like cards displayed by a cagey player. The stewardess who'd been at the boarding gate appeared from behind a curtain near the cockpit to murmur "We're only serving water now, sir, and could you please watch your language."

"Holy water, is it? We'll be needing more than that if you keep on chucking us about."

"We've started our dissent," Slater heard her say until he thought about it. A glance at his watch showed him that the time was several minutes after midnight. He'd no idea how much time had passed since the plane had encountered the turbulence, and there was certainly no reason to ask. All that mattered was that they would be landing soon, and he strained his eyes at the blackness that appeared to have become the substance of the window. At first he wasn't sure that he was seeing tiny lights lying too low for stars, and then the pattern like a distant constellation resolved itself into a set of grids. They were marking airstrips, and he didn't need the announcement that the plane was about to land.

Perhaps the pilot was resolved to make up for the turbulence, since they touched down as if the plane weighed nothing to speak of. It came to a virtually imperceptible halt while noises almost too undefined to resemble music hovered in the cabin, and then a staircase lumbered out of the dark. The more substantial of the stewardesses opened the door to it, and her colleague waited on the tarmac to point the passengers towards the terminal. Slater made for the entrance so fast he hadn't time to notice any stars in the black sky, but when he stepped into the extensive bare white room he had to join a queue for the solitary operating immigration booth.

He'd never seen anyone so apparently determined not just to do but to look like their job. The officer's long face was an all-purpose warning, and jowls resembling a bloodhound's made it even more morose. He questioned a woman at length before sending her on her way and beckoning the next passenger forward. He was still quizzing her when the man with the prominent stomach began to complain. "What's the holdup this time? Some of us want to get home."

The immigration officer sent him an ominous look that only provoked him to raise his voice. "We're all Brits here, aren't we? Don't treat us like we've landed somewhere else."

Before he'd finished speaking two men in identical sombre suits appeared from behind a partition beyond the booths and converged on the protester. "Please come with us," one said Slater couldn't tell which.

"That's more like. You don't get anywhere if you don't kick up a row."

One official led the way between two empty booths while the other followed close behind the passenger. When they reached the partition the man turned to the queue as if his belly was swinging him around. "You want to kick up as well," he told them. "Hang on, where are you taking—

As his escorts ushered him behind the partition, each with a hand on one of his arms, his voice ceased. The only sounds were at the booth. At last the officer handed back the woman's passport and beckoned Slater with a gesture reminiscent of a fighter summoning an opponent. Slater tried offering a generalised smile along with his passport, but the overture might as well have been invisible. "Name?" the officer said.

"Paul Slater. Derek Paul, if you want the whole thing."

"Which are you?"

"I was born Derek Paul. Not born it, obviously, but that's what they called me when they did. I left Derek behind a long time ago."

"You've changed your name."

"Not officially, no. It's still in there if you look."

The officer opened the passport at the identification page and glanced away at last from Slater's face. "Date of birth."

'Just had my birthday last week. Twenty-third of April." Since this apparently wasn't enough Slater added "Seventy-six."

"Age."

For a moment Slater didn't know, or at least had to remember the date. His answer only made way for another toneless question. "Place of birth."

"Right here in Liverpool."

"Citizenship."

"British." With a surge of the irritation that had seized the protester in the queue Slater said "Can't you tell?"

"Date of expiry."

"Not for a long time yet, I hope." This went unappreciated too. "The passport, you mean," he said. "I'm not really sure without looking. Since when were we expected to be?"

If there was any answer in the unwavering pale gaze, it was just an admonition. "Wait a minute," Slater said with no idea of what he was preventing. "It's, don't tell me, no, I see you wouldn't. It's, hold on now, yes, it's next, next March."

The man shut the passport without another glance. "You are advised to leave sufficient time for the renewal."

As Slater took hold of the passport he said "Do you mind if I ask what you're looking for?"

"Why should you want to know that?"

"I don't suppose I need to. In fact I'm sure I don't." Slater was about to risk tugging at the passport—the man's grasp felt like a confirmation of the warning in his eyes—when he found he was alone in holding it. "Thank you for," he said and couldn't leave the word dangling. "Thank you for your time."

He expected to find a door behind the partition on the far side of the booths, but there was just a blank wall. The partition must cut off any sounds; he couldn't even hear the interrogation that would be following his. The arrivals hall was deserted, and the shops were blanked out by metal shutters. As he hurried to the exit the high roof seemed to shrink his footsteps until they were no more substantial than their echoes. His reflection was growing on the glass doors when they parted with a gasp like the last of a breath.

Above the lamps that glared down on the car park the sky could almost have been a roof they were set in. No doubt they were helping to render it so black. The multitude of cars appeared to be forgetting their own colours, and if he hadn't memorised the location of the Astra—section E for Eroica and for the key of the symphony as well, third row like the number of the symphony—he might have panicked. He had to rouse it with the key fob before he was sure that the grey car was his gold one. He rested a hand on its hollow metal pate while he gazed at the sky until he succeeded in conjuring forth a star attended by three other intermittently visible gleams. He found them oddly reassuring, and so were the headlamps once he switched them on, and the dashboard lights that Tom and Amy used to pretend were the lights on the control panel in a cockpit. Some if not all of this felt like a promise of the lights of home.

The barrier raised its arm to point at the sky. Along the empty four-lane road that led away from the airport, the branches of thin trees netted scraps of the blackness. Single-storey blocks of grey corrugated metal flanked the road, and Slater hadn't previously realised how little the route offered for the mind to grasp. Miles later he came to the first houses, in which every window was as black as the sky. Beyond the houses ranks of headstones stretched away on both sides of the road into the dark, and he couldn't recall ever having taken so long to leave the cemetery behind. At last the road widened, and soon the grassy strip between the pairs of deserted lanes was as broad as a road itself. The elongated grove that stood on it, and the fields that kept interrupting the parade of unlit houses, had begun to feel as if the land was reminiscing about itself. No doubt the night was giving Slater thoughts like these, along with a sense of isolation.

As he turned along St Peter Street he couldn't immediately see the house; the trees standing in square plots on the pavements blocked his view. He was nearly home by the time he saw that the windows were full of the sky, like mirrors with nothing to show. He parked beside Melanie's Viva on the drive and carried his suitcase to the front door rather than risk disturbing anyone with the sound of the wheels. He was finding his keys when the four panes in the door lit up as though he'd triggered an alarm.

He saw Melanie's silhouette descend into the hall with a flickering movement reminiscent of an old film. Her shape was snagging on the frosted panes, which made her look intermittently atomised. She must mean not to waken the children, since he couldn't hear her footsteps. The glass tried to recompose her features as she opened the door, and then her large generous face seemed to brighten the night with a smile. She stood on the threshold and hugged him with all her strength, whispering "Is it really you at last, Paul?"

"I can't imagine who else it's likely to be," Slater murmured. She was in just her dressing-gown, which fluttered as a chill wind reminded him of the hour. "Let's get you inside," he said. "I don't want to lose you, do I?"

She tilted her head back without letting go of him, and her glossy black hair trailed over her shoulders as her oval brown eyes seemed to deepen with a question. "How are you going to do that?"

"I'm saying I'm not. You aren't dressed for out here, that's all."

She shook her head, presumably at herself, as they retreated into the hall, and he was managing to shut the door without a sound when Amy called "Is that dad?"

"Is it, mummy?" Tom contributed at once.

As he appeared at the top of the stairs Amy joined him. They looked like sleepy versions of their images that lined the hall and climbed beside the stairs, framed photographs of the family holidaying in half a dozen European countries. Yet again Slater found himself thinking how his and Melanie's features had been displaced: the nine-year-old boy made his mother's face male with hair cropped almost as short as he would like, while Amy's extra pair of years hadn't altered her resemblance to her father —blue eyes set wide, rounded face except for the prominent chin, small mouth. "Now you've seen him you can both go back to sleep," Melanie said. "You've school and rehearsals as well."

"Can't we stay up? It's nearly time to go."

"Nowhere near, Tom," Slater said before he saw what time the pincers of the hour and minute hands were closing on. "We aren't even close to four,"

he said.

"Can't we wait anyway? I don't feel like going to sleep."

"And I don't," his sister declared.

"There's nothing to keep you awake, is there? I'm sorry if I did, but it's not my fault I was held up. It's your last rehearsal today and we want to be proud of you both. I'm sure you want that as well."

"You know we both are," Melanie said.

"That's right," Slater said, which seemed inadequate. "Just remember you two and your mother are all I need in my life. You can think about that while you go to sleep."

As he hefted the suitcase Melanie switched out the hall light, and he saw the children's eyes grow dark. When Tom lingered beside the highest photograph Slater felt he had to ask "What were you saying you wanted to wait for?"

"The sun." With some defiance the boy said "It won't be today till it comes up."

"You mean it won't stop being yesterday," Amy said.

While Slater thought she was doing her best to scoff, he was uncertain whether she secretly shared the idea. "Come on, you two," he said. "Don't tell me you're still bothered by that nonsense. I didn't think you ever were."

Was that too rough? They seemed less than reassured. "If you were worried because I wasn't here when—

"Can we leave it, Paul? This isn't the time for it, especially if you want anyone to sleep."

"All I'm saying," Slater said, "is we're all here and it's the day after, and that shows there was no reason to worry in the first place."

"Well, you've said it now, and it's time everyone was in bed."

When the children headed for their rooms as if they were competing to mime reluctance Slater said "If the sun doesn't wake you we'll tell you when it's here."

He followed Melanie into their bedroom to leave his suitcase by the bed, and felt her watching him all the way out of the room. In the bathroom the electronic buzz of the toothbrush filled his skull while his reflection grimaced at him. He had the odd notion that the sight and its monotonous two-note chord—the high whine of the motor, the low drone of bristles against teeth—had a message for him, but he was too aware of the series of meaningless expressions his mouth was adopting. He used the toilet and found his face with soap and water and a towel, and then he hurried to the bedroom.

Melanie lay facing the door, and stretched a hand across the white cloudscape of the quilt to him. As soon as he'd eased the door shut she murmured "You were a long time."

"I didn't think I was." In fact he couldn't tell, and so he said "I didn't mean to be."

"Then don't be any longer."

She turned on her back to watch him undress and leave his clothes on the chair beside the window, beyond which the trees were as still as the streetlamps that drained them of colour. When he joined her beneath the quilt she gave him a soft lingering kiss and captured his hand to draw his arm around her as she nestled her back against him. As he reached for the light-cord she intertwined their fingers, the way she did on planes when they were taking off or about to land. He could almost have fancied that she was bracing herself, which made him feel oddly apprehensive. He yanked at the cord, and as the dark fell on them she clasped his hand tighter. "You aren't going away again, are you?"

"Not that I'm aware of." When her grasp didn't relax he said "No reason to think I am."

"I wish it were the weekend."

"The concert will be done and we can all unwind, you mean."

"Don't give me any more to fret about, Paul. I meant we'll be together, the four of us."

This so plainly confirmed how he'd suspected she was feeling that he said under his breath "That rubbish about yesterday got to you, didn't it."

He'd meant to speak too low for Melanie to hear, but she said "It was being on my own that did."

"You aren't now, so it can stop." He wasn't going to apologise for having had to reassure his mother, even though Melanie was gripping his hand as if to keep him there. "I wonder what they can be thinking now," he said, "the Finalists."

"I'd rather not."

"Maybe it's better to think than feel sometimes," Slater retorted, but with less than a breath on her neck. "Then don't," he said more audibly. "Just sleep."

Since she was unwilling to release his hand, he used hers as well to rub her stomach. She'd liked him to stroke it when she was pregnant, and this was still a way of bringing her some calm. She thought it was related to meditation—the diaphragm was—but it felt as though he was moulding her to him as she settled more closely against him. Soon he couldn't distinguish her body or her breathing from his own, presumably because he'd gone to sleep.

The inclination of the seat helped. It had reclined all the way to horizontal. His breaths had grown so even that they were indistinguishable from the unwavering note of the Jetstream, which sounded like the voice of the featureless dark outside the window. Some detail seemed capable of troubling him, and eventually he remembered that he'd dumped his luggage in the aisle beside him rather than stowing it overhead. Surely it wasn't worth waking up for when there appeared to be no cabin crew to stumble over it, but he was jerked awake by an urgent bleeping and a voice that identified it as an alarm.

Why was she saying there was no cause for it when it was so nervously insistent? He felt as if the violent jolt had dislocated his ability to grasp language—as if he'd left too much of his intelligence behind in the dream. The incessant repetition of the note seemed capable of driving every other sense out of his mind, and he had no idea how long he took to grow aware that Melanie was still clasping his hand. It allowed him to recognise that he'd heard her saying "Now there's the alarm."

How could it still be dark at this hour? If it wasn't, where had his sight gone? Perhaps some of his perceptions needed to catch up with him, but he had to grip Melanie's hand more fiercely than she was holding his before he felt able to risk opening his eyes. She was lying on her back, waiting to meet his gaze. "What were you thinking?" she said.

It might have been a gentle accusation, and he wasn't going to admit that he'd been unaware of her. "I can't with this," he said and stretched out his hand to shut off the racket, which had begun to put him in mind of a very young child at a keyboard. The abrupt hush let him notice how flat the light appeared to be, but he managed to recall his promise. "I'll tell them the sun's up."

"We both will."

Why might he have a problem in reaching the door? Because he could fall over his suitcase, of course, which was where he remembered leaving it. On the door his and Melanie's dressing-gowns looked shrunken by emptiness, or at least they would if he let them. He gave Melanie a vigorous hug once he'd shoved his fists through the synthetic silk sleeves and tied the slippery cord. As she crossed the landing to waken Amy he made for Tom's room.

The curtains framed a sky so featurelessly white that it could have been last night's in negative. Its muffled pallid light showed him the familiar chaos of the boy's room, clothes and books and computer games strewn on and around the desk overlooked by football posters. While the bed was thoroughly rumpled, it was unoccupied. Not seeing Tom filled him with a panic that he heard in Melanie's voice as well. "Amy?" she was pleading.

Slater twisted around to see that the girl's bedroom was deserted too. As his mind seized on the extravagant disorder she'd left behind and posters for pop stars stared back at him, he might have been making a desperate bid to cling to some sense of his daughter. She and her brother amounted to far more than that, and as Slater told himself so he heard Amy call "We're here."

"We've had our breakfast," Tom shouted.

"You can't have had much," their mother said.

There was certainly no smell of breakfast, which might have wakened Slater. "Who's going in the bathroom?" Melanie asked him.

"Why don't we both?"

They hadn't often shared it since Amy was born, but he wondered if he'd been alone in wanting to do so now. "Wash up if you've finished," Melanie called down the stairs, "and then these rooms are overdue for tidying if you're ready for school."

How anxious was she to restore a domestic routine? Sharing the bathroom wasn't quite as Slater thought it used to be. Although they kept touching and following that with a smile, Melanie seemed distracted by listening for the children, wherever they were in the house. Slater felt compelled to strain his ears and saw her relax when they were rewarded with domestic sounds offstage. As he and Melanie returned to the bedroom Amy called "Hurry down, we want you."

"We're making you toast," Tom shouted.

Now that he'd said it Slater could smell it. No doubt the steam that had turned the bathroom mirror as blank as the sky had prevented him. "Save your voices. Remember the concert," he told the children.

Melanie was straightening hastily up from the dressing-table mirror. She was in one of her business outfits—metallic grey suit, polo-necked blouse. He'd never known her to dress so fast, which seemed to urge him to be at least as quick, especially since she lingered at the top of the stairs while he did his best. She kept him in sight but started downstairs before he emerged from the room. "Here come your customers," she called.

Amy was wielding tongs to pass Tom slices out of the toaster. He was diligently buttering them—at least, applying a synthetic substitute—all the way to every corner, as if they were outlines he had to fill in. He and his sister were wearing their St Dunstan's uniforms, the green of which had been putting Slater in mind of spring for weeks. He should have known the children would have made coffee too, and the white mugs on the equally colourless table were exuding steam like their own substance rendered vague. He sat opposite Melanie and heard her crunch a piece of toast, delicately echoing the sound inside his head. "Compliments to the kitchen," he said once his speech was clear.

"And the people in it," Melanie said as if this needed establishing. "Are you two ready to go when we've finished?"

Slater glanced at the clock on the cooker to see the matchstick puzzle of the digits adopt a new shape. "I'll run them to school," he said.

"We both can."

Surely Melanie's first job of the day wouldn't take her in that direction, and he thought of reminding her until he glimpsed determination in her eyes. If she had to deal with some anxiety, he was sure that she was strong enough to do so by herself—she was clearly not inviting discussion, especially in front of the children—and so he said "Who's travelling with whom?"

"I will with mummy," Amy said at once.

"The men will lead the trek, shall we?" This aimed to be more of a joke than it seemed to end up, and he confined himself to the sounds inside his head until he and Melanie had cleared their plates. "Let's see what the day has in store," he said.

It seemed to have little enough for the moment. All along the street the trees were as motionless as the pallid slab of the sky, which turned the windows of the houses into blank rectangles that might almost have been waiting to be written on. Presumably the neighbours who went to work had already gone or were yet to emerge. The cars yipped like electronic puppies at each other, and as the children climbed in Tom called to his sister "See you at school."

His voice sounded not just dwarfed by the silence but muffled, as if the sky had shut it in. The doors shut with four hollow thuds, and Slater swung the Astra out of the drive. Beyond St Peter Street the houses grew taller while the spaces between them demonstrated how low the sky had grown. Soon a park seemed to bring it even closer, and Slater saw how bare the trees still were, as if the leaves had found too little light to coax them forth. As he glanced in the mirror to remind himself where Melanie and Amy were, Tom said "Did you miss the earthquake, dad?"

Was this another reason for Slater's mother to be worried? It reminded him that he had to call her. "On the island, do you mean?" he said. "When did that happen?"

"It woke me up when we were waiting for you to come home. Everything was shaking. Me as well."

"I'm sorry I wasn't there." Slater wasn't sure if he was apologising or just regretted not having shared the experience. "Did anything break?"

"I don't know." The idea seemed to take the boy unawares. "I didn't see."

"Then I expect it didn't. I haven't noticed anything," Slater said, only to wonder if he should. "Did Amy or your mother?"

"It wasn't just me. It was everything."

Slater had to work out the question Tom thought he'd asked. If the rest of the family had been unaware of any tremor, perhaps the boy had dreamed it but was determined not to think so. The road had brought them to an even wider one that was flanked and divided by trees, and it led to a profusion of green—not leaves but the uniforms of children trooping into St Dunstan's. Slater watched Tom and Amy until they were lost in the uniformed crowd, and then he noticed Melanie waving at him in the mirror—how insistently before he'd realised, he couldn't say. "Stay in touch," she mouthed.

As he pulled away from the kerb she followed him. He was wondering how far she meant to accompany him—as he recalled, her first job was downtown—when she found a gap in the tree-lined strip and turned away out of the mirror. His own route took him back towards the cemetery—almost home—but he stopped short of it and took out his mobile. After several measured trills of a bell that sounded more than usually artificial, a woman's voice said "Aurora House. Constance speaking."

"How are you?" He meant this as a greeting more than a question but couldn't tell if it was taken as either. "Is Mrs Slater available?" he said.

"Available."

"To speak to. This is her son."

"Son."

Until Constance had identified herself he could have thought she was a recorded message, and she still didn't sound much more vital. "Her son Paul, yes," he said. "She wanted me to call. I was there just yesterday but it seems longer."

"A lifetime."

So she was capable of finding words of her own, though he didn't especially care for the odd choice of phrase. Might she have been a Finalist? He didn't see how they could still cling to their faith, and yet he didn't like to think that any of them were looking after his mother. "So could I have a word?" he said.

"Mrs Slater."

"Yes, Mrs Slater. Eileen Slater, yes."

He thought his impatience had driven the woman away until he wondered if she had been addressing his mother, not parroting him yet again. He didn't know how long the silence, which felt like the aural equivalent of the sky, gave no hint of activity before he heard his mother's voice. "Is that Derek?"

It sounded vague and so, he was unhappy to recognise, did she. Both his parents had called him Derek when he was too young to have much of a sense of himself, but once he'd seen he had a choice he'd settled on his present name. "It's Paul," he said.

"Paul." He could have thought she'd picked up a trait from Constance, especially when site repeated "Paul." At least this seemed to have helped define her voice as she said "Are you there at last?"

"I have been for a while. I didn't call in case you were asleep."

"I was."

"Then I'm sorry. Constance should have said and I'd have called back."

"Constance."' This earned no response that he could hear. "I didn't mean now," his mother said. "I was asleep when, you know."

With a sense of being made to join in the game of echoes Slater said "When..."

"When nothing happened."

Somehow this wasn't as reassuring as it ought to be, but he said "That's fine then, isn't it?"

"It woke me up. I didn't know where I was."

He was close to asking what had wakened her, and then he was as far away from it as possible. "So long as you do now," he said.

"I'm better for hearing from you, Derek."

He kept his protest to himself and found something else to say. "Is everyone else all right?"

"Everyone."

Surely he could take that for a yes. "And they're looking after you," he said. "The staff."

"Constance."

Was this addressed to the woman? Neither its tone nor anything it brought about was telling. He couldn't recall meeting Constance; at best he had a generalised impression of people in uniform. "Her and the rest," he said.

"That's what I need." Perhaps this was a play on words, unless his meaning hadn't immediately reached her, because she added "They're not the same as you, Derek."

"He isn't either."

He didn't say this aloud, and yet he had a disconcerting sense of having failed to keep it to himself. He held his breath until his mother said "Anyway, you've your family to think of. Will I be seeing them soon?"

"I'll talk to Melanie about when."

"Melanie." As he wondered if he needed to explain his mother said "Remember her. Your wife."

She was saying that she did, of course, not that he should. "And the young ones," she said.

"Tom and Amy."

"That's right." She could almost have been commending his memory, praising him as if he'd reverted to the child whose name she kept using. "Amy and Tom," she said as though testing whether the sequence was equally valid. "Let's try and be together soon."

Too much of the conversation seemed to consist of repetitions, in slow motion too. "We'll be in touch," Slater said. "Now why don't you catch up on the rest you were saying you needed."

"The rest." She might have forgotten what she'd meant or somehow changed her mind. "There's plenty," she said.

"Then you should treat yourself to a helping," Slater told her, only to feel he'd misunderstood. He had to trade several endearments before he felt comfortable with ending the call. He left the mobile on the seat beside him as token company, and was casing the Astra forward when he noticed a police car in the nearest entrance to the graveyard.

Had the police been watching him? Now he recalled that you weren't expected just to switch off the engine if you used your mobile in a car, you had to remove the key from the ignition too. As he drove towards them, not too fast but surely not slowly enough to arouse any suspicions, he saw that both the occupants of the white vehicle were disconcertingly young. Perhaps that was one reason why their smooth scrubbed faces looked so tightly closed around a purpose, determined not to let in any doubt or humour, but he was reminded of the Finalists. He straightened his tips and gave the police a terse nod of acknowledgement before he let them see him focus on the road ahead.

He was alongside the cemetery entrance when he glimpsed twin items at the edge of his vision, a pair of roundish objects as blank and white as the sky. Of course they weren't faces; the driver had flashed the headlights, and now he saw her stretching out a hand towards him and then patting the air as if dealing with some article he couldn't see—a child's head, perhaps, or a mound of earth. She was gesturing him to pull over, and he braked so quickly that he blocked the way out of the graveyard.

It seemed advisable not to move on in case they took him to be trying to escape. The driver stayed in her seat while her colleague ducked out of the car, tugging his official headgear down as though to consolidate his small stiff face. He paced to the front of the Astra and scrutinised the number plate before raising his pale gaze to inspect Slater. When he came to the driver's door at the speed of Slater's pulse, Slater lowered the window. "How can I help?'" he said.

He couldn't tell if the policeman was considering the question or Slater's face, even once the man said "Where have you been, sir?"

"Just dropping the children off at school." Slater would have hoped this might earn him at least a hint of approval. "Mine and my wife's," he said in case this solved the unidentified problem. "We both did."

"Where is your wife now?"

"On her way to work if she's not already there."

"What work would that be, sir?"

Slater was close to laughing at the vintage phraseology, which could have been designed as a badge of maturity. Certainly the man seemed more like a memory of a police officer than today's version. "She fixes computers," he said.

"And what work do you do?"

"I'm in charge of music at Texts in Speke."

"In charge."

"Of the department, yes. I'm your classical man in particular." Slater thought he could risk showing a trace of impatience as he added "I'm on my way there now."

This didn't change the man's blank gaze, but neither had anything else. Slater could almost have imagined that his interrogator knew the answers and was testing him to find out if he did. The policeman closed one hand on the lowered window and held out the other. "May I see your licence, please."

"Here I am." Slater unfolded his wallet to exhibit the driving licence in its plastic window. "Nobody else would have that face," he said.

The policeman might have been miming the absence of any response. Admittedly it hadn't been much of a joke, especially considering Amy's resemblance to her father. "Please hand it to me, sir," the policeman said.

Slater removed the licence from the wallet and planted it on the man's palm, which was disconcertingly soft as well as pale and smooth enough to put him in mind of a cloud. "Wait here, sir," the policeman said.

Slater wasn't too far from enquiring where the fellow thought he might have gone. He watched the man return to the police car and sit beside his colleague while she consulted a small computer. They didn't speak—the deserted road was as silent as the multitude of stones—and he didn't see them communicate in any way before the policeman came back to him, so deliberately that Slater would have expected his footfalls to be noisier. "All in order, then?" Slater said. "I'm who it says and this is my car and it's taxed and insured."

The policeman lowered his head as if the monologue had weighed it down. "Where were you last night, sir?"

"Good God, how much else do you want to know?" Having kept this to himself, Slater said "On the way home from visiting my mother."

"That's confirmed. Tell anyone who wants to know."

Slater didn't speak until he had his licence back. "Such as who else?"

"Anyone who asks you, Mr Slater. Please be sure to remember."

He had even less sense of what he was being told to do or why, and he blurted "Just how much do you know about me?"

"Everything you are is in the system."

He didn't care for the notion at all. "May I ask what this has been about?"

"You'd be advised to forget about it, Mr Slater."

"How can I forget it when I don't know what it is?"

While he didn't feel quite confident enough to say that, he wouldn't be the first to blink. The policeman was staring at him as if searching for Slater's thoughts, although his eyes looked as dully vacant as the sky. Then his face appeared not just to flare up with the same pallor but to flatten as his surroundings did. His colleague must have been flashing the headlights, and once Slater blinked his vision reverted to normal. "You can forget this ever happened," the policeman said.

Slater barely managed not to retort that he'd had enough of being told what to forget and to remember. As the policeman turned away at last Slater shut the window. At the sound of the engine the man glanced over his shoulder, but Slater had the unsettling impression that both officious faces were fully turned to him. He must need to catch up on his sleep, though perhaps he ought to be glad that the police hadn't tested his breath. He sent the Astra forward and saw the white car shrink to the size of a toy in the mirror. Stones and trees closed around it, and then it was gone as though it had been too transitory to have a place in the venerable landscape.

The cemetery fell behind at last, and houses in which the windows were suffused with no colour flanked the road. Soon it narrowed, and the sky seemed to press the houses closer to the earth before they gave way to blocks of shops. These looked dingy and anonymous, as if the secondhand goods dimly visible beyond the windows had infected them with staleness, and Slater was glad to reach the main road.

It led him towards the airport, though there weren't any planes in the sky, and then to the retail park. Apart from the outsize writing of their names the buildings weren't much more individuated than the sky. The sign for texts was in computer type and as devoid of capitals as the average message on a mobile. Slater found a space not too many ranks of cars away from the store and felt as if the sky was pacing him while he hurried across the car park.

Beyond the shop entrance and the displays of books he shouldn't have to glance towards to recognise, music was in the air. It reminded him of the vague tentative murmurs he'd heard on the plane, and he couldn't name the composer. He was straining to hear it more clearly so that he could identify it when Shelley Blake came over to him.

He'd never known how much the manager's name had to do with literature. Her taste in reading didn't seem to extend beyond her lifetime, if even that far. Perhaps she wouldn't be able to attribute the Text for Today, this month's quotation that was printed on the staff T-shirts: Had we but world enough and time... Either she was wearing more makeup than usual or he was more aware of the mascara that outlined her grey eyes, the pink lipstick that helped shape her full lips. Even the silvery blonde hair that framed her snub-nosed oval face might have had its tints touched up. She waited while he abandoned trying to recognise the music, and then she said "Put something else on when you're ready, Paul. Something everyone will know."

Was that a criticism of his selections? "Any requests?" he said.

"It's your department. We'll leave it to you."

He might have preferred her to say what she thought the customers might like. He nodded at the trace of music in the air. "Whose idea was that, then?"

"Whoever made it up, I should think."

He'd already had one conversation that resembled a series of ill-defined traps in a dream. She was gazing at him as though she expected more of him, but all he could think of to say was "Sorry, am I late?"

"Nobody's saying so."

"I think I lost track of the time. Don't ask me why, but some police pulled me up."

"I wasn't asking, Paul."

"I know, but if you were..." Even if he felt as though he was talking to himself, it needed to be put into words. "You wouldn't believe how much they wanted to be told," he said, "and they already had it on the computer."

"I expect we're all there."

"I don't know about you, but I'd like to think there was more to me than some electronic information."

"You should then, Paul."

"I just don't know what they were trying to do."

"No need to say. Really, there's no need."

Perhaps her urgency was meant to suggest that he would soon be late after all. "I won't waste any more time, then," he said.

As he made for the staff quarters he found his name tag in his pocket and pinned it above the Marvell. At the door he extended the plastic rectangle on its lead to fit it to the plaque on the wall. He thought the anonymous murmur in the air had muffled the click of the door release until he found that the door didn't budge. He peered at the tag, only to wonder how anyone could expect the system to recognise RETALS LUAP, which sounded like a misspelled retail outlet. Then he managed to laugh, though not before he felt as if looking down at his transformed name had seized him with vertigo. He applied the tag again and heard the lock acknowledge him.

The staffroom was a large white concrete box in which straight chairs huddled against a table opposite a gathering of seats padded with slabs of imitation leather. Under the fluorescent tubes the room looked not just empty but impersonal. Slater clocked on with his tag, triggering a ding that put him in mind of winning an electronic game, and glanced at the memory board on the wall. Was that his handwriting? Presumably whatever task he'd written up had been dealt with, since the words had mostly been erased. Just a few letters were faintly distinguishable: RE A L, too widely spaced to be spelling the word. He couldn't make sense of them as he hung his jacket in the nearest of the lockers in the kitchen beyond the staffroom. Once he'd switched off his mobile he went back to the shop.

The music section was at the back, past a multitude of books. Perhaps it was his lack of sleep that made their covers look oddly imprecise in the artificial light, which had as little colour as the sky that glared through the long windows. Even the cases in the racks of compact discs seemed less familiar than they had to be. The prospect of relinquishing his own taste so as to reflect everyone else's felt oddly threatening, and at first he couldn't even think how to do it. If the music was supposed to exemplify the shop, he might as well select from the label that their multinational owners had caused to be created. Perhaps in some sense that music represented the world.

The Primest discs had their own prominent display, where the timidly classical compilations were shelved behind the more unashamedly popular. Beathoven emphasised the rhythms of the composer's best-known melodies, while High Din did the same for his contemporary, and Lud Wig showed Mozart topped by an extravagantly elaborate hairpiece composed of notes. On reflection Slater didn't think he could live with any of those performances, let alone Bach with Bite or Poochini or Un-Ravel, and so he slipped Beethoven's Pastoral—the symphony, he thought, not the sonata—into the player. "Is this all right for everyone?" he called.

"We've heard it before."

He couldn't tell which of the staff had spoken. They were deployed throughout the shop, shelving books or arranging displays or checking stock against lists on handheld monitors or serving customers, although the day had brought out few of those. He heard a murmur of agreement, either with his question or with the response. He propped the compact disc case on the Now Playing stand on the Information counter, and looked up to find that somebody was waiting to be seen.

He was a large balding man in a grey track suit that made his shape vaguer. His roundish face looked blurred by fat and to some extent defined by hair—eyebrows overshadowing the small eyes, a moustache and a restrained beard framing the mouth, uneven stubble poking out of the broad nose. As Slater met his gaze he raised his shaggy eyebrows, which appeared to expand. "Have you remembered yet?" he said.

Slater felt rude for gazing at him, especially since it didn't make the man look any more familiar. "I'm sorry," he said, "I'm not sure..."

"You were finding a tune for me. You thought you were the man to know."

Slater couldn't recall being asked. He was hoping for some help, but when the fellow only stared at him he had to ask "Which tune was it again?"

"Something like this."

The man lifted his gaze heavenwards, suggesting that the melody resembled the one in the air. Certainly the tentative notes he hummed weren't too distinguishable from it. Slater would have been embarrassed to ask him to repeat them, but had to admit "I haven't found it yet, I'm afraid."

"Where did you look?"

"In the catalogues online." That had to be the answer, even if he couldn't recall doing so. How badly was his lack of sleep affecting him? At least he was able to say "It does sound rather familiar."

"That's what you thought." Perhaps this was a reproach, but the man added "I think I've remembered some words."

"It's a song, you mean."

"Didn't you say?"

Slater had no idea, and his forgetfulness had started to make him feel lacking. "What words are those?" he said, trying not to sound nervous.

"It starts off with the town where I was born."

"That should help." The man's accent prompted Slater to add "I'd say Liverpool."

"Like you by the sound of it. You're best ending up where you came from."

"Some of us have never left." That wasn't true visiting his mother was enough to give it the lie—and Slater felt as if he was trying too hard to manage his memories. "Are you thinking of the Beatles?" he said.

"You've got to if you think of Liverpool."

"Yes, but do you have their song in mind? The one that starts the way you said."

All at once he was afraid of being asked for the title. How could he have forgotten it, even if he specialised in other kinds of music? Perhaps the man knew it, because he said "I'm not thinking of that, no."

It sounded unnecessarily reminiscent of a guessing game. "Is it more recent?" Slater said. "One of Dylan's, could it be?"

"Isn't he the poet?"

"Not the one from Wales, the singer who took his name."

"You shouldn't do that." Slater felt no less bewildered than accused, even once his customer said "Take a name. Don't they say never take one in vain?"

"That's just God."

"It ought to be the rest of us as well. Take it away and you won't be able to get to yourself. You know yourself you can't look anything up without a name."

"So, Dylan the singer," Slater said in a bid not to think about any of that. "Was it his song?"

"Doesn't sound like him."

"Then I'm guessing it's the one he based his song on. Barbara," Slater said and then "Barbara."

"Barbara Barbara. Don't know that one."

"Not Barbara Barbara," Slater said and tried to laugh, despite feeling like an echo of an echo. "Barbara. Barbara..." With an effort that strained not just his mind but the whole of him he succeeded in recalling "Barbara Allen."

"Hey," the man said in surprise if not indignation, "that's my name."

Slater was on the edge of laughter now, unless it was hysteria. "What is?"

"It's not going to be Barbara, is it? Not Barbara Barbara either. Have a go at Alan."

Perhaps that was how he spelled it, whichever of his names it might be. "As you see, mine's Paul," Slater said.

The customer peered at his badge—indeed, scrutinised it so closely that Slater was reminded of immigration or the police. "If you say so," the man eventually said.

Slater glanced down to see that the badge was inverted, turned up towards him as though to remind him of his name. Even once Slater reversed the badge the customer didn't look especially convinced. "Can you sing it for me?" the man said.

For a disoriented moment Slater thought he was being asked to perform his own name, a notion that seemed capable of driving the ballad out of his head. With an effort he succeeded in retrieving a pair of lines: "He turned his face unto the wall, and death was drawing nigh him..." He would rather not sing that just now if ever, and he struggled to recapture the words that the man had more or less told him. He took a breath that he couldn't hear for the hovering music, and sang "In something town where I was born..."

"How's that again?"

Slater did his best to raise his voice while he repeated the line, but couldn't prevent the rhythm from fitting itself to the symphony, and the melody fared not much better. The customer had him rehearse it once more, and this time he joined in. As Slater saw his colleagues duck towards their work, quite possibly to shut out the duet, the man said "That's something like."

"Shall I see if I can find it for you?"

"If you want."

The song wasn't on any of the albums by the Neaps. It wasn't among the Only Folk compilations, and it didn't seem to have been recorded by Maurice and His Men. Slater searched through all the likely discs and then the increasingly unlikely ones before he had to tell his customer "I'm afraid we don't have it in Folk just now."

"Doesn't have to be."

Presumably he meant he would accept a composer's interpretation, and Slater moved to the classical racks. Volkswagen came to mind until the initials yielded Vaughan Williams, who didn't seem to have gone anywhere near the ballad. Britain was a thought—Britten, to be more precise—but he hadn't set it either. Holst had stayed clear along with Grainger, and there was no trace of a version by Beethoven, whose rustic dance was leaving very little room in Slater's head for any other musical thoughts. At last he said "It looks as if I'll have to order it for you."

"If it won't be too much trouble for nothing."

"It's none at all. We're here for you. Without you we wouldn't exist," Slater said and typed his name to log onto the computer at Information. The screen flickered for an instant, unless his vision did, before responding. Invalid, it declared.

The customer glanced at the screen and then gazed at Slater. "Aren't you well?"

"I'm fine. It's the system that isn't."

"I wouldn't say that too loud if I were you."

"I don't care who hears." This was no more defensive than his remark about the computer. "Slater," he hissed as he put in the name again, just as unsuccessfully. He was about to page the manager, though it made him feel worse than incompetent, when a thought saved him. He typed Paul and was acknowledged at once, which would have reassured him if he weren't so aware of having forgotten the routine. "I'm in," he said. "What sort of version would you like?"

"Of you? The one you are will do, I'd say."

However plainly this was a joke, Slater didn't find it appropriate. "Of the music," he said.

Since Slater hadn't even hinted at a grin, his customer's face stayed blank. "Whichever you think."

"Traditional?" When the man raised no objection Slater brought up the title, but the onscreen repetitions were so numerous that he had to search for a reason to single one out. "The Final Family," his instincts eventually prompted him to say. "I believe they're supposed to have caught the spirit."

"Let's have them, then."

Slater patched the details into an online order form before he had to say "And your name again..."

"Allen."

"Mr Allen," Slater said, almost sure he'd heard that spelling, and in the absence of any contradiction he entered it on the form. "And your postcode."

He had to ask to hear it again, which didn't lessen how it made him feel. "Sorry," he said. "It was just a surprise. It's the same as mine."

"You'll be looking for me at home."

Slater couldn't help wishing he were there right now—him, not the customer. "What number's yours?" he said.

"Don't tell me that's yours too."

Slater suppressed his unease, since the idea was absurd. The mumbled number was a teen, but certainly not his. "Close," he said, though he wasn't sure how much. "You must be just round a corner."

"You'll be seeing me again before you know it."

"It ought to be here soon," Slater said, as that was all the customer could mean, and printed out the information. "If you could bring that with you it would be helpful."

"It'll help you remember, you mean." As he took the flimsy slip the man said "Thank you for your time, Mr Player."

"So long as you care about names, this is me," Slater said and extended his badge on its lead.

He might have been making a bid for admission at an invisible threshold. The man didn't even glance at the badge before he turned away, murmuring "I'll leave you alone then, Mr Later."

"Slater," Slater protested but had no idea who heard him. Everyone had their backs to him, and he couldn't tell how much of his voice the discreetly boisterous music had absorbed. "I'll be in the office if anyone needs me," he said rather louder than he'd proclaimed his name, and made for the plaque on the wall.

The office was the second room along the concrete passage. It was a windowless bunker much like the staffroom but with desks, each of which was occupied by a computer, their screens as blank as oblivion. As Slater sat in front of his the unadorned white walls reminded him of the sky; it felt like being surrounded by slabs of solidified cloud, or else the walls seemed less substantial than they ought to. He would leave once he'd checked for any calls; he didn't even know why he was so anxious to do it—but as soon as he switched on the mobile it clanked and trembled in his hand. Melanie had tried to reach him.

At least she had left him a message, and he fumbled for the key. A woman told him he had one new message and gave him instructions on how to retrieve it, which he couldn't do until he had finished being told. He'd forgotten to wait for the anonymous artificial voice to finish before he poked the appropriate key, and had to go through the ritual again. Once he'd jabbed the key a second time he heard a whisper of static not too distinguishable from silence, and then it produced Melanie's voice—the memory of her call. "Don't worry if you're there," she said. "Well, of course you are. Just checking all is as it should be. The children tried and so I said I would. We'll all be fine till we're back together."

What did she mean about the children? He thumbed the button to recall her number and pressed the phone against his car, and heard silence as blank as he imagined the unseen sky must be. He didn't know how long he waited to hear an unnecessarily remote bell, which seemed to be summoning more of the silence as it echoed itself. Then the bell faltered like a musician who had missed a note, and Melanie said "Hello?"

It shouldn't be a question. She ought to be seeing his name. Did her voice sound artificial? Perhaps it was her answering message, which he couldn't recall ever having heard. Before he managed to respond or even take a breath she said "Who's calling me?"

"It's me. It's only me."

"Not only at all, unless you're saying you're the only thing that matters."

"I'd never say that. There are you and the children for a start."

"Matters to them and to me. You ought to know I meant that."

"I'm sure other people do as well. Matter, I'm saying." The sense of artificiality hadn't left him; the conversation felt like rummaging in his mind. "Why couldn't you see me?" he said.

"What do you mean. Paul?"

That sounded genuine enough—her unease did. "Just now," he said. "When I rang. You couldn't see my name."

"I wasn't looking. I wanted to hear."

Had he aggravated her unease? He still had to ask "Why did you call? What was wrong?"

"Nothing is now."

"That's a relief, but what were you saying was the matter with the children?"

She was certainly uneasier now. "What did I say?"

"That they'd tried to get in touch with me, I thought. There's no trace on my phone."

"That explains it, then." Her relief seemed to let her add "Mind you, there are always traces. If there weren't I couldn't do my job."

She was talking about computers, but he was anxious to learn "Why did they want me?"

"Why wouldn't they?"

"I'm asking why they tried to call."

"I really couldn't tell you. I expect it can wait till tonight if I let them know I've spoken to you." She sounded eager to say "We'll pick them up after their rehearsal, shall we? I should be finished by then."

"I can get them if you like."

"No need to be apart any longer than we have to be." As if to leave the thought behind she said without a pause "How's your day shaping up?"

"I don't know how long I was dealing with a customer. One of our neighbours or not far from it. A Mr Allen, I believe."

"He does sound a bit familiar, but let's concentrate on us."

At least their conversation had lent her voice some substance, and she sounded close enough to be in the room. "And our work," Slater said.

"That's us as well, and the children are."

"I should think we ought to let them be themselves." Just in time Slater grasped that whatever was behind Melanie's words, she wouldn't want to hear that kind of comment, and so he gave her a silence to prompt her to speak. "I can't wait to see them, can you?" she said.

"We'd better get back to work so we're in time."

"I expect so." As Slater made to say something other than farewell she said "See them performing, I meant."

"That as well," Slater said and was anxious for the day to be done. The shop felt like a stage in his return to the family, and he seemed to need to keep them in his mind. By the end of the workday he could scarcely bring to mind how he'd spent it—checking stock, removing items from the shelves to send back where they'd come from, finding music for a customer, serving at the tills, which emitted notes like rudimentary attempts to join in the melodies overhead if not to diminish them or take their place—and he left all that behind as he made for his car.

Beneath the white sheet of the sky the dormant vehicles might have been forgetting their colours. Perhaps the sunless light was muffling his perceptions, because he had to use the key fob to locate the Astra. He heard an electronic sound that seemed to be transformed into a flare of light, but he had to rouse the car again, having lost it once more in the maze of empty metal. He fell into his seat and grabbed a water bottle to suck at the plastic nipple, feeling vulnerable and isolated. It must show how incomplete he was without his family, and he twisted the key to bring the car back to life.

The traffic lights at the exit from the retail park looked blanched by the sky. Although the main road was anything but busy, the lights took their time about releasing him. Such traffic as there was stayed on the main road when he turned away between the faded shops. He couldn't help looking for the police at the graveyard, but except for trees there were only stones like extrusions of the rock beneath the grass.

He saw St Dunstan's before he was expecting to, though he couldn't recall when he'd last approached it from this direction. At first the white blocks of the school consisted mostly of a mass of stripes, the railings of the schoolyard. The bars moved lethargically apart as he drove closer, as if the view beyond them was gradually taking shape—the buildings practically indistinguishable from the sky, their windows blank as cataracts, the empty yard. No, there was a glimpse of green, and then the gaps between the bars let him see Amy and Tom. Melanie was with them, and he should have noticed her car on a side street ahead, especially since no houses were in the way. "Now we're all together again," Amy cried as he opened the passenger door.

"We'll always be," said Tom.

Slater would have expected her to give that a big sister's look, but for a change she seemed not to feel superior. "Who's coming home with me?" he said.

The children's faces wavered, and he could have thought Melanie seemed taken aback too. "We all are," she said.

"No, I mean who's travelling with me." When even this appeared to fall short Slater said "In my car."

"It can be the boys again." Melanie said.

Tom apparently understood this before his father did, and climbed in the Astra. Amy and her mother hurried to the Viva, which swerved at speed out of the side road as if Melanie couldn't wait to see the rest of the family in her mirror. As the Astra came up behind her she moved off so deliberately that Slater assumed she wanted him to stay in the reflection. He grew aware that Tom was gazing at him. "Well, Tom," he said and for a disconcerting moment didn't know how to continue. "Are you prepared?"

The boy's gaze flickered, surely not with nervousness. "What for, dad?"

"What else could it be? Your concert, of course."

"I think we are." Even more gravely Tom added "I hope."

"No need for that, I'm certain." When the boy looked less than reassured Slater said "I believe in you and Amy."

"And mummy."

"She does too."

Tom's gaze retreated, leaving his eyes blank, so that Slater wondered if he'd misunderstood the boy somehow. He could have thought he was forgetting how to talk to his family. Was this another indication that he needed to catch up on his sleep? Even that prospect made him uneasy, and he concentrated on following the Viva, meeting Melanie's eyes in the mirror whenever she looked for him. He was barely aware of having a passenger, and had to keep glancing at Tom, who was intent on the other car.

As he followed Melanie into St Peter Street the trees closed in. Was even the vegetation confused by the unemphatic light? He could have thought all the buds were taking their leaves back, having concluded that spring had proved to be an illusion. The pallid sky appeared to have settled into every window of the house, and until he left the car he couldn't see a single room. Melanie opened the front door, revealing the hall and the photographs climbing towards the sky. Once Slater crossed the threshold he could see the photographs weren't blank. As he shut out the inhibited trees and the unforthcoming sky he said "We'll have dinner when you two have done your homework."

"We haven't got any," Tom said.

He looked oddly lost, and Amy did until she said "They let us off because of rehearsals."

Slater was disconcerted to feel that the domestic routine had been undermined. How regulated did he need their life to be? What did he think would happen otherwise? Before he could ponder this, if indeed he wanted to, Melanie said "Come and read while we get dinner ready then."

He had the odd notion that she meant the children to read aloud to them. He wouldn't have encouraged reading at the table—surely that used to be regarded as rude—but at least it meant the family was all together. As he made a salad to accompany the lasagne Melanie had taken from the refrigerator he saw that the children's books must be old favourites, revisited so often that they'd shed their presumably disintegrating jackets.

He was doing his best to identify them—it felt like a memory exercise—when Melanie said "If you're ready we are."

The children shut their books at once. The blank pages Slater glimpsed were the flyleaves, of course. He poured drinks—lemonade for the children, wine for him and Melanie—while she loaded everybody's dishes, and then he remembered a question he'd wanted to ask. "Who's going to tell me about the earthquake?"

Melanie frowned, and Amy produced a smaller but fiercer version. "Which one?" she said before her mother could speak.

"How many have there been?"

"None at all that I'm aware of," Melanie said. "Now why doesn't everyone —"

"I believe there was a bit of one, wasn't there? Tom said you had it while I was on my way home."

"Tom would," Amy said.

"You must have felt it too," the boy protested. "You woke up like me."

With all the loftiness her extra years had conferred upon her Amy told him "That wasn't an earthquake."

"What was it, then?"

"I don't know what woke me." As their mother made to intervene Amy said "I went all shivery. It was like having ripples in my tummy and my head."

"That's the same thing. It wasn't just us, it was—"

"You were worried about your father being late, that's all," Melanie said. "You can forget all about it now. Don't go getting yourselves worked up when you have your big day tomorrow."

The children looked frustrated if not more thoroughly dissatisfied, and Slater did his best to divert them. "That's enough earthquakes for one day," he said, and when their faces stayed stubbornly baffled "Your mother's excelled herself today, hasn't she? I can't remember when it tasted so good."

He was confusing himself if not them. Melanie hadn't made the lasagne today, and he couldn't even recall which of the two of them had been the cook. Soon enough everyone's plates looked as if they mightn't have held food at all, and the children left the table. "Don't go far," Melanie said and seemed to wonder why she had.

"We're only going to watch," Amy said.

As Slater passed Melanie items to put in the dishwasher he couldn't hear the television in the next room. When he and Melanie left the kitchen he heard sounds too rapid to identify, and the flat screen in the living-room met him with a series of random images like frames in a chaotic film. Tom was switching channels, only to complain "There's nothing on."

"It looks as if there's far too much," Melanie said.

"Let's have the control, please," Slater said.

He lingered on some of the channels long enough to be sure what they were offering, but in no case was it much. The fragments of news seemed bland and overly familiar—predictions of prosperity, forecasts of employment, prognoses of technological developments, assurances of better times in store. Slater hoped all this would come true for Tom and Amy, but he saw it wasn't reaching them just now. Otherwise there were cartoons —"Seen it," Tom and then Amy announced—and quiz shows—"Seen it," the children chorused—and episodes of comedies— "Seen it" in every case. "Well then," Melanie said with impatience that Slater thought wasn't too far from nervousness, "what do you want to see?

"The film with all the music in," Tom said, very nearly at once.

"The one that's made of music," Amy seemed to deduce he had in mind.

"I'm sure you know which that is, Paul."

He could have thought the family was imitating one of the quiz shows. If Melanie knew the title, why couldn't she say? It must be quite a few years since they'd all seen the film. No wonder the children couldn't put a name to it, and as the title came to mind at last he saw the disc where it should be, under F on the shelf. "Fantasia," he said for anyone who needed to know. Thumbing the disc out of its case, he slipped it into the player.

The screen grew blank, unless it had already been, as the player engaged with the monitor. In a few moments a star described an arc like the skeleton of a rainbow on the screen. While the image was familiar— the Disney logo —Just now it seemed more like an omen of unnatural light. At least the disc menu lent Slater some control, and he started the film.

He remembered it well enough, and he saw that the family did. A master of ceremonies introduced the conductor and the orchestra, whose instruments began to glow as they performed a reworking of Bach. As Slater recalled, the children had been captivated, but now the transformation of the music into an extra sense unsettled him, especially once the orchestra was reduced to abstract patterns that were supposed to represent the music. They reminded him how it was composed of electronic impulses translated by the system, and how his perception of it consisted of electronic disturbances in his brain; all his perceptions did—even the thought itself, not to mention the self that was having it. Although music often sent him into a reverie, he didn't care much for this one. Since trying to make his mind blank offered no reassurance, he did his best to confine his awareness to the patterns on the screen and in his head.

Next came Tchaikovsky, and the children still giggled at the balletic vegetation. Slater could have thought their amusement was a little nervous, and the sight of flowers and mushrooms dancing as though they had faces and brains had lost its appeal for him. It seemed to suggest that music could bring the mindless to some kind of life—that other forms of electronic activity might as well. The music that followed took the shape of a mouse but also formed itself into a broom that executed a prancing march and multiplied into countless replicas of itself, enough to people a world. Slater might have imagined the world had collapsed from the artificiality of the situation, because now the images turned primordial, depicting chaos before they showed the birth and death of all life—no, just the prehistoric kind, too distant to be remembered. Why couldn't he stop thinking? What would happen if he did? The thought felt even more unwelcome, not least because it appeared to turn the monitor blank. The film had reached the intermission. "Have we had enough?" he said.

The children only stared at him. but Melanie said "Why, have you?"

Or was she asking why? Slater couldn't own up to the truth when he didn't know what it was. "Not unless you have," he said.

He wasn't even sure if this was a plea. As he reached for the control Melanie said "It's something we're doing together."

The orchestra returned before he would have been able to head them off, and then the master of ceremonies coaxed the soundtrack onstage. The sight of the unstable line creeping out of the side of the screen to cavort in time with various instruments roused all Slater's unwelcome thoughts. Eventually Beethoven drove it back into hiding, but the symphony felt like a recent memory Slater was trying to recapture, and not too accurately either. In the past he and Melanie might have exchanged winces at all the inappropriate portamento and pointed out the conductor's eccentricities to the children, but now the slithering of the violins from note to note seemed inseparable from the sinuous movements of the mythical creatures onscreen. They weren't memories, even ancient ones, but concepts that had never really existed, a thought that he found less than reassuring. A thunderstorm flung down by Zeus was sent packing by the sun, but soon the night was drawn over the land, an event rather too reminiscent of the sky outside the window, where the featureless expanse had turned black at some point Slater couldn't recall. Now what point was the film making about time? Hours didn't dance, and they certainly didn't take the form of ostriches or hippopotami. He felt as if the spectacle was undermining his grasp of the nature of time, but closing his eyes only made him nervous of what he might see when he opened them. Suppose there was nothing to see? He had to make himself hear the music in his head, and once he recalled what shapes it would be taking now—elephants and alligators—he was able to look. Another night was still to come, bringing a gigantic demon that reached down from a mountain to toy with its resurrected victims. Slater wanted to remember that it was conquered by daylight, but that didn't happen; a procession of vague figures carried feeble lights across an uncertain terrain where even the trees were indistinct, and at last the procession merged with an obscure pale radiance. "Well," Slater said and was anxious to find more to say. "I hope that lived up to our memories."

"It was a bit different," Tom said.

Since nobody else spoke, Slater couldn't avoid asking "How?"

Tom seemed to wish he'd kept quiet, and glanced at his mother and sister as though for some kind of support. It was Amy who said "I thought the sun came back at the end."

"Don't you think it does?" Melanie said, less like a question than a bid for reassurance.

"That isn't the sun," Tom objected.

"Maybe it was better," Slater tried suggesting while he wondered if they were talking just about the film. "I tell you what," he said. "If we don't see the sun tomorrow we'll go and try and find it at the weekend."

Melanie pressed her lips together as if she might have liked him to have kept the notion to himself. "Why won't we see it tomorrow?" Tom protested.

"I'm not saying we won't. There aren't any prophets here. I only meant if it carries on like this."

Tom glanced at the window, where the gap between the curtains was apparently too thin to admit even a hint of light from the street. "For ever?"

"Of course not for ever. Nothing lasts that long." Once again Slater thought he'd said too much, and now not enough. "Apart from us," he felt compelled to add.

Amy seemed not to know where to look. "Just us?"

"Now I said I'm not a prophet. They've all gone away till next time."

"Which time, dad?"

That was Tom, but Slater suspected the boy wasn't alone in wondering. "Whenever some other crowd thinks we're all due to come to an end," he said and saw this didn't appeal much to anyone. "But there are more like us who don't, aren't there? And we won."

"How did we?" Amy said.

He might have liked them simply to accept the notion, but perhaps he could hold it together. "By believing," he said and felt unexpectedly inspired. "That's all we have to do, and that answers your other question as well. Believe in whatever matters to you and it'll stay with you for ever."

He hoped that made sense or at least felt as if it should, but he didn't need any more questions. "Now I'm for an early night," he said as he shut the system down, having extracted the disc, "and I shouldn't think it would do the rest of us any harm."

Presumably they agreed, since they followed him. He could have thought they meant to queue outside the bathroom, extending the procession of family images that climbed out of the past and up the stairs. Instead they disappeared into the bedrooms as he shut the door, and he felt as if he was bursting into or at least venturing into song on their behalf, because he'd remembered a few more words to do with Barbara Allen. "All in the merry month of May, when green buds they were swelling... " It was a surely a promise that life would always revive and an explanation of why the trees were keeping back their leaves until then. Otherwise he made do with the melody, interrupted by brushing his teeth, which let him retrieve another line: "Young man, I think you're dying." He was too old for it to relate to him, and Tom was certainly too young, but as soon as it was uttered he regretted having loosed it. He sang louder without bothering with lyrics, as if deedledum and doodledum could make retrospective nonsense of the line. He was playing the concerned father, not reverting to a state before he'd acquired language, and fell silent as he made for bed.

He might have inadvertently started an audition. While Melanie watched him undress and slip under the quilt they heard Amy recommence the song, though without any words that Slater could distinguish. Tom was next and just as apparently wordless, followed by his mother. As Slater listened to her contribution with his eyes shut he could have thought the family were signalling to one another, establishing where they were. He must be close to dreaming, and he fought to be aware when Melanie came to bed.

The melody she was murmuring trailed off as she returned to him. He couldn't recall turning out the light, but he must have, given the dark. As she nestled against him and captured his arm she whispered "Don't let it be like last night."

Her voice was so muted that he might have fancied he was hearing it just in his head. He didn't even know whether she had been speaking to him, but he said "Like what?"

"We'll be able to sleep now you're home," Melanie said, taking a firmer hold on his arm.

Did she mean them or the children as well, or perhaps not him at all? How could she know whether he'd slept on the plane? The flight and in particular the lurch it had suffered seemed to be his most vivid memory just now, which made him feel as though it might be repeated if he fell asleep—the lurch, at any rate. His awareness of hugging Melanie began to dissipate, consumed by the dark, and he felt threatened by sleep, but why should he feel that? Melanie was asleep—her breaths were as regular as her pulse, keeping time with it and his own—and she wasn't going anywhere so long as he kept hold of her, any more than he was. His consciousness lapsed for a moment, unless it was much longer, since as he struggled back to sentience he had to recall that he was holding Melanie. Singing under his breath might help him stay vigilant, but it was singing in his sleep that wakened him, although the man's voice didn't sound quite like his, however close it was. The words it seemed to have been finding weren't altogether accurate: not Allen but panic, and had he really heard "Young man, I think you're flying"? Perhaps the young man could be Tom after all, an idea that roused Slater to brave the vague dark, having left Melanie a hug he hoped would linger on his behalf. The boy was safe in bed; Slater was sure of it once he'd inched the quilt back from the dormant shape to reveal the dim still face. He mustn't stoop any closer—by the time he was near enough to feel Tom's breath, his own might wake the sleeper—and he contented himself with murmuring a scrap of the song like a lullaby; perhaps he'd heard it used that way somewhere. On his way back to Melanie he was dismayed to think he'd left someone out, a thought that felt like being seized by the dark, and he was in Amy's room so fast that he was afraid of waking her. When he succeeded in making out her face it was as peaceful as her brother's, and once he'd whispered the lullaby Slater retreated to his bed.

Hadn't he undertaken something else for them? Yes, he'd promised them the sun. Though he needn't alert them when it came up, he wouldn't mind seeing it do so. He regained his hold on Melanie and remembered to caress her midriff while he waited for the night to begin to grow paler. His caresses found the rhythm of the breaths he could think he was sharing with her, and perhaps his brainwaves were adopting that pulse as well, because for an instant he seemed to feel everything merge before he felt nothing at all.

The implosion of his consciousness wrenched him awake, and he clutched at the arms of the seat to save himself from plunging into whatever void awaited him. He found no arms, only a soft flatness that he couldn't even grasp. No, he was lying on his back, not flying after all. He was home in bed—alone in bed. His eyes flickered open to be met by darkness so apparently total that they winced shut at once. He was attempting to breathe when he heard Melanie say "Don't go off again, Paul. We're waiting for you."

They were at the end of the bed. Although he felt he'd only blinked, it was daylight now, the same version as yesterday's. The children were wearing their St Dunstan's outfits, and Melanie was in her business uniform. "Stay awake, dad," Amy urged.

"Then we can have breakfast," Tom said with enthusiasm.

Slater had to laugh, affectionately enough. Surely nothing could be wrong if the most vital issue was breakfast. "Give me a chance to breathe," he said.

As he heard their footsteps like a succession of heartbeats on the stairs he made for the bathroom. He did his best to sing in there, though the lyrics of the ballad kept eluding him. How was his reflection dealing with the few lines he brought to mind? In reverse or in some other kind of transformation? Obviously it was voiceless, but the sight made him feel threatened with the same lack, so that he went downstairs as soon as he could.

Three slices of toast sprang up to greet him, and Tom brought them for Amy and himself to butter while Melanie poured coffee. Slater might have protested that he could do all this, or was the routine important to the children? Perhaps it was helping them not to be nervous—about tonight's concert, of course. "Did everyone have a good night?" he said.

The pause might have implied they knew his answer would be no. After somewhat more than a moment Amy admitted "It was better."

"We heard you singing," Tom informed him.

Slater couldn't tell if this was meant to support Amy's observation. "I'm glad we're all musical," Melanie said. "Whatever can bring us together."

Surely he could take this at face value. He was working on his breakfast, though the muffled crunching in his skull sounded rather too much like some kind of collapse, when Tom said "What's that on you, dad?"

Had he seen an insect or a blemish? Slater swallowed his abruptly dry mouthful as an aid to saying "What do you have in mind?"

"The words you're putting in our heads."

Slater supposed he ought to laugh, having realised Tom was thinking of the quotation on his Texts shirt. "Maybe they were there already, Tom. They're from a famous poem."

"It's not famous to me," Tom said and gazed a challenge at his sister.

"I don't know them either. Do you, mummy?"

"Had we but world enough and time— " Melanie hesitated and then said "Had we but world enough and time... "

"You're just being an echo," Tom protested. "We can see those."

"I'm trying to think what should come next." With a reproachful look at Slater she confessed "Well, I can't."

"You know it really, though," he was anxious to remind her.

"If you say so, Derek. Now can we try and concentrate on what's important?"

Using his old name had to be a rebuke for telling her what she ought to recall, but it made him feel misperceived. Tom giggled at it, though not as if he understood, and Amy said "Who's Derek?"

"Just who I was when I was both your ages. As your mother says, it's not important. Not worth remembering at all."

"So what's the rest, dad?" Tom said. "You have to know."

"So do you. You all do." When they only gazed at him Slater said fiercely "Paul Slater."

"Not of you," Tom said with a giggle that surely had no reason to be nervous. "The rest of your poem."

"It isn't just mine. It isn't even mostly." Slater glanced down at the inverted words, only to feel as if he was plummeting into meaninglessness. emit dna made a certain amount of sense—it suggested leaving some kind of coded trace—but how was he to interpret hguone dlrow or even tub ew daH? He could have imagined that language had begun to disintegrate or that his grasp of it had. Even when he looked up, the deranged words clung to his mind, and he couldn't think how to drive them away except by speaking. "Had we but world enough and time..."

The children giggled, but Amy said "What happens if we haven't?"

"Look, I can't think of it just now, all right? Your mother's already told you it isn't important." The outburst left him nervous, and he turned on Tom. "Why are you asking me now, anyway? You've been seeing it all month."

"Then why does it say it's the text for today?"

"Don't ask me that either. I don't do all the thinking for the shop." In an attempt to find some humour in the situation Slater added "I wouldn't blame anyone if they thought I'm not much good at doing it for myself."

"Nobody does, Paul," Melanie said, and he thought he heard an unspoken apology for having used his abandoned name. "Now let's take each day as it comes, you two. And this one's your special one, so let's keep our minds on that."

The argument had distracted him so much that he couldn't recall clearing his plate. "Your mother's right," he said, "and it's time we saw you to school."

He didn't realise that he hadn't looked out of the windows until he opened the front door to find the world too white. Of course frost had drained the parked cars of colour and turned their windows blank. All the houses had grown as pallid as ice and looked no less brittle, and the dull uncoloured sky had taken up residence in every one. How cold must the night have been to make the buds shrink back into the trees? The twigs and branches were so black that they resembled fissures in the sky. The Astra and the Viva blinked and yipped as if they were starting awake, and then the only sound was a harsh tuneless duet—Tom and Amy scraping the windscreens with the plastic implements they'd taken from the cars. As the noises ceased in unison Slater said "Who's going first?"

The children looked uneasy before their mother understood. "You lead if you like," she said. 'Just don't go too far."

"Dad," Amy said, "can I come with you today?"

"To the school, you mean, obviously." Since she didn't deny it he said "Certainly you may." He climbed into the Astra as she did, and when they slammed the doors the world went out around them.

The vibration that reverberated through the car felt unduly reminiscent of the lurch he'd experienced on the plane. It seemed to pass through him like a wave as he managed to see what had turned the world blank. "It's just condensation," he said before Amy could speak.

As he twisted the key in the ignition he was suddenly afraid that the computer at the core of the vehicle would let him down. The engine came alive, however, and he switched on the wipers and the defrosting system. The car surrounded him and Amy with its unremitting artificial breath while the wipers cleared arcs of the windscreen, revealing samples of the street, a process that put Slater in mind of a change of scene in an old film. He turned the car out of the drive, only to wish he'd waited for the back window to clear; the image of the Viva in the mirror was so faint that he had to strain his mind to perceive it at all. It gained definition as he drove along the street at a speed that wouldn't have disgraced a funeral, so that by the time he reached the main road he was able to see Melanie and their son. As he accelerated gently—tenderly, he might have called it—Amy kept her eyes on the mirror and said not much louder than the murmur of the car "Can I tell you what happened yesterday, dad?"

"Why shouldn't you be able to?"

"Maybe we aren't supposed."

"You can always tell me anything, Amy." He felt as if he was having to remember to add "And your mother."

The car behind them had grown no clearer by the time Amy said "Some of the girls in my class had the thing with their tummy."

"Ah." However old-fashioned he sounded, Slater had to say "That might be best discussed with your mother."

"I don't think she likes people talking about it." With what he could have taken for eleven years' worth of reproachfulness Amy said "You were there."

He felt forgetful and disoriented. "Where, Amy? When?"

"When I told you both about it, and Tom was there too." Having apparently needed to establish all this, she said "About how it woke me up when you were coming home."

"And now you're saying your classmates noticed it as well. Nothing too odd about that, is there? And if any of them didn't, well, some people can sleep through an earthquake."

"Who says it was one?"

"You haven't forgotten your brother."

"I wouldn't," Amy said without even a hint of the loftiness Slater might have expected, "but we're not sure it was."

"I really don't know what else it could have been."

"See, we aren't supposed to talk about it."

"I've already said you can with me." Less brusquely Slater said "What makes you think you can't?"

"My friend asked a teacher what she thought it was."

"And the teacher said..."

"She didn't." As though she resented or was made uneasy by having to expound Amy said "She took my friend to see someone and we haven't seen her again."

"To see someone how? I mean, why? To see whom?"

"The teacher wouldn't tell us. She said we better hadn't ask."

"And you really haven't seen your friend at all since?" He was sounding too much like an interrogator, but he had to say "Hasn't anyone been in touch with her?"

"We can't."

"Perhaps she was upset by being singled out like that." Slater saw that Amy thought as little of the explanation as he did. "I suppose it might be best," he said, "if you don't bring up the subject today."

"My friend, you mean."

He hadn't, and was disturbed to wonder if he should have. "Perhaps she'll be there." he tried saying. "Perhaps she's waiting to tell you all what happened." When Amy gazed harder at the mirror he said "If you like I'll see what I can find out while we're at the school." There was no response beyond the blurred murmur of the car, even when he added "Or if you'd rather I didn't I won't."

Presumably this was how she might increasingly behave at her age. They were already in sight of the school; he seemed to have forgotten there was so much open land along the route. As he drew up outside the schoolyard the Viva swelled up in the mirror, and he could have thought it was growing more solid. Amy leaned over for him to kiss her forehead, and he said almost without thinking "That'll keep your mind alive."

She gazed at him as intently as she'd watched the mirror. "Dad, will you do something for us?"

"Anything I can."

"Will you leave your phone on?"

Perhaps it was just her fervency that disconcerted him. "Why would you like me to do that?"

"Then you can see if we send you a message." She seemed not too far from pleading as she said "Just in case."

While he wasn't going to ask the question that he sensed would only make her nervous, he said "Are you meant to have your phones on at school? You don't want to get into trouble after what you were saying about your friend."

"We can put them on in the breaks. Don't you want us to call you?"

"Texts mightn't." At once he felt he was letting his family down. "You're as important," he said. "No, you're more. It'll stay on."

"Thanks, dad. You'll always be our dad." She lingered to say "And mummy's husband" before straightening up from the car to call "Dad's going to leave his phone on."

Slater hadn't noticed Tom leaving Melanie's car. At first he was unable to locate the boy's face among the dozens if not hundreds that turned towards him, and he could have imagined they'd grown as homogenous as the St Dunstan's uniform. His bad night must be catching up with him, because it wasn't until Amy went to Tom that Slater singled out his son. Didn't the two of them usually join their friends? Slater was distracted by a clank not unlike the snapping of a trap—the sound of a message. He wondered if the children were making sure he'd kept his word until he saw that the sender was Melanie. That should help, the screen said.

She flourished her mobile when he found her in the mirror. Perhaps she'd concluded as he had that the children might be seeking reassurance before the concert. He brandished his phone and then responded You as well. While this could have been clearer, she gave him a smile, and he sent her one before looking away from the mirror to see the schoolyard was deserted.

He wished he'd seen the children going into the school, especially since the reflection of the sky rendered every window blank. As he drove off Melanie followed him. He oughtn't to be so conscious of her that he failed to focus on the road, and he looked ahead to see there was traffic to be kept in mind. He was nearly at the graveyard before he realised that he didn't know when her car had vanished from the mirror.

The Astra wobbled as though it had been overwhelmed by a gale. He'd caused the turbulence; his hands jerking at the wheel had. Surely he had no reason to panic, but the car wavered again as his phone uttered its clank. He pulled into the nearest entrance to the cemetery and read Melanie's new message. Love you, it said. Still here.

He was troubled by her having needed to add the last words, and he couldn't think how to respond except by copying her message back to her, which he'd never done in his life. As he put the phone away he saw the police car lurking among the memorials. Had the police seen him use the phone while the engine was running? No, the white shape beneath the unproductive trees was a tomb, not a vehicle, and he did his best to leave the error behind along with the graveyard.

The road shrank between the huddled shops, which looked more forgotten than ever. Beyond them cars were halted on the main road, but moved off as he caught sight of them. No doubt traffic lights had released them. In the retail park the sky seemed to be on its way to leaching every vehicle of colour. Was he parking in yesterday's space? When he glanced back at the Astra he could have thought the windscreen had already grown as frosted as its neighbours, but that must be the reflection of the sky as well.

Another reflection met him at Texts, though when the pallid glass doors slipped apart he saw that to some extent it had been composed of Shelley Blake. He wondered how long she'd spent in emphasising her features, outlining her grey eyes as if to stop them growing paler, pinkening her lips. Even her silvery blonde hair looked more metallic, exhaustively touched up. Since she appeared to expect him to speak first, he felt as if he should have prepared a remark. "On time this time," he said.

"Let's hope it's every day now." Surely she didn't need to think before adding "Paul."

"Let's hope they aren't all like this one." Perhaps that sounded too unenthusiastic, and he jerked his head to indicate the sky—it felt not unlike lurching awake. "How much longer do you think we're going to carry on like this?"

"I think we'd better carry on just as we have been. That's why we're here."

She either hadn't understood or chose not to understand. The doors met behind him, shutting in an almost inaudible vaguely musical murmur. When he raised his eyes in its general direction Shelley Blake said "Is that still you?"

"Don't you know?" In case this seemed too combative he said "I mean, didn't someone start it off today?"

"It's whatever was here overnight."

"Then I expect I'm responsible." Since her expression didn't waver, not that there was much of it, Slater said "Would you like a change?"

"We don't want anything out of hand. Just be sure you play it safe."

As he wondered how much less adventurous she imagined a choice of music could be, she said "And then can you put everything in order?"

"Everything," Slater said and risked a laugh.

"All the discs." She stared at his badge as if this would remind him of his job. "All your music, Paul." As he thought of retorting that it was by no means all his she said "Make sure it's the right order."

"Which one is that?"

"The one everybody wants. There's only one." She plainly felt it was unreasonable of him to make her add "The one everybody can see."

She had to mean whichever was easiest to understand. Slater went to the racks to find the shop its music. He was disconcerted by how complicated the arrangement of the discs seemed, even to him: composers, performers, conductors, symphonies, concertos, operas, oratorios, songs. .. He felt incapable of making a selection until film music came into his mind, but Fantasia ought to strike a chord with everyone. No sooner had he thought of it than he saw the album in the rack. As the Bach prelude that conjured up innumerable macabre films began a muted thunder overhead, Slater made for the staff quarters, tugging out his badge to meet the plaque. "Paul Slater," he snarled under his breath in case the system was reluctant to acknowledge him, and felt as if he might have to say more until he heard the mechanism find in his favour.

The music followed him into the staffroom—notes that kept mounting towards a peak to fall back and recommence their climb. On the way to his locker he caught sight of the memory board, which still displayed the remnants of the message in his handwriting. How could there be more to it than he'd previously seen? He must be viewing it from an angle at which the overhead glare didn't blot out quite so many characters, faint though they were. ERE PA LATE—he still couldn't reconstruct the words, which left him feeling inadequate. He raised a hand to wipe out the meaningless fragments but instead hurried to his locker.

The metal door shut with a clank like the amplified sound of an incoming message. The children would be in their classes by now, and Melanie might be on the road. He wished he'd thought to ask where she was working. The music had risen into a blaze of sound suggestive of an unquenchable light, unless the film had put that into his head. It couldn't dispel the pallid blankness that surrounded him—the concrete walls—and once the time clock had contributed a random note to the music he made his way out of the room.

He didn't know how long he gazed at the racks, trying to see how the discs could be better arranged—long enough that he began to feel in danger of forgetting what the sight meant. It was music rendered solid; no, it was a kind of memory of music, fragments of the past stored in the form of impulses. He needn't dwell on that, because the idea seemed to leave him less able to read the names and words. Surely it was best to use the ones that were poking up on tags above the discs for customers to see, not that there were many of those in the shop just now. Composers had to come first, or there would be no music, or had folk music come before any composer? On second thought the alphabet must be the solution; it was the order most people knew. So a performer like Glenn Gould preceded Handel after all, and Angela Hewitt took precedence over Holst, but did she over Bach? Surely last names counted most, since some people mightn't know the others. For a moment Slater could have imagined that the racks were already in the order he'd thought up, but he had to remember that wasn't how he'd just seen them. He took hold of the handful of cases behind the letter A composers insufficiently prolific to have name tags of their own—and moved them to the beginning, and then he set about following them.

The cases and the tags clacked like counters in a game. The sound kept driving the music out of his head, and soon he'd lost all sense of time and even of the shop around him. He mustn't grow unaware of Melanie and the children, wherever they were just now, and he was fixing as much of his mind on them as he could spare when a voice he ought to know said "Trying to put it all back together?"

He turned to be met by a blur, hardly even a sketch of a face. It regained its features as he confronted it fully—the eyes peering from beneath the overstated eyebrows, the mouth that seemed to need defining by its hairy frame, a few surplus strands accentuating the nostrils. The sight made Slater wonder when he'd last shaved: presumably this morning, since however hard he rubbed his chin he couldn't feel any stubble. "Doing my best," he said. "What can I do for you today, Mr Allen?"

"Maybe you have. You remember."

"Your order, you mean. It may be a bit soon," Slater said but made for the Information desk. "Let me see for you."

"Thank you, Mr Slayer."

Although Slater must have misheard, he hesitated at the computer. What name had he needed to type last time? The Bach hovered over him again—four notes tramping upwards, three of them outdistancing the fourth—as he remembered that the system called for his first name: no, not Derek. He keyed the four letters and brought up the customer's order. "As I say, Mr Allen ..."

"Close enough."

"I'm afraid it hasn't come for you yet."

"Not a problem and maybe the opposite. Any chance you can take it off the computer?"

"I should think we'd be in time. You're saying you don't want it now."

"I think we may have remembered it wrong, the both of us." As Slater attempted to feel less incompetent the man said "It was a poem, not a song."

"It could still have been set to music."

"Maybe everything can be." Allen tilted his head towards the music that was following Bach—the Tchaikovsky suite. "Like the funguses," he said.

He must have the film in mind. Slater might have pointed out that he had the process back to front—the music had produced the mushrooms— but only said "Do you recall the poem?"

"I remember, I remember." It wasn't clear that these were the opening words until the man added "It wasn't the town where you were born, it was the house."

Rather than attempt to recall where that had been in his case Slater said "I'm afraid I don't know any music for that."

"Nobody's expecting you to. Do you know how it goes on? But now I often wish the night had borne my breath away."

Slater reminded himself that this was only a quotation. "Shall I get rid of this, then?"

"May as well. You don't want too much stuff on the system."

As Slater cancelled the order he saw his postcode vanish from the screen, and was disconcerted by how vulnerable this made him feel. He found himself taking hold of the phone in his pocket like some kind of talisman. A glance showed him it hadn't received any messages, which seemed reassuring enough to let him say "You'd have felt what my family did the other night."

"Why," Allen said with an oddly guarded look, "what did they do?"

"Nothing." The word seemed too bare, not to mention defensive. "They didn't do anything at all," Slater insisted. "I'm saying what they felt."

"Which other night?"

"Not the last one. The one before."

"The last one." Perhaps the man was simply sampling the phrase. "Nonesday, you mean," Allen said. "You're telling me I know what they felt."

"I'm assuming you must have felt it as well, knowing where you live."

"Didn't you just blank that out? What are we meant to have felt?"

"I'm told it was an earthquake."

"I don't think I'd have felt one of those."

Slater couldn't very well not ask "Why, what else was happening?"

"I don't know what you'd call it. Maybe a bit of a seizure. First one I'd had in all my life."

Though the man was visibly reluctant to talk about it, Slater felt compelled to learn "What did it do to you?"

"Put me out like a light. I don't know how long I was. Next thing I knew it was starting to be the next day."

Slater wasn't sure that he wanted to ask "Have you any idea what time it happened?"

"I'd say about midnight." Some kind of resolution made the man add "No, midnight it is."

"It sounds like what some of my family felt." Having said that, Slater was driven to add "Someone at my children's school was talking about it as well."

"What did they say to you?"

"I wasn't there. They were asking a teacher." Although he felt as if he'd already said too much, he told Allen 'Apparently the teacher didn't like it much and took them to see someone."

"A doctor, would that be?"

"I don't know." In a moment Slater blurted "Nobody seems to. That's what bothers me."

"You needn't let it. They weren't one of yours by the sound of it."

"I oughtn't to be concerned just with my family."

"You want to watch what you let in your mind these days."

Before Slater could enquire what this had to do with Allen or anyone outside the family, Shelley Blake said "When you're in the shop it should be on the shop."

Slater had no idea how long she had been listening or even where she'd come from, though Allen looked unsurprised enough to suggest he'd been aware of her. "I think it is," Slater objected, "if I'm dealing with a customer."

"I'd better stop pretending to be one then, hadn't I?" Allen took his leave by adding "Thanks for looking for me."

Shelley kept her glaze on Slater, who said "I believe he's a neighbour of ours."

She might almost have been giving him a minute's silence before she said "Some thoughts are best kept to yourself."

"You don't mean that one."

It wasn't much of a joke, and even less once it was out. As if he hadn't spoken Shelley said "A lot better if you don't have them at all."

"Forgive me, what are we talking about?" When she gave him a stare as blank as the sky—it looked like a refusal to think—he said "I've never been a Finalist, if that's what you're getting at. I'm even less likely to be one now."

He wouldn't have thought it possible for her eyes to grow blanker. "I wish you hadn't brought that up," she said. "Try keeping your mind on the job."

When she moved away he turned his attention to the racks, and his awareness of her vanished like a breath, taking his rage at her admonition with it. Where had he been before he was interrupted? Best to start again at the beginning in order not to be distracted by the hours that were dancing in the air. Even if they were invisible, were they rendering time more substantial? He didn't quite know what he meant by that, especially since he'd forgotten whether they were elephants or hippopotami. Besides confusing him, this made him think he ought to recall something else. There was just his family, and a surreptitious glance at his mobile confirmed that they still hadn't sent him a message, although why should he feel reassured that there was no sign of them? Perhaps they were waiting for some word from him.

As he brought their names into the destination window he wished his mother had a mobile too. Was Melanie keeping in touch with her parents? He assumed she must be, but he hadn't room for any more people in his mind just now; he was too busy thinking of a message. I'm all right, he typed and added so long as you are, holding the phone as low as he could reach. Every letter emitted a muted bleep that reminded him how electronic the communication was, and he couldn't help feeling spied upon, even though he wasn't visible in any of the security mirrors, at least not to himself. He launched the message and watched the icon blink to indicate that his words were on their way. The instant the symbol subsided he put away the mobile, and looked up to see a man and woman entering the shop.

Though he didn't recall having seen them before, he knew they were security. They were so identically watchful that their expressions seemed to sum up the whole of them. He could easily have fancied that their vigilance had clenched their compact faces. He glanced about in search of a shoplifter or some other kind of criminal, but couldn't even see a customer. Those of his colleagues he could see were keeping their heads well down. He managed not to realise who the quarry was until the newcomers paced around either end of the music racks to close in on him.

They were in uniform, twin outfits so thoroughly grey that they looked close to denying any colour. The woman's cropped hair was only slightly longer than the man's, and her eyebrows were even less defined than his, as though to compensate. Their lips and eyes were nearly as pale as their skin, which had all the smoothness of the sky. The woman opened her mouth, but it was her partner who said "Mr Derek."

Slater did his best to feel misidentified. "That's not me."

Their attention seemed to converge on his badge. "It's on the record, Mr Slater," the woman said.

"I am, am I?" he said and felt as if his words were playing with him. "What's the trouble?"

"You won't want to discuss it here," the man said.

Slater wasn't far from panic. "Is it to do with my family?"

"It doesn't have to be."

He would have liked to hear more reassurance in the woman's voice. "You want somewhere private, do you?"

"We think you may," the man told him.

Though Slater didn't know why he should feel responsible or even if he should, he made for the staffroom. At the plaque the guards loomed on either side of him. "You know who I am," he muttered, "don't start pretending you don't," and dragged his name out from his chest to fit to the reader. The door gave, and the solid pallor of the staffroom closed around him. As he found a chair at the head of the table, which appeared to have been scrubbed completely featureless, the man sat on his left while the woman sat opposite her colleague, and Slater could have thought their faces were adding to the blankness of the room. "So," he said in an attempt to regain some sense of the situation, "what can I do for you?"

"Better do it for yourself," the woman said.

"And your family."

"A bit of a task," Slater retorted, "if I don't know what I'm doing."

They met this with a look that put him in mind of pincers gripping him. "We hear you've been having doubts," the man said.

"Hear from whom?" When their eyes grew blank as a silence rendered visible, Slater said "Has someone here been talking about me?"

"No need for that."

He wasn't sure whether the man was rebuking him, even when the woman said "We've observations of our own."

"You've been observing me, have you?" He felt as if their inexpressiveness was swallowing his rage without a trace. "And all you've found," he said, "is I've been having doubts."

"And disturbing other people," the woman said.

"Which other people?" Slater had a disconcertingly undefined sense that he shouldn't have asked that, or indeed "Doubts about what?"

"The state of things," the man said like a warning.

"Since when haven't we been allowed to question that, whatever it is? I didn't think that was the kind of place I was living in."

"Perhaps it's time it was," the woman said.

"If it's for everyone's good."

"My god, you sound like Finalists. They couldn't see beyond their own beliefs either."

"No," the woman said, "we're the opposite."

"And they're one thing you should forget about," the man said.

Slater wasn't going to be told what he ought to remember. As incredulously as he could manage he said "Is this really all because I was asking about the earthquake?"

Nobody spoke. Their eyes might even have been trying to deny that he had and to convince him of it as well. Anger indistinguishable from panic provoked him to blurt "Are you the same people who take children away for asking too much?"

He didn't need their eyes to tell him that he had. They could hardly arrest him for it, and he demanded "What happens to them?"

"They see the truth." Just as tonelessly the woman said "Exactly what do you think you're going to achieve?"

"You're doing nobody any good," the man said, "least of all yourself."

Slater had a grotesque sense of listening to parents. He'd found nothing to say when an electronic clank resounded through the room. "Better see what you have," the woman said.

The phone clanked again as he took hold of it, and once more as he fumbled it out of his pocket. "Take your time," the male guard said.

This infuriated Slater almost too much to let him finger the keys. We are, he saw at last, and then We are and We are. Of course that didn't mean the senders were together. Tom and Amy might be, and presumably Melanie felt able to speak for them all. "It's my family," he said.

"Are they as they ought to be?"

Before Slater could respond to her question the woman's partner said "Best concentrate on keeping them that way."

Slater was on the brink of enquiring what kind of threat this was meant to be, but only said "How do you suggest I should do that?"

"You might try responding to them." the woman said.

He barely held back from retorting that he didn't need this kind of advice. How much did she think she knew about him and his family? How closely could they have been observed? He did his best to think he was saving them as he replied Then we all are. He looked up to find the guards were gazing in the vague direction of the subdued music, Bach tramping eternally uphill. "Are you giving us that?" the woman said.

Had they even watched him choose the disc? Slater couldn't quite ask but said "It's part of my job."

"We'll let you get back to the rest," the man said.

Slater couldn't risk believing they'd finished with him until they stood up in unison. They stood aside to let him touch his badge to the inner plaque, and then they led or at any rate accompanied him to the music section, where they lingered to watch him start putting the Adams albums in sequence. "That's more like it," the man said. "Order keeps the world in shape."

"That's what you should be about, Mr Paul."

"Mr Slater," the man added or amended.

While resenting their praise Slater was disgusted to find that it came as a relief, all of which he kept to himself in the hope they would leave him alone. He concentrated on his task until he realised they'd gone away, and then he did his utmost to forget them and whatever they represented. He couldn't afford any more distractions; he had to finish before it was time to leave for the concert. The clatter of plastic reminded him of tiles in a gambling game, and he was struggling to focus only on the names when he became aware that Shelley Blake was watching him. "Don't let me take your mind off it," she said.

"I'm afraid our visitors did." Having managed to recall that she hadn't been responsible for them, Slater said "Sorry if they bothered you."

"They shouldn't bother anyone."

"They rather did me. If you're wondering—"

"I'm not, Paul. I don't want to know, and nobody else does. So long as they're happy, that's all that matters."

"I'd say at least a few more people do."

"Nobody's saying you shouldn't keep them in mind."

The conversation had begun to feel as indefinite as a discussion in a dream, and he went back to rearranging names. He hadn't time for lunch, and he could do without dealing with customers too, not that he was aware of any. The light of the sky seemed as artificially constant as the glow of the fluorescents overhead, all of which robbed him of any sense of the passing of time. When he became aware of Shelley Blake once more he could have thought she had never moved away, but his watch showed him he'd come to the end of his shift. "Well, Paul," she said.

This sounded no less neutral than the sky looked, and he strained to find some meaning in it. "I think I'm finished for the day," he said.

"Is it as it should be?"

Someone else had said the like of that recently, but he couldn't recall any more. "It is for now. I'll come back to it next time."

"Tomorrow."

"Not tomorrow." Her word felt altogether too possessive, and he had to reclaim the day. "Sunday," he said. "I'm with my family tomorrow. I should be with them now."

"I must have forgotten you weren't here." With a look that seemed to want to hold him where he stood she said "We will be."

He would have supposed so without being told, and he didn't understand her emphasis. Outside the shop the parked cars seemed more faded than ever. No doubt the daylight was too muffled to dispel the frost, which helped to give them an abandoned look. The yip with which the Astra greeted him sounded enfeebled, surely because so many vehicles were in the way; he needn't panic over thinking the electronics had run down. He started the engine and set off the wipers to bring the world back into some kind of focus. While it wasn't yet time for the concert, he couldn't help growing nervous while he waited for the windows to clear.

He would have expected to find more people heading home on the main road. Where he turned towards the school the dilapidated shops looked grey as ash and hardly more substantial, as if they might collapse before his eyes. In the cemetery the trees were propping up the sky, and he couldn't make out a single inscription; the stones might as well have been blank. An open space showed him St Dunstan's ahead. The mass of railings edged apart, letting the long blocks of the school regain their shape, and he saw a solitary figure in the yard.

It was Melanie. He parked behind her car in the line of frozen vehicles alongside the featureless slabs of the pavement and hurried into the schoolyard. "Am I late?" he called.

"You just aren't," Melanie said, already heading for the main entrance.

Beyond the doors, which were as silent as they were imposing, a corridor that apparently had no time for colours led towards the blurred murmur of an audience. A stretch of the left-hand wall was occupied by overcoats unnecessarily reminiscent of abandoned wings. As Slater hastened after Melanie the tuneless mass of voices kept any identifiable words to itself, and he had an odd sense of overhearing a rehearsal. The murmur rose as though to greet him when he opened the door to the assembly hall, where the sight of hundreds of backs of heads seemed to render the dialogue even more secretive. As he hurried ahead of Melanie in search of unoccupied seats he felt no less anxious than he had in the car park. He didn't think he'd breathed for a while by the time he located a pair of empty seats near the middle of the third row from the bare stage. "Excuse me," he called above the blur of voices, "are those anyone's?"

Every face between him and the spaces turned to gaze at him. Of course only their movements were identical. "They'll be yours," someone said.

All the watchers faced the stage and stood up in unison to make way for Melanie, and Slater was reminded of illustrations popping up from a book he'd owned as a child. They stayed on their feet until he passed along the row, keeping Melanie in sight, which meant the series of faces on the edge of his vision lost any individuality they had. As he sat down, the line of figures did, but he couldn't hear the folding seats for the omnipresent murmur, which had begun to seem as indistinct as the sky that was the entire content of the high windows. He found the murmur breathlessly oppressive, and was struggling to think of some conversation when it faded into silence as though a volume control had been turned down. The headmistress had taken the stage. "Welcome to St Dunstan's," she said.

He was thrown by her resemblance to Shelley Blake, though he was unable to recall how else he might have expected her to look. Her fingers were loosely intertwined like a reminiscence of a prayer, which made him feel guilty, singled out at school. He and Melanie had professed enough of a belief to have the children enrolled at St Dunstan's, but only because of its musical reputation. At least their lack of a belief was strong enough to fend off the likes of the Finalists, he told himself as the headmistress said "You know how much time we've spent getting ready for you and I know you'll agree it has been worthwhile."

She had more to say while some of the pupils carried music stands and chairs onstage, to be followed by the orchestra with their instruments. Slater wondered why all this had been left so late, although he hadn't realised when he'd seen the stage was bare. The muted activity seemed to merge into an undifferentiated blur that distracted him from the speech, but he managed to hear the headmistress say "You've come for the music, not to hear me. Here's some I'm sure you know."

Slater did before the orchestra had played five notes. It was the Pastoral, and performed a good deal more to his taste than in the film or at the shop. The cartoon images seemed to be leaving him alone, and he found himself waiting for the hymn after the storm. It wasn't actually a hymn; Beethoven hadn't been naive enough to think it would bring back the sun, and it couldn't hold off the night either. Slater was reminded of the Finalists; suppose their belief had been the strongest in the world, however briefly? They had certainly managed to convey it to everyone he could bring to mind. It might have been too powerful to have gone away, in which case what had happened to it? Of course it was irrational, but then so were its adherents, and mightn't that add to its power for them? Where had they all gone? There was no point in glancing at his neighbours—that wouldn't show him whether they were among the faithful—but the line of faces dwindling towards the walls troubled him, especially the faces at the far end, where he could have thought they were merging with the pale blurred surface. At last the symphony disintegrated into an explosion of applause, and as Slater stopped clapping the headmistress said "Now it's time for voices."

She was somewhere out of sight on the front row. The renewed murmur of the audience covered up any sounds the choir made in gathering onstage. Their faces put Slater in mind of pale flowers blooming from a mass of foliage. At first he couldn't see Amy or Tom, and then he was aware only of them. They looked at least as intent as several other people he'd encountered recently, an earnestness that didn't falter even when the children met his eyes. As they shifted it to the conductor who had taken up her post in front of the choir, she raised her hands, reviving the silence. Slater saw Tom and Amy take a breath or at any rate part their lips, and found he couldn't breathe himself. He'd heard less than the first phrase when he was overtaken by the notion that he'd already known what they would sing. "In this fair town where I was born..."

Did the man who'd tried to order it have a child at the school? Slater wasn't sure the explanation could bear too much scrutiny, but surely it would let him concentrate on the performance. "All in the merry month of May..." He wasn't about to look for Allen in the audience; just the thought made the faces beside him seem far too reminiscent of an identity parade. 'And death was drawing nigh him..." As he saw their mouths shaping the syllables he wondered if this was what somebody had in mind when they'd said a word was made flesh. He supposed he shouldn't think that here, and perhaps anywhere else, not least because it felt like a threat to perception. "As she was walking o'er the fields, she heard the death bell knelling..." Words were information, and he might easily conclude that all life was a form of it—a set of electronic impulses—but where did that lead him? Nowhere he thought he would choose to go, and he tried to drive the reverie out of his mind by only hearing the ballad. "Farewell..." This wasn't the last word, it was the first one of the final verse, but it seemed capable of doing away with everything that came after.

The hush that followed the final word of the choir—"Allen", which Slater could imagine was trying to remind him of someone—immediately splintered into applause that saw the children off the stage. As soon as he couldn't see Amy and Tom he was anxious to know where they were. He twisted around until he found them by the back wall, among other members of the choir. When he faced the stage again he was dogged by an impression that he'd recognised more people in the audience than he would have expected, even if he couldn't bring them to mind now. "Nothing's wrong," he muttered in case Melanie was about to ask, as well as on his own behalf.

It would disrupt the occasion too much if he were to take the family and leave. He felt as if he'd been warned not to cause disorder. Remembering that soon they would all be together helped him sit through the rest of the concert—a young pianist playing a transcription of Bach's famous prelude and fugue, a selection from Tchaikovsky's best-known ballet arranged for a chamber group whose percussion sounded oddly electronic, a soprano singing Schubert's Ave Maria, an orchestral finale that took the listener up the mountain to meet the demon. At last the frenzy of the resurrected sank back into the graves, and the music had scarcely faded to its final note when someone burst into applause as if they couldn't bear the silence.

Slater wasn't slow to follow. Melanie joined in, and he saw pairs of hands rise up on both sides of him like a startled flock of winged creatures. As the clapping subsided and the row began to empty, Tom and Amy came to find their parents. "You really brought it alive," Melanie said. "You were stellar."

"You deserve to be up in the sky," Slater said.

Perhaps this went too far, which might explain why Amy was gazing hard at him. "Dad."

"Amy," he said and wondered why he had an impulse to add her brother's name.

"I can't see her."

More nervously than he could recall ever having heard her speak, Melanie said "Who?"

"The girl I told dad about. The one they—"

"Not now, Amy." Slater had a sense that far too many people were listening; he could even have fancied that the entire audience had halted on its way out of the hall—that if he looked he might see someone who had interrogated him. "Later," he said.

"When later?"

"Tomorrow."

It was the only answer that came into his mind, but he felt as though he'd made a promise, especially when Tom's eyes brightened. "We're going to see the sun, aren't we? You said."

"I don't know how far we may have to go."

"That doesn't matter, does it, mummy?" Amy said. "We'll all be together."

"That's all it's about," Melanie said.

Slater looked away to see that the hall was deserted, though he hadn't heard anyone leave. Being confronted by the rows of unoccupied seats made him feel like a show that had come to an end or at least to an interval. "Time we were home," he said.

The corridor wall was bare of coats. Tom and Amy had theirs— indeed, they'd put them on. The empty schoolyard felt as if the walls and the equally blank ceiling of the corridor had opened out and risen, but not enough. "Who's in my car?" Slater said as he made for the gates.

"I wish we'd just used one."

He didn't need to understand why Melanie felt that way. "We will tomorrow."

"It's my turn," Tom declared and turned to his sister. "You be with mummy."

Slater couldn't see why the boy thought he had to tell her. No doubt if Tom didn't have some strange ideas he wouldn't be a child, and the same must be true of his sister. Slater supposed he'd entertained a few odd notions when he was either of their ages, but it wasn't worth attempting to remember. He climbed into the Astra and let his son in while Melanie and Amy carried out their version of the routine. Once he'd followed the Viva away from the kerb he glanced in the mirror but couldn't see the school. All that mattered was to keep Melanie and their daughter in sight, though of course not to the exclusion of Tom. The boy seemed as intent on them as Slater was, and his voice sounded no less concerned. "Dad?"

"Tom."

"What was Amy saying happened to some girl?"

"She was spirited away for asking too much." While Slater meant this for an amiable warning, it seemed to have turned more ominous. "I don't really know and Amy doesn't either," he said. "I think it's best forgotten."

"You said you were going to talk about it tomorrow."

"I'm sure we'll have better things to do then, aren't you?" More urgently than he understood Slater said "Don't remind her and perhaps she won't remember."

Tom stared ahead so fiercely that Slater wondered what he thought he saw. There was just the other car beneath the sky that seemed to weigh on the trees, which looked close to sinking into the open spaces that bordered the road. As the Viva led the Astra into St Peter Street the trees closed in, and so did the sky as though its supports had begun to give way. Everything outside the car looked attenuated by the pallor that lingered on the windows, and even when Slater ducked out of the car in the drive the dull glare of the sky seemed to have diminished his vision. "Let's get inside," he muttered, blinking at the family to bring them into focus.

He couldn't judge how much of a difference the hall light made to the pallor that appeared to have settled into the house. "What are we having for dinner?" Melanie said.

Slater supposed she was asking for preferences, but Amy said "I'm not very hungry."

"I'm not," Tom said.

"Did you have something before the concert? Hasn't it left any room?"

When they'd finished nodding and the opposite Melanie said "Then you'd better say, Paul."

"I wouldn't say no to an early night if we don't know how far I'll be driving tomorrow."

"One of us can." She might have been about to tell him not to leave them so soon, but whatever she saw in his eyes seemed to change her mind. "I shouldn't think you'll need singing to sleep," she said.

"I never have," Slater told her and was unable to recall ever having sung Tom or Amy to sleep. He didn't think he ever would. A sharp pang of loss that he didn't want to understand, never mind letting his family suspect, made him retreat to the bathroom.

As he foamed at the mouth or at any rate the teeth he wondered what was troubling him. Was there a word he ought to find significant? It wasn't retails nor yet relates, though it might be related to both. Of course, it was his name in the mirror. He couldn't have said why the rearrangement of the name made him feel vulnerable, but he dropped the badge face down beside the sink. The vibration of the toothbrush resounded through his head until the electronic roaming felt indistinguishable from him. Laying down his badge hadn't prevented the image in the mirror from continuing to bemuse him. What exactly did it consist of? What did he? If it was a projection of himself, what else might be? He didn't want to be alone with it or his thoughts, and he barely lingered to grab his tag. The family came to their doors as he made for the bedroom. "We'll be early too," Melanie said.

"We won't be late," Amy told him.

Presumably this was a bid at a quip, but it sounded somehow ominous. It hung in the air until Tom pointed at the badge his father had taken off. "Now you aren't a text, dad."

Slater wasn't sure how to welcome this or even if he did. He left Melanie a hug as he slipped past her into their bedroom. As he took his place in the bed he planted his badge on the table beside it, only to feel as if he was making sure he would be identifiable in the night. Who would need to identify him? He closed his eyes and felt they were shutting out too much of the world. He thought he'd closed them for scarcely a moment, but when he opened them he saw that the window was dark. Surely that meant he could sleep, and he would let himself once Melanie joined him. In fact she was beside him, and the room was dark as well. He slid a hand around her to be gripped hard and closed his eyes to help him concentrate on her presence, but his mind had a question for him. Had he overlooked a name? Which was the one that came first? He ought to solve the problem before he tried to sleep, so as to be ready for Sunday—not the day of the sun, which would be tomorrow. Sunday didn't mean that putting the names in order had anything to do with religion, but it seemed to be his kind of ritual, and wasn't religion an attempt to bring order to the world? Wasn't any belief? Names—his mind felt in danger of being overwhelmed by them, and there might well be a composer before Adams, perhaps someone called Abbot, though surely not Abate. And did Bach lead the Bs? Babbitt sounded possible, but Babel was something else, conceivably the mass of names in his mind. Babel had been the outcome of reaching for heaven, and he hadn't realised how many scraps of religion had lodged in his consciousness. Did he need singing to sleep after all? He mustn't disturb his family, but perhaps he could simply imagine the music. If he could just bring to mind a phrase by each composer in order, that might be better than a lullaby for him.

He didn't know how long he had been straining to think of a melody of Abbot's by the time he heard the music. At first he thought it was a man's voice—perhaps he was asleep after all, and singing—until he managed to distinguish that there was more than one, so muffled or so distant that he'd taken them for a solitary murmur. It was the ballad again; the children were breathing it, possibly in their sleep. Their voices proved they were still there in the dark, which meant he needn't go to look, let alone imagine that they were using the song to remind themselves of their own existence. Or could he be dreaming the voices? Dreams were disordered memories, after all, that adopted new shapes in the mind. He mustn't let them do that—he didn't even want to think why not—and he redoubled his hold on Melanie's waist in the hope of regaining control of his thoughts. He might have asked if she could hear the children, supposing she was awake, but she wasn't there at all.

That and his silent struggle to cry out snatched his eyes open. She was standing at the end of the bed, hand in hand with the children. "Back in the land of the living?" she said. "We're ready whenever you are."

They were indeed dressed for an outing. As he sat up, Slater peered at the window but could see nothing beyond the glass. It took him some time to grasp that the sky had stayed blank. "Still no sun," he mumbled.

"You said we'd find it," Tom reminded him.

"We'll go up if we have to, won't we?" Amy said.

"We may." Slater found he was groping about the bedside table, but he didn't need the time, never mind his name badge. "Anyway, let me get going," he said. "Someone can bring me a coffee if they like."

"There's nothing in the house, Paul."

"Nothing," Slater said and tried to sound only jovially incredulous. "Haven't we been to the shops?"

"I've had other things on my mind just like everybody else." Her desire not to worry the subject was plain as she said "We can look for something on the way if anyone's bothered."

She and the children moved towards the stairs as Slater made for the bathroom. Once the door was shut, if not sooner than that, he couldn't hear them. He was tempted to call out, but it was enough to know they were close. There was no harm in reminding them that he was, though he couldn't remember the words of the ballad. He set about humming melodies at the top, such as it was. of his voice—the various themes of the Pastoral. He needed to be sure they were in order, though weren't the notes themselves a form of order? What sort did they bring to the world? He was uncertain whether he could hear an echo or a voice if not more than one joining in. None of the sounds could belong to his reflection, however animated by the music it appeared to be, swaying if not dancing to the rhythms and conducting them as well. Of course this meant that he was doing so, even if it felt like mimicking an image of himself. The idea didn't appeal to him, any more than the pallor that had settled on the glass to attenuate his reflection. He left the bathroom as soon as he could, to see the family sitting on the stairs. They looked like three descending stages of a life, not unreminiscent of the photographs above them. "Was anyone singing?" he said.

"You were," Amy said, and Tom confirmed it with a giggle.

Melanie came to stand in the bedroom doorway while Slater dressed, and he couldn't decide whether she was playing a guard or a go-between. Perhaps she simply meant for some reason to encourage him to be quick. She sent the children to make a last use of the bathroom, and he had an odd sense that she'd remembered a scrap of their domestic ritual. As she opened the front door he thought at least one of the children murmured "Goodbye house."

In the street the trees looked worn down by the pallor that seemed to have descended into them, and Slater could have fancied they were forgetting how to bud. The windows of the Viva and the Astra were blank slabs set in the pallid metal. "Who's going to drive?" Melanie said.

"I expect you two will in time." Having extracted tentative smiles from the children, he told Melanie "Let me and you can take over if we need you to."

The Astra emitted its puppyish yip and gave them a coquettish blink, a performance that he seemed to recall amusing Tom and Amy once upon a time. They climbed in the back as Melanie sat beside him, and he saw that the windows weren't too frosted after all, however uncertain of its substance the world beyond them looked. "Ready for the big adventure?" he said and when he'd found the children in the mirror "Where do we all want to go?"

"Where the sun's gone," Tom said.

"That'll be through the tunnel," Amy told them.

"She's right, isn't she?" Slater said. "We're best going under the river if we want to catch it up."

"You're the driver," Melanie said.

As he swung the car out of the drive he lost sight of the house. By the time they reached the main road he could have thought the street had reverted to a grove; certainly that was how it appeared in the mirror, but he didn't look back. At least today's route wouldn't take him past the graveyard, where he imagined the stones and the trees deep in a secret colloquy like silence rendered solid.

There was very little traffic. He would have said all the cars they passed were parked if not abandoned, except that the occasional vehicle seemed to acknowledge his attention by moving off. Was there a fog—the frost in a less substantial form? He found it hard to make out houses, all of which appeared to be occupied by the sunless sky. Any faces he might have glimpsed at windows looked oddly nominal, more like images on screens, even if they were watching him and the family. As for any shops, it must be too early for them to be open, and their shutters left them so blank that they mightn't have been there at all.

The road had left all the buildings behind by the time it led down to the tunnel. Beyond the slanting ramp each of a pair of arches stood over two deserted lanes. As soon as Slater drove beneath the left-hand arch the pale ceiling and its apparently sourceless glow closed over the car. He couldn't judge when the weight of the earth above it gave way to the burden of the invisible river, but it felt as though the blank surface that straddled the car was growing more oppressively present while the enclosed road sank lower, pressed down by the roof. The sight of the unrelieved vista that stretched more than a mile to a subterranean bend seemed to have silenced the family and, he could have thought, the car as well. Unable to think of anything he cared to say, he began to hum the reminiscences of the Pastoral. Before long Melanie joined in, and then the children did. Beethoven had never meant the music as a vocal quartet, but there was nobody except the family to hear. Slater didn't know how often they'd rehearsed the themes when they came to the bend, which appeared to lead up to an unrelieved pale blankness. No, there was a line of tollbooths, and he was suddenly afraid he'd come all this way to no avail. "Have we got some money?" he said not unlike a prayer.

"We couldn't forget that, could we?" Melanie said.

He wasn't sure how much of a question this might be until she displayed the coins, which reassured him for as long as he failed to notice what was odd about the tollbooths. Surely most of the barriers beyond the narrow booths used to be automatic, but now every cabin was occupied, and every face turned in unison to watch the car. He had an uneasy sense that he was close to recognising some of them—far too many if not all—or was that a result of their expressionless official look, which was identical not just among themselves but with everyone who'd interrogated him since he'd come home? He had to choose a booth before anyone could find his hesitation suspicious, and he drove towards the exit in the middle of the line. "Nobody say anything," he almost didn't think to mutter. "If anyone has to talk I will."

The attendant was a woman or a man with long nondescript hair—the smooth bland inexpressive face gave no indication of gender. Slater was on the way past the booth to the toll basket when the window above him slid back and the attendant leaned over the sill. "A moment, please."

The pale voice seemed sexless too. The lack of any character made the attendant seem to sum up all the officials Slater had encountered recently—an ominous summation. He saw the barrier twitch like a warning not to proceed. "What's wrong?" he blurted.

"What do you think is?"

"Nothing if you say so."

He didn't care how much this sounded like a plea so long as it let them past the barrier. The eyes gazing at him were so pale or so reflective of the sky that he couldn't distinguish the pupils. "May we ask where you're going?" the attendant said.

Retorting that it was nobody's business but the family's wouldn't make the attendant go away. Slater didn't know when all the faces in the other booths had turned to watch him. "Out for a run," he said.

"Not running away, are you?"

"What would I be running from?"

He had a nervous sense of having said too much—that the trick was not to suggest anything was amiss, even by implying that it couldn't be. The blank gaze rested on him for an indeterminate time before the attendant said "What are you taking where you plan to go?"

"Where am I, back at immigration?" Instead of demanding this Slater said "Just my family. You can see."

The attendant didn't look away from him. The blankness seemed to spread out of the eyes as the face withdrew into the booth, and Slater could have thought the features had grown altogether too indefinite. "Can we go now?" he blurted.

"Wherever you think."

He couldn't even tell which booth the muffled voice came from. Melanie handed him the coins to throw into the metal basket, and as the barrier wavered upwards he thought he heard a sound on both sides of the car, a murmur less than words—less than a sigh. A glance in the mirror as he drove onto the motorway showed him the row of narrow boxes, each peopled by a figure that looked as if it was propped up. While all of them appeared to be gazing after the car, he couldn't make out an expression or indeed a face. Then the windows of the booths turned pallidly opaque as if a single breath had settled on them, and he fixed his attention on the way ahead.

There was very little to distract him from the road. Either frost or fog must be rendering the fields so pale. In the distance, far beyond the point at which perspective pinched the road invisible, he saw how the land rose against the sky at the horizon. It put him in mind of an act of defiance—whose, he didn't know. However remote it seemed, they had to reach it long before dark. When Tom spoke Slater stared ahead as if the boy had held his peace. "Dad," Tom insisted, "there's somewhere."

"We don't need to eat, do we? Wouldn't we rather be where you asked for?"

"We don't," Amy said. "If we stop we'll never see the sun."

In any case the Traveller's Return was shut if not abandoned, and Slater didn't spare the inn another glance. "See where we're heading?" he said. "That'll bring us closer."

Perhaps this was premature. Even if the motorway could hardly lead straight to the mountain, driving as fast as he felt able to risk didn't appear to be reducing the distance. No doubt the mountain was too far away to begin to gain stature just yet, but it looked as if the dull sunken sky was holding it down. He'd lost all awareness of gripping the wheel and treading on the pedal when Tom said "How far is it now, dad?"

"As far as you see." Surely Slater could do better than that, and he said "Don't worry, we've plenty of time."

At least he'd stopped short of claiming they had all the time in the world. For the moment the sullen sunless glow looked permanent enough, but how instantaneously had darkness fallen last night? He couldn't help reflecting that the sky was just the underside of a vast blackness. He hoped nobody would ask what time it was, not least since this would show that he wasn't alone in having forgotten a watch. When he peered at the clock on the dashboard, the digital fragments that ought to form numbers had collapsed into chaos. If he'd gone in for praying he might have begged for the computer not to let the family down any further. He found the children in the mirror and saw Amy opening her mouth. "I know what should bring it, Tom."

"What?" the boy said as though he would have liked to trust his own skepticism.

"If we sing."

Slater took her to mean it would pass the time. Her brother seemed to want to be convinced, and when she set about humming the melody he added words. "In something town where I was born ..."

Slater was too intent on the road to think how to make the words more precise. Once Melanie joined in he supposed he ought to, though only with the fragments he could bring to mind. "All in the merry month of May" was the line that appealed most to him, and he sang it whenever it came around, and did his best to fend off some of the other words by humming over them.

"And death was drawing nigh him..." While he didn't want to ask if anybody knew another song, especially since he couldn't think of one himself, he was long past judging how often they'd revived the ballad by the time they came in sight of a road that led off the motorway towards the mountain.

The side road meandered between fields that lay low in a mist, if frost wasn't holding them down. The route reminded Slater of any number of places he and Melanie had taken the children when they were younger, unless they'd visited the places before the children were born. Why was the mountain taking so much time to rise ahead? "Oh mother, mother, make my bed, for I shall die tomorrow..." Melanie had fallen silent, and only the children were pronouncing the words. "Here we are," she said as if she was advising not just them but the landscape.

The bulk was indeed a mountain now, blocking off the way ahead. The slopes weren't much less pale than ice and spiky as an enormous uncontrolled crystal. The road appeared to peter out beyond it, sinking into a frozen field. Alongside the road at the foot of the mountain was an extensive car park. "It's just for us," Tom said.

Slater parked the Astra and waited for the family to join him on the deserted expanse of bare earth. The car emitted a sound he could almost have found plaintive as he activated the electronic locks. Impulses like those had no emotions or sentience, he thought, and looked hastily for something else to think. The notice beside the car park was largely illegible, and he couldn't deduce what it would have said. ME TO MY PA—he couldn't even judge where the clumps of letters would have fitted into the disintegrated message. The signpost indicating the path up the mountain said only I AM TO LATE, which he found just as incomprehensible. Perhaps it had never been in a language he recognised. "There's our way," he said.

The path took the route of a vanished stream. It bent almost at once, but he didn't bother glancing back at the car, which was already out of his mind. The smooth pale rock walls were at least twice his height, and the low sky added to the sense of climbing up a tunnel. For the moment the ascent was gentle. As Tom and Amy raced ahead Melanie called "Don't go too far."

"Can't we go to the next bend?" Amy protested.

"To see if we can see," Tom cried.

"Just stay in sight," Slater told them, finding Melanie's hand. He didn't think they would be able to see the sun from the bend ahead, where the walls were higher than ever. Was he helping Melanie climb, or was she aiding him? He couldn't recall when they had last been up a mountain, but they seemed to be equal to the task. Quite soon they caught up with the children, who were waiting impatiently at the start of the next few hundred yards of path. "It's still not there," Tom complained.

"It just means we need to go higher," Melanie said and gazed at Slater until he agreed.

Tom scrambled up the path with Amy at his heels, and their parents followed hand in hand. Were the walls growing paler as the path approached the sky? Slater mustn't imagine that the children were borrowing the pallor—at least, not unless they were climbing into a portent of the clouds, which seemed to be threatening to make them look less substantial. "Be careful," he shouted.

The walls flattened his voice, and Tom's came back even flatter. "There's nothing to be careful of."

He might have been complaining. Perhaps he was dissatisfied with the uneventfulness of the climb if not its apparent lack of a goal. The next bend led to another quarter of a mile of track between walls not much more detailed than the sky. "We'll be there before you know it," Slater vowed, which at once struck him as careless, since it seemed to urge the children up the slope. He and Melanie were on the way to matching their speed when music caught up with him—the Beethoven that wasn't quite a hymn.

Amy swung around so fast that the dust she stirred up seemed to render her and Tom momentarily immaterial. "Who is it?" she said.

She sounded as uneasy as she and her brother looked. Of course nobody could summon the family back from their mission, but Slater wished he recognised the number on the screen. He couldn't think of a question other than Amy's. "Who is it?" he demanded.

He heard a sound that was less than a breath—just electronic restlessness—and then it seemed to form into a voice. "Who else do you think it could be, Derek?"

"It might be someone who isn't called Derek," he said and mouthed at Melanie "My mother."

"Don't upset anyone, Paul. We're here and we know who you are."

Though Melanie spoke so quietly that he almost didn't hear her, his mother apparently did. "I know you like to be Paul. I was only— Her pause admitted static before she said "Just wanting to see how you were."

"I still am." This seemed unnecessarily clever, and he said more gently "Fine."

"Well, that was all I wanted. I should think you'd expect your mother to."

"Of course I would. How is it where you are?"

"Just the same as you remember."

"They're looking after you." In case that seemed patronising he added "They'll be there if you need them, Constance and the rest."

"I've got everything I need." This sounded final, especially when she said "And what are you doing with yourself?"

"We've gone out for a run on my day off."

"Where are you running to?"

He mustn't let this recall the interrogation at the tollbooth. "To the sun, we hope."

"I'll hope it too, then. I wouldn't mind another look at it. What about the grandchildren?"

The question seemed so vague that he felt as confused as he took her to be. "We've none."

Melanie frowned at him, and he was afraid he shouldn't have had the thought, let alone spoken it aloud. "Amy and Tom, you mean," he said hastily. "Your grandchildren. They're here with us, of course."

Or had they passed out of sight while he and Melanie were intent on the call? No, they'd halted on the path above their parents, and as he found them they stirred, waving at the phone. "They're saying hello to you," he said.

"It'll be that or goodbye, won't it? Say goodbye for me." With enough deliberation to be making it her last word she added "Paul."

"Grandma sends her greetings," Slater said and brought the phone back to his face, only to glimpse a movement like an insect's on the screen. At once it vanished, and he realised he'd caught sight of its dwindling— the last of the icon that denoted network coverage. "I haven't got a signal any more," he said.

Melanie and the children took out their mobiles. "We've gone too," Amy said.

"Make that all of us," her mother said. "It doesn't matter, does it? We're all here."

"Granny isn't," Tom observed.

"She'll be where she wants to be, Tom." No doubt Melanie sensed that Slater couldn't help feeling responsible, because she added "Everyone wanted you back with us, Paul."

"Or we couldn't have done our concert," Amy said.

This was surely an exaggeration, however affectionately meant. As the children recommenced their climb he put away his mobile, and thought he saw that the screen was entirely blank. Not least in order to put that behind him he murmured "I suppose she just didn't want to feel on her own."

"Maybe she's missing Allen," Melanie said.

Slater felt as if the sky had lurched towards him, bleaching his vision nearly blank. "Who?"

"Paul." This was a rebuke and incredulous as well. "Your father," she said. "That was another reason we felt you should go and see Eileen."

Slater had a panicky sense of not knowing where his mouth was or how to use it. When he felt his lips part he had to say "I don't remember."

The children had climbed out of sight— no, they were waiting again, and when Slater focused his attention on them Tom turned to say "What don't you remember, dad?"

"About—" Slater didn't know how much he risked by admitting "About my father."

"He used to call us funny names," Amy said. "Ours but not quite."

"And he'd tell us poems," Tom said.

"And sing us songs like the one we sang for you."

As Slater gazed uphill he was no longer sure what he was perceiving. He was hardly even aware of Melanie until she said "Is that enough?"

In some way it seemed to be. He had an almost indefinable impression that he could leave the memories behind, as if they were no longer necessary to him. He felt close to weightless with shedding the burden that he hadn't even realised he was carrying. What else might have to go? He could have thought his sense of liberation had released the children, who ran with no visible effort up to the next walled-in bend. "Come and see," Tom shouted, and Amy called "We're nearly there."

In a moment they were hidden by the bend. "Wait for us," Melanie protested.

Slater did his best to keep panic out of his voice, as he thought she had with hers. "You heard your mother."

"You can hear us," Tom responded, and from further off Amy contributed "We'll sing."

"In what's its name where we were born..." Their voices were muffled by the walls if not the sky, and Slater had no time to wonder how they could have come up with the identical alteration of the lyric. He didn't try to grasp what else they sang; he was too concerned with holding on to Melanie as they followed the memory of a stream. In too little time to be worth mentioning they were at the bend, from which he saw Tom and Amy at the top of the path with their backs to him. Beyond them there appeared to be nothing at all.

Before he could take a breath to call out, the children vanished off the path. "It's all right,"* he blurted, clutching Melanie's hand. "I can still hear them." Surely he could, even if no words were audible as he urged or was urged by her up the path. The sky didn't recede, and he could have thought the blank surface was waiting for them. When he stepped off the end of the path onto the summit the landscape seemed to fall away on every side, and he could have fancied that it brought the sky closer. All that mattered was seeing the children ahead.

They were standing on the peak, which was flat and oddly regular, practically a rectangle, with as little colour to it as the sky. There was room on it for Slater and for Melanie as well. From the height the fields that extended in every direction looked paler still, and might have been competing with the sky for featurelessness. He couldn't recall when he'd last seen a colour. He was trying to think that only the distance was robbing the world of its details when Tom said "How did we come?"

"Dad drove," Amy said with a laugh, not as lofty as she might have wanted it to be. "Don't you remember?"

For some moments Slater was able to believe that nothing was wrong except their inability to see the road. Their ascent could have led them around the opposite side of the mountain, after all. The trouble was that he could see no roads anywhere, and searching for them had brought another issue to his notice. The horizon was unnaturally close, no more than half as remote as it should be, if even that. The flatness of the land gave it nowhere to hide, and he didn't know how far or how often he'd turned around in the hope of seeing he was somehow mistaken before Melanie said "What are you looking for?"

"I don't need anything else," he said, fixing his gaze on her and the children. "You're all here."

Although he was determined to make that the answer, he couldn't help glancing away from them. At once he wished he hadn't, because the horizon was visibly shrinking towards the mountain. His panic felt as if his insides had dropped out of him, leaving him empty of any resource. If the family weren't seeing what he saw, might that provide any reassurance? He was struggling to think how to distract them when Tom said "It's snowing, isn't it?"

While he didn't sound entirely convinced, he seemed willing to be. Slater gripped Melanie's hand—perhaps he had never let go of it—and strove to see as Tom was seeing. Surely the blankness that was advancing all around them could be an uncommon species of snowstorm, however much it looked as if the sky was consuming the world. He had to strain his vision to distinguish that the oncoming mass consisted of innumerable flakes. He was about to risk telling Tom he was right when Amy said "Suppose we'd better go back before it gets us."

At that moment Slater saw too much. Yes, the vast inexorable mass was composed of countless fragments, but they weren't snowflakes. Only their pallor had misled him. They were shards of the landscape, which was disintegrating. They put him in mind of pixels into which the world was splintering, an image reverting to its simplest components. It left them nowhere to go, but how could he tell Amy or anyone? Before he dared to speak, Tom complained "We haven't seen the sun."

Slater felt Melanie take a firmer grip on his hand. "We don't need to," she said. "We can feel it."

"I can't," Tom declared in some kind of triumph.

"I don't think I can either," Amy said.

Melanie turned towards their father and squeezed his hand. "Close your eyes and you will."

For an instant he glimpsed that she'd seen the same as he had. How could he have imagined otherwise? "Hold our hands, you two," he said with an urgency that he knew was prompted by the shrinking landscape. "We'll all close our eyes and feel the sun together."

As they faced the children hand in hand, Amy and then Tom turned to meet them. Slater found Tom's hand, which felt disconcertingly small and frail, hardly even there. Melanie took Amy's, and the girl fumbled for her brother's. The last thing Slater saw was the trust in the children's eyes. "All shut now," Melanie said, and he thought he did begin to feel the sunlight. Surely that explained why, despite the altitude, he hadn't been able to see anyone's breath. He remembered hearing that no amount of cloud could entirely block off the sun.

What else ought he to recall? Something about children—perhaps that someone was supposed to be like a little child, though weren't you also meant to put childish things away? He was glad the children were there, at any rate. Perhaps their beliefs, whatever they were, would carry the day somehow; they could well have more beliefs than he'd retained, though he couldn't speak for Melanie. Was he thinking too much in a desperate bid to cling to some sense of himself? What would happen if he failed? Suppose you couldn't feel the light if you thought about it? He had an idea that someone might be singing wordlessly, but couldn't tell whether it was him. Then the impression seemed to be overwhelmed by if not transformed into light, which was pervading every sense. He didn't know whether he was seeing it or experiencing it in some way that left words behind, but it might have been all there was to the world.

Reading The Signs

First published in The New Gothic, December 2013

When Vernon came to a roundabout with no diversion sign, he saw he'd gone wrong. He lowered his window in the hope of hearing where the motorway was, but the night was as silent as the February sky that looked close to sagging onto the roofs of all five streets. He drove back to the last sign, which stood on another roundabout, and then he noticed what he'd previously overlooked. The four metal legs supporting the sign had gouged erratic tracks through the dewy grass. Plainly someone had thought it would be fun to move the sign.

Five roads met at this intersection too. Vernon had been driving for at least ten minutes through the moorland town, and surely he ought to be close to the route back to the motorway. He might have phoned Emma to say he was delayed, except that she was generally asleep by midnight; he hoped she was now. Instead he turned along the road between the pair he'd already followed. If it didn't bring him to a sign, he would come back.

The terraced streets were deserted. The low sky appeared to have squashed every colour besides grey out of the ranks of narrow houses. The wan glare of the streetlamps blackened the window frames and the curtains that blinded the panes, the front doors that opened onto the street. He glimpsed movement among the vehicles parked half on the pavement, but it was only a cloud of fumes seeping from under the hood of a car. Beyond the car the road bent sharply, and when it straightened, he saw somebody trudging ahead.

Even from several hundred yards away, Vernon saw the walker was unusually tall. As he put on speed for fear that the man might turn aside before Vernon could ask for directions, he became aware that the fellow's head was disconcertingly small. It turned to peer towards the car, and the upper portion of the body slipped askew. The light of the next streetlamp found it as it righted itself, and Vernon realised that a child was perched on the man's shoulders. He was relieved to see it but unnerved by having imagined anything else. He could only hope that he was safe to drive—that he wasn't too much in need of sleep.

The boy had regained his hold on the man's shoulders by the time Vernon drew alongside. The small face looked scrubbed shiny, gleaming under the streetlamp, and the wide eyes were alert despite the hour. His long nose twitched, perhaps with nerves, as his lips pinched inwards. The father's long face had been dragged thinner by the weight of his jowls, and his dull tired eyes were underscored by skin that looked bruised, while his loose lips drooped under a bulbous nose. In his indeterminately coloured suit and with his shirt collar open, he scarcely seemed dressed for the night, and the boy's outfit wasn't much more suitable—a waspishly striped jumper inside a dark overall, both of them a size too large. Vernon lowered the passenger window and shivered at the chill that met him. "Will this bring me back to the motorway?" he called.

The man sidled between two parked cars and stooped to the window, but didn't speak until he'd lowered himself almost to his knees as if his burden had brought him to them. Vernon heard the boy's hands thump the roof, presumably for support. The man's breath glimmered in the wintry air as he said "What are you asking for?"

"I'm looking for the motorway. I was wondering if I've gone wrong."

If the man seemed unhappy with this, perhaps that was his habitual condition—the flatness of his voice would be a local trait. As the boy's hands clutched at his shoulders, he gave the road ahead a dull glance. "You're no more wrong than me."

"We were going that way, weren't we?" The boy's voice was shrill and rendered tinny by the roof. "You have to say," he said.

The skin beneath the man's eyes twitched while his lips chafed each other. No doubt he was embarrassed to be prompted to hitch. "Look for a lift by all means," Vernon said, and when the fellow's face grew blanker still "I mean with me."

The boy kicked up his legs, displaying trainers that reminded Vernon how much Tom's used to cost, and as the cuffs of the overalls flapped they revealed the boy wasn't wearing socks. "I'll give you a ride, son," Vernon called and told the man "You don't want him out like that at this time of night in this weather."

Even if this was presumptuous, he thought it needed to be said. The man's face stayed expressionless as the boy leapt down from his shoulders like an acrobat. The trainers struck the pavement with a plump thud that set a dog barking in a house, and the boy released one of the man's hands. "Where you going?" the man said.

Did he think the boy was about to run off? The man had straightened up, and Vernon couldn't see his face. Perhaps Vernon had misunderstood the question, since the man added "You can't stay sat on me."

The boy's thin lips sucked inwards, losing any colour, as if his teeth or something else had pained him. "Would you like to sit in front?" Vernon said.

The man ducked to stare at Vernon. "Who'll be telling you the way?"

"I expect you should." Vernon leaned over to tip the passenger seat forward. 'You do as your dad says," he said. "Better sit in the back."

As the boy clambered in, he gave Vernon quite a look. Vernon remembered earning glares whenever he told Tom not to do something at that age. When he pushed the seat upright the boy made a face, though in the dimness Vernon couldn't see what kind. Once the man had slumped onto the seat and fumbled the safety belt into its socket, Vernon said "Straight on?"

"That's where."

The man seemed to resent having to say so. No doubt he was as weary as he looked. As he shut the window, Vernon sent the car forward. Talking ought to help him stay wakeful, and he said "What's kept you both out so late?"

The man's breath clouded the air as he muttered "Broke down."

"Was that your car I saw back there?"

"No idea what you've seen."

Perhaps the boy would be better company. As Vernon glanced at the small indistinct face, he saw the empty street fleeing backwards. "Have you been somewhere good?"

"Playing."

Vernon took that for an affirmative. He tried giving the man the kind of look adults shared on the subject of children, but the fellow was staring dully through the windscreen. It was hardly polite to seem amused by how the boy took after him, and Vernon stayed quiet until the street ended at a junction. "Left?" he suggested.

"That's us," the man just about said.

From previous journeys Vernon had a sense that the motorway curved in this direction several miles ahead. The road he turned along was wider than the one he left but no less deserted. Cars occupied the concrete drives of houses frozen by the frigid light. He saw the boy's eyes flickering from side to side as though to take everything in, which prompted him to say "I'll bet my son would have thought this was an adventure at your age."

A shadow fluttered over the boy's face as he peered out of the mirror. "How old's that?"

"You tell him."

Vernon thought the man was addressing the boy, then wondered if he was. "Eight?" Vernon said, which was apparently an insult, given how blank the small face grew. "His name's Tom," Vernon said in an attempt to placate him. "What's yours?"

"Tell the man your name, son."

"I'm me."

"I'm sure you are and nobody else." Vernon made another bid to share the adult viewpoint, but the man was keeping his thoughts to himself. "I'm Jack," Vernon said.

Neither of his passengers responded with a name, though the man uttered a breath that bloomed grey. Vernon thumbed the button on his side of the car to ensure the passenger window was shut and turned the heating up to full. The mans gaze had begun to dodge back and forth as though he was imitating his son, and his thick tongue poked his lips apart. "Time to play," he said.

The boy sat forward. "Try telling, pop," he said and grinned as if he was no less proud of his teeth than of the answer.

"Sit back, son," Vernon told him. "You need to put your belt on." As the boy's face withdrew into the dimness, his grin was the first thing to vanish.

"That's no fun."

"I can't drive unless everyone is strapped in. I don't want the police telling me I can't, do I?"

"You don't."

Perhaps the man's voice was so toneless because he didn't like to see his son rebuked, in which case he should have done the parental job, though Vernon felt guilty for neglecting to check the boy had used the belt. He braked and waited for the boy to yank it across himself in a mime of resentment. As the car regained speed he said "Time to play what?"

The man's eyes flickered, but not in his direction. "You'll see."

"If it's a secret, just say so."

"Don't be like that."

Could the fellow actually think Vernon was being unreasonable? Before Vernon could make his feelings even plainer, the man turned his head away from him. "See the signs," he mumbled.

Vernon saw the small head swing that way too. "So that's safe," the boy said.

In a moment Vernon thought he understood, but said only "Intelligent chap, isn't he?"

The man expelled another ashen breath. "Likes to think so."

Did he resent his own son's intellect? That might explain why the boy seemed somehow to be holding back, but Vernon wasn't about to be daunted from showing concern. "Are you cold there in the back?" he said. "I've a blanket in the boot if you'd like to wrap up."

"Last thing he wants," the man declared.

"It really won't be any trouble."

"You're right, it won't."

Vernon was ready to ignore if not to argue with the man until the boy spoke up, shriller than ever. "I'm how I like."

"If you say so," Vernon said but felt inadequate. "If there's anything else I can do for you, just let me know."

"No call for that." The man nodded at the windscreen as though to indicate he was leaving the subject behind. "I'm miserable tired," he said.

The boy was looking where the man had looked. "It's my turn."

"I believe I see what you're up to," Vernon said.

"Is that a fact."

It sounded like a question the man lacked the energy to raise. "Can anybody play?" Vernon said.

"Depends." Even less encouragingly the man added "Depends what you reckon the game is."

"I'll make tea." As the man gave him a look that might have been convicting him of feeblemindedness, Vernon found the next number plate ahead. "Owls own banks," he suggested.

"You're as clever as him." This didn't much resemble praise, but the man contributed "Our own business."

"Out of bounds," the boy said.

Vernon felt oddly relieved to have identified the game, as if he'd recovered some kind of control. "Do you play it whenever you're on the road?" he asked the man.

"Got to keep your brain going somehow."

"So you don't nod off at the wheel, you mean." When the fellow kept any response to himself, Vernon found inspiration on a number plate. "Weariness is fiendish."

The man thumped his forehead with the fingertips of one hand as though to enliven his mind. "What it's for."

The boy seemed to need no time to ponder. "What I found."

Was the man scowling at his quickness? Perhaps it was up to Vernon to carry on the game, and a registration number let him say "Gee up. Trigger."

The boy's giggle was even higher than his voice. His father glowered at it, unless he was making sure his turn came next. He looked away from the mirror before he said "Get us thinking."

"Gone up there," the boy said at once.

Vernon had the odd notion that the game had turned into a dialogue from which he was excluded. He was glad to see they'd reached the edge of town. The houses ended several hundred yards ahead, and beyond them the road stretched into empty darkness. "Where shall I drop you?" he said.

The man shook his head as if to rouse himself or to dislodge some unwelcome burden. "Not round here."

"I thought you said you were on my way."

"Never said different. Not yet, that's all "

Vernon almost laughed aloud at the man's brusqueness, since there seemed to be no other way to take it. "So long as you let me know when you're where you want to be," he said as the last of the light slipped from the boy's face in the mirror.

The streetlamps receded while the moor loomed around the car. The long low slopes were in no hurry to reveal themselves, and even once they gained some definition the ragged crests were scarcely distinguishable from the drooping sky. Although they hid the motorway, the strip of illuminated road that ran between the sprawling verges led in the direction where Vernon assumed it to be. Otherwise the headlamp beams only blurred the dark that hunched around and ahead of the specimen of road. He needed more than the monotonous sight to keep him vigilant, and he tried saying "So what do you do, Mr..."

"Mister is right." Just as dully the man added "You've seen."

"That's what we get for being fathers, isn't it?" When his bid for good humour fell short of the man, Vernon said "I was thinking of the other kind of job."

"After one of them, are you?"

Even by the man's standards the retort seemed unnecessarily harsh, and then Vernon wondered if he was unemployed. "Isn't there much work hereabouts?"

"Here?" The man waved a hand so sluggishly that it looked hampered by the darkness. "See if you can think."

Vernon might have countered that the man didn't seem especially capable of it. Instead he concentrated on the lit stretch of road as it veered from side to side. A protracted curve led so far out of the way he thought he should be taking that he let out a dimly luminous breath when another elongated bend corrected the deviation. All this made him say "Don't you mind leaving your car all that way back?"

"Doesn't matter what I mind."

"Couldn't you call someone?"

Presumably he didn't belong to a motoring organisation, and the local garages would have shut down hours ago. Vernon was aware of talking for the sake of it as he said "I wouldn't like to break down out here and not be able to get help."

"Better hadn't, then."

"No, I mean if I did I'd be able to call."

"Not here you'd not. Nothing gets out," the man said with morose triumph.

"I think my phone would. It's pretty well up to date, not like its owner."

Vernon slowed the car to a walking pace and found his mobile in the fat pocket of his padded coat. As he touched the illuminated screen he glimpsed the boy's face blanching in the mirror. "Expect you've never seen the like, son," the man muttered.

Vernon blinked at the phone and brought it closer to his face before pocketing it. "I'm afraid your dad was right. I can't pick anything up."

"Want to watch out what you're picking," the man said so indistinctly that he might almost have been talking in his sleep.

"He's right again, son," Vernon said, the only way he could make sense of the remark. "Be careful."

The boy lurched forward, not far enough for the dashboard lights to illuminate his face. "What about?"

"Who you get involved with," Vernon said and glanced at the man for agreement. When the fellow kept his gaze on the dark, Vernon added "What they're up to as well."

The boy fell back as if the belt had recaptured him. If his father had glanced at him in the mirror, the man's expression was too fleeting for Vernon to catch. As the car put on speed once more, the grass and weeds that framed the headlight beams twitched to greet them. The dim outlines of the slopes shifted as a wind rattled the passenger window, emphasising the chill. "Would you really have walked all the way up here?" Vernon said.

The man shrugged as if trying to work off the last traces of his burden. "No choice."

"Well, I think we always have those. It's up to us to decide what's best to do."

That was aimed at the boy, even if Vernon couldn't have explained precisely why—it was the kind of thing he still said to Tom—but the man mumbled "Try saying that round here."

Vernon might have pointed out that he just had. He assumed the man was referring to the kind of life he had to lead, the poverty he believed he'd made plain. He was relieved to see a pair of headlamp beams sprout above a slope against the sky ahead; at least the number plate would provide a distraction. The beams groped back and forth as if they were reaching vainly for the lightless clouds, and then they fell to the road as the car appeared around a bend. Vernon sensed his passengers readying themselves, but it seemed he was the first to read the plate. "Three nice eggs," he said.

He heard the man part his sticky lips, but the boy was faster. "That's not easy."

"There's no escape," the man said and stared at the mirror.

The other car sped past, and the boy's face went out like a dead bulb. It was dimly silhouetted by a pair of red lights that shrank to embers before the darkness doused them. Vernon was realising how devious a route the other vehicle had followed. "This can't be the only road, can it?" he said.

"It's that all right," the man said without looking away from the mirror. "You'll see."

In that case it must be the diversion, and Vernon had to admit he wouldn't be unhappy to leave his passengers along the way, together with the tension they'd brought with them. It and the chill were afflicting him with shivers, and he was tempted to offer the blanket again. Perhaps the boy was inured to the local weather, and as the headlights revealed yet another extended bend Vernon said "Are there still schools round here, then?"

"Still."

The man might have been aiming the word at the reflection in the mirror. "I was wondering where he goes to school," Vernon said.

"Try asking."

Though this sounded quite unlike an invitation, Vernon said "Where do you, son?"

As the boy inched forward, the man demanded "Who's saying he does?"

Improbable as it seemed, could the boy have been taught at home? At least that might explain the man's resentment. "I'm saying he seems educated," Vernon said. "Literate for his age."

"He's good at that. Good at a lot else as well."

This seemed more discontented than Vernon understood. How could anyone deplore their own child's intelligence? He was determined to involve the boy now, and as the road straightened out further than the headlamp beams could reach he said "What should I be looking for, son?"

"Don't know."

"What sign, I mean."

"Sign."

Was the boy imitating his father to placate him? "For your village, if that's what it is," Vernon said.

"There's none."

Vernon wished he could make out the boy's face. Might the child be afraid to display too much intelligence around his father? "Your house, then," Vernon said.

"Can't see."

Perhaps he was protesting about having to sit in the back, and yet Vernon wondered if he'd misunderstood. "Will I know it when I come to it?"

"You'll be put right," the man said.

He sounded weary of the conversation if not resolved to end it. Vernon wasn't going to he silenced, and not just because chatting would help him to stay awake. "I'm guessing you're a reader, son."

"Reader."

"Of books, yes. Is that where you've picked up some of your way with words?"

"Here's where."

If he was trying to sound like his father, it didn't quite come off, and the uninhabited night all around them didn't lend his answer much credibility. "I'm asking because I travel in books," Vernon said as much to the man as to the child.

"Thought you were travelling in a car."

Vernon couldn't judge from the boy's shrill tone whether this was a joke, and the man's dull face gave no assistance. "The publishers send me around to show the shops their books," Vernon said doggedly. "A few of us still do that even with all the modern developments."

The boy leaned forward far enough that Vernon saw his indistinct face was blank. Surely no child could be unaware of computers and the Internet and how they'd changed the world. Perhaps, having grown up with it, the boy simply took it all for granted. I've some books in the boot you might like," Vernon said. "The kind my son used to."

"He'll want none of them," the man said so fiercely that his breath glimmered with each word. "Nobody's getting out."

"I didn't mean up here. Hardly the right place."

"Right for some things."

Vernon wasn't about to enquire which. For several reasons he welcomed the sight of headlamp beams ahead. They ranged about beneath the clouds until the night appeared to cut them down, and he felt as if more than the dark and the huge smudges of moorland had closed in. Only the moor had obscured the beams, and soon they were brandished above a lower slope. As the lorry swung into view around a bend he grew tense, surely just anticipating the game. The headlamp beams dropped to the tarmac as his did, and he squinted at the registration number. "Call general assembly," he said.

"Child goes a-roving "

Vernon was reflecting that the boy had proved his point about literacy when the man said "Can't get away."

The lorry roared past, and Vernon glanced at the mirror. Had just the headlamps turned the boy's face so white? As the rear lights shrank into the darkness, the boy sank back as though he wanted to emulate them. Vernon didn't like to think the child could be so afraid of his father—and then a worse notion came to him.

He could only drive while he struggled to think. His mind felt frozen by the chill and weighed down by the dark, as if he mightn't be able to use it until he left the desolate emptiness behind. A wind blundered against the car and set the passenger window jittering, and he found he didn't want to look towards the man beside him. The dim slopes of the moor were trembling, and he wondered if the boy was fighting to restrain a shiver, just as Vernon was. He did his best to peer into the mirror without betraying that he was, but the boy's face had retreated into indistinctness. He was trying to discern its expression when he glimpsed a light ahead, and then another and a third —an irregular series of them following a line beyond a gap between the slopes. He didn't dare hope too much until the car was nearly at the gap, through which he saw more lights speeding both ways on a straight road close to the uneven horizon. They were on the motorway, and the intervening land was almost flat. He took a breath and swallowed, and then he had to speak. "I don't think I'm seeing a house."

The man stared ahead. "Keep looking."

"What am I likely to see?"

The man seemed no more eager to respond than Vernon had been to ask. It was the boy who said "Nothing you'd call one."

What was he trying to convey? Even by narrowing his eyes, Vernon still couldn't see the boy's face. He might have thought the child was trying to stay out of reach of the man's gaze. Before Vernon could think of a comment to risk, the man muttered "You'll have us for a way yet."

Vernon saw the miles of deserted moorland he had yet to cross, and the lights shuttling along the motorway as if to remind him how distant they were, and then he saw another light, a dim but undeniable glow on the clouds beyond the spot where the motorway disappeared rightwards over the horizon. He was sure the glow denoted a service area, and it prompted him to say "I can take you to the services, and then you're on your own."

He sensed unease so palpable it sent a shiver through him. The man raised his sluggish head as if he was confronting the mirror. "Depends what happens on the way," he said.

Too late Vernon realised he shouldn't have spoken. His first mistake had been to bring his passengers up here, where nobody else could see them. Now he would have been taking them among other people, but what chance had he left himself? Why had he taken so long to grasp how little the man knew about the child he pretended was his son? Not his name or his age, not where he lived or went to school... No wonder he hadn't owned up to a name either, although perhaps that gave Vernon some faint hope, since it suggested that the man might leave him capable of talking. Then the hope went out as if the darkness had seized it, and the car seemed to grow cold as the depths of a cave. The man had withheld his name before Vernon's phone had turned out not to work.

He was overtaken by a shiver so convulsive that his foot slipped off the accelerator. The car lost speed at once, and the man's head swung towards him. "What are you trying to do?"

"I'm not trying anything," Vernon protested, and instantly knew what he should. Using just his toes while he dug his heel into the rubber mat on the floor of the car, he pressed the pedal down. He let the car surge forward and then lifted his foot from the accelerator. His ankle and his shin ached from the strain, but his leg hadn't moved, and surely the man couldn't see what Vernon was doing. The head at the edge of his vision loomed towards him once more, and he didn't dare meet the fellow's eyes. "What's happened now?" the man demanded.

"I don't know. I'm not sure." Vernon managed not to grit his teeth at the pain in his leg before he'd finished speaking. He waited for the speed to drop so far that the car began to judder, and then he went down a gear, and another. He inched his foot higher, slowing the car enough to turn it shaky again. Before he could speak, he had to swallow a cry at the dull agony in his leg. "Something's wrong with the engine. I don't know the first thing about them. Do you?"

He hadn't said half of that when he realised how useless his plan was. If the man was able to fix cars he would have fixed his own. The pain made his foot lurch off the accelerator, and the car wavered to a halt and stalled. The man was staring at him, but it took Vernon some seconds to turn his head. The man's eyes were so dull that his emotions were unreadable, even when he spoke. "I'll give it a look."

"I'll need to open the bonnet."

The man's sagging face came so close that his greyish breath settled on Vernon's skin. "How'll you do that?"

"I'm doing it now," Vernon said and leaned towards the floor in front of his seat. "It's done."

He was unable to breathe until the man had sprung the buckle of the belt out of its socket and scrabbled at the handle to open the door and sidled in a crouch onto the road. The fellow twisted around in that position and stared into the car. "Shut the door for heaven's sake," Vernon urged. "It's cold enough in here."

The man slammed the door hard enough to shake the car. Vernon had been afraid he would demur. As the man tramped into the headlight beams, Vernon said low but urgently "Is your dad—"

"He's not my dad."

That was all the confirmation Vernon needed, and he blurted "What can you tell me about him?"

The boy leaned forward as the man stooped to the bonnet, and Vernon saw that the child's face was pale as ice. "Never mind," Vernon murmured. "You're safe now. Where do you want me to take you?"

"Over there," the boy said and pointed beyond the man, who was attempting to lift the bonnet that Vernon hadn't actually released. "Past all the lights."

Vernon was distressed to think that the child might be almost too scared to breathe; certainly his breaths weren't visible. "The far side of the motorway, you mean."

"That's where he got me from."

The man thrust his head towards the windscreen and thumped on the bonnet. "Can't get in."

"Stand back a moment. Let me try the engine again," Vernon shouted before lowering his voice. "Sit back, son. Hold on tight."

As the man straightened up, the boy did the same. "Have you got your belt on?" Vernon was anxious to learn.

"Never took it off."

How had he managed to crane forward so far? Vernon hadn't time to think about it now. The glare of the headlights mounted the man's body as he retreated several steps, which left his face harder to read. "Stay there," Vernon shouted and twisted the key in the ignition.

The starter motor rasped, and the engine emitted a shrill stuttering cough, but that was all. He felt the key grow slippery with perspiration as his mouth grew dry as ash. He mustn't release the key yet; you could keep it turned for ten seconds before you had to leave the engine dead for thirty more—and then the engine sputtered into life. He seized the gear lever and struggled to manipulate it into reverse, but it only jerked into the slot for fourth gear. The man was growing restless, swaying forward in the headlights, and Vernon realised that he hadn't locked the passenger door in case the fellow heard. Even if he did, what could he do about it? Vernon thumbed the button, and the door locked with a loud click just as the lever found reverse gear. The car lurched backwards with a squeal of the tyres, and as Vernon threw it into first gear to swerve around the man, the headlights illuminated his entire figure. His hands were jerking towards his face, and Vernon thought he was miming dismay until the man cupped them around his mouth to yell a solitary word. "Moorchild."

For a confused moment Vernon thought the fellow was giving his name at last. The hands sank, and he saw the man's expression. If the long face had slumped even further, it was with relief; he looked as though he could scarcely believe his own good fortune. Perhaps that was what seized Vernon with an icy chill, unless it was the sight of his small passenger escaping the restraint of the safety belt with a sinuous reptilian motion, or even just the way the temperature dropped with the cavernous iciness the boy brought with him. His neck was owning up to its length as his head swayed towards the man, who had retreated to the verge of the road and was thrusting out his hands to fend off whatever he saw. "He's yours now," he yelled. "You chose him. You're welcome to him."

He sounded hysterical with delight, and perhaps this was too much for Vernon's passenger. Before Vernon could flinch the boy scrambled over the back of the empty seat and slithered head down to unlock the door. He darted out of the car on all fours and leapt to his feet with a cry that sounded less like a child than a night bird. All the same, it was a word. "Carry," he was demanding.

Vernon had a last glimpse of his face, which was as white as the underside of a slug. The eyes dwindled as the lips gaped with a grin that reached around the sides of the head. The man had staggered backwards as the door swung wide, and now he whirled around to dash along the road. He hadn't reached the limits of the headlights when the pursuer caught him. Clothes flapping about its elongated limbs, it sprang onto his shoulders and dug its fingers into the top of his head.

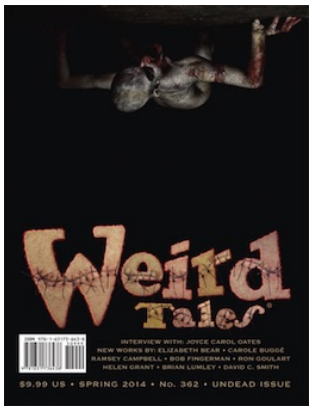
Vernon didn't know if the shrill sound was a cry of triumph or the man's wail of despair or both. He saw the man flee out of the headlamp beams as if he could somehow outdistance the burden on his back. Then the man stumbled off the road and rushed into the night as the rider kicked his chest to spur him onwards. It was a game, Vernon thought wildly—a childish game if not a senile one. Quite some time after the figure pranced helplessly into the wilderness, Vernon managed to shut the passenger door and lock it, and eventually his shaking fingers let him control the car. He eased it forward and then drove as fast as he dared, because the lights on the motorway seemed as distant as stars. Until he reached them, if he ever did, he would be more aware of the darkness at his back.

Note: In The New Gothic, the man's solitary word is clearly printed as 'Moorchild.' However, at the World Fantasy Convention, Brighton 2013, where Campbell reads the tale aloud, he uses the word 'moonchild'.

2014

The Impression



Weird
Tales
INTERVIEW WITH: JOYCE CAROL OATES
NEW WORKS BY: ELIZABETH BEAR • CAROLE BUGGÉ
RAMSEY CAMPBELL • BOB FINGERMAN • RON GOULART
HELEN GRANT • BRIAN LUMLEY • DAVID C. SMITH
$9.99 US • SPRING 2014 • No. 362 • UNDEAD ISSUE

First published in Weird Tales, Spring 2014

Alan was nearly at the schoolyard gates when he saw his grandmother. She was wearing the ankle-length kaftan that shared more than one tint with all the rusty hair trailing down her back. Her large broad face looked proud of him in his new uniform, and he hoped she wouldn't make her feelings any more apparent while he was with his classmates. "Is that all your mother gives you?" Boyd was asking. "Mine gives me twice that and my father does when I see him."

"So do mine." Eagerness to compete raised Hall's voice even higher. "And my mother's partner, she does sometimes too."

"I earn my pocket money," Alan instantly regretted saying, because Boyd demanded "What do you have to do?"

"Just help her clean the house."

Hall emitted a hiss that stressed his similarity to a balloon. "My mothers have men in for that. They've taught them at the university and they say at least it's a job for them."

"My mother pays a woman," Boyd protested, "otherwise it wouldn't be done right."

"You're just as conscientious, aren't you, Alan? Your mother appreciates it now you're on your own." As if seized by inspiration his grandmother added "Wait till tomorrow and I'll show you how to have some fun with rubbing."

Hall uttered a stammering hiss that did duty as a laugh, while constellations of pimples flared on Boyd's cheeks as he spoke without looking at her. "What kind's that?"

"Wait and see," she said, mostly to Alan. "You can tell your friends all about it next week."

He thought they weren't friends so much as interrogators, but they were the best he'd found in his first few days. At least she'd parked her battered

Micra out of sight of the schoolyard. The ample houses around the school gleamed white in the September sunshine. A mile down the wide avenue their relatives split in half, and along a side road was a half where Alan lived. It felt bigger since his father had married the Thai girl and stayed abroad, not to mention emptier since they'd had a son. Alan's grandmother parked outside and murmured

"Have they given vou homework already? I'll come in for a few minutes."

She cooked vegetables to accompany the casserole his mother had left in the microwave. While he interrupted his homework with dinner she busied herself with dusting and polishing the pale pine kitchen. "I'd best make sure I'm out of Margaret's way" she said at last, having glanced approvingly at his English work. "I'll take you for your treat tomorrow."

The smell of breakfast didn't waken him, since muesli had so little of a smell, but his grandmothers arrival roused him. Today she was in a kaftan like a flattened patch of jungle, while his mother wore shorts and a T-shirt that said Fit For Purpose, the women's gym she owned and worked in as a trainer. He tried not to dwell on the sight of her breasts apparently announcing they were fit, because it left him feeling guiltier than he cared to understand. Her red hair was tied into a pony-tail that helped her face look tugged into a compact version of her mother's, and she greeted him with a smile not unlike levelling her lips. "You really needn't do so much for him," she had just said.

"I've plenty of time on my hands, Margaret, and now he's got homework I don't mind picking up a duster."

"I didn't know you had," Alan's mother said and gave him a weighty look.

It took his grandmother most of an hour to drive to the next town, where she parked by the cathedral and retrieved a large leather case from the back seat. As they paced along an aisle of massive foot-worn flagstones under arches tall as any dinosaur, Alan saw he was treading on names and dates. "Watch and I'll show you how it's done," his grandmother murmured, but she'd hardly started cleaning a brass memorial with a duster from the case when a priest closer to Alan's age than hers bustled over, black robes fluttering. "Excuse me, you mustn't do that."

“I used to bring my history class here."

“That must have been some time ago. It's no longer permitted."

"Well, Alan, there you are. God doesn't want you having fun or even a reward."

"Please don't involve God." Perhaps the priest felt this left the responsibility with him, because his eyes closed for a possibly prayerful moment. "If you want unsupervised memorials," he said, "I believe there's something at Perlston Manor."

She had driven about hallway home when she turned along a side road and then another, which was so overgrown that it resembled a track through a field. It wound between immense grey trees that had cracked open as they crumpled to the earth. Eventually the trees on the left gave way to the low uneven remains of a thick stone wall with bits of an old house beyond it. "It'll be worth it" Alan's grandmother told him. "Remember the story about the magic lamp? It's like that but instead of a genie you get a picture to keep."

As she steered the car through a gap in the wall onto a relatively bare patch of earth beneath the open sky, Alan had the odd notion that the gloom the trees had cast on the road was waiting somewhere ahead. When he followed his grandmother through the ruins—arched windows with their tops lopped off, half a doorway, grey mossy lumps of inner wall—he kept being touched by a chill he would have expected to feel inside a stone house. "That's where it must be," his grandmother said.

She meant the remnant of a smaller building beyond the main one. A shattered cross half buried in weeds showed it had been a chapel. She stepped through an arched doorway that had survived upright and then through its shadow. As she made for a long grey object that was lying low in the grass, it seemed to stir as if its lid were shifting. Just the grassy fringe was, in the wind. 'We call that a sarcophagus," she said.

It was a stone coffin no higher than her ankles. For a moment Alan imagined its contents had been pressed as flat as the white face on the lid, an elongated face so thin that it might have been sucking its hollow cheeks inwards. The scrawny lips were as unbending as the long sharp nose, and if the blank eyes beneath extravagantly high brows weren't lidded they were stretched so wide that it appeared to have erased the pupils. Either the model for the plaque had been bald or the artist had no room to portray hair, since the face was raised less than an inch. Below the aggressively pointed chin were the man's name—Lord Ranulph Perlston, dead so many centuries that they made Alan feel belittled—and some words in a language the boy didn't know. "What does that mean?"

"Pray God doesn't find him wanting," his grandmother said after some consideration. "Just let me start and show you what to do."

Planting a hand on the slab of a forehead, she sank to her knees. Alan could have fancied she was about to pray, but as far as he knew she didn't any more than he did. The moss that grew in patches on the lid had stayed clear of the plaque, and so it didn't take her long to clean it. She took a roll of heavy paper from the case and snipped off a length that she laid like a sheet over the still face. Once she'd secured it with tape to the upper edge of the plaque, she gave Alan a stick of wax to hold. 'Don't ever do this in church," she said and knelt on her case on the lid of the sarcophagus.

She tugged the paper smooth before taping the sides and lower edge to the plaque as if to hide the face. When she began to rub the wax over the section of paper concealing the forehead, Alan didn't think it would achieve much, but the high flawless brow swelled up on the paper like an old-fashioned photograph developing in a tank. His grandmother conjured up the right half first, framing it with her left thumb and index finger, and did the same with the other half. When she moved her hand to the right eye Alan said "Can I do some now?'

"He's yours if you want him," his grandmother said, though not before she'd glanced around the ruin as if hoping to locate another memorial. "Be careful. No going back."

Once she'd used his arm to help her up he knelt on the case. It reminded him of the kneelers he'd seen in front of pews in the cathedral, but he didn't think the ruin contained much that was holy. Cornering the right eye beneath the paper with his thumb and forefinger, he began to rub the hidden face. Soon the eye took greyish shape, and he could have thought it was gazing up at him, unless it was ready to open as soon as he'd rubbed it enough. He might almost have left it alone, except that you weren't supposed to abandon any task, and before long both eyes were waiting for the rest of the face to join them. The cheeks felt so hollow it seemed well on the way to becoming a skull, while the nose reminded him of a long sharp bone. As he completed the face with the left side of the lips and chin, a dusty wind tugged at his sleeve and tried to lift the paper. He thought the lips had writhed into a sneer—the paper had shifted, at any rate—but when he sat back on his heels to look at his work the mouth was as severely straight as ever. "Let me lift him for you," his grandmother said. She stooped to peel off the tapes and stuff the handful into the case before slipping the waxed page into a transparent folder. The plastic turned the face grey as a slug, and perhaps that was why she frowned at it as she handed Alan the folder. "I think that's as good as he's going to be," she said.

"Aren't you going to get him?"

"To tell you the truth I'm not that fond," she said and made quite swiftly for the car. As Alan followed her he heard a restless movement in the grass within the chapel—a bird or small animal, though he hadn't noticed any near the ruins. Or had his grandmother dropped the bunch of strips of tape? In a moment the twisted brownish object was hidden by the grass along the edge of the lid, if he'd seen it at all. "I'd better deliver you home, had I?" his grandmother said. "I'll take us all to the seaside tomorrow."

Alan laid the picture on the desk in his room but found it distracted him from his school homework. The face put him in mind of a dissatisfied teacher, and even when he moved it to the bed he sensed it at his back. He was dusting the china on the dresser in the dining-room when his mother came home. "Did you bring anything back from your expedition?" she said, and met the eyes of the picture Alan brought to show her. "He looks like a lot of men to me."

Alan felt she was somehow blaming his grandmother, and so he tried saying "Gran says she'll take us to the beach tomorrow."

"There's no need to make her think you do so much. If you did everything I have to you might have some reason to complain."

He took himself early to bed, stowing Lord Perlston's face in the shallow drawer of the desk, which only made him wonder what lay under the stone lid in the ruined chapel. Surely that face couldn't still be gazing up after so many years, but he didn't want to imagine how it might look now. If he could have thought of somewhere else to keep the picture he would have taken it out of the desk.

Sunlight and the aroma of breakfast wakened him. His grandmother was scrambling eggs, and Alan thought she might have come early so that his mother couldn't put him to work. On the drive to the beach he shared the back seat with three folding chairs in bags. She'd brought a hamper too, and Alan swam after they'd had the picnic lunch as well as for most of the morning. He hoped that showed his mother he was fit enough and persuaded his grandmother that he was enjoying himself. He mostly was, especially so long as he ignored some children who were burying their father in a mound of sand, leaving just his upturned face clear. Further down the beach he saw a woman drying a girl's face with a towel, and beyond them a man appeared to be imitating them by using some material to hide his face. The late summer haze made his thin body waver, and he vanished into the dunes before Alan could focus on him. The boy shivered, because the sea felt as though it had grown cold as stone.

A wind was rising, and he retreated to the beach to towel himself. He hadn't realised that the long mound where the children had buried their father was so close. Where the man s head had been, the wind was making a lump of sand adopt various shapes, and Alan found he didn't care much for the spectacle. He put up only a token protest when his mother decided it was time to leave as the wind began to dash sand along the beach.

That night he dreamed of trying to erase a picture rather than see what it was. Every stroke of the eraser emphasised the gathering outline, and he couldn't shut his eyes. He was barely able to flounder awake before the eyes of the picture would have met his. Perhaps he'd been thinking of the art class, which would give him the excuse to take the trophy of the coffin into school.

Mr Granger was a towering but stooped man with untamed silver hair and emphatic eyebrows. His quick grey eyes caught sight of the picture at once. "What's this you've brought us, Dalton?" he enquired as though addressing the whole class. "Why, I do believe you've been out rubbing."

Hall let out bits of a hiss while Boyd snorted, and the art master scowled at them. "I'm glad to see it hasn't quite died out," he said and slipped the page out of the folder to hold it up. "Can you talk us through the process, Dalton? Do be on your feet."

Once Alan had managed to describe the method without embarrassing himself too much Mr Granger said "It always reminds me of how you see more details the longer you look at a painting." He sighed when nobody owned up to sharing the experience. "Where did you collect this fine fellow, Dalton?" he said.

"My gran took me to Perlston Manor, sir."

"Then this must be the lord of the domain. Don't take it personally, but he wouldn't have welcomed you if the stories are accurate." Before Alan could risk a question Mr Granger handed him the rubbing in its folder. "Let's start by getting to know one another," the teacher said. "I want you all to draw yourselves. Show me how you think you look."

Alan did his best but was distracted by the faces gaining definition everywhere around him. Perhaps that was why Mr Granger leaned down to mutter "Pitiful"— except that when Alan glanced around, the teacher was several desks away, and nobody else was close enough to have leaned over Alan. The whisper must have been in his head, along with the sensation like a shadow growing solid at his back. "Is that how you see yourself, Dalton?" Mr Granger said once he'd appraised Alan's sketch. "No call to be so hard on yourself."

Alan tried to feel praised and to take the feeling home, but he seemed to have taken something else instead. Once he'd shut the rubbing in the drawer of the desk in his room he kept thinking that somebody unimpressed by his homework was about to loom at his shoulder. He finished as fast as he could and hurried downstairs to his chores, but he'd only just donned the glove that was really a duster when his mother came in. She gave him a blink that was also a frown. "Haven't you done your homework?"

"I've finished it," he said and less accurately "There wasn't much."

"We'll give you a night off," she said with a kind of defiance. "I'll take you to that film you've been wanting to see."

Alan had been saving it for the weekend, perhaps even hoping Hall and Boyd might go with him—he still regretted neglecting to tell them that his father sent him money every Christmas, which helped him think his father hadn't needed another son because Alan had somehow disappointed him—but he saw his mother was determined, possibly to prove she didn't ask too much of him. As she parked her dumpy domed Volkswagen near the Frugoplex he noticed a loiterer beside the cinema. The man's face was concealed by a fluttering piece of material, but Alan thought he was leaning against the billboard to wait for someone. No, the figure was part of a torn poster, a photograph of people queuing for a film.

Alan wished he could concentrate on the one he went to see. Even once the boy acquired his superpowers, having been bullied at school and mugged by the local street gang, Alan had to keep glancing away from the screen to dispel an impression that somebody was sidling towards him along the row of seats. He kept thinking that he wouldn't have to stand up to let the newcomer pass, since they were so thin, but suppose they meant to sit next to him? The prospect made him peer harder into the gloom. The nearest person on the far side from his mother was several seats away, and his face only gradually took shape in the dimness. That recalled Mr Granger's comment about paintings; Alan needn't be reminded of anything else. Whenever he stared along the row he had to wait for the face to take shape again, to persuade him that nobody had stolen closer in the dark. He glanced all around him as the credits began to crawl up the screen, triggering the house lights. His mother was silent until she had started the car, and then she said "Well, I don't think that was worth paying for."

Alan suspected that she meant both the film and his behaviour. He couldn't think of an answer, especially while he was unable to locate the figure with the face that had looked as though it was piecing itself together from scraps; the poster of the queue appeared to be wholly intact. Surely that showed it had been repaired, but he kept thinking about it in bed, not to mention feeling that an upturned face was lying far too close to him, even though he'd left the picture in his desk at school.

Before going to bed he'd searched online for references to Lord Ranulph Perlston, but found none. He gobbled his breakfast and tramped so fast to school that his rucksack persisted in nodding over his shoulder. By the time he arrived he had sweaty sodden armpits, but at least Mr Granger was on yard duty. "Ah, here's our collector of old things," he said. "Have you turned up anybody else like him?"

"No, sir." Having gathered a breath, Alan said "Can you tell me about him?"

"Good gracious, what a winded fellow. Not running away from anyone, are you?" When Alan shook his head Mr Granger answered him. "The story goes that he was disappointed in his sons."

"Oh," Alan said and could think of no reply worth a breath.

"He had quite a few with different ladies and didn't think any of the poor chaps measured up. Apparently they all met with accidents that nobody was anxious to examine too closely, and the ladies tended to go that way too."

"So that's why you said what you said about me."

"I also told you not to take it personally." Mr Granger said and stooped to gaze harder into the boys eyes. "That's what you should keep in mind. Do your best and nobody should carp."

For a moment Alan wanted to have his picture of himself back in case he could improve on it, but all the portraits were adorning the wall of the art room. As soon as he was at his school desk he raised the lid. The face gazed up through its plastic veil, but had it changed somehow? Even when he removed it from the folder he wasn't sure. The eyes seemed slyly wider or about to be, and the callous mouth might have been on the edge of writhing into a sneer if not baring its teeth at him. He thought that was how the face in the coffin might look—eyes wide as holes, teeth grinning with no humour and without lips as well—although shouldn't it be dust by now? That wasn't reassuring, and he shoved the page into the folder before slamming the desk lid so hard that some of his classmates jumped and laughed at him. He leaned his elbows on the desk until the geography master told him to sit up, and then he pinned the lid down with his folded arms whenever he could, but still sensed eyes staring up at him. At the end of the school day he made himself put the picture in his rucksack. Surely his grandmother would tell him if anything was wrong with the face.

On the avenue the trees tossed like sleepers unable to waken, and he felt as if he were being urged home by an insubstantial yet powerful captor. When he turned along the side road the wind strengthened behind him, and the rucksack twitched up every time a gust caught it, as though its contents were determined to crane over his shoulder. The only distraction was somebody ahead, almost hidden by the trees that sprouted from the pavement. Was the man making a joke of the sheet of newspaper the wind had plastered to his face? As he receded, too distant for Alan to see his legs move, he left the paper flapping at his head. The rank of trees in front of Alan's house cut off the sight, and when he reached home nobody was to be seen.

He left the rubbing downstairs while he tried to do his homework, but he was aware of the empty house around him and below him. He threw the folder with the picture on his desk before he set about cleaning the hall. He had to shake the duster glove, because it made the banister feel uneven. Though there was nothing inside the glove, the smooth wood still felt wrong, as if it had grown embossed. However hard Alan rubbed he couldn't crush the sensation, and he was afraid his mother would notice that something was amiss. When she let herself in she only said "Your grandmother will be here soon.'

As she laid the table in the dining-room he dabbed at the sideboard. There was hardly any dust, but he seemed to feel an object writhe like an insect under the glove—an insect, or an eye coming to life, or lips squirming to form an expression. He remembered thinking that Lord Perlston might be dust, and he didn't quite stifle his cry as he recoiled. "Good God," his mother cried, "what's wrong with you now?"

As he searched for an answer he might dare to give, the doorbell shrilled. "I nearly knocked a plate off," he blurted.

"Everyone all right?" his grandmother said, and Alan felt as if they were putting on a show for her. He mimed how much he enjoyed dinner between answering question after question about his new school. Once dinner was finished and cleared away the family made for the front room, where his mother protested "Do we have to have company?"

She meant the picture Alan had brought downstairs, not him. "I wanted gran to see," he said.

"I should think she's seen quite enough of it. I have." When he let it settle on the low table piled with fitness magazines she said "I hope that isn't going to stain."

"I'm sure it won't, Margaret," his grandmother said, which encouraged Alan to say "It isn't really like rubbing a lamp, is it? There isn't really any magic."

"Not that kind," she said and looked wistful. "Why, would you rather there weren't any?"

"Its just Mr Granger said that man killed boys and ladies because he didn't think they were good enough for him."

"I'm surprised your teacher would tell you such things," Alan's mother declared. "And I don't like you bringing anybody like you said into our house."

"I didn't," Alan cried and felt he was denying more than he cared to acknowledge.

His grandmother looked dismayed by his outburst, but his mothers stare kept her feelings to itself. "Don't you want to keep it, Alan?" his grandmother said.

"I'd be happy if he didn't," his mother said, "if it's responsible for getting him into that state."

"You have it, gran." So as not to seem ungrateful he added "You never got one of him."

She would be safe. Lord Perlston hadn't done anything to grandmothers and besides, perhaps Alan's mother was right to think he was just in a state —the kind his father's dereliction had left him in for months. He was hoping the state would pass away once his grandmother took the picture home, but in the night he jerked awake with a sense that a face was turned up somewhere near him, waiting to be noticed. What was the dim shape that lay next to his head? Only a bulge of the pillow, which meant that the presence he sensed close to him must be under the bed. He made an inexact grab at the cord above him, and when he managed to capture it the light came on just in time to show him an arm retreating into its lair beneath him. It was the shadow of his own arm, but he had to take quite a few breaths before he was able to lurch out of bed and kneel to peer underneath. Nothing unwelcome was to be seen, not even dust. All the same, when he retreated into bed he left the light on.

His fears were lying in wait at school. Whenever he opened his desk he was afraid to be met by a stony gaze and a thin-lipped sneer. More than once when he shut the lid he seemed to hear a breath like a rush of dust. The day grew dark with rain, which kept the boys in the classroom at lunchtime. "Draw us a picture, Dalton," Hall squeaked out of boredom, and Boyd contributed "Just don't draw your ugly face."

The downpour hadn't slackened by the time the bell brought the school day to an end. Outside the schoolyard a man was wiping his face with a cloth. He was a parent, but beyond the gates someone was rubbing a surface to let a face peer out—just a driver clearing condensation from inside a windscreen. Because of all this Alan didn't see his grandmother at first, waving at him across the road.

Or was she waving? She was gesturing vigorously with one hand while she shielded her eyes with the other. She seemed to be warning him not to step into the road, though it was safe. As he darted forward he realised that her fierce gestures were aimed not at him but at somebody behind him. At that moment a hand, though it didn't feel like much of one, came to rest on his shoulder. "Go," he thought a voice said as he flinched towards the road.

He couldn't help stumbling off the kerb as he twisted around. He heard a screech and then another—one a woman's, one of brakes. The driver who had been clearing the window barely managed to halt the car in time. "Watch out, you damned young fool" she shouted, and Boyd grinned at Alan from beside her while Hall did so from the back.

Alan was still trying to grasp that there was nobody close behind him—everyone around him was staring as if the incident had been wholly his fault—when his grandmother reached him, "It's all right now," she murmured. "It will be, I promise." She was silent while driving him home, but as he left the car she said "I'll see you soon. I'll let Margaret know when."

The rain had stopped, unveiling the sun. Nevertheless Alan dreaded the household tasks—even the feather duster on its stick was too reminiscent of a magic wand, and also reminded him of his grandmother cleaning the face on the sarcophagus. He wasn't anxious to work at his desk while his mother wasn't home, and so he did his homework at the kitchen table. He was afraid she would notice that he hadn't touched his chores, but she was busy being pleased that a rival gym had shut down and sent her some customers. He thought she might be preoccupied enough to overlook how late he tried to stay up, but eventually she said "Time you were asleep."

He didn't expect to be. Lying in bed was worse than wondering what might have used his desk for a lair—but the fears seemed unexpectedly remote, and soon they went away, letting him sleep until his mother wakened him for school. His classroom desk proved to hold no terrors either. Why couldn't he he satisfied with this? He needed to understand what had changed—and then he remembered his grandmother's last words to him. Had she been ensuring he stayed away from her until it was safe?

For the rest of the day he was fearful, but not for himself. When he tried phoning her, it wasn't even her voice that told him to leave a message. He didn't, since he was unsure what to say, and she would be able to see that he'd called. As the final bell let him leave the school the sky grew not much less dark than his thoughts, but no amount of rain would prevent him from seeing his grandmother.

She lived a mile away from the school, in the opposite direction from his home. By the time he arrived at the small russet house she'd shared with her late husband, the sky was solid black. Trees that overhung the garden added to the dimness, and Alan couldn't see whether her car was in the garage. He dashed to the house and rang the bell.

He heard rapid soft footsteps, but when they stayed muffled without coming to the door he recognised his own heartbeat. He leaned on the bellpush, but once the shrill sound died away the house reverted to silence. His grandfather used to hide a key to the house somewhere behind the garage, and might it still be there? Alan was dodging along the front of the house when a glimpse through the window made him falter. He peered into the front room and then, although the action unnerved him, rubbed the pane with his hand to wipe away his breath.

An upturned face lay on the table in the middle of the room, and the same face lay beside it. Had its owner come to join the image that had called him forth? Alan couldn't breathe until he managed to distinguish that both faces were on paper, and then he understood how his grandmother had tried to keep him safe. The only solution he could bring to mind was destroying the pictures, and he hurried in search of the key. He was past the garage when he halted again. His grandmother was in the back garden.

She was lying on a sun lounger, and didn't move when Alan called to her. She must have fallen asleep while sunning herself before the sky clouded over. She'd covered her face so as not to get sunburned if she dozed; in fact, as he crossed the lawn Alan saw that she was entirely hidden by the sheet, a sight that made him think of hiding under the bedclothes. Might she be sleeping outside because she didn't want to share the house with the visitor she'd invited? Alan called out again and reached to ease the sheet away from her face, but there was no need; spidery movements under the sheet indicated that she was clutching at the lounger to raise herself. She sat up so gradually that the sheet clung to her face, a spectacle that seemed to claim all of his awareness. He was about to plead with her to show her face when a hand took hold of his shoulder. "Come away, Alan. Don't look."

It was his grandmother, and she was behind him. The sheet began to bare the forehead, which lacked not just hair but other elements generally associated with a face. "I said come away." Alan's grandmother urged, twisting him around to shove him past the garage. When he tried to glance beyond her she cried "I told you not to look."

He couldn't be sure if he'd glimpsed the sheet lying flat or a shape, though hardly enough of one to be called a body, outlined beneath it, His grandmother unlocked the garage and made him sit in the car before she drove it out. When he tried to speak she shook her head fiercely and was silent until they reached his house. As he released his seatbelt she said "I told you I'd say when I'd see you. Just try and look after your mother."

He felt as if he hadn't been sufficiently afraid for his mother As he set about dusting he didn't know whether he hoped to sense secretive movements under his hand; at least that ought to mean his grandmother wasn't being visited. "Leave them alone," he muttered, but didn't dare to challenge anything to pay a call on him, and nothing did. After dinner he went to bed as soon as he could, telling his mother he didn't feel well. Though his bedroom was deserted, that didn't let him sleep much. He knew where he had to go.

In the morning he walked to the end of the road and caught a bus to the cathedral town. From the stop nearest to Perlston Manor it took him more than half an hour to tramp along the lanes. Winds swooped into the hedges to make them creak. The ruins of the manor stood still while grass and weeds kept prostrating themselves around the stones, and patches of lichen shivered on fragments of wall. In the midst of the remains of the chapel the sarcophagus lay quiet, and the face on the lid might have been designed to pretend that the subject of the memorial was just as peaceful. It didn't fool Alan, who managed to dislodge from a remnant of wall a chunk almost too heavy to lift with both hands. He staggered to the coffin and dropped his burden on the upturned face.

The forehead caved in, but the eyes gazed up so relentlessly that he was afraid to glimpse an expression. He had to retrieve the lump of stone and drop it several times, shattering a section of the lid, before the face was entirely destroyed. Alan rested the stone on the intact stretch of the lid and began to hurl pieces of the memorial away from the coffin. He needed to see what it had concealed—to see that was destroyed as well.

There seemed to be nothing to bother him, just fragments that might have been bits of bone mixed with brownish dust. Shying away a piece of the plaque that included most of the broken mouth. Alan turned back to the coffin to find that a bunch of dried twigs had been blown onto the lid. They were twitching out of the hole he'd made, where they had caught on the edge. He could have taken them for the legs of a spider, except that even one so large would have scuttled away from him instead of scrabbling to catch hold of his hand if not to fend him off. With a cry of rage and panic he used the chunk of stone to crush the object as it struggled to withdraw into the coffin, and then he devoted himself to smashing the lid.

It took a long time, and so did seizing handfuls of the contents of the sarcophagus and flinging them to the wind. He was desperate to believe that only the wind made the crumbling substance squirm as if it was determined to take shape. At last the coffin was as empty as he could leave it, and he stumbled along the lanes to the main road. The bus driver stared at him before letting him board.

As soon as Alan was home he started cleaning all the surfaces, so hard his hands ached. He was plying the duster on the stick when his mother came home. He could never tell her what he'd done, but surely she would see how meticulous he'd been. She only looked at him as the bus driver had. "What have you got on your hands?' she said. "What have you brought home?"

On The Tour

First published in The Spectral Book of Horror Stories, June 2014

As soon as Stu looked into Yesterday's he saw Jaz sitting near the bar. "They've remembered me," Stu told him. "They've got me on the bus."

The smallest man at Jaz's table took a mouthful of bitter and wiped his wry lips with the back of his fist. "Which one's that, pops?"

"The tour bus. The Beatles tour that goes past my house."

"Are we supposed to know who you are?"

"He used to be with Scotty and the Scousers," Jaz said. "He was the drummer."

"Ever meet the Beatles?"

"We were on with them," Stu declared. "Ringo bought us a drink, only John pinched mine and made out it was a joke. Scotty said he should buy me another but John wanted to settle it outside, and then Paul said it wasn't worth it and George got me one instead. We always thought John knew the others wouldn't let him fight and that's why he was safe to start it."

"That's your claim to fame, is it? That's what they'll be saying about you on the tour."

Jaz made to intervene until Stu said "I don't know what they're saying yet. I'm off home to hear."

"Sounds like you're taking after your friend Lennon, not getting us a round."

"I never said he was a friend. He didn't like us being bigger on the bill than they were."

The man was opening his mouth when Jaz said "Stu's right. I've seen his poster."

Just the same, as Stu made for the street he heard the man laugh. The fellow seemed determined to stay unimpressed, and Stu called to Jaz "You know about the band. You tell him."

Early partygoers were already heading for the clubs. All the girls were dressed for a hot night, though it was April. On Church Street, where a police van was the solitary vehicle exempted from the ban on traffic, a musician was picking coins out of his guitar case. Everybody waiting at the bus station appeared to be on their own, and the line Stu joined was as silent as a photograph. At least the homeward bus arrived before the wind through the glass shelter could start his knees clapping together. The downtown hotels gave way to tall Victorian houses that had fissured into apartments, and then the buildings set about shrinking almost as small as his house.

The bus left him at the end of the road next to his. The house where he'd grown up was just his now, and looked as dilapidated as he felt when he let himself. The tree outside the gap-toothed wooden fence smeared the dusty brownish bricks with twilit shadow, which sprawled on the dead leaves strewn across the untended token garden and had settled in both front rooms. Like its neighbours, the house was boxed in by the pair that flanked it, from one of which came the mumble of a television. Stu twisted the key in the rusty lock and barely paused to slam the door on the way to tramping up the variously resonant stairs to his bedroom. He shoved the sash of the window high and dragged the sheet over the corner of the mattress before pulling the quilt up to the pillow as a preamble to throwing clothes off the chair onto the bed. He brought the chair hobbling to the window and propped his elbows on the sill.

At first he wasn't sure that he was hearing the tour guide, especially since he couldn't see the bus. Was the blurred voice coming from the television next door? When the small white single-decker coach appeared at the end of the road Stu succeeded in making out some words, and rubbed his bruised stomach as he sat down from craning over the sill. One of the quirkiest Liverpool bands of the sixties… Their only album was a collector's item… People used to say the drummer was the star. Once Ringo had said he was the better musician, and here was his house.

Stu waved to the passengers who were gazing up at him. Some of those on the far side of the vehicle leaned into the aisle to see him, and several people waved at him as the tree on the pavement set about blocking his view. He didn't shut the window until the bus had coasted out of sight. As an afterthought he said "Catch us next time"—the invitation the band shouted at the end of every gig.

After dinner from Wong's Pizza round the corner he listened to the album. He'd had his copy made into a computer file, which preserved fifty years' worth of clicks and pops. He didn't mind them; in fact, they meant he didn't regret selling his vinyl quite so much. He sang along with Annie from Anfield, matching the falsettos from half a century ago, and Sally the Scally and All the Big Ships, where the band had used Liverpool street songs they'd overdubbed and he'd performed the riff Ringo had admired. "You could be better on the skins than me, man," he remembered Ringo telling him.

He slept more soundly than he had for weeks. He mightn't have wakened in time for work if his bladder hadn't sent him a message and then a reminder. A bus twice the size of the tour coach and crammed with passengers took him downtown. He had breakfast at the Calorie Counter near both the Philharmonics—the concert hall, which had never booked the Scousers, and the pub—and then marched downhill to Vin's Vintage Vinyl.

Though the shop wasn't due to open for ten minutes, Vin was already staring out between the nostalgic posters on the window. Several turns of a red rubber band secured his greying ponytail and seemed to tug his lined forehead higher, his long glum face thinner. "How's your diddle, Stew?" he said.

"How's yours?"

"Hanging right last time I looked." Whenever Vin made what was presumably a joke his face grew yet more lugubrious. It stayed that way while he said "Get your coat off, then. Let them see where you belong."

Stu could tell he'd only just switched on the heater, which creaked as it lent the shop the smell of burning dust. He thought he saw his own breath as he hung his padded jacket in the mouldering back room that barely had space for a toilet and a sink. Like Vin, he wore a T-shirt printed with an image of a vinyl record that said VIN'S on the label. "Look proud of my twelve-inch," Vin said.

This joke and variations on it were so familiar that his face stayed routinely morose as he opened the shop and looked for an album to attract customers.

Stu didn't recall ever having seen the chosen band; he'd never shared a gig with them. Once the first side of the album—cover versions sung with basic sixties harmonies, standard twangs on two guitars and a bass, doggedly dull drumming—had failed to entice the public, Stu said "Can't we have mine on?"

He didn't need Vin's look to tell him he sounded childish. "Me and the Scousers," he insisted.

"Is that what you're calling it now?" Vin's expression didn't relent as he said "Go on, give it a spin."

Though he could always go straight to an album if it was in stock, they weren't in any order. Stu had a sense where some of them were, but by the time he found the Scousers he was struggling not to ask Vin to find the album for him. He peered at his own youthful face—angular features concentrating on a grin to match the rest of the square of faces, cropped hair bristling with a hint of rebelliousness—and then he picked the arm off the rival album halfway through a track. "Watch it," Vin protested. "What's your rush?"

After just a couple of jittery attempts Stu succeeded in locating the spindle on the turntable with the hole in the middle of the record. As he propped the sleeve against the till he noticed the dog-eared price tag. "Maybe it's worth more now I'm on the tour."

The ageing bell gave a clang or at any rate a clunk before Vin could answer, and a couple wandered into the shop. Stu thought the music was responsible, especially when the man raised his eyes from browsing in the racks to glance towards the till. "That's me," Stu said as he heard himself brushing the cymbal in the fadeout of Fly Away, Liver Bird. "That was my band."

"You reckon," the man said while the girl looked no less bored than she did with the shop in general.

"He's saying he was on the drums," Vin said. "That's our era, us."

"You just heard there's more to it than that." When nobody seemed to understand or find the effort worth making, Stu said "They talk about it on the Beatles tour."

"About Ringo," the man told his partner. "Remember, they did."

"Him as well," Stu said and had to raise his voice to be heard over his own drumming. "There's me again. Stu Stewart with the Scousers. That's why they've got me on the tour."

"Don't remember you," the man told him, and the girl took a moment to shake her head.

"Maybe I haven't been there long. I only realised just this week."

Vin was working on a hint of a smirk. "What's he been saying about you on the bus?"

"She," Stu informed him. "They can be, you know."

He might have expected the girl to appreciate that, but he knew how frustratingly unpredictable they were. "You're not saying what they're saying," Vin said.

"How good I was."

"How good was that?" the girl hardly seemed to want to know.

Stu nearly demanded what was wrong with her if she wasn't able to hear. He already resented having been provoked to sound as though he was boasting. "I'll find out," he told Vin. "I'll tell you when I've heard it all."

"Bet you can't wait," the girl said.

"We'll let you carry on," the man said as he hurried her out of the shop.

Stu could have thought the bell had rendered Vin more combative. "Never mind scaring off the customers," Vin said.

"I never. He took her out for being rude. Anyway, I brought them in."

"Not so I noticed."

"Me and the band did. You saw how he wanted to know who we were. You ought to play us more often. Come to think, why don't we make copies to sell?"

"That's not my style and you've been around long enough to know it." Before Stu could decide if this referred to copyright or the vintage image of the shop, Vin said "You don't want to go on about selling. You didn't sell him your disc or any bastard else."

"You didn't either," Stu blurted, not immediately grasping how much he'd antagonised his employer. "I will another time," he promised. "You know I'll do anything I can for the shop."

"Like what, Stew?"

"Anything at all." In some desperation Stu said "Maybe I can get her on the bus to tell everyone I work here."

"That'd be a smash."

Stu couldn't tell from Vin's doleful face how skeptical this was. Perhaps Stu shouldn't have undertaken quite so much, but surely the tour would like to know. He only wished he'd taken time to hear precisely what she was saying about him before he mentioned her, and now he was anxious to listen. Did she vary her commentary? How often would the tour pass his house while he was at the shop?

Vin changed the record as soon as the first side was over, but Stu held back from objecting. He jammed the kettle under the tap in the sink and plugged it in behind the counter, where it hissed at the first tracks on Rubber Soul. "That's what the public want," Vin said, though Stu thought fewer people were lingering outside than while the Scousers had been audible. He confined himself to making coffee in the Vigorous Vinyl mugs Vin had ordered before changing the name of the shop. "Fair enough, you're good for something," Vin said as he took his mug.

Stu only just stopped short of retorting that he was good for a lot better. He'd been hired because Vin had seen him with the Scousers, after all. When the next prospects ventured into VVV he asked if he could help and loitered near them to enthuse about whichever album either of them took out of the racks, though he had to commute between them once they moved to opposite ends of the shop. Eventually one man bought a Pacemakers album. "Let's hope we never need one," Stu said, and thanked him and his partner for supporting the shop and urged them to come back.

"Don't get in a stew about it," Vin said with additional moroseness once they were alone. "Give the buggers room to breathe."

Stu tried keeping his distance from a customer and made no sale. He might as well have been at home to listen for the tour guide. He was acutely aware how Vin was observing him while packaging albums the shop had sold online. Vin was at the post office when Stu succeeded in selling three Rolling Stones albums to a man who'd brought just one to the counter. "I got rid of a bunch of Stones," he told Vin as soon as he plodded into the shop.

“Hope you didn’t need an operation,” Vin said, lengthening his face.

After that the shop felt like an obstacle to going home, the way too many of the last hours of a school day used to feel. Stu jogged and then rather less than jogged uphill to catch the bus home. The first one sailed past without stopping, and the next one had standing room only, like a Scousers’ concert —he couldn’t recall which. He lurched about whenever the bus stopped or started or changed speed, and lurched worse as it turned along a road not on the route. “Where are we going?” he cried.

The driver gave him less than a second in the mirror. “Police.”

The road the bus ought to have used was cordoned off as a crime scene, and the mass of diverted traffic wouldn’t have been able to overtake a funeral. By the time the bus reached Stu’s stop he was nearly half an hour later than he’d meant to be home. He ran and trotted and trudged panting to his house, where his hands shook so much that he had to use both of them to aim the key at the lock. He clutched the banister and hauled himself upstairs to fumble the bedroom window open and drag the chair across the room.

Suppose he couldn’t hear the guide even if the tour hadn’t already passed by? The harder he strained his ears, the more they filled up with the pounding of his heart. He’d fallen onto the chair, but as soon as he was able to stagger to his feet he craned out of the window. He could hear no sound beyond the thuds like the action of a pile-driver that felt capable of shaking his skull. He was gripping the sill with both hands so as to lean out another few inches by the time he heard the guide. As he struggled to distinguish words—the effort felt like striving to focus his entire body—he only seemed to squeeze the voice smaller. Once the bus came into sight he did his utmost to relax, and a few words reached him. The guide was saying someone was a legend and a genius, but Stu couldn’t yield to believing whom she had in mind until she described him as Ringo’s favourite drummer.

Was that going a little too far? Perhaps not if the audience accepted it, and as the bus coasted alongside his house Stu saw them begin to smile up at him. When he stuck his fists out of the window and flourished his thumbs, some of his audience returned the gesture. “Visit me at Vin’s Vintage Vinyl,” he called after the bus, and didn’t sink onto the chair until his stomach began to throb.

He only wished he'd heard all the guide's comments about him. Might there be a later tour on Fridays? Enough of last night's pizza was left that he didn't need to go out to fetch dinner, and he hurried back to the bedroom window, where he held the chilly carton on his lap. All the voices he heard were on the street or in the houses, and they could hardly be talking about him. When he started to jerk awake from nodding towards the remains of the last slice of pizza, he sent himself to bed.

The voice that kept wakening him couldn't be the guide's. If it wasn't in Stu's head, it certainly couldn't be on the bus, even once the dawn set about seeping into the room. How early was the first tour? Did he have time to listen to it before he left for work? He waited as long as he dared, finishing off the pizza for breakfast, and then had to dash for the bus into town. At least he had news for Vin, though for a while he wondered if he would ever regain enough breath to tell him.

Vin had made himself coffee, and Stu wasn't sure how to take the departure from the protocol. "Kettle's been on." Vin seemed to think he needed to be told.

As Stu stirred in the contents of one of the cartons of milk Vin pocketed from fast food restaurants—barely enough to turn the coffee even slightly paler—he said "I didn't get the chance to hear everything they say about me yet, but—"

"I wasn't asking," Vin said and raised all the noise he could find in the bare floorboards as he went to open the door.

He put Abbey Road on the turntable and gave Stu a warning look that Stu found unnecessary if not worse. By the time the album ended, having abandoned the drummer and the rest of the band, not a single customer had visited the shop. Saturday ought to be the busiest day, and Stu watched Vin growing glummer. Halfway through the first side of the mystery tour Vin said "We need to bring more people in or I may as well trade from home."

"How are you going to do that? Bring them in, I mean."

"Maybe it wants somebody that can."

"Well, there is." When this earned him a stare that scarcely even hinted at a question, Stu said "There's me."

Vin was silent long enough to have thought of quite a few words before saying "I meant a girl."

“We don’t need them. You saw that one yesterday. They aren’t on our wavelength.”

“My wife is.” Almost as ominously Vin said “Not much to look at any more, that’s her trouble. No use to my shop.”

“Well then there’s still me. I don’t need to look like anything except who I am. I started to tell you, I did hear some of the things they’re saying about me. Don’t think I’m boasting, will you, but they’ve got me down as a legend and a genius and Ringo’s fave.”

“That’s what you think, is it, Stew?”

Stu didn’t want to be trapped into making the claims for himself. “What I think, I’ve thought of a slogan for us.”

“Then maybe you’re some use.”

“Visit him at Vin’s Vintage Vinyl.” When Stu didn’t see even a glimmer of recognition he said “That’s me.”

He thought the weary clang of the bell that announced the day’s first customer had robbed him of a response until Vin muttered “Just leave it, Stew.”

Could Vin doubt him, or did he think Stu’s inclusion on the tour wouldn’t help the shop? He wasn’t going to undermine Stu’s rediscovered confidence. Stu kept close to any customers in case they wanted his advice, but managed to hold back from pointing out the Scousers’ album and drawing attention to the drummer. Less than half an hour before the shop was due to close he said “Do you mind if I leave a bit early as long as we’re so quiet?”

“Going on your tour, are you?”

“That’d wow them, wouldn’t it? They wouldn’t be expecting that.” When Vin gave him a look that seemed determined to fend off his enthusiasm Stu said “I want to go and hear. Not just for me, not even mostly.”

“Been telling yourself that, have you, Stew?”

“That’s not my name,” Stu said with a fierceness that, in all the years since his second wife had left him, he’d forgotten he possessed. “I’m not a pan of Scouse.”

“Sounds more like that’s all you think you are, a bit of one.” Before Stu’s rage could find another word Vin said “Go on, go home and sort your head out. That's what the weekend's for."

Stu had a better use for it, and he'd be bringing the proof to the shop. He reached the homeward stop less than a minute ahead of a bus. The police had restored its usual route, and he was home so early that he only just missed the penultimate tour of the day, which left him feeling prickly with frustration. At least he had time to make sure he heard everything about him on the final tour.

He mustn't risk being unable to hear. He dodged out of the house to stand behind the tree outside the front garden, and wondered how much he resembled a drunk overtaken by a need. Sometimes he'd been like that—both his wives had lectured him about it more than once—but he couldn't afford to be now, financially or otherwise. In any case, his neighbours oughtn't to be watching him; they would have a better reason when they heard the guide. Here was the tour at the end of the road at last, and as the bus turned towards him he put the tree between them.

Suppose it prevented him from hearing? Should he just stroll along the road? It might look as if he was loitering in search of praise—as if he needed that to lend him confidence. He'd begun to tear strips of bark off the tree by the time he heard his name. The bus was on the far side of the tree, and he kept it there by sidling around the trunk. As soon as it was well past he sprinted to the next tree, and thought he glimpsed passengers turning away from gazing at his house. He followed the tour to the end of the road, where he had to let it go, having run out of cover. Whether since the trees were in the way or because his exertions had amplified his heart, he'd failed to hear another word.

When his pulse had finished shaking his body he let go of the last tree and limped back to the house. "What have you been up to now?" he could hear his wife demanding—either of his wives. They'd accused him of making too much of all his Scousers posters, as if both of them weren't doing that themselves. He'd argued all night with the first one after she'd torn a poster on the wall by the stairs—only dusting, she'd said. He'd waited for her replacement to carry on the damage, and she was gone too once she had. Being unmarried had let him have the posters framed under glass, although that left them feeling less alive to him. Now that the tour was bringing it all back to life he shouldn't need them so much.

The light from the street glared out of the frames, and the contents went dark as he shut the door. Might there be another tour today? Even if that was only a hope, a couple of pieces of toast would keep him going while he waited. He kept stopping after just one bite for fear that the crunching that resounded through his head might deafen him to the approach of the bus. When at last it grew too dark and cold for him to imagine there would be one, he brushed the crumbs off his lap and out of the window, then leaned on the sash to haul it down. He drew the curtains before switching on the light, and then he got ready for bed. He wanted to be awake well in time for the first Sunday tour.

His name wakened him, but he couldn't tell how high the voice had been. He thought it might have been falsetto, the way the Scousers sang—and then he realised what it must be, and lurched out of bed. His feet were tangled in the quilt, so that he almost fell headlong as he floundered to the window. The rumble of the sash blotted out the guide's next words, which surely couldn't be responsible for the behaviour of her customers. While Stu couldn't see many people on the bus, as it passed his house they were pointing and laughing at him.

The tour was almost out of sight before he managed to laugh in response. He supposed he might have reacted like them if he'd seen himself standing naked at the window, blinking dozily at the world. He didn't mind being a Scouse joke for once, especially since the wall under the windowsill had preserved his decency. He used the bathroom as speedily as he was able and dressed on his way back to the window. As he fumbled to fasten the strap of his wristwatch he was disconcerted to find it was nearly noon. He'd been roused hours later than he'd planned to sleep.

He still didn't feel awake. Surely he had time to make himself a coffee before the next tour, but he left the front door open so that he would hear the guide while he was in the kitchen. The mug spattered his hand with drops that felt like embers as he tramped down the slippery path to his gate. There was no sign of the tour, but might he have failed to hear it by straining too hard? His shaky hand was smarting in half a dozen spots by the time he succeeded in carrying the mug to the chair at the bedroom window. He didn't know how many bitter sips he'd swallowed when he saw the bus sneaking up the road.

He hadn't been hearing his pulse, but now he did. Could it have deafened him to the commentary, or was the guide waiting until her passengers saw his house? She didn't speak as the bus nosed past the gate, but she must already have mentioned him, since the scattered passengers were gazing up at him. Although their faces didn't change when he waved and stuck his thumbs up, he was overtaken by the notion that they were trying not to laugh.

He had to be mixing them up with the earlier tour, and he just needed to be more awake. He took gulps of coffee that felt as if they were skinning his mouth. His head was throbbing with caffeine, not to mention his attempts to hear the guide, before the tour reappeared. As he watched the bus cruise towards his house she didn't utter a single word, and he was suddenly convinced that she'd been talking about him while he couldn't hear. Was the bus slowing to give the passengers a better look at him? Faces turned up to him, and as his arms shivered with his struggles not to gesture he was sure he saw lips writhing in an effort to suppress mirth.

He heard laughter as trees hid the bus. What had she said about him? He dropped the mug, splashing his ankles, and stalked downstairs, grabbing the banister at every step. She must think he was stupid if she imagined she could prevent him from hearing her remarks. He marched to the end of the road to watch for the next tour.

When it showed up on the main road he withdrew behind the first tree, but he must have taken too long over making sure it was her bus. The tree wasn't quite broad enough to hide him, and as the bus turned the corner a passenger craned to watch him. Stu dodged around the tree, but more people twisted in their seats to spy him. As the bus sped towards his house he heard it trailing laughter. He was unable to catch up with it, not that he knew what he would have done if he had, and so he retreated into the house.

He oughtn't to have let the guide realise he could hear. On the next tour she kept her comments well out of earshot, but he wasn't fooled. Even if the passengers didn't point and laugh, he could see how their faces were hiding whatever she'd said about him. Each reappearance of the bus enraged him further, and when he started breaking splinters off the windowsill he stormed down to stand at the gate. Staring fiercely at one consignment of passengers didn't daunt them; some of them didn't even bother withholding their amusement until they were out of sight, while the guide pretended she was too busy driving to notice him. His drumming on the gate failed to impress the next group, though the performance scattered bits of wood across the pavement, and his vocals fell short of restoring his image, however high he strained his voice. It left his throat raw, and he'd had enough of trying to counteract her mockery. He snatched out his phone—for once he was grateful to his last wife, who'd nagged him to buy the mobile so that she would be able to locate him—and found the number for the Beatles tour.

He might have known the office would be shut on Sundays. He needn't think they were refusing to answer, having recognised his number. The chilly twilight sent him into the house, but he wasn't about to close the window. How many tours did he still have to watch? It seemed there was just one, and perhaps ending her day made the guide careless of whether Stu heard, unless she wanted to provoke him to put on more of a show. As the bus entered the road she grew loud enough for his neighbours to hear. Scotty and the Scousers had become a cult band, she was saying, partly thanks to the Beatles. John Lennon had told their drummer he was Ringo's favourite as a joke. People in the know packed the Scousers' gigs out because the drummer was the best in the business—the best laugh. He'd earned the nickname Chicken Drumsticks because he played as if he was using them.

"I never heard that," Stu told her passengers. "I never heard any of it. It's not true, none of it. What's wrong with you?" He scarcely knew whom he was addressing, let alone how high his voice had risen; his wives would have been covering their ears by now and telling him not to screech. They'd managed to incite him to put on the wrong kind of show—the guide had. She wouldn't think it was so funny when he told her employer.

The tour was out of sight by now, but who else had it started talking about him? How many of his neighbours might be? Even with the window open as wide as his shoulder could heave the sash, he was unable to decide if the muffled voices were on television. They seemed to be repeating one another's words, but was he the subject they were agreeing about? He shivered whenever he craned out of the window, to be met by another faceful of frosty air. Eventually the dawn became daylight that was just about as grey, and he began phoning Vin's Vintage Vinyl.

If Vin was there he wasn't owning up to it, and the tour firm didn't answer. Stu had been trying both of them for most of an hour by the time Vin made his weariness audible. "What's up now, Stew?"

"It's Stu." Having established this, Stu said "It looks as if I'll have to be late."

"What's keeping you? Don't say your tour."

Stu wasn't going to admit that until he'd dealt with it, and so he said "I think I'm a bit sick."

"You're not telling me anything. Anyway, don't go rushing back. I'm working on a girl like I said."

She wouldn't replace him, Stu promised himself. Nobody could. He cut Vin off without replying and tried the tour firm once again. He was answered so immediately that he almost forgot he didn't want to be identified—not yet, at any rate. He did his best to elevate his voice even higher than the woman's that had greeted him. "Can I ask about someone you've got on your tour?"

"Someone who works for us, do you mean?"

"Not her, no." In some haste Stu added "Somebody you talk about. Stu Stewart."

"Who's that, sorry?"

"Me," Stu was almost provoked by her tone to blurt. "The drummer with Scotty and the Scousers," he said aloud.

"He isn't part of our tour."

"You can't tell me that. You've always gone along my, gone along his road and now you're talking about him."

"Which road is that, sir?"

Her last word nearly robbed him of speech. When he named his road and then told her where it was, hiking his voice higher still, she said "We've never used that route. We don't come within a mile of it."

She'd recognised him, of course. By calling him sir she'd betrayed that she had. He didn't need to hear her start to laugh as he cut her off. How much of an idiot did she take him for? Did she really believe she could trick him into doubting the evidence of his own senses? She and the other one would have even less of a chance when he took the tour. He would have to go downtown to catch it from the terminus, and he hurried to the bus stop on the main road. A bus was approaching, and Stu hadn't finished fumbling for his travel pass when the doors opened to him. "You're all right," the driver said. "We'll let you on."

For an instant he thought she meant because he was Stu Stewart, and then he recognised her voice. Her accomplice must have been in touch with her, and now they were trying to convince him that he'd caught an ordinary bus. He didn't need to scrutinise the passengers to see they knew better. "That's kind of you," he said through his teeth, and sat behind her as the bus swung into his road.

She wasn't going to deliver her commentary. That was obvious as soon as he met her eyes in the mirror. Perhaps she had already ridiculed him; in fact, when he twisted around to peer at the passengers he was sure she had. The knowledge brought him to his feet, and he grabbed a seat on each side of the aisle as he faced his audience. "Now you're on my part of the tour," he declared. "Stu Stewart, as if you didn't know."

They needn't try to look as though they didn't. The guide who was posing as merely a driver demolished all the pretence by saying "Can you sit down, sir."

Could he have spoken to her on the phone? It hardly mattered; they were all the same. "Ringo's favourite drummer and don't let anyone tell you different," he said louder and higher. "People came to see me right enough, but it wasn't for a laugh."

"Sir, if you don't sit down—"

"What'll you do? Tell your lies about me, like you haven't already?" His pitch was rising out of his control, and more than one passenger had covered their ears, though he wondered if they had because they didn't want to hear the truth. The bus was slowing, and he let go of the seats to demonstrate a few riffs on them. "That's just a taste. You know what, I think Ringo learned from me," he said and felt bound to explain the falsetto he couldn't bring down. "And this is how we used to have to sing."

He faltered, because his was no longer the only voice. The other one was repeating the tale about John Lennon's joke at Stu's expense. As the bus stopped outside his gate Stu lurched at the guide, but her lips appeared to be pinched shut. Was she devious enough to be throwing her voice? “Here’s what you’ve all been waiting to see,” Stu announced, “my house,” but he could still hear the commentary underlying his own. “I’ll find you,” he cried. “I know you’re there. You aren’t hiding from me.”

As he stalked along the aisle he began to recognise the passengers—the man at Jaz’s table in Yesterday’s, the girl who’d been brought into Vin’s shop. He couldn’t see his wives, however many faces he caught hold of. He was well on the way to prying a face wide to grasp the source of the relentless voice before its owner struggled free, having bitten Stu’s fingers, and fled like the rest of them. Several were emitting sounds higher than Stu was making. The guide was the last to flee, and shut him on the bus. He didn’t mind being left when he still had his audience, more of whom were joining them on the pavement. It was completely his tour now, and he took the guide’s seat, but he hadn’t discovered how to start the bus by the time several men drove up to help him.

The Watched

First published in Dark Screams Volume 1, December 2014

By the time the bird hide came in sight Jimmy's arms were aching for a rest. The bag of potatoes his grandmother had forgotten to buy when they'd gone to the shops was too heavy to be carried in one hand. It lolled ponderously against his chest with every step he took along the canal path, and whenever he tried to put on speed its irrepressible contents dealt him a thump. In any case, he might have dodged into the hide. Watching his house and its neighbours always made him feel like a spy in a film.

The hide was a hut composed of rounded logs, open on the side that faced away from the canal. The logs were patched with moss and scaly with small leaves. A gap low enough for Jimmy to look through and sufficiently high for a tall person not to have to crouch must have been designed to give a view of any life on the canal and across it before the houses had been built. Now the gap was full of the glare of the lamps in front of the houses, an amber light that seemed to hold the nondescript boxy buildings still and left the inside of the hut as dark as the silent stately water. Jimmy had lurched into the hut before he realised it was occupied. Somebody was skulking in the left-hand corner as if he didn't want to be seen.

Jimmy hugged the bag and was retreating onto the path when a low, hoarse voice followed him. "Come here, son."

The man hadn't turned, and Jimmy didn't know what he might be doing out of sight. "I've got to take these to my nan."

"She'll wait." Still without turning, the man said, "I know where you live."

What kind of threat was this meant to be? As Jimmy tried to ignore it, the man swung around. "I said come here."

His wide jowly mottled face looked as if it was to some extent propped up by the thin straight lips. His eyes were tired but fiercely determined to stay awake. He was brandishing a card in the dimness, and it helped Jimmy to recognise him—the community policeman who'd come to the school to lecture everyone about drugs. Some of those had killed his daughter, and he'd grown so furious about it that he might have been holding his audience responsible. "What do you want?" Jimmy said.

"I know what's going on over there. Better listen if you don't want trouble."

Jimmy resented feeling accused, especially since this was how too many adults seemed to feel they should treat anyone like him. He slouched into the hide to be met by smells of urine and alcohol and tobacco smoke. He didn't know how many of these belonged to the policeman, who'd grown dishevelled since visiting the school—crumpled suit, tie dangling from a collar that had lost its button, uncombed hair. As Jimmy dumped the bag of vegetables on the shelf under the gap in the wall of the hide, the policeman said, "That's your granny you live with, is it? Where's your parents?"

"My dad went off and the man my mam's with doesn't like me." In case this sounded like a babyish complaint, Jimmy added, "And I'm looking after my nan."

"Needs it, does she?" The man's breath glimmered orange like the fumes of a fire in the November air. "Is she the helpful sort as well?"

"I suppose."

"Looks out for her neighbours, eh? How much does she know about them?"

"You'd have to ask her."

"Don't get cute with me, son. You know who we're talking about. The lot who live next door."

Since his house was squashed between two more of the same, Jimmy felt he could say, "I don't know which."

"I told you about being cute. The ones with all the visitors, and maybe you know why. The Dibbin mob."

So he didn't mean the men who'd married each other. Jimmy had suspected the Dibbin family for a while but hadn't told even his grandmother. "Are they druggies?"

"The worst kind, son. Your local dealers." The man's lips writhed, letting his face droop further. "Too local," he muttered, "for anyone to bother over except me."

Understanding overtook Jimmy so fast that he blurted, "Are they the ones who—"

"Killed her, the scum." His eyes twitched so tight and narrow that Jimmy thought he saw them bulge. "And how do you know about that?" the policeman said, lower still.

"You told us at my school."

The man's stare hadn't relented when it strayed past Jimmy. "Well, there's someone we're talking about."

Jimmy's grandmother was at the kitchen window, pressing the edge of a hand against her forehead and peering both ways along the canal. "I've got to go home," Jimmy pleaded. "She'll be worried."

"She'd better be." Jimmy's bid for sympathy seemed to have antagonised the policeman, who said, "If you care that much about her, you'd better give me what I need."

Jimmy didn't speak until his grandmother had trudged out of view. "What?"

"Maybe you can't see any more than me, but you can listen. Your bedroom's next to those scum, isn't it? Stick your head against the wall and you can tell me what you hear. I'll let you know when to come across."

The game of spying had lost its appeal. Jimmy was close to refusing when the policeman said, "And you can tip me off when they've got customers."

"How?"

"Do something at the window." As Jimmy wondered if the man was much good at his job—he'd started to sound not much better than childish—the policeman said, "You don't want anybody seeing what you're up to. Here, do this."

Before Jimmy could draw back, the man floundered at him to plant a hand over his nose and mouth. The flabby palm was moist with sweat, and the fingers stank of nicotine. Jimmy was about to struggle free so as to breathe when the policeman let go. "Your old granny won't know what you're doing," he said, less a statement than an admonition. "You don't want anyone knowing I'm here."

"Suppose they find out?"

“Then I’ll be thinking you’re responsible. If you let me down you’ll be assisting criminals.” As Jimmy opened his mouth to protest, the man’s gaze veered away from him. “She’s back,” he muttered, and Jimmy saw his grandmother leaning across the sink to peer through the kitchen window. “You didn’t see me, understand,” the policeman said. “Better trot off home before she wants to know what you’ve been up to. And just remember, if you get done as an accomplice she might be as well.”

Jimmy thought the man was behaving as unreasonably as only adults could. All the way along the path to the footbridge he felt as if he was carrying another weight besides the bag—a lump of resentment and frustrated rebellion. His feet on the metal steps made more noise than the barge that chugged under the bridge. As the long vessel rode its luminous ripples past the houses, Jimmy saw a tiny light glare as red as a laser in the hide. It was the tip of a cigarette, but he could have taken it for a signal or a warning.

He’d hardly knocked on the back door when his grandmother flurried into the kitchen. Some hairs had straggled loose from her greying bun, but her intensely wrinkled face looked determined to fend off anything unwelcome, which in Jimmy’s experience covered a good deal, including most of the news. As she unlocked the door she cried, “Wherever have you been?”

Jimmy hefted the bag of potatoes, which assailed him with an earthy smell. “These are heavy. I couldn’t walk fast.”

“You’re a good boy and don’t let anybody tell you different. Your mother ought to be proud, but I shouldn’t ask so much of you at your age. Blame my old brain for forgetting at the shop.”

Jimmy could have retorted that he was twelve, not to mention wondering why his father shouldn’t also be proud of him, except that he knew his grandmother had never liked the man who’d taken her daughter away. As he let the bag sprawl on the kitchen table she said, “You were such a long time. Don’t say I made you strain yourself.”

She sounded more anxious than he could bear. “I had to stop and talk to someone.”

“Anyone I know?”

Jimmy turned his back on the hide and lowered his voice as well. “Just a policeman.”

“A policeman,” his grandmother cried, raising her face like a shield. “Have you been getting into trouble?”

“It wasn’t me. He’s after someone else that has.”

“I don’t want to know, Jimmy, and you mustn’t get involved, either. You don’t know what their sort could do to us.”

Presumably she meant criminals. Mightn’t that make her their accomplice, at least in the policeman’s eyes? Jimmy heard her dismissing the issue as she said, “You start your homework while I make us a nice dinner.”

He grabbed his rucksack from the narrow stairs and hurried to his bedroom, where he unfolded the laptop on the rudimentary desk before pressing his ear against the wall between posters for two of his favourite singers, each of them dressed in not much more than her underwear. He could hear a woman’s voice—that must be flat-faced Mrs. Dibbin, who always looked close to nodding off—and then her pudgy husband, who wore at least as much jewellery as his wife. Where was their bony bald son Dez, who seemed to consist largely of veins and sinews and restless nerves? Jimmy was trying to identify his voice when the argument grew clear enough to let him realise he was overhearing a television show.

The muffled confrontation distracted him from working on his essay about the history of where he lived, the fields and woods that the housing estate had replaced, a past that had nothing to do with him. When his grandmother called him for dinner in the kitchen he could hear the Dibbin family through the wall, but their television was louder. He ate his burger—a stockier version of the one his grandmother had made for herself, accompanied by twice as many chips—as quickly as he could so as to listen upstairs. “You needed that, didn’t you?” his grandmother said. “Here, I’m not very hungry. Have some of mine I haven’t touched.”

Jimmy was dismayed to think he’d put her off her dinner by making her nervous. She was already thinner than she had been when he’d come to stay, and he felt he was taking too much of her food. He went upstairs, chewing a last mouthful, to bruise his ear against the wall. The ear had begun to throb by the time he heard Dez Dibbin in the hall next door. The teenager was talking about a deal. “I’ll go and get it now,” he shouted.

Jimmy ran to the window and covered his mouth. Did he just look shocked? Even when he remembered to cover his nose as well, he couldn’t see any movement in the hide. He jabbed a thumb at the house next door and then mimed steering with a wheel, none of which brought a response. How else could he alert the policeman? In desperation he bared his left arm and pretended to insert an object into it. He'd poked at the arm several times when a figure dashed out of the hide.

He saw the policeman run not entirely straight to a car parked on the road that paralleled the canal. The car screeched away so hastily that it travelled several hundred yards before its lights came on. It raced past the footbridge and swerved onto the road bridge, and Jimmy couldn't help being excited by the prospect of a car chase. He darted out of his bedroom, only to realise that his grandmother might want to know what he was doing. As he hesitated at the top of the stairs a muffled discussion came to an end, and someone slammed the front door of the Dibbin house. A car—it would be the hulking Rover that was always parked half on the pavement—sped away, followed by silence.

Jimmy heard nothing else while he tried to concentrate on his essay, unless there was a distant splash. He'd managed to write just a few dogged sentences by the time the front door of the next house slammed again. "Here's the pizzas," Dez shouted. "I got the deal."

Jimmy covered his mouth, but he was giving nobody a sign except himself. So he'd sent the policeman in pursuit of pizza. Yet another argument had broken out next door, and he planted his ear against the wall. He caught the name Blundell and heard Dez protest, "Didn't touch the car." Whatever this signified, the tangle of angry voices moved out of earshot before Jimmy managed to distinguish another word.

He made himself finish his essay, borrowing paragraphs online and changing enough words to let him hope the teacher wouldn't notice, before he ventured to the window. As far as he could tell the hide was deserted, which left him afraid that the policeman might come to the house. Surely he wouldn't when that would betray his presence, and eventually thinking so let Jimmy sleep.

In the morning his grandmother presented him with the man-sized breakfast she kept telling him boys needed to help them grow. She admired him in his uniform as usual and adjusted his rucksack on his shoulders without being encouraged, let alone asked, on the way to seeing him off from the front door. His breath looked like nervousness made visible as he craned over the footbridge to see that the hide was deserted. He was sure the policeman would return, probably angrier still, not least with him.

The thought made school come as a relief or, at any rate, a postponement—the classroom chaos that he might as well join in as long as it didn't let him work, the schoolyard bullying he'd learned to imitate to protect himself, the teachers who were either simply boring or earnest about it as well, especially the ones who spent half the lesson waiting for everybody to behave. He only ever really learned when he could work by himself. On his way home through the dank twilight he saw that the hide was empty, but when he looked out of his bedroom window the silhouette of a head leaned around the edge of the gap in the logs, a silent greeting from the dark.

It made him desperate to hear something to incriminate the Dibbins. He stayed at the bedroom wall until his grandmother had summoned him twice for dinner. "Do they have to give you so much homework?" she complained. "That is what you're doing up there, isn't it, Jimmy?"

He was close to blurting out the truth, but more anxious to overhear. He heard nothing to compensate for last night's mistake—not much that was comprehensible at all. If he'd seen the policeman in the morning he might have gone to speak to him, but instead his nervous recklessness drove him to approach the headmistress in the schoolyard. She was just his height, and yet she made him feel small. While her round face was placid, her grey eyes were a warning not to underestimate her. "Jimmy Cropper, isn't it?" she said. "What's the problem?"

"Can I ask you something, Mrs. Briscoe?"

"Anything you need to. If you don't ask questions, you won't learn."

"A community policeman, is he a real one?"

"You should do what anyone in authority tells you if it's not against the law." This sounded like a standard answer to a question Jimmy hadn't meant to ask, but Mrs. Briscoe added, "Did you have somebody in mind?"

"The one who came to talk to us about drugs."

"Ah, that gentleman. I hope you've taken what he said to heart." Once again she seemed to follow an official caution with a personal response, murmuring, "But you're right all the same. I'm afraid Mr. Blundell isn't real any longer."

“Why?” Jimmy tried to sound less rude by saying, “What happened to him?”

“I understand he became too involved in a case.” As Jimmy grasped which one she had to mean, Mrs. Briscoe said, “He’s no longer with the police, so if by any chance you should meet him, don’t let him make you think he is.”

Jimmy thought that like any adult she knew more than she was prepared to tell him. Had Blundell tried to convince someone else he was still a policeman? Knowing that he’d lost his power was such a reassurance that Jimmy even felt emboldened to ask questions in class rather than hoping none would be addressed to him.

The hide was empty when he passed it on his way home. Either the dusk wasn’t quite dark enough for Blundell to take up his post or he’d abandoned his vigil. Jimmy went to his room to make a start on his homework before dinner. As he shut the curtains a head loomed into the gap in the hide. The man had ceased to be a threat, and Jimmy didn’t even bother trying to overhear anything next door.

In the morning the hide was still deserted. It glistened with mist like a lingering wintry breath. He’d forgotten about it by the time he reached the school, but Mrs. Briscoe called him over in the yard. “Will you forget what I told you about Mr. Blundell?”

She sounded as conspiratorial as Blundell had. “Why?” Jimmy said.

“I shouldn’t have mentioned it. There wasn’t any need. I’m afraid the gentleman isn’t with us any more.”

Jimmy was ashamed to feel relieved. “You mean he’s…”

“That’s precisely what I mean.” Less brusquely, Mrs. Briscoe said, “When you’re old enough to drive, just you make sure you never drink, and don’t let anybody drive who has. Mr. Blundell drove into the canal.”

Jimmy’s feeling of relief seemed to be in danger of deserting him. “When?”

“Before I spoke to you about him. The previous night, I believe.”

Jimmy was remembering not just how he’d hoped to provoke a car chase but Dez Dibbins' protest that a car hadn’t been touched. “Thanks, Mrs. Briscoe,” he mumbled, turning away to keep his thoughts to himself. He just had to realise that he couldn’t have seen Blundell last night. Either someone else had been in the hide or Jimmy had imagined the silhouetted head.

He managed to put it out of his mind until he was on the canal path. The late afternoon was dark enough for the lights outside the houses across the water to have come on, except for the pair of lamps closest to the Dibbin house and his. The hide was deserted, but as he reached the house he thought he glimpsed movement in the reflection on the kitchen window. Before he could look his grandmother came to the door almost too hastily to keep her balance. “I’m glad you’re in,” she said, with not much breath. “They’ve been smashing the lights.”

“Who has, Nan?”

“I didn’t look, Jimmy. They might have seen me seeing.”

Jimmy thought he could answer his own question, although why should the Dibbin family feel watched now? He went up to his room, hoping to spend not too much time on his homework. As he drew the curtains he glanced across the canal. Somebody was in the hide.

The occupant wasn’t anxious to be seen. Jimmy had barely made out the shape of a head when it withdrew into its lair. Was there a trickle of moisture on the logs beneath the corner of the gap where the silhouette had appeared? In the dimness between the dead lamps Jimmy couldn’t be sure. He gripped the flimsy plastic curtains and leaned his forehead against the chilly window, and then he dragged the curtains together.

The history project seemed more remote from him than ever. He hadn’t written much by the time his grandmother announced dinner. “What are they making such a row about?” she wondered as the Dibbins carried on an argument in which only all the words she forbade Jimmy to say were audible, and he thought it must be the aftermath of running Blundell off the road into the canal. He was tempted to let his grandmother know, but he shouldn’t make her nervous. He needn’t risk telling anyone at all, because surely the police would track the culprit down.

The murky morning seemed to have cleared the hide, and it was still deserted when he came home, but he saw his grandmother in the kitchen doorway. She was looking for someone, though not him. She gestured at the Dibbin house, and Jimmy was afraid what she might say until she called, “Have you seen the window-cleaner?”

“It isn’t his day, Nan. He came last week.”

“Well, he must have been again, and he didn’t do a very good job. I could do better myself.”

Jimmy tramped across the footbridge and along the towpath to see that a smeary trail led across the kitchen window and the door, ending halfway along the blinded window of the Dibbin house. “He wants to buy himself a new sponge,” his grandmother said.

Jimmy didn’t think the trail looked as if a sponge had made it, and in any case the window-cleaner would have washed it off. It must have been left by an object the size of a man’s face and at about that height. Was the resemblance more apparent where it had come to rest on the neighbouring window? Before Jimmy could risk a closer look, a wind brought a fierce onslaught of rain across the canal, reducing the marks to an indistinguishable blur. “Come in, for heaven’s sake,” his grandmother cried. “We don’t want you catching your death.”

He was in his room when he had to glance out of the window. How could anyone be in the hide? It had been deserted less than a minute ago, and so had that side of the canal for hundreds of yards in every direction. Nevertheless, a head was dimly visible against the glow of a lamp on the road beyond the hide. As it lolled into the gap, the rain on Jimmy’s window made it seem uncertain of its shape. He had the sudden uninvited notion that the watcher had been waiting for him to come home. He shut out the sight and retreated downstairs. “Can I do my homework down here, Nan? It’s cold up there.”

“You do it wherever you like. And if you want the heat up, just you say.”

Working in the front room wasn’t as reassuring as he’d hoped, because he could hear visitors next door. Before long he realised they were all using a signal—two knocks with a long pause after each, and then a pair separated by almost none. He didn’t enjoy feeling like a spy when there was nobody he wanted to inform. After dinner he felt still more uncomfortable, sensing how wary his grandmother was of distracting him from his work. Whenever she turned a page of her library book the timid whisper felt like an apology for making such a noise. He called his homework finished as soon as he could, but he didn’t have much fun watching television. Now that he’d heard the secret knocks he was afraid his grandmother might notice them, and the thought of her ignoring them made him just as nervous.

He had to go to bed when she kept telling him. The only movement at the hide appeared to belong to trickles of lingering rain, and he was letting the curtains sag together when he saw another aftereffect of the storm. A swathe of moisture as broad as a man led from the canal towards his house and disappeared close to if not at the kitchen wall. Jimmy had only to lean out of his window to see how it ended, but instead he made sure that the window was locked before he retreated to bed.

In the night it rained again. On his way to school Jimmy couldn't distinguish the marks on the window or the trail from the canal. The hide was empty when he passed it, although the left-hand corner looked darker than the rest of the interior. He tried to think the stain was just some of the mist that hung around the canal. He'd started to feel anxious about leaving his grandmother alone in the house, and he hurried home from school, though not fast enough to outdistance the dark. As he came to the hide he saw someone within.

He was grateful that the figure in the corner had its back to him. Was it already there because night had fallen earlier, or was it waiting for him? The way it slumped in the corner reminded him of the bag of potatoes he'd dumped on the shelf in the hide, not least because it looked equally capable of losing its shape; more than its clothes appeared to be sagging with moisture. As Jimmy made to sneak past in the hope of going unnoticed, the figure twitched as if it was hitching itself together. Before it could turn and show its face Jimmy fled to the bridge.

His grandmother hadn't even let him in when she demanded, "Is something wrong at school?"

"I've just got a lot of work to do, Nan."

"Well, don't you let them drive you too hard or I'll be in there for a word."

He had to go up to his room, where he stayed well away from the window. Next door he heard raised voices, mainly saying words that always made his grandmother wince and grimace. When he watched television with her he kept hearing the secret knock. Lying in bed felt like not daring to go to the window, and suppose the occupant of the hide came over to the house? What if his grandmother saw it from the downstairs window? Jimmy couldn't even start to fall asleep until he heard her come up to bed.

The nights grew longer, closing like claws around the days, leaving many of them smudged with a twilight of fog along the canal. Jimmy stayed well clear of the path by the hide and used the road instead. Whenever he came home after dark he saw a shape, such as it had, in the corner of the hide. It looked wetter than ever. From the house he sometimes couldn't avoid seeing a roundish object lurch into the gap in the hide as if to remind him that he was being watched, or that he hadn't yet fulfilled his mission, or even that he'd been responsible for a death. He could hardly even work at home, never mind at school, for living in a panic as constant as it was dull. He was afraid what his teachers might say to his grandmother when the school had its evening for parents and people who'd taken their place. He was still more nervous of having to explain, in case talking about the reason for his fears brought it closer.

How close would that be? Jimmy kept seeing a moist trail that led from the canal and finding marks on the window. While he was glad that the marks were increasingly blurred, he preferred not to think why they might be. One murky sunless morning he saw an extra elongated smear at the height where he would have expected the eyes of a face to be, as if they had been squashed blindly against the glass and drawn along it. He would have rubbed it off the window if he could have borne to touch it, so that his grandmother wouldn't see. He was anxious for her all day, and the feeling turned into dread as he came in sight of the hide, because he could hear her calling, "Mrs. Dibbin. Mr. Dibbin."

Jimmy dashed to the bridge so fast that he didn't have a moment to glance towards the hide. As he clattered up the steps he saw that his grandmother wasn't alone. She was knocking on the back door of the Dibbin house. He faltered on the bridge—he was afraid for her, but even more fearful of the situation—and then he ran down the steps three at a time. He was on the towpath when Mrs. Dibbin flung open her door. "What's all the noise for?"

"You make quite a lot yourselves, Mrs. Dibbin." At once Jimmy's grandmother sounded apologetic. "Have you seen somebody out here?"

"I'm seeing you and him."

The other person was the window-cleaner, Jimmy saw. "Someone at the windows," his grandmother said.

"There better hadn't be." The woman's sullen face grew even duller as she said, "Looks like you are."

“I’m only seeing what someone’s done. They’ve been doing it to my house as well. Surely you’ll have noticed, Mrs. Dibbin.”

“We’ve not noticed much about you.”

This was so plainly a threat that Jimmy was afraid his grandmother would respond to it, but she only pointed at the marks on the glass. “Did you do that?” Mrs. Dibbin accused the window-cleaner.

“It wasn’t me and I wouldn’t leave it like that, either.”

“You can stay away in future all the same. Our Dez can do the windows just as good.”

The man stared even harder at Jimmy’s grandmother than at Mrs. Dibbin before tramping away at a pace that seemed meant to express injured pride. “And you can keep clear of our windows as well,” Mrs. Dibbin said.

“I’m sure I only wanted to look out for my neighbours,” Jimmy’s grandmother protested. “It would be a better world if we all did, don’t you think?”

“We can take care of ourselves, so better give up looking,” Mrs. Dibbin said, and slammed the door.

As Jimmy’s grandmother followed him into their house she murmured, “I don’t know why everyone’s acting as if I’m not right in the head.”

“Watch out what you’re saying to Mrs. Dibbin and them,” Jimmy blurted, before he could stop himself. “They’re the ones that policeman was after.”

“Isn’t he still?” As Jimmy heard a more ominous meaning, his grandmother said, “Never mind, I don’t want to know about it. Don’t look for reasons to take against people. You’ve seen what happens with that.”

“What does, Nan?”

He could see that she regretted having to say “What did with your mother and father.”

Once he was in his room Jimmy risked looking across the canal. The outline of the head that peered out of the hide seemed dismayingly unstable. How much notice might his grandmother’s behaviour have attracted? He didn’t know if he was more nervous of the Dibbin family or of the watcher in the hide. He’d done very little homework by the time he was called for dinner.

Tonight's burger was stouter than ever. He managed to finish it and some of his salad and chips before hiding his nervousness in his room. How could he leave his grandmother on her own downstairs, closer to any danger? He'd lost his parents—he mustn't lose her as well. "Leave my nan alone," he muttered. "She never did you any harm. Remember who did."

He had to see if his words achieved anything. As he parted the curtains he braced himself for the sight of a head glistening in the dark. There was certainly movement, but it was closer than the hide; it was in the water. Something like a lumpy sack was drifting across the canal. No, it wasn't simply drifting; despite the current, it was advancing inexorably towards the house. For the moment it was facedown, but Jimmy was terrified that it might raise its waterlogged head. He snatched the curtains together so clumsily that he nearly ripped them from their hooks, and stumbled backwards, recalling words he'd heard: "You didn't see me." Just now they felt like a prayer, and he wanted them to apply to him as well.

He was wondering if he should be with his grandmother, for her protection or his—he was afraid there wouldn't be much of either—when he heard noises beside the canal. A heavy object was being dragged, or rather it was slithering, towards the house. Jimmy couldn't help thinking that it sounded determined to be solid, if not to hold itself together. He held his breath until his head throbbed, and then he managed to distinguish that the sluggish dragging had passed his house. Surely his grandmother couldn't hear it from the front room. He was holding his breath once more when he heard the knock.

It was the secret sign, with two long pauses followed by a short one. He hadn't heard it previously tonight, and now it was at the back door. Perhaps Mrs. Dibbin failed to notice how soft it sounded—sodden, even—because as Jimmy pressed his ear against the wall he heard her grumble, "Is that the mad old bitch again?"

"What's the nosy cow want now?" Mr. Dibbin complained. "Go and sort her out, Dez."

Jimmy flattened his ear against the wall and clenched his clammy fists. His pulse was beating so hard that he thought it might deafen him. He didn't hear Dez Dibbin go to the back door, but Dez's voice came from that direction—his outburst of disgust and worse. "I'm tripping," he cried. "You're not here."

In a few moments his parents added their own protests, consisting largely of a couple of the words Jimmy's grandmother deplored. The sounds fled in some confusion out of the front of the house, and Jimmy heard car doors slamming. In the midst of the screech of tyres, did he hear a fresh outburst of cries? The car raced away into the night, and then there was silence until Jimmy went downstairs. His grandmother came out of the front room to meet him. "I don't know what just happened next door," she said. "I'll do as Mrs. Dibbin told me and mind my own business."

She said nothing further while they watched television. When Jimmy returned to his room he was able to go straight to his window. There was no activity in the hide or the canal. Sleep took him by surprise almost as soon as he went to bed, and his grandmother had to waken him. The silence next door revived his appetite for breakfast, and the desertion of the hide nerved him to use the canal path to school, where he managed to concentrate on his work despite all the clamour around him. He'd had to ignore worse at home, and now he could dare to think that was over.

When his grandmother came to the back door it was evident that she had news. "Well, they've gone," she said, and gave the Dibbin house a disapproving look. "Don't you ever get mixed up with anything like that."

"What happened, Nan?"

"The men next door heard they went in the canal. Whoever was driving, they must have been on some of their drugs."

Jimmy didn't want to ascertain how much she'd known without admitting that she did, but he felt he ought to learn "Who was in the car?"

"All of them. All dead now."

He tried not to think that one already had been. "How many, though?"

"All."

She looked worried for him—presumably she found his insistence odd—and it seemed best to let the subject die. "Time we went shopping," she said.

The journey to the supermarket was even slower than last week's. Jimmy wanted to think she was driving that way so as not to be like their late neighbours, but he suspected it had more to do with her age. When he unloaded the groceries at home she realised she'd forgotten to buy apples. "Do you mind going back?" she pleaded. "They're good for your health."

Jimmy didn't want to mind or to dwell on her forgetfulness. He walked back to the supermarket and loaded a carrier bag with enough apples for a fortnight. The burden wasn't too cumbersome, and in any case he didn't need it as an excuse to dodge into the hide when he saw lights in the Dibbin house. The police were inside—the real police. No doubt they were searching for drugs. Everything Blundell could have wanted had come to pass, and so why should Jimmy still feel nervous? All at once he recalled what he'd said last night for the watcher to hear. He hadn't just declared that his grandmother had done Blundell no harm; he'd said, "Remember who did," and it made him clap a hand over his mouth.

At least for an instant he was able to believe this was the case. Certainly a hand was covering his mouth, and now his nose as well. It smelled of stale water and of what was left of itself. It was as cold as he imagined the mud at the bottom of the canal must feel, and in other ways it felt far too much like mud, as if some of it might be capable of oozing up his nose and between his lips. He didn't know what he would have swallowed if he'd tried to scream, but his captor didn't seem to have much strength, and Jimmy managed to struggle free. He reeled out of the hide without looking back as words repeated themselves in his head. "You didn't see me"—he was desperate for that to stay true. All the way to the bridge the bag of apples thumped his chest as if that could bring him back to his ordinary mundane life. He almost dropped the bag, because he was desperate to keep a hand free. He thought he might never stop wiping his mouth.

2015

Nightmare

First published in Horrorology, October 2015

They had left the hotel just a few miles behind when Lawrence said ‘There’s somewhere else I used to go.’

‘Striders Halt,’ Violet read on the sign for the next motorway exit. ‘What was that, Lawrence?’

‘A view of the whole valley. I could show you if you like.’

‘Is it far?’ At once she regretted sounding less than wholly enthusiastic. ‘If it means something to you,’ she said.

‘Only if it would to you as well. Maybe we can still salvage a little magic from the weekend.’

‘I thought you thought it was fun.’

‘I think we can do without that kind.’

She’d thought he’d shared her wry amusement. He must have been suppressing his reaction for her sake. The hotel he’d remembered from his childhood had turned out to be mostly occupied by several coachloads of old folk. They’d seemed to overwhelm the place, slowing it down to their speed and adding to its faint stale smell, filling the faded corridors with a mass of sluggish footsteps and effortful breaths. Lawrence might have intended to recapture some of his youth and share it with Violet, but instead they’d been reminded what could lie ahead for them. During the day they’d gone for walks on the hills and ridges, but the hotel was too remote from anywhere else to let them escape in the evenings, and so they’d been trapped with singalongs in the bar or into producing dutiful laughter at superannuated comedies on the television in the crowded lounge, where their neighbours kept turning to them to ensure they joined in. ‘Pet,’ Lawrence added as if this summed up the entire experience.

‘I never knew you disliked being called that so much.’ After all, several of the old folk had used it to Violet as well. ‘I hope you’re mine at least,’ she said.

‘I don’t care to be patronised. I’m more than a little too old.’

Was he complaining or boasting? Since they’d both retired he seemed to have grown unsure of himself and defensive to compensate, as if all the easy authority he’d shown with his students had just been armour for his vulnerable nature. She’d assumed that now they weren’t lecturing they would have time to grow closer. They mustn’t settle into themselves if it meant that they drifted apart, and she signalled to leave the motorway. ‘Let’s see your view,’ she said.

The January sun was lying low behind a vast slab of marble cloud. The icy glow blackened the exposed bones of the landscape. On either side of the road that wound between bare fields, hulking hedges bristled with thorns. Sometimes Violet glimpsed birds in the midst of the tangle of twigs, unless the restless objects were the only remaining leaves, shaken by the wind that sent a chill into the car. As the road straightened between the last of the fields, Lawrence sat forward. ‘What’s that in the way? It oughtn’t to be there.’

A line of wide bungalows blocked the end of the road, beyond a village green – an expanse of grass bisected by the road, at any rate. As the car emerged from between the hedges Violet saw that the bungalows extended out of sight past both ends of the green. ‘I expect someone else must have liked the view,’ she said.

‘Then they should have left it for the rest of us to appreciate.’

‘Do you want to go back?’

‘Back the way it was. Drive around for a bit, will you? Perhaps there’s still a path.’

‘Drive where, Lawrence?’

‘Wherever we’re allowed,’ he said and gestured vaguely at the houses. ‘I’ll shout if anything seems familiar.’

A sign on stumpy concrete legs identified the bungalow road as MEADOW PROSPECT. At least, Violet took that as the name, though a poster about a lost dog obscured more than half of the first word. Another fluttering poster drew her eye to a sign for a side road several hundred yards away – as far as she could make it out, CLIFF ROAD. ‘Yes, try that,’ Lawrence urged before she could ask.

Twin lines of elongated pale stone bungalows curved left and then right without hinting at the presence of a cliff. Violet was coasting around a third curve at a pace even she found sedate when one of the cars parked on the wide drives between the bungalows – a silver Jaguar – backed into the road at twice her speed. As she braked while Lawrence gasped and threw his hands up, the other driver lowered his window, leaving the Jaguar across the width of the road.

His receding hair was the faded brown of a vintage photograph. His eyes looked pinched narrow by wrinkles, more of which appeared to stretch his colourless mouth straight and thin. He apparently felt entitled to be heard with very little effort on his part, and Violet had to roll her window down, letting in a reason for a shiver. 'Sorry, what did you say again?'

'I asked if Fetcher brought you here.'

'I don't believe so,' Violet said, though the name sounded somehow familiar. 'Fletcher, did you say?'

'I quite clearly said Fetcher.' The man frowned as if she'd put him to more trouble than was warranted. 'You can't be lost,' he said.

Was this an accusation or a question that didn't bother sounding like one? Lawrence was lowering his window, presumably to ask for directions, when the man said 'Perhaps you can tell me whom you've come to see.'

'Nobody at all. My husband wanted to revisit some of his old haunts.'

'I don't know you,' the man said, scowling harder at Lawrence. 'I've never seen you here.'

'Nor I you. I was here before you were.'

'No,' the man said with a smile too thin to contain mirth. 'Nobody was.'

'I can assure you my parents and I—'

The man had already returned to scrutinising Violet. 'I should have thought you were too old to be defacing our streets.'

'What the devil do you mean by that?' Lawrence demanded, leaning out of the window so violently that the car shook. 'How dare you say that to my wife?'

'What can your companion be yapping about?' the man said without glancing at Lawrence. 'I should try and keep him under control.'

Lawrence lurched across the metal sill and produced a series of shrill barks. ‘How’s that for yapping?’

‘Don’t, Lawrence.’ Violet had not just to stroke his arm but tug at it before he subsided onto the seat, rubbing his chest where the sill had bruised it. ‘Don’t let him reduce you,’ she murmured.

‘That’s your idea of a joke, is it?’ The man’s face had grown angrily piebald. ‘Is it supposed to be how Fetcher sounds?’

‘We don’t know anything about that,’ Violet assured him. ‘I wonder if you could possibly tell us—’

The man met this with such a glare that she hesitated. ‘I won’t expect to find you,’ he said, ‘when I come back.’

‘Expect what you like,’ Lawrence retorted, but the man had already shut the window as firmly as his lips. As the Jaguar sped past, only just missing the wing mirror of the Viva, Violet saw the driver raise a phone to his face. ‘Tell who you want we’re here,’ Lawrence shouted, twisting around to add ‘Tell your whole damned suburb.’

‘That isn’t necessary, Lawrence. That’s not how we behave,’ Violet said, though she couldn’t help feeling enlivened by how much younger his reaction made him seem. ‘Shall we call it a day?’

‘Not while there’s so much light left. Just say whenever you’ve had enough of indulging me.’

The confrontation with the driver had affected Violet more than she cared for. Her legs weren’t quite steady, any more than her hands were on the wheel. Once she was close to the next street sign she was able to say ‘Fetcher.’

‘Why are you saying that to me?’

‘See, it’s why that person did.’

Another of the posters was stuck to the low sign. It showed a dog standing on its hind legs as though perched on its name, which was written larger than the message underneath. That was why the name had sounded familiar, and someone had scribbled over the animal’s face. So this was the defacing the Jaguar driver had referred to, and she hoped he’d meant that neither she nor Lawrence could have been involved. ‘What’s the matter with these people?’ Lawrence said. ‘Don’t they want anyone to find their way?’

She scarcely had time to put the handbrake on before he unleashed himself from his safety belt and stalked over to the sign. Until he helped the wind to lift the poster, which covered half the first word, the sign appeared to name LEY ROAD. He was letting the poster fall back into place when a woman with disorganised grey hair hurried out of the side road, buttoning her long black coat. ‘Where’s the dog?’ she called.

She was wearing leather slippers, Violet saw. Lawrence didn’t answer until the questioner was staring up at him from less than a yard away. ‘I’m afraid there’s no dog.’

‘Of course there is. Don’t tell me you didn’t hear it.’ Her voice was growing louder with each phrase. ‘You aren’t deaf, are you?’

‘Is it your dog?’

‘Why should it be? We look out for one another round here. We aren’t like the rest of the world.’ Her frown might have been including him in the repudiation. ‘Now will you please finish wasting my time,’ she said, ‘and tell me where it’s gone.’

‘There was never any dog.’ As she took a breath that suggested she was about to raise her voice even further Lawrence said ‘It was me.’

‘Don’t be so childish.’ She had indeed found more of a voice. ‘What do you mean, it was you?’

‘My attempt at imitation.’ When she looked both impatient and uncomprehending Lawrence treated her to a few barks. ‘That kind of thing,’ he said.

Violet heard how apologetic he meant to be, but the woman stared at him as if facing down an animal. ‘Have you really nothing better to do at your age than play tricks?’

‘Excuse me, madam, but you’d have to know the context. I—’

She shook her finger at the poster or at him. ‘Was that you as well?’

‘I hardly think there’s much resemblance.’

‘You know perfectly well what I mean. Are you responsible for the damage?’

‘Do you truthfully think that’s how I look?’

‘I think you look incapable of answering a simple question.’

‘No, I’m not responsible, and I can’t believe you could think for an instant I was. Now here’s a simple question for you. Can you tell us how to get to __’

‘To wherever you ought to be? Just turn right round and scamper back where you came from.’ She stalked away but turned to add ‘And I wouldn’t advise you to do any more pretending.’

As Lawrence yanked at his seat belt so hard that it snagged, Violet murmured ‘We don’t seem very welcome, do we? Shall we give up and go home?’

‘Give up?’ He blinked at her as if he hardly recognised her. ‘We never would have once,’ he said. ‘Unless you’ve had enough of me.’

‘You shouldn’t say such things. You don’t mean it any more than I do.’

‘Then carry on.’ As he succeeded in fastening his belt he muttered ‘They can’t keep the magic to themselves.’

He was speaking figuratively, of course, even if it sounded like rather too determined a bid to recapture childhood innocence. History had been his subject as much as hers, and it had taught them how people were led to believe magic was real, not just an enchanting fancy. As she turned along Valley Road she was relieved not to see the woman who’d accosted him, but there was no suggestion of the view he was seeking, just a succession of long squat houses that looked united in anonymity, resolved to exhibit no personality to strangers. Once the road stopped curving Violet saw a sign for Valley Crescent, or at least as much of the name as the dangling poster didn’t hide, but this road led her away from the direction Lawrence wanted her to take. She’d begun to share his dogged resolve to find whatever was to be found, and she followed Valley Lane into Valley Drive, which brought her to Valley Avenue. Each sign was partly obscured by a poster about the lost dog, and the face in each photograph had been disfigured beyond recognition, a sight that made Violet feel irrationally guilty, too much of an intruder. She had as much right to use the streets as anyone who lived there, not that a single resident was to be seen. A road presumably called Valley Row led to one that must be Valley Terrace, and she was starting to wonder if the names had been chosen to confuse outsiders. Then Lawrence leaned forward, clasping his hands together so fervently that she could almost have thought he was praying. ‘This has to be it,’ he said.

The road was straight, and the houses on the side that was presumably closer to his goal were twice the height of the bungalows opposite. Perhaps they had been built to take advantage of a view. Less than halfway along the street Lawrence said ‘Yes, here.’

She had barely switched the engine off before he escaped from the harness. When she followed him she found him peering at the unfenced grass in front of the houses. ‘I’m sure that’s part of the path,’ he said.

It wasn’t much of one. It was composed of uneven rock almost overgrown enough to pass for an unkempt strip of the lawns it divided, and stretched from a flagstone of the pavement to a solid wooden fence behind the houses. If it was natural, it was unusually straight despite its irregular edges. As Lawrence stepped on it Violet had a qualm of nervousness. ‘It’s on someone’s property,’ she said, though this fell short of explaining her unease. ‘Do you think we should?’

‘It still has to be a right of way. They haven’t dared to cover it up,’ he said and strode along the path.

Once it passed between the houses it was shut in by fences enclosing the back gardens. The fences were at least seven feet high, like the one that blocked off the path beyond its junction with a narrow alley that led behind the gardens. ‘We just need to find the way through,’ Lawrence said.

Violet failed to see where, and he plainly couldn’t either. He tramped along the alley at a speed suggestive of conviction, only to return before she caught up with him. The opposite stretch of the alley defeated him as well, and she saw him clench his fists so hard that they looked close to fingerless. The next moment he crouched and sprang up in a bid to peer over the fence. ‘I think I see—’

Whatever he meant to add was driven into him as his feet struck the ground. Though the impact visibly shook him, it provoked another furious attempt, which allowed him to grab the top of the fence. He was struggling to haul himself up when Violet saw movement at an upstairs window of the nearest house. The woman wasn’t gesturing like a prisoner desperate to attract attention. She had been cleaning the inside of the glass, and now she opened the window to call ‘You there, what on earth do you think you’re doing?’

Lawrence twisted his head around while he clung to the fence. ‘Not pretending I’m a dog,’ he gasped, ‘before you ask.’

‘What’s that? Just you stay where you are,’ the woman said and slammed the window.

Violet had the absurd fancy that the woman was telling Lawrence not to let go of the fence. As his body sagged and began to shiver with the effort of holding on, she clutched at his waist to help him down. When his feet thumped the packed earth hard enough to jar a groan out of him, she felt she had been very little use. Perhaps he was compensating for his frailty and Violet’s by growling ‘Coming for a word, is she? I’ve got a few.’

‘Don’t let’s have another scene. Can’t we leave it now?’

‘I nearly saw. I won’t be happy till you have,’ he said as they heard a gate being unbolted behind them.

The woman pulled it wide and stood in the frame like a guard. She had silver hair as neat as a fur hat, and was so thoroughly made up to look younger or at any rate less wrinkled that Violet felt dishevelled by comparison. ‘What did you say about the dog?’ the woman challenged Lawrence.

‘I’ve been looking for it as you all seem to be.’ Violet couldn’t tell whether he meant to appease the woman or was making a sly joke, even when he added ‘And I was looking for your view.’

‘You can’t see it from here.’

‘Then could you tell us how to get to it?’

‘That isn’t possible. As you say, it’s ours.’

‘I don’t think you can do that, you know. You can’t shut the world off from people.’

‘That isn’t the world.’

Violet had a sense of overhearing a conversation she couldn’t grasp, if indeed Lawrence did. ‘And I asked,’ the woman said, ‘what you’re to do with the dog.’

‘Not a solitary thing. I’m not much of a dog man, and even if I were I don’t think I’d be as obsessed with it as you all seem to be.’

‘In that case you’ve no business being here, and I’d recommend you make yourself scarce.’

‘Not till I’ve found why I’m here.’ Perhaps hearing his own clumsiness made Lawrence blurt ‘If you really think we’re trespassing, why don’t you see what the police say.’

‘We don’t need them.’

If this was a warning, it only antagonised him. ‘Do your worst, then,’ he said, ‘and meanwhile you’ll forgive me if I keep looking.’

As he set off at speed along the alley Violet said to the woman ‘Couldn’t you just let him finish looking? He was here as a boy.’

‘And what’s he here as now? I shouldn’t let him stray,’ the woman said and shut the gate in Violet’s face.

Violet regretted lingering to stare at the gate as if she were somehow confronting the woman, because when she turned away Lawrence was out of sight. ‘Lawrence,’ she called, both an appeal and a rebuke, as she hurried down the alley to a bend, certainly not the dead end that her momentary panic made it seem to be. She was nearly there when she heard him.

He sounded excited, even shrill, although she didn’t catch the solitary syllable that had been startled out of him. ‘Lawrence,’ she repeated, but perhaps he was too preoccupied to respond. She was panting when she reached the corner of the alley, not as promptly as she would have expected of herself. At least she could see why Lawrence must have yelped in triumph. Just around the corner there was a gap in the fence.

He still wasn’t to be seen. He’d crawled through the opening, then. It was an irregularly rounded hole less than four feet wide and not even as high, at the bottom of a section of the fence that looked older and more weathered than the rest. Violet couldn’t help thinking of the kind of aperture some pet owners might incorporate in a door; certainly it might have tempted the lost dog. ‘Lawrence,’ she called more sharply as she crouched towards the gap.

She couldn’t see through it by simply stooping. The posture sent pain flaring up her spine into her skull. She had to lower herself onto all fours on the prickly concrete and duck towards the opening. The low sun met her, shining directly into her eyes, so that she was scarcely able to distinguish that the sliver of fierce light appeared to be resting on the edge of a cliff. Was there a path, either the one they’d followed from the road or another track crossing it on top of the cliff? Violet squeezed her eyes shut and widened them, which didn't help at all; either the sun had subsided beneath the edge or it had been overwhelmed by cloud, because all she could see through the gap was a pallid expanse as featureless as a void, as if the fence was perched on the brink of the cliff.

Her perspective must have changed. Perhaps she'd crouched lower without noticing. She was about to wriggle through the gap as a preamble to lecturing Lawrence for making her do so when a fiercer stab of pain brought her almost to her feet. She gasped as her hands struck the spongy fence, which felt cold enough for the moisture it exuded to be close to frozen. 'Lawrence, say where you are,' she shouted and heard her voice invade the silence – just her voice, which made her feel more intrusive than ever, as though every resident who could hear her disapproved of her. She didn't need to shout when she had a phone. She wavered to her feet and fumbled the mobile out of the padded pocket of her plump coat, and poked the key to call Lawrence's number.

When she heard the bell inside her phone she tried to hear where his ringtone might be, but the simulation in her phone gave just a single trill before it was cut off. She just had time to glimpse an image on the screen – a figure whose upright stance looked somehow unnatural. Perhaps she was reminded of the posters she'd seen in Striders Halt because the face was disintegrating into a mass of pixels. She had no chance to read the displayed name, which seemed shorter than Lawrence's, as the phone emitted a bleep like the isolated note of an alarm and the screen went blank. She was pressing the power button – squeezing it without result – when she thought she heard Lawrence.

Had he called 'Yes'? The high sharp sound resembled that word more than any other. He was somewhere around the corner – in the alley, Violet hoped, not on the far side of the fence. She hurried to the corner and peered along the alley, which seemed to have grown unreasonably dimmer. Surely the sun shouldn't have taken so much of the light with it, though enough remained to show her that the alley was deserted. 'Lawrence,' she called. 'Tell me where you are.'

Her voice petered out between the fences, giving way to a silence so total that she might not have spoken at all. What childish game was he playing? Even if he wanted to reward her with some surprise he thought she would appreciate, she wasn't enjoying his behaviour. 'Lawrence,' she called more and more furiously, 'Lawrence,' as she marched along the alley, searching for another gap, even a chink in the fence. She was still looking and, more desperately, listening when the alley brought her to the corner of the road.

The unbroken fence stretched out of sight, presumably following the edge of the cliff. The premature twilight made her aware of the absence of streetlamps. She could have concluded that whoever had developed Striders Halt didn't care to waste any light on visitors, though the street was visible enough, the blank windows of the bungalows competing with their doubles across the deserted roadway to reveal no evidence of life. She was about to call to Lawrence when she was distracted by the street sign. She'd assumed the first syllable of Valley Terrace was covered up, but now that the poster had fallen off as though it was no longer required, she saw the word was only half the length she'd taken it to be.

A chill wind brought the poster fluttering towards her across the arid flagstones. The face of the begging pet hadn't just been scribbled out; someone had tried to substitute a caricature of another face, so vigorously that they'd shredded the paper. Violet might have fancied that the damage had exposed features underlying the animal's face. Why couldn't she read the lines printed beneath Fetcher's name? Even if some computer problem must have been responsible for the repetitive gibberish, she thought it odd that nobody had noticed. All this was distracting her from finding Lawrence. As the poster sank flat on the pavement she called his name, and turned just in time to glimpse a response.

It could only be Lawrence. The movement had been by the Viva, and of course that was where he would have met her, presumably to lead her to the view he'd rediscovered. She thought he'd beckoned her to follow, since it was the only gesture that made sense, before returning to the path between the houses. 'Just wait,' she cried, 'what on earth's the urgency?' Perhaps some aspect of the view was about to disappear with the waning light, and she hurried to the path so as not to disappoint him. But when she reached the alley behind the houses she found it was deserted.

'What are you playing at, Lawrence? Show yourself, for heaven's sake.' She gasped all this as she tramped along the alley, though her voice was too breathless to travel very far. He must have gone back to the gap in the fence – she'd begun to think he had been crouching as he dodged along the path, as though getting ready to crawl through the hole – but surely he could have waited for her at the corner. ‘All right, show me—’ she urged as she came to the bend, and then her voice died in her mouth. It wasn’t only Lawrence that she couldn’t see. There was no gap in the fence.

The sight seemed to turn not just her mouth dry but her mind, parching it of the ability to think. When she faltered to the section of the fence where she was sure the gap had been, she felt as if she might have to support herself against it – might even discover that it wasn’t solid. But it bruised her fist as she thumped the new wood, which was indistinguishable from the rest of the fence. She was almost bewildered enough to wonder if the fence could have been repaired while she was searching for Lawrence, and then she had the equally unwelcome notion that she had somehow mistaken her way – that the gap must be at the other end of the alley. If her ageing brain had let her down, surely she could bear the possibility so long as she found Lawrence. Perhaps becoming each other’s mental backup would be part of growing old. She needn’t be ashamed to admit she’d lost her way, though wasn’t Lawrence’s behaviour responsible? Once they were reunited she’d decide how much to blame him and how soon she would forgive him. All these thoughts kept her going almost as far as the opposite end of the alley, until she could no longer avoid seeing that there wasn’t so much as a crack in the fence.

As she stumbled out beside the street sign the poster lying on the flagstones stirred, raising its disintegrated face. ‘Lawrence,’ she shouted and was turning towards her car when a figure peered around the house beside the path and ducked back. She was sure it was Lawrence, but how could he act like that? Had senility overtaken him all at once? She called his name over and over, though increasingly feebly, as she made for the path.

It was as deserted as the street, and so was the alley. Violet felt close to releasing a scream of frustration, if not another kind. She was peering wildly about as if her desperation could produce Lawrence when she caught sight of the window she’d seen the woman cleaning. It was blankly curtained now, but it was the only inspiration Violet could find. She limped up the path and along the street to the front of the house. ‘Hello?’ she cried as soon as she’d rung the doorbell.

She didn’t hear another sound until a silhouette appeared on the frosted glass that made up most of the front door. The outline of the figure was fragmented by the swarming nodules of the glass, which left the face as a pale blur. ‘Why are you making all that noise?’ the woman demanded, barely audibly. ‘Who do you think you are?’

‘I know who I am.’ Saying so wouldn’t help, and Violet said only ‘You saw me behind your house. You spoke to me.’

‘Count yourself privileged. I’ve no more to add.’

‘I’m looking for my husband.’

‘You won’t find him in here.’

‘But you saw him as well,’ Violet pleaded and felt a twinge of hope. ‘You were watching him, weren’t you? Didn’t you see where he went?’

‘He can’t be far.’

‘No, but he could be lost.’ At once this seemed altogether too possible. ‘I’m sure a stranger could get lost round here,’ she said.

‘Not for long.’

Violet couldn’t tell why this sounded ominous: perhaps because that was how the thought of losing Lawrence made everything feel – the empty street as dim as the interior of the house, the figure that seemed disinclined to take shape on the glass. ‘May I use your phone?’ she blurted.

‘You most certainly can not.’

Violet tried to believe she’d mistaken the murmur. ‘I need to call my husband. My phone’s dead.’

‘They aren’t welcome here.’

Violet suspected this meant far more than her phone and Lawrence’s. ‘Just help me find him,’ she begged, ‘and we’ll leave you alone.’

‘He’ll be found.’

Why should this seem threatening? It aggravated Violet’s growing panic. ‘Help me,’ she said furiously, ‘or I’ll make such a noise it’ll wake the whole place up.’

‘No need. It’s awake,’ the woman said, and her silhouette decomposed further as it shrank into the darkness of the house.

‘You can’t get rid of me like that. You won’t until I’ve found my husband,’ Violet cried and was about to create more of a disturbance – however much would bring the residents out of their houses to help her – when she heard Lawrence call her name.

It was only the first syllable. She'd never liked being abbreviated, but now it was more than welcome, even when it was yipped as shrilly as that. He was further away than the street, but at least the sound hadn't come from the direction of the cliff. 'Lawrence,' she shouted as she swung around, nearly losing her balance. 'Come here. Come back.'

The empty street seemed to capture her voice, holding it in. The unlit houses, where every window was colourlessly blank with curtains, emphasised the gathering darkness. She could have believed the night was cutting her off from Lawrence. 'Talk to me,' she shouted. 'I'll come to you.'

'Don't.'

Why would he say that to her? What would have made him say it to someone else? Surely she'd misheard him. 'I'm coming now,' she vowed and dashed to the car.

As she strapped herself in she was overtaken by a notion that she wasn't sure she welcomed. How could all this be anything except a nightmare? She was asleep in the passenger seat while Lawrence drove them home, and soon she would waken to find they were safe. She was tempted to think so, and yet it dismayed her; it felt like betraying Lawrence, abandoning him to the unlit indifferent streets. She mustn't use the idea that she was dreaming as an excuse not to find him. She lowered both front windows of the car and felt as if she were letting in the icy night to keep her awake. 'Lawrence,' she called as she switched on the headlights. 'Keep talking to me.'

While she turned the car the headlamp beams lit up a bungalow and then its twin, followed by one that could have been either of them. Driving straight on would have brought her to a dead end, and in any case she felt lost enough without venturing into the unknown dark. She coasted to the junction at not much more than a walking pace while she peered ahead hard enough to sting her eyes and called Lawrence's name. As she eased the car out of the road she heard him.

She was about to respond when she realised she was hearing a dog. It was the first she'd heard in Striders Halt, and how long had it been since she'd ceased hearing birds? The yapping sounded not far from articulate, which was why she'd taken it for a human voice, though she didn't want to wonder why Lawrence would have been protesting ‘No no no.’ If it was the elusive Fetcher, someone else could catch the animal. ‘Lawrence,’ she called louder, but the only answer was another burst of frenzied yapping. She was almost at the next junction when she saw the creature ahead.

It might well be Fetcher, since it was performing the trick all the posters had shown. It was rearing up to beg even though nobody was offering it a treat. Before Violet could distinguish more than a large vague silhouette, it dropped to all fours and dodged around the corner. When she reached the corner both roads were deserted. She mustn’t be distracted by it or by wondering why nobody had come out of the houses to catch it. ‘Lawrence,’ she shouted as if she could dismiss the creature and recall him, but only the dark chill wind came to her through the open windows. She hadn’t seen or heard any hint of his whereabouts by the time she reached the village green.

Had she left the streets behind too soon? Had she managed to miss out some of them? She stared at the dark huddle of bungalows as if by making her eyes ache she might bring Lawrence into the open, and then she fumbled her phone out of her pocket. She was hoping it might have regained some of the power it had lost in Striders Halt, but it was still as dead as the rectangular stone it resembled. She had to believe Lawrence wasn’t out here; he couldn’t have been faster than the car.

She didn’t know how many times she drove through the lightless streets – how often they brought her back to the green. How frequently did she pass the Jaguar, which was once again parked on its drive? There might well be more than one, taunting her with the illusion that she knew where she was. Her voice had grown hoarse and dry with calling out to Lawrence. Even sounding the horn failed to bring any life to the introverted streets, which she could have imagined were dreaming of themselves. She was driving desperately faster now, as though she could overtake Lawrence in the act of losing himself. While she knew that one of them would eventually have to lose the other, she could never have dreamed it would be anything like this. She had the sudden awful thought that he hadn’t been truly lost until she’d told the woman that he might be. If this was in any way possible, oughtn’t it to mean that she could bring him back as well?

She cried his name and leaned on the horn, and saw the only other creature in the streets dodge beyond the limit of her headlights. It was yapping again, however much this sounded like a voice struggling to tell her to go, go, go. She could even have imagined that it was fleeing the light, as though ashamed to be seen. Suppose it could lead her to Lawrence? She wasn't quite confused enough to believe that, but she saw that she was following it anyway, having forgotten which way she'd meant to drive through the streets, which had begun to seem malevolently unhelpful. She lost sight of the creature well before the streets led her yet again to the green.

She braked with a screech that sounded like her dismay rendered audible, and then she clambered out of the car. She felt as if the mob of lightless houses had cast her out – would continue doing so every time she searched for Lawrence. She strove one last time to think she was having a nightmare, a distorted version of her wish and Lawrence's to bring some magic back into their life. Soon she would waken to find herself in the passenger seat, but she knew that wasn't possible; Lawrence had never learned to drive. Her hands were shaking so much that she could hardly cup them around her mouth. 'Lawrence,' she cried, 'come back.'

Her words were aching not merely in her ears but throughout her entire self when she thought she heard a voice somewhere among the houses. 'Let it go.'

She couldn't tell whether it was addressing her. As she strained her eyes at the mass of bungalows, she saw a figure dart out between them. The headlight beams were splayed across the green towards the larger darkness, making it harder for her to distinguish the shape. It was yapping and panting, and the face on the blurred shaggy head seemed more fragmentary than it ought to be, fluttering in the chill wind. When the figure reared up in front of her she didn't know whether it meant to beg or plant its paws on her shoulders and nuzzle her face. All she could do was cry 'Lawrence.'

Extras

This section contains forewords, afterwords and other relevant material:

Foreword to The Inhabitant Of The Lake And Other Less Welcome Tenants, 1964

Foreword to Dark Companions, 1981

Foreword to Cold Print, 1984

Clive Barker's foreword to Scared Stiff, 1986

Robert M. Price's foreword to Crypt Of Cthulhu #43, 1986

Foreword to Waking Nightmares, 1990

Foreword to Strange Things And Stranger Places, 1992

Introduction to the story The Limits Of Fantasy, 1993

Introduction to Far Away And Never, 1996

Foreword to Ghosts And Grisly Things, 1997

Afterword to Scared Stiff, 2001

Foreword to Alone With The Horrors, 2002

Introduction to Told By The Dead, 2003

Afterword to Told By The Dead, 2003

Foreword to Inconsequential Tales, 2007

Afterword to Just Behind You, 2008

Afterword to Ancient Images, 2011

Afterword to Dark Companions, 2011

Afterword to the story The Page, 2012

Foreword to The Unspoken, May 2013

'A Warning To The Curious', the tale chosen by Ramsey Campbell for the anthology 'My Favourite Horror Story'.

Introduction To The Inhabitant Of The Lake And Other Less Welcome Tenants

When I was ten years old I discovered H. P. Lovecraft in The Colour out of Space, and was profoundly excited and disturbed by his work, and some years later, after I had read considerably more of Lovecraft's fiction, I turned a bent for writing, which began when I was seven, toward the Cthulhu Mythos. I wrote five stories in nine months; they were little more than amateurish pastiches of Lovecraft's tales, but I had courage enough to show some of them to August Derleth, and, had he not considered them promising and encouraged me to carry on, those tales might have remained in the original draft.

Perhaps even more important, he persuaded me to agree that the Arkham country had been saturated as setting for stories in the Mythos, and that a new milieu for a series of tales might well be originated in Great Britain. He felt certain that even H. P. Lovecraft would approve of such a new setting, and of a sequence of stories taking place there. I considered the Severn Valley a likely milieu. As a Roman-occupied area, it might retain influences of the decadent Roman practices; and some years ago, in the Cotswolds, a supposed witch was executed by persons unknown. With cautious enthusiasm, I set about creating my own towns. Some research was, of course, necessary, and the various towns were not conceived as a whole; their details were added to in each story and so the towns came into being.

Among the stories thus far written, there are six towns in the area. They do not correspond to the settlements in the Arkham country, except insofar as they represent a conscious attempt to parallel Lovecraft's Massachusetts towns; they are primarily my attempt to invent a realistic, detailed background to aid in imparting verisimilitude to my fiction.

Brichester (the Roman 'chester'—castra—with a likely prefix) is the most important of these towns. A large modern city, complete with central office buildings, cinemas, stores, and the like, it yet has its regions of alien influence. It is composed of three sections: Mercy Hill, a raised portion of the town, at the top of which stands a hospital—a one-time prison, while some miles beyond it lies a terribly haunted lake; Central Brichester, an area of offices and large stores; and Lower Brichester, where most trains arrive. In itself, it is a perfectly normal town, and most of the sorcerers living there practise their arts secretly (although there still is a regrettable cult among students at the university), illustrating how underground societies exist in every community.

Camside, on the bank of the river Cam, is a rather unimportant town between Berkeley and Severnford, once visited by a man intent on seeking out the god Byatis, but otherwise undistinguished. Severnford is part dockland, its buildings mostly shabby and dilapidated, including a cinema and several public-houses; beyond it is an island reputedly used as a meeting place for covens. At the centre a group of historic buildings is preserved, among them an inn now closed because of vandalism.

The remaining towns of the Severn Valley at Brichester are rather less than normal. Clotton (a corruption of Cloth Town) is inhabited by unusually superstitious people. In 1931 it was invaded by malefic aliens. Once a fairly large settlement, Clotton is today too small to appear on most maps, and is widely supposed to be haunted, and is thus much avoided.

Temphill (Temple Hill—a reference to the town's being built around a church reported to be other-dimensional) is the only town which is rather completely mapped. It is a small settlement with only one hotel. Most of its buildings are neglected, and its inhabitants seem more interested in old ways, in magic and the outré, than in normal, prosaic life. Temphill is built on a long main road, different portions of which are known under different names—Wood Street, South Street, etc.—it crosses a river, and toward the centre of town rises to a hill on which is built the famous shunned church.

Finally, there is Goatswood, the town lying furthest into the Cotswolds. Surrounded by woods, this town contains a little-used railway station and a fairly modern town centre; but its inhabitants are reputed to be non-human. Goatswood takes its name from the legend that the god Shub-Niggurath is either imprisoned or has at times made his home in a hill near the town.

Like most other writers who have ventured to add to Lovecraft's Cthulhu Mythos, I also invented esoteric volumes to which references could be made. One, The Revelations of Glaaki, was written by members of a cult under the inspiration of the god they worshipped; it was subsequently published in an edition from which many of the more unconventional passages had been cut, now a very rare volume. The other, an untitled and much-banned work by Johannes Pott, was rejected violently by publishers in Jena, circulated in handwritten copies among underground groups, and has never been printed. It contains many repulsive and shocking concepts, among the mildest of which is the theory that all areas of darkness are inhabited by malformed beings.

The reader will notice that I have frequently resorted to cross-references, not only of settings, but also of events. The reader will observe also that I have not directly utilised the beings of the Lovecraft pantheon, I have but referred to them; for I wished to invent my own, or to clarify inexplicit hints left by Lovecraft and other contributors to the Mythos; I wanted, in sum, to add to the Mythos. I hope that readers of this book will find it possible to conclude that in their own modest way these stories reflect the greater wonder and horror of the masterpieces of H. P. Lovecraft.

J. Ramsey Campbell
Liverpool, England
7 January 1964

Introduction To Dark Companions

To the interviewers favourite question—why do you write horror stories?—there are many answers, all of them true. Here are some. My most vivid memories of my early childhood are of being frightened: by Hans Andersen and the girl cutting off her feet to rid herself of the dancing red shoes, by the deformed creatures that swarm out of the mine in The Princess and the Goblin, by (most unlikely of all) an edition of The Rupert Annual, a British children's book, in which a Christmas tree stalks home to its forest one night, creaking away in the dark and leaving a trail of earth through the house. The cinema got to me too: I spent most of Disney's Snow White in a state bordering on panic, and then there was the scene (meant as a joke) in Danny Kaye's Knock on Wood where a corpse is hung up like a hat and coat on the back of a door. I began to read adult horror fiction when I was eight or nine years old, but I'd already known for years that fiction could be terrifying.

So when I began to write stories, they had to be tales of would-be terror. At the age of eleven I had finished a short book of ghost and horror stories, patched together like Frankenstein's monster from fragments of tales I had read. Most writers start by imitating their favourites. Mine, three years later, was H. P. Lovecraft, now that I'd found a complete book of his stories. Lovecraft's style seemed easy to imitate, and so did his monsters. I wrote half a dozen stories in the manner of Lovecraft, with titles such as The Tower from Yuggoth, and sent them to August Derleth of Arkham House, Lovecraft's American publisher. Derleth liked them enough to tell me how to improve them—by describing fewer things as eldritch and unspeakable and cosmically alien, for a start, and by re-reading the ghost stories of M. R. James to learn suggestiveness—and eventually he published a book of them. You can tell I was seventeen when I finished the book—one character thinks nothing of buying a house sight unseen—but all the same, it began my career.

Literary imitation is rather like ventriloquism—trying to say things in someone else's voice—and just about as limited a skill. My next book was a reaction against this, and sometimes so personal as to be wilfully incomprehensible. By now I'd left school and was working in the tax office, where I wrote stories at my desk in the lunch hour, surrounded by bureaucratic activity and ringing phones. No wonder my surroundings began to appear in my stories, and so did my growing obsession with movies and the dying cinemas where I caught up with films of the previous thirty years. Since my first book was an imitation of Lovecraft's horrors, it had been a way of sidestepping my own fears—I sometimes think that is why so many amateur writers imitate Lovecraft today—but now I was beginning to write about them, perhaps because I was gaining enough confidence as a writer to be more honest about myself.

While the supernatural elements in these new tales weren't autobiographical, the feelings were—particularly the descriptions of how it felt to be afraid. During my schooldays I'd often been terrified of going to the Catholic grammar school, where they were fond of using corporal punishment, but now that I was growing up I found that there were many other things to fear: women, and answering the office phone, and talking about myself, and going to parties where I knew almost nobody... Well, I needn't go on; most of it is in my stories somewhere. All the same, I'm convinced that good horror stories nourish the imagination, and so I hope these stories do.

I had four years of the tax office, and another seven of public libraries. It wasn't until my second collection was published that I decided to try to write full time. I was growing bored with irrelevancies; at least everything you do as a writer is relevant to the job—no cramming yourself for examinations (a pet hate of mine) with facts you will never use again, no dressing up and looking servile at interviews. The first couple of years were hard; if my wife hadn't then been working, they would have been impossible. At least writing for a living persuaded me to make myself clearer, and so, I suppose, did reading my stories to audiences—for me, the most enjoyable part of my work. I use many of the stories In this book.

With the exception of Napier Court, all the way from 1967, the stories here were written since that freelance plunge in July 1973. They can more or less speak for themselves, I hope. The very short stories (Heading Home, Vacant Possession, Out of Copyright, Calling Card, Conversion and Call First) are the best of a group of tales I wrote as a kind of tribute to the old EC horror comics, which in fact I never read until my twenties. Horror and humour have much in common, and it was often difficult to see where the horror comics ended and EC's other comic, Mad, began; perhaps these tales of mine are black jokes. Out of Copyright is one of my attempts to make myself clearer, since another acrostic tale of mine (The Words that Count, where the entire story was an acrostic) left many readers bewildered. Calling Card was written (as First Foot) in response to a commission from the Liverpool Daily Post to write a ghost story for Christmas and the New Year, which the newspaper then refused to publish. Drawing In probably belongs with these stories, since I was trying to discover if there was still any terror to be had from the best-known (and most domesticated) horror character of all. Many of the stories grew out of their settings; the setting of Mackintosh Willy is real, and so is the graffito that gave me the idea for the story; the location of Above the World is real, down to the hotel, a favourite of mine; the cinema in The Show Goes On was real until they knocked it down—and so on, for almost all the settings. Of course, they may not look quite like that to anyone else but me.

Three of the stories have been given awards. Mackintosh Willy tied with Elizabeth Lynn's Woman Who Loved the Moon for the World Fantasy Award in 1980; The Chimney took the same award in 1978, again for best short story of the previous year. In the Bag was given the British Fantasy Award for best short story in 1978. (The story was published in November 1977. Up to that time the award had been based on the previous calendar year, but after that, for one year only, it was based on the period from July to June. Harlan Ellison's Jeffty is Five became eligible for a second time, and this time it won, all of which has caused some confusion in reference books.) All three stories are about childhood in some way; make of that what you will—perhaps that I often return to the theme that deep down, we are all still as vulnerable as we were in childhood; sometimes it takes very little to break through our defences. It's a disturbing thought, but then I believe that horror fiction cannot be too frightening or too disturbing. Too much of it seeks to reassure, often by reinforcing prejudices.

And that's as good a way to end as any. Now you're alone with the stories and yourself.

Ramsey Campbell
December 1981

Foreword To Cold Print: "Chasing the Unknown"

The first book of Lovecraft's I read made me into a writer. I found it in the window of a Liverpool sweetshop called Bascombe's. I was fourteen years old then, and went there every Saturday to search through the secondhand paperbacks at the rear of the shop once I'd made sure there was nothing in the window. Sometimes, among the covers faded like unpreserved Technicolor in the window, there would be a bright new book on which to spend my pocket money: an issue of Supernatural Stories written by R. L. Fanthorpe under innumerable pseudonyms (Pel Torro, Othello Baron, Peter O'Flinn, Oben Lerteth, Rene Rolant, Deutero Spartacus, Elton T. Neef were just some of them), a Gerald G. Swan Weird and Occult Miscellany whose back cover advertised studies of torture and flagellation and execution 'for the nature student.' But that Saturday, among the yellowing molls and dusty cowboys, I saw a skeletal fungoid creature, the title Cry Horror, the author's name I'd been yearning for years to see on a book. For a panicky moment I thought I hadn't half a crown to buy the book, dreaded that it would be gone when I came back with the money. I read it in a single malingering day off school; for a year or more I thought H. P. Lovecraft was not merely the greatest horror writer of all time, but the greatest writer I had ever read.

Some (Stephen King and Charles L. Grant among them) would take that to prove that Lovecraft is an adolescent phase one goes through—certainly a writer best read when one is that age. I can only say that I find his best work more rewarding now than I did then. Grant claims that 'when you grow up you discover that what attracted you when you were fourteen was his rococo style and very little else,' but I don't think it was so in my case; certainly I don't agree that 'the style makes the stories.' Indeed, I think that's precisely the trap into which too many imitators of Lovecraft fall.

I was one of them, of course, having already done my best to imitate Machen and John Dickson Carr. If I avoided the trap to some extent, I did so unconsciously—did so because I didn't merely admire Lovecraft, I was steeped in his work and his vision throughout the writing of my first published book. I began it as a way of paying back some of the pleasure his work had given me, some of the sense of awesome expectation that even reading some of his titles—The Colour out of Space, The Whisperer in Darkness—could conjure up. No other writer had given me that so far. I wrote my Lovecraftian tales for my own pleasure: the pleasure of convincing myself that they were almost as good as the originals. It was only on the suggestion of two fantasy fans, the Londoner Pat Kearney and the American Betty Kujawa, that I showed them to August Derleth at Arkham House.

> 'There are myriad unspeakable terrors in the cosmos in which our universe is but an atom; and the two gates of agony, life and death, gape to pour forth infinities of abominations. And the other gates which spew forth their broods are, thank God, little known to most of us. Few can have seen the spawn of ultimate corruption, or known that centre of insane chaos where Azathoth, the blind idiot god, bubbles mindlessly; I myself have never seen these things—but God knows that what I saw in those cataclysmic moments in the church at Kingsport transcends the ultimate earthly knowledge.'

So began The Tomb-Herd, one of the stories I sent Derleth. Since his death, a regrettable element of fantasy fandom has devoted a good deal of energy to defaming him. The honesty and courage of these people may be gauged by their having waited until Derleth was unable to defend himself and by the way they often conceal their smears in essays ostensibly on other subjects. For myself, not only did I find him unfailingly helpful and patient and encouraging when I most needed this support, but in retrospect I'm doubly impressed that he could find anything worth encouraging among the second-hand Lovecraft I sent him. Here are a few more choice passages from The Tomb-Herd:

> 'The house which I knew as my friend's, set well back from the road, overgrown with ivy that twisted in myriad grotesque shapes, was locked and shuttered. No sign of life was discernible inside it, and outside the garden was filled with a brooding quiet, while my shadow on the fungus-overgrown lawn appeared eldritch and distorted, like that of some ghoul-born being from nether pits.'

> 'Upon inquiring of this anomaly from the strangely reticent neighbours, I learned that my friend had visited the deserted church in the centre of Kingsport after dark, and that this must have called the vengeance of those from outside upon him.'

I suspect most of us would be strangely reticent if a stranger came knocking at our door to ask why his shadow resembled that of a ghoul-born being, but let's go on:

> 'In that stomach-wrenching moment of horrible knowledge, realisation of the abnormal ghastlinesses after which my friend had been searching and which, perhaps, he had stirred out of aeon-long sleep in the Kingsport church, I closed the book. But I soon opened it again...'

Best of all:

> '(Now followed the section which horrified me more than anything else. My friend must have been preparing the telegram by writing it on the page while outside unspeakable shamblers made their way towards him—as became hideously evident as the writing progressed.)
>
> 'To Richard Dexter. Come at once to Kingsport. You are needed urgently by me here for protection from agencies which may kill me—or worse—if you do not come immediately. Will explain as soon as you reach me... But what is this thing that flops unspeakably down the passage towards this room? It cannot be that abomination which I met in the nitrous vaults below Asquith Place... IA! YOG-SOTHOTH! CTHULHU FHTAGN!'

Behold the trap I mentioned earlier—the fallacy by which one can persuade oneself that if one imitates or, more probably, exceeds the worst excesses of Lovecraft's style, one is achieving what he achieved. (One reason Lovecraft and Hitchcock are so often imitated is that both display their technique fully rather than concealing it.) But the hyperbolic passages in Lovecraft's writing (by no means as numerous as his detractors claim) are built up to; as Fritz Leiber puts it perfectly, they're orchestrated. It's easy to imitate Lovecraft's style, or at least to convince oneself that one has done so; it's far more difficult to imitate his sense of structure, based on a study of Poe, Machen (in particular "The Great God Pan'), and the best of Blackwood. I think that's the point Charlie Grant misses: Lovecraft's style would be nothing without the painstaking structure of his stories.

Derleth told me to abandon my attempts to set my work in Massachusetts and in general advised me in no uncertain terms how to improve the stories. I suspect he would have been gentler if he'd realised I was only fifteen years old, but on the other hand, if you can't take that kind of forthright editorial response you aren't likely to survive as a writer. I was still in the process of adopting his suggestions when he asked me to send him a story for an anthology he was editing (then called Dark of Mind, Dark of Heart). Delighted beyond words, I sent him the rewritten Tomb-Herd, which he accepted under certain conditions: that the title should be changed to The Church in the High Street (though he later dropped the latter article, along with the prepositions from the title of his book) and that he should be able to edit the story as he saw fit. The story as published, there and here, therefore contains several passages that are Derleth's paraphrases of what I wrote. Quite right too: as I think he realised, it was the most direct way to show me how to improve my writing, and selling the story was so encouraging that I completed my first book a little over a year later.

I've included here a selection of tales from that book, The Inhabitant of the Lake. Though prior publication never deters me from revising my stories—revised editions of my novels The Doll Who Ate His Mother and The Nameless are soon to appear, and some of the stories in my collection Dark Companions were revised for that book—I've resisted the temptation to improve these earlier tales, partly because I feel too distant from them. Here they are, flaws and all.

The Room in the Castle expands Lovecraft's reference to 'snake-bearded Byatis' (am I remembering it accurately?)—Bob Bloch's originally, I believe. The Horror from the Bridge is based, like several of these stories, on Lovecraft's Commonplace Book as it appeared in the Arkham House anthology The Shuttered Room. It's based on two entries: 'Man in strange subterranean chamber—seeks to force door of bronze—overwhelmed by influx of waters' and 'Ancient (Roman? pre-historic?) stone bridge washed away by a (sudden & curious?) storm. Something liberated which had been sealed up in the masonry thousands of years ago. Things happen.'

The story is based to some extent on the chronology of events in Lovecraft's The Dunwich Horror, but towards the end I found I hadn't the patience to build as minutely as Lovecraft would have.

The Insects from Shaggai is based on another entry in the Commonplace Book, or rather on my misreading of it. Lovecraft wrote 'Insects or some other entities from space attack and penetrate a man's head & cause him to remember alien and exotic things—possible displacement of personality,' a superb idea I rushed at so hastily that I failed to notice he hadn't meant giant insects at all. (An account of the dream which gave him the idea can be found in the Selected Letters, volume V, page 159.) Of all my stories this is probably the pulpiest. As such it has some energy, I think, but I wish I'd left the note alone until I was equipped to do it justice.

I wrote the first page of The Inhabitant of the Lake and developed writer's block. What released me weeks later was writing The Render of the Veils in the garden on a summer morning. It's based on a Lovecraft note ('Disturbing conviction that all life is only a deceptive dream with some dismal or sinister horror lurking behind') but it began my liberation from Lovecraft's style, in the sense that it's told largely through dialogue. I was pleased enough with it to want to name my first book after it, but Derleth felt—rightly, I think—that it sounded mystical rather than frightening. I returned to The Inhabitant of the Lake (again rooted in the Commonplace Book: 'Visit to someone in wild & remote house—ride from station through the night into the haunted hills. House by forest or water. Terrible things live there') with renewed enthusiasm.

Four stories followed that are not included here. The Plain of Sound may be read in the small press journal Crypt of Cthulhu, in an issue devoted to my work. The Return of the Witch was suggested by two Lovecraft notes: 'Live man buried in bridge masonry according to superstition—or black cat' and 'Salem story. The cottage of an aged witch, wherein after her death are found sundry terrible things' but it developed as a rewrite, virtually scene by scene, of a Henry Kuttner story I had never read and didn't encounter until several years after my story was published.

My story contains a moderately evocative dream sequence: 'He dreamed of wanderings through space to dead cities on other planets, of lakes bordered by twisted trees which moved and creaked in no wind, and finally of a strange curved rim beyond which he passed into utter darkness—a darkness in which he sensed nothing living. Less clear dreams occurred, too, and he often felt a clutching terror at glimpses of the shuttered room amid bizarre landscapes, and of rotting things which scrabbled out of graves at an echoing, sourceless call' and a sudden outburst of paranoia that points rather disconcertingly forward to fiction of mine such as The Face That Must Die: '(Look at the bastard! He tells you you're possessed, but you know what he really means, don't you? That you're schizophrenic. Push him out, quick! Don't let him come poking round your mind!)' but otherwise I think the story can be allowed to rest in peace.

The Mine on Yuggoth was a thorough rewrite of one of the first tales I showed Derleth, The Tower from Yuggoth. I got one of the ideas for the rewrite in church, during mass, and I suspect that was when Catholicism lost its grip on me, though probably never entirely. The Will of Stanley Brooke was my first punning title; the story attempted to tell its tale wholly through dialogue, with no Lovecraftian adjectives at all, but I remember congratulating myself on the originality of a theme which in fact was Lovecraft's, from The Festival. The next story here, The Moon-Lens, has its basis in a Lovecraft note ('Ancient necropolis—bronze door in hillside which opens as the moonlight strikes it—focused by ancient lens in pylon opposite'), as did The Face in the Desert, a poorly imagined Arabian tale Derleth rejected from the book and I for this one. More background on the book can be found in Horrors and Unpleasantries, Sheldon Jaffery's anecdotal history of Arkham House.

While Derleth was looking at the manuscript of my collection I wrote another story, The Stone on the Island. For a change, this was based on one of M. R. James's Stories I Have Tried to Write:

> 'The man, for instance (naturally a man with something on his mind), who, sitting in his study one evening, was startled by a slight sound, turned hastily, and saw a certain dead face looking out from between the window curtains: a dead face, but with living eyes. He made a dash at the curtains and tore them apart. A pasteboard mask fell to the floor. But there was no one there, and the eyes of the mask were but eye-holes. What (James wonders) was to be done about that?'

My solution was that it wasn't a mask. The tale may be technically superior to any of the Inhabitant stories, and it reads more like me than Lovecraft, I think. However, I find its adolescent sadism excessive, and so I haven't included it here.

Now began my struggle to leave Lovecraft behind and write like myself—a struggle that caused me to write an article, Lovecraft in Retrospect, condemning his work outright (when what I was really condemning was my own dependence on him). I suspect that writing about his creations had been a way to avoid dealing with my own fears. My impatience with trying to imitate the Lovecraftian structure led to the extreme compression of some of the stories in Demons by Daylight, my second book. One story in that collection, The Franklyn Paragraphs, is based on two notes from the Commonplace Book, and two stories written during that period belong to the Lovecraft Mythos. One, Before the Storm, I didn't feel was worth rewriting in order to fit into Demons by Daylight; it appears here for the first time between hard covers. By contrast, Cold Print was fully rewritten in 1966. Both show my struggles to be myself, I think, and in Cold Print the struggle has pretty well been won.

I had nothing more to do with the Lovecraft Mythos until 1971, when Meade and Penny Frierson asked me to contribute to their extraordinarily ambitious (and, on the whole, impressively successful) small press anthology, HPL. I offered them A Madness from the Vaults, written in 1962 but, I'd felt, too fantastic to fit into my first book. When I turned up the fanzine in which it had eventually appeared I was dismayed to find that its sadism far exceeded that of The Stone on the Island. All I could do for the Friersons was write what was virtually a new story under the same title.

The Tugging was written three years later, in response to a request for a story for a DAW Books anthology, The Disciples of Cthulhu. That anthology set me thinking of editing one of my own. Just before his death Derleth had told me that he planned to edit New Tales of the Cthulhu Mythos. Arkham House agreed that I should, and I contributed the story The Faces at Pine Dunes.

Editing that book helped me organise my thoughts about the followers of Lovecraft. The great merit of Lovecraft's mythos was always that however much it showed, it suggested more: it was a way of sketching the unknown in terms that fed the reader's imagination—mine, certainly. Perhaps it was inevitable that writers such as myself would attempt to fill in the gaps. I think the most important question to be asked about any story based on Lovecraft is whether it conveys any of the awe and terror Lovecraft's stories did. I've little time for the kind of story which purports to discover yet another genealogical link among Lovecraft's entities—this kind of nitpicking may be all right for the fanzines, but hardly a basis for fiction—and much less time for stories that rob Lovecraft's concepts of awe by explaining them away. On the other hand, I admire such disparate stories as Bloch's Notebook Found in a Deserted House (surely the most frightening Mythos tale by anyone other than Lovecraft), Wandrei's The Tree-Men of M'Bwa and The Web of Easter Island, Frank Belknap Long's The Space-Eaters (an oddly moving as well as awesome story about the pupil confounding the teacher), Henry Kuttner's The Graveyard Rats, T.E.D. Klein's Black Man with a Horn, among quite a few others.

My doubts about the overpopulation and overexplanation of the Mythos prompted me to write The Voice of the Beach. Lovecraft regarded Blackwood's The Willows—in which, as he often pointed out, nothing is shown or stated directly—as the finest of all weird tales. The closest he came to achieving what Blackwood achieved was in The Colour out of Space, which contains none of the paraphernalia of the later mythos. The Voice of the Beach was my attempt to return to Lovecraft's first principles, to see how close I could get to his aims without the encumbrances of the mythos. Lin Carter looked at the story when he was editing Weird Tales, but rejected it as insufficiently Lovecraftian. For my part, I believe it's the most successful of these stories.

Whether I shall return to Lovecraft as an influence I don't know. Some may feel I've never shaken it off. Blacked Out, the most recent story in this book, is clearly indebted to Lovecraft, though it wasn't written with that intention. (In a sense Among the pictures are these is the earliest piece, a literal description written in 1973 of some drawings I executed in my early teens.) One Edna Stumpf (a name on which I can scarcely improve) rounded off a review of my novel Incarnate, which she very kindly described as 'surprisingly good,' with the words 'My dream is that Campbell take ten years to flush the Lovecraft out of his typewriter. And rewriter (sic) it.' I hope she and any others of like mind will not be too distressed if I don't take ten years off from writing. If some of Lovecraft's sense of wonder remains in my work, so much the better. I hope that at least my attempts to repay the pleasure his work still gives me have not lessened his power.

Ramsey Campbell
Merseyside

6 July, 1984

Foreword To Scared Stiff: Tales Of Sex And Death: "The Bare Bones", an introduction by Clive Barker

Death And The Maiden. It's an eternally popular subject for painters, and in a sense for writers and filmmakers too. What does the image conjure? A woman, naked perhaps, or nearly so, gazing at us with horror (or, on occasion, with a sublime indifference) while Death stretches a rotted paw to touch her breast, or leans its worm-ridden skull towards her as if to ply her with kisses.

Corruption and sexuality in a marriage of opposites.

The motif is echoed whenever a movie monster takes beauty in its arms, or at least attempts to. Sometimes, of course, the Maiden keeps Death at bay; as often, she's claimed. Whichever, the sexual frisson generated by her glamour is increased tenfold by the presence of the foulness that shadows her.

But the drama of the image—with the Maiden representing innocence and life, and Death the joyless evil that threatens her—is only one aspect of a fascinating confrontation. There are countless sophistications of that theme, the most complex of them more readily rendered in prose, I believe, where the writer can describe both the outer and inner conditions of his characters, than in any other medium.

Stories that can show us the flesh in all its sensuality, then reveal the bone beneath; or uncover the decay at the heart of an apparently wholesome passion; that take us into the wildest realms of perversion, and into the fever of obsession. It's a fruitful area.

But for a genre that derives much of its power from the trespassing of taboos, horror fiction has been remarkably coy when it comes to talking of sex. In an age when characters in all manner of fiction have forsaken their blushes to fornicate, horror fiction clings to its underwear with a nunnish zeal.

There have been, it's true, many masterworks charged with eroticism (indeed there's an argument that says much of the genre is underpinned by repressed sexuality) but it has remained, for the most part, sub-text. We can take our werewolf with a touch of Freud or without. As long as he doesn't sport an erection (the werewolf, not Freud) as well as snout and tail, we can interpret the image shorn of its sexual possibilities.

For my part, I tend to be of the opinion that such willful naïveté is perverse, and that art is best enjoyed, as it should be made, to the limit.

Turning a blind eye to what an image may signify—either because the interpretation distresses or confounds us—is not what good fiction should do, nor should it be the response it elicits. It's doubly regrettable, therefore, that so little horror fiction has taken the challenge of sexuality by the balls.

I've talked of this with writers and fans alike, and many of them evidence some fear that if the undertow of sexual meaning were made manifest the fiction would lose some of its power to persuade. I have argued in return that any fictional forum that requires a willful suspension of the reader's spirit of intellectual inquiry (as opposed to his disbelief) doesn't deserve to survive, and have put my pen where my mouth is (as it were) with sex in a number of my pieces.

Mr. Campbell has done the same, with great success. Here, gathered in a single volume, are several of his stories that marry the horrific with the sexual. I don't use the word erotic here, for I think the sexual material in these tales serves a far more complex function than straightforward titillation.

For one thing, it is never a narrative aside—an overheated fuck before the horrors begin afresh—but rather a central and eloquent part of the story's texture. For another, the actors in these scenes (when human) are seldom the deodorised stuff of fantasy, but the same pale-buttocked, stale-sweated individuals we all of us greet each morning in our mirrors. Thirdly, and most pertinently, the sexual material is marked by Ramsey Campbell's unique vision, just as everything in his fiction is marked.

Most of you will know that Mr. Campbell has earned his considerable audience, and countless critical plaudits, by creating a world in which much remains unsaid and unseen, and the fear he creates is as much wed to our individual interpretation of what the prose is implying as derived from anything the author explicitly reveals.

This being the nature of his gift, it might seem that graphic sexual descriptions—and believe me, graphic they are—would not sit happily with such obliqueness. Far from it. One of the delightfully unsettling things about these tales is the way Ramsey's brooding, utterly unique vision renders an act familiar to us all so fretful, so strange, so chilling. As elsewhere, his pithy prose responds to the challenge of reinventing experience with subtlety and resilience, never slipping into cliché, but always asking us to make fresh sense of the acts set before us.

And so we should, for sexuality is all too often the territory of the sentimentalist or the pornographer, too seldom that of the visionary. Yet it's a transforming act, literally. It remakes our bodies, for a time; and our minds too. For a little space we know obsession intimately; we are at the call of chemical instructions which sharpen our senses and at the same time narrow our focus, so that our perceptions are heightened and refined.

Horror fiction has traditionally had much to say about all these subjects: transformation, obsession and perception. Sex, with its ecstasies and its petit mort: its private rituals and its public corruptions; its way of reminding us that all physical pleasure is rooted in the same body that shits, sweats and withers, is the perfect stuff for the horror writer, and there can be few artists working in the genre as capable of analysing and dramatising such territory as the author of the volume you hold.

As I said earlier, horror fiction has traditionally dealt in taboo. It speaks of death, madness and the transgression of moral and physical boundaries. It raises the dead to life and slaughters infants in their cribs; it makes monsters of household pets and begs our affection for psychos. It shows us that the control we believe we have is purely illusory, and that every moment we teeter on chaos and oblivion.

And to that list of taboos I now add another list: the forbidden substrata of sexuality. The obsessions with parts and people we keep in our private thoughts; the acts we dream of but dare not openly desire; the flesh we long to wear, the pains we yearn to endure or inflict in the name of love.

Here are fictions which unite subjects from both the above lists. In which the dead don't simply rise—they rise to fuck.

To some of you, these stories will seem portraits of Hell. But if you're honest, your dreams may tell you differently.

Who knows, maybe the Maiden hasn't been startled by Death at all; maybe that cold touch on her breast is what she's been waiting for all her life.

People desire stranger things, as the extraordinary Mr. Campbell is about to prove...

Clive Barker
London
29th June, 1986

Debatable and Disturbing: Editorial Shards, an introduction to Crypt Of Cthulhu #43, by Robert M. Price

Ramsey Campbell is one of the top handful of horror writers today, and one of the still smaller group that deserves to be. It may be hard for some of us oldsters to realise, but there are no doubt some in today's newest generation of Lovecraftians (drawn to the faith perhaps through the Cthulhu role-playing game or Re-Animator) who already knew Campbell's mature, non-Mythos work and only later learned that he, like Robert Bloch and Brian Lumley, had cut his teeth writing Lovecraftian tales.

Veterans and neophytes alike rejoiced when Scream Press issued Cold Print, a collection of Campbell's Mythos tales, last year. Several were reprinted from the 1964 Arkham House collection The Inhabitant of the Lake, but certain "less welcome tenants" were omitted. Besides some from the 1964 volume, other missing Mythos items were stray fanzine stories or discarded drafts.

Where else but in the pages of Crypt of Cthulhu is a poor Campbell-ite likely to find these tales? The present issue collects all the rest of Campbell's early Cthulhu Mythos stories. The Tomb-Herd was rewritten and published as The Church in High Street, and though several snipped paragraphs were included in Ramsey's preface to Cold Print, the whole tale seemed of sufficient interest to publish here. The Face in the Desert was rejected even from the original Inhabitant of the Lake and appeared previously only in a fanzine. A Madness From the Vaults appears here in its two incarnations, the first having appeared in an obscure fanzine, the second, a completely rewritten version in Penny and Meade Friersons' HPL fan anthology (1971). The earlier is taken from Ramsey's handwritten manuscript (as are The Tower from Yuggoth and The Face in the Desert; all the early manuscripts are housed in the Local History Library of the Liverpool Public Libraries).

The manuscript The Tower from Yuggoth is substantially different from the rewritten and published The Mine on Yuggoth, practically a different story. Here are both for comparison. Two more of the tales from The Inhabitant of the Lake not included in Cold Print, The Plain of Sound and The Return of the Witch are included here though The Will of Stanley Brooke, not a Mythos tale, is not. The Stone on the Island first appeared in the 1964 Arkham House anthology Over the Edge (reprinted by Victor Gollancz in 1967 and in paper by Arrow in 1976).

The stories are printed here in at least roughly chronological order.

Robert M. Price, Editor
Crypt Of Cthulhu #43, Hallowmas 1986

Foreword To Waking Nightmares

Horror fiction can be many things. The field includes the ghost stories of Sheridan Le Fanu and M. R. James, not to mention the best tales of Russell Kirk. It ranges from the psychological terrors of John Franklin Bardin to the philosophical terrors of Samuel Beckett's The Unnamable and Not I. It embraces both the supernatural visions of Algernon Blackwood at his best —The Willows, The Wendigo—and the relentless violence of Joe Lansdale's The Nightrunners, the last horror novel I found genuinely frightening. Horror fiction can work as humour, as metaphor, as political allegory, as the imagination's reveille. I won't presume to claim that the present book has such scope, but I'm inclined to be pleased with its range.

I've arranged the stories in the interest of variety, but I'll discuss them chronologically. The earliest is Jack in the Box (1974), the first of a group of stories (several of which may be found in Dark Companions) written in emulation of Tales from the Crypt and the other E.C. comics, which themselves derived from Poe and Weird Tales magazine, and in particular from Ray Bradbury. By sheer carelessness I managed to transpose the words torchlight and daylight in the penultimate paragraph of the original typescript of Jack in the Box, an error which destroys the whole point of the story. My apologies to any readers who ended up scratching their heads over a previous printing of the tale.

The Trick (1976) comes next, and it isn't a story I would write now. Jim Herbert told me recently that since he became a father he has tried to steer clear of the theme of children as victims. For my part, parenthood seems to keep sending me back to the theme of the vulnerability of children—Night of the Claw, Incarnate, The Influence—but what bothers me about The Trick is its cold-bloodedness. Still, people whose opinions I respect have found the story frightening, and I've included it here on that basis. I think it also contrasts well with Eye of Childhood, written two years later. I would have given that story a somewhat more obvious title, but Robert Aickman had already based the name of his second American book on the phrase from Macbeth. There's another child protagonist in the next tale, Bedtime Story (1980); like The Nameless, this was written after our daughter Tammy was born. Ideally—though in fact, I fear, too seldom—having children reminds one what it was like to be one.

Playing the Game also dates from 1980. At least, this version does, though the first version I sent to my agent was completed in late 1974 as one of my E.C. emulations. My friend Mike Ashley, the anthologist and bibliographer, suggested that the characters in that version were feebly motivated, and I came to agree with him. In 1982 I learned that T. E. D. Klein had bought the tale for Twilight Zone magazine—the original version, to my surprise. 'When you rewrite,' he commented to me, 'you really rewrite, don't you?' Later Herb Yellin published my preferred version in an anthology from Lord John Press. Both versions of the tale attempt to convey how parts of the Liverpool docks affect me.

I wrote almost no more short stories until 1983, the year which produced the next four tales in this book. The first, Watch the Birdie, carries its own explanation. Next Time You'll Know Me can be read as some kind of response to my being sent unsolicited manuscripts. It appeared in Douglas Winter's Prime Evil, where one of those copy-editors whom writers abhor tried to change all the narrator's said-bookisms into 'said.' In the Trees stems from a walk in Delamere Forest, where I often go to play with ideas for new stories, and Old Clothes derives from the idea of apports, one of the very few mediumistic notions odd enough to appeal to my imagination.

Beyond Words (1985) owes something to the comment with which Kenneth Jurkewicz rounds off his essay about me in Everett F. Bleiler's Supernatural Fiction Writers: 'For him it is indeed the words that count.' Stanley Wiater suggests this is a tale best read aloud. Just as odd is The Other Side (1985), but perhaps the oddness is more studied, insofar as the tale was written in response to a request to write a story based on J. K. Potter's cover for the program book of the 1986 World Fantasy Convention, where J. K. and I were among the guests of honour. On one level the story is about my attempts to write something which would equal, rather than simply quote, Potter's surreal image. I should have liked to use the picture for the cover of the present book, but instead you may find it on the sixteenth volume of Karl Edward Wagner's Year's Best Horror Stories.

Second Sight (1985) was produced for J. N. Williamson, who asked me to write a two-thousand-word story for his anthology Masques II, and Where the Heart Is (1986) was composed for Kathryn Cramer's The Architecture of Fear, an anthology of tales in which the architectural setting is also a metaphor of some kind. I liked this idea, but was disconcerted to find that in her letter describing her requirements to potential contributors she had cited me as having achieved in various stories what she had in mind: I felt as if I were being asked to imitate myself. (In general writers are likely to be truest to themselves when they are trying not to repeat themselves.) However, the family and I had recently moved house before managing to sell our previous home, and I was also losing patience with hearing the perennial claim that no ghost stories were being written anymore—at least, not by writers within the field. Together, these elements prompted Where the Heart Is. That kind of synchronism—putting coincidences to use whenever they're useful—I believe in.

Another World (1987) was another tale written to order—a useful discipline—but its readers may not have noticed. I was originally approached by Paul Gamble (Gamma) to contribute to an anthology of stories on the theme of a forbidden planet, to be published by the London bookshop of that name. I duly wrote on the theme. Later the editorship was taken over by Roz Kaveney, and the scope was widened to include writers who had signed books at the bookshop and who were allowed their own choice of theme. Almost the opposite happened in the case of Book of the Dead, originally an anthology of tales set in the world of George Romero's trilogy of zombie films. I turned down a request to contribute, simply because I felt Romero had himself said all there was to say on his subject, but when I learned that the tales had only to use the theme of the zombie in some way I thought I might have something to offer: It Helps If You Sing (1987). Imagine my bemusement at reading on my contributor's copies of the book that each of the stories in this anthology is set in a world where the dead have risen to eat the living, which is certainly not the case with my story. Incidentally, the introduction by Skipp and Spector to the book strikes me as the most persuasive statement I've seen on behalf of the splatter-punks, though I don't think all the stories in Book of the Dead live up to its claims.

The Guide (1988) was another story written on request, and one I especially wanted to do right by. Paul Olson and David F. Silva asked me to write a traditional ghost story for their book Post Mortem. Now, I was becoming convinced (and still am) that many of today's horror writers are unaware of the traditions of their field. Indeed, one course on writing horror advises its students to avoid learning from the old masters, as if there aren't already too many writers who appear to have read no fiction older than themselves. I therefore welcomed the chance to demonstrate that the techniques employed by M. R. James are as valid as ever. Incidentally, the James book cited in the story is genuine, as are the quotations from it.

The idea of being directed by a (probably supernatural) prompter had been lying dormant in one of my notebooks for some time when Chris Morgan asked me to write a story for his anthology Dark Fantasies. I suspect that I might otherwise have developed the idea along more comic lines than I did in Being an Angel (1988), and perhaps it still retains enough potential for me to do so in another tale.

I believe I can thank Jenny's and my children for generating the last two 1988 tales. It was our daughter Tammy who introduced me to the game of Blocko which prompted The Old School, while both she and our son Matty were fond of Jan Pienkowski's pop-up haunted house book, which set me thinking along the lines which led me to write Meeting the Author. I should think that you, the reader, have done enough of that for one book by now. British members of any professions or other groups who feel maligned by any of the tales herein should address their complaints to the Fictional Depictions Complaints Commission in the first instance, then to the Royal Commission on Representation in Storytelling. Complainants in other countries should approach the appropriate bodies. Me, I'll blame the copy-editors.

Ramsey Campbell
Merseyside
20 June 1990

Foreword To Strange Things And Stranger Places

The strangest place most of us ordinarily see is the world, but familiarity tends to make us forget how strange it is. One thing good horror fiction—and, I'd suggest, any good fiction—can do is remind us. Of the stories in this book, "Needing Ghosts" certainly did that to me, and much else besides. If everything a writer creates is a stage in the process of getting to what he writes next, then perhaps I can claim that the rest of the contents lead to "Needing Ghosts."

Well, let me leave the exploration of that theme to anyone who finds it interesting. "Cat and Mouse" (1971) was the earliest tale I ever wrote to order, for the first anthology to be edited by a fantasy fan of about my own age with whom I'd corresponded while at school, Michel Parry. The book was, I need hardly say, a collection of supernatural tales about cats. Reviewing it in Fantastic, Fritz Leiber criticised my story for coming on too feline too early. As usual in his criticisms, he was right, and his comment was the reason why I introduced the theme of "The Chimney" more gradually, but I don't think it's malicious of me to point out that the feline images in the opening sentences of "Cat and Mouse" were added at Michel's request. I hope they and my comments won't seem too intrusive.

Writing on a subject provided by an editor can be a useful discipline. "Cat and Mouse" now looks to me like one of my more controlled stories from the period after I'd completed Demons by Daylight and found myself writing in search of new themes. Some of the results of that process appear in The Height of the Scream, and some, to my relief, have never appeared anywhere. One such muffled story was "Property of the Ring," among the few tales I wrote in 1970. Dissatisfaction with it deterred me from even preparing a typescript, but I did feel the basic theme deserved another chance. When I began to write full time in 1973 and the horror markets immediately vanished like so many will-o'-the-wisps, I thought it might do as the basis for one of the science fiction stories my agent, Kirby McCauley, kept suggesting I should try to write.

The result was "Medusa" (1973), my first novella. Several of my other attempts at science fiction saw even less print than this did, and believe me, no wonder. Whereas I wrote a handful of sword and sorcery tales (not counting the Solomon Kane stories I completed) in order to develop images that seemed too extravagant to be accommodated in my usual stuff, my science fiction stories tried to deal with Themes, too consciously, I feel. "Medusa" is probably the best of them, insofar as here and there imagination surfaces, but I may as well admit that I feel too distant from the story to have any real sense of having written it or of why I did. However, better writers than I have praised it—Dennis Etchison, in his introduction to Bill Minister's three-hundred-copy edition, and T. E. D. Klein—and so they must take some of the responsibility for its presence here.

In 1974 there seemed to be a new market for horror—a bunch of Marvel comics which would include prose tales modelled on the E. C. comics of the fifties. I wrote quite a few that year, appreciating the discipline of having to be terse, even when it transpired that Marvel had decided not to use prose stories after all. "Rising Generation" was my zombie story to go with the other found monsters, and "Wrapped Up" was done for Michel Parry, for a mummy anthology which failed to appear. "Run Through" was based on a dream of seeing a figure repeatedly running towards me, and perhaps the business with the key derives from my own obsessive behaviour: I often have to check several times that I've locked doors or switched off electricity. Writing the story doesn't seem to have helped me stop myself, but the important issue is whether it's a good story. As for "Passing Phase" (also 1974), I've no idea where it came from.

"A New Life" was one of the last of my E. C. pieces. It was written in 1976, the year when much of my energy was devoted to writing novels based on classic Universal horror films. These were published under the house name of Carl Dreadstone—my original suggestion had been Carl Thunstone, but Manly Wade Wellman understandably thought people might assume that pseudonym was his—though in England, to add to the confusion, some were credited instead to E. K. Leyton. I was hoping to reissue my Dreadstone books as an omnibus, but alas, this is not to be. I can at least take this opportunity to make it clear that I wrote only The Bride of Frankenstein, The Wolfman and Dracula's Daughter. The other novels are nothing to do with me, and by now even Piers Dudgeon, the editor who commissioned the series, can't recall who wrote them.

I suppose both "The Next Sideshow" (1977) and "Little Man" (1978) owe their existence to my liking for fairgrounds and seaside resorts, especially out of season. I live less than half an hour's walk from such a resort, New Brighton. I remember visiting it as a teenager one rainy Boxing Day to see The Apartment, Billy Wilder's alleged comedy about attempted suicide, at the moribund local cinema—altogether one of the low points of my life. That I ended up living so close to that setting no doubt says a lot about me.

New Brighton is on the tip of the Wirral Peninsula, and used to be reached by a ferry from Liverpool. "Needing Ghosts" (1989/90) finds a context for my nighttime rides on the ferry, along with much that is stranger. I said at the outset that the story was a stage in a process, and for once that was obvious to me during the writing of it. I'd been having problems with my novels: I'd almost blocked at least once while writing The Influence; denying myself a psychologically troubled central character in Ancient Images had given me more problems than I'd anticipated; Midnight Sun gave me several kinds of hell for most of a year. As I was struggling with the latter, Deborah Beale of Legend managed to persuade me to commit myself to following it with a novella, and "Needing Ghosts" was the result, for which my bookseller friend John Mottershead lent me his surname. It may be the strangest piece I'll ever write.

Some of its energy derives from the excitement of working in a form new to me (as distinct from "Medusa," which ended up as a novella rather than setting out to be one). However, that doesn't quite explain why it was such fun to write. Once I'd written the early scene at the bus terminal—more precisely, the bit with the destination indicators—the story kept coming out so much stranger than I could have predicted that I could hardly wait to write it so as to find out what happened next. The process felt immensely liberating, perhaps because I was able to include elements which had seemed too dark for inclusion in Midnight Sun, certainly because the story let me explore the territory where horror and comedy overlap, an exploration which led straight to The Count of Eleven and to some extent The Long Lost too. Where will those books lead? There's only one way to find out, and that's why I continue to write. May the reader enjoy the results as much as I enjoyed the process.

Ramsey Campbell
Merseyside
3 August 1992

Introduction to the story The Limits Of Fantasy in The Year's Best Horror Stories 21

In the summer of 1974 Michel Parry, an old friend, complained to me that nobody was sending him tales on sexual themes for his black magic anthologies. Aroused by the suggestion, I wrote Dolls, which enabled me both to explore what happened to the supernatural story when the underlying sexual theme (not always present, of course) became overt and to write a long short story that was stronger on narrative than atmosphere, a useful preparation for writing my first novel. Michel hadn't expected anything quite so sexually explicit, and I was amused when his publishers, Mayflower, felt compelled to show Dolls to their lawyers for advice. They were advised to publish, and over the next two years Michel commissioned several more such tales from me, including two for a short-lived series of anthologies of erotic horror which he edited as Linda Lovecraft, who was, in fact, the owner of a chain of sex shops and who is one more reason why asking for Lovecraft in a British bookshop may earn you a dubious look. Perhaps the anthologies were ahead of their time because More Devil's Kisses, the second in the series, was pulped shortly after publication, apparently in response to objections from Scotland Yard. Rumour had it that the problem was a tale reprinted from National Lampoon, involving a seven-year-old girl and a horse. I confess to being more amused than irritated by the ban, much as I felt upon learning that my first novel had been seen (in a television documentary) on top of a pile of books for burning by Christian fundamentalists—something of a compliment as far as I'm concerned. On reflection, though, I think I wasn't entitled to feel quite so superior about censorship. Though my sexual tales had been, on the whole, progressively darker and more unpleasant, I'd suppressed the third of them, In The Picture. It was the initial draft of the story published here.

At the time (May 1975) I believed I had decided not to revise and submit the story because it wasn't up to publishable standard, and that was certainly the case. However, the reasons were more personal than I admitted to myself. All fiction is to some extent the product of censorship, whether by the culture within which it is produced or by the writer's own selection of material, both of which processes tend to be to some extent unconscious. Perhaps the most insidious form of censorship, insofar as it may be the most seductive for the writer, is by his own dishonesty. For me the most immediate proof is that it wasn't until Barry Hoffman asked me if I had any suppressed fiction that I realised, on rereading In The Picture, that my dishonesty was its central flaw.

One mode of fiction I dislike—one especially common in my field—is the kind where the act of writing about a character seems designed to announce that the character has nothing to do with the author. On the most basic level, it's nonsense, since by writing about a character the writer must draw that personality to some extent from within himself. More to the present point, it smells of protesting too much, and while that may be clear to the reader, for the writer it's a kind of censorship of self. I rather hope that In The Picture is the only tale in which I succumb to that temptation.

In The Picture follows the broad outline of The Limits Of Fantasy, though much more humourlessly, up to the scene with Enid Stone, and then Sid Pym begins to indulge in fantasies of rape and degradation which I believe are foreign to his sexual makeup and which are contrived simply to demonstrate what a swine he is—in other words, that he is quite unlike myself. Of course nothing could be further from the truth. In response to Barry Hoffman I treated In The Picture as the first version of the story and rewrote it exactly as I would any other first draft, and I had the most fun writing Pym's boarding-school fantasy, which is at least as much my fantasy as his. For me his presentation of it is both comic and erotic.

It seems to me that even the most liberal of us employ two definitions of pornography: the kind that turns ourselves on, which we're more prone to regard as erotic, and the kind which appeals to people with sexual tastes unlike our own and which we're more likely to condemn as pornographic. In my case the absurdity is that the group of scenarios which I sum up as the boarding-school fantasy (which is obviously as much fetishistic as sadistic) is the only species of pornography I find appealing, and it was therefore especially dishonest of me to include no more than a hint of it when I collected my sexual tales in Scared Stiff. I suppose, then and in my original suppression of In The Picture, I was afraid of losing friends, but that really isn't something writers should take into account when writing. I suspect I was assuming that my readers and people in general are squarer when it comes to erotic fantasy than is in fact the case. Since the publication of Scared Stiff I've heard from readers of various sexes that they found parts of the book erotic, and a female reader gave me a copy of Caught Looking, a polemic published by the Feminist Anti-Censorship Taskforce, in which one of the illustrations (all chosen by the FACT designers on the basis that they themselves found the images erotically appealing) is a still from a spanking video made in Britain before such videos were banned outright under a censorship that is fast overtaking the equivalent glossy magazines. (The Spankarama Cinema in Soho, rather unfairly chastised in the Winter 1982/83 Sight and Sound and touched on by association in Incarnate, is long gone; perhaps I should have had a publicity photograph taken under the sign while it was there.) Incidentally, perhaps one minor reason for my reticence was the notion that this sexual taste is peculiarly British, but a day in Amsterdam proved me wrong.

So I trust this hasn't been too embarrassing. I haven't found it so, but then I may sometimes lack tact in these areas: I once greeted a friend I met in a sex shop, who immediately fled. Still, I'm committed to telling as much of the truth as I can, as every writer should be. If we can't tell the truth about ourselves, how can we presume to do so about anyone or anything? Secretiveness is a weakness, whereas honesty is strength.

Ramsey Campbell
October 1993

Click here to return to the story The Limits Of Fantasy.

Introduction to Far Away And Never, 1996

These tales date from my brief stint as a write of pure fantasy. All are set in a mythical word. Of course, the version of New England I perpetrated in my first Lovecraftian stumblings was pretty mythical, not to mention the juvenile sketch of Arabia ("Araby") which I persuaded myself was good enough for The Face In The Desert. But the present tales, with one exception, are of the planet Tond, and that's where the problem begins.

Introduction To Ghosts And Grisly Things

Am I old yet? Am I jaded? Have I reached the point H. Russell Wakefield reached, and Nigel Kneale, and any number of commentators on my field, when they declared with all the confidence of ignorance that no good work was being done in it any more? Not while writers who've come after me are adding so much of worth to it—let me exhort anyone who needs convincing to start with Thomas Ligotti, Terry Lamsley, Kim Newman and Poppy Z. Brite, four of my particular favourites. I hope I may add some good stuff yet myself. Meanwhile, here's all this, which I'll reminisce about as the mood takes me, in chronological order of writing.

Through the Walls (1974) was a part—an odd one, you may think—of the process of working myself up to try a major psychedelic. When I dropped acid for the first time soon afterwards, the experience had thankfully little in common with the tale, though the flashback I suffered in late 1976 had far too much. I originally intended the story for Superhorror, the first anthology I edited, but several informed friends—Hugh Lamb, Kathy Murray and T E. D. Klein, all of them presently less active in the field than they deserve to be—pointed out flaws in the version I showed them. Later I rewrote it, and here is its final form.

Looking Out (1974) derives, I suspect, from my mother's increasing reluctance to venture far from her house once Jenny and I were living together. It was a trait that chafed her sister and brother-in-law, whom she regularly arranged to visit only to cancel at the last moment. Many were the arguments we had when I tried to persuade her that my aunt and uncle might be inconvenienced, and great was her pique if they proved to have invited a friend the next time she announced a visit. All that had its comic side, but Nairn's plight became hers too, anticipated by the tale. At least, that's my sense of it, though the notes for its development should be in the library vaults of Liverpool University if anybody wants to challenge my account.

As well as addressing its obvious themes of the difficulties of ageing and of the costs of change, The Sneering (1975) is a somewhat bitter celebration of an area of Liverpool where I once attended school—Ryebank Private School, to be precise, from 1953 to 1957. I remember being ragged on my arrival by some seniors and declaring with what must have been insufferable precociousness that I wouldn't stand for it. Sit down for it, then, one of my tormentors duly responded. My memory and my eleven-plus results suggest it was a pretty good school, though one Irish teacher, a Mrs Toomey or Twomey, berated me in front of the class for having told someone at a bus stop—I've no idea how the information got back to the school—that I wrote stories (true even then) and wanted them to be published in America. Wasn't England good enough for me? she demanded, and it's only now I retort that Ireland seems not to have been for her. She was fond of telling unruly pupils how she had once spanked a rebellious girl on stage in front of the entire school. My readers must decide why this should have lodged in my memory.

Missed Connection was written in early 1976, and The Change immediately after. The year was nothing if not productive, as can be seen from Joshi's and Dziemianowicz's splendid bibliography, The Core of Ramsey Campbell. The first of these two stories prefigures the darkness and oppressiveness of the second, I think. These qualities aren't so appropriate in the first instance, which should have been another of my succinct tales written in tribute to the EC comics of the fifties, but I find The Change authentically grim—indeed, for me it's my darkest tale, and surely needs no exegesis by the author.

This Time (1978) and Root Cause (1979) don't call for much explanation either. The more fiction one writes, I find, the more the slightest incident or passing thought can set about instantly plotting itself. This Time began with the idea of counting backwards during the onset of an anaesthetic, and was a tale I worked out pretty fully in advance so that I would have something to write once our first child was born. (Down There followed it, and was so intractable that I nearly abandoned it after three days, until a paragraph of the first draft came alive.) The genesis of Root Cause must be somewhere in my notebooks, and I leave it to be discovered with a grunt or gasp or cry of triumph by some future researcher. Will that be my spectral finger marking the page for them, or just a length of restless cobweb?

Welcomeland (1987) owes its conception to Alan Moore, one of the contemporary British giants—Bryan Talbot and Neil Gaiman and John Coulthart are others—of the comic book. At a party after a signing we did in Peterborough, Alan told me of an abandoned Northern industrial town that a businessman had sought to turn into a theme park until his money ran out. Substances ingested at the party may have helped me to develop the notion as weirdly as it deserved.

We come to 1990, and four tales herein. The Alternative is one of the stories I thought of writing on the theme of a life whose positive qualities depend on dreadful nightmares. Maybe in time I'll write another, though this one also discovers a moral theme. I wrote at length about my actual dreams and nightmares in my regular column in the magazine Necrofile. A Street was Chosen has at its root the kind of trick writers should play on themselves every so often—requiring themselves to use a style they don't ordinarily employ. My task here was to write in the passive voice without undue repetition, and in the form of a scientific report. I found this virtually impossible until I switched from writing longhand, always my way with first drafts, to composing directly onto the computer screen. That's how I write non-fiction, the present ramblings included, and perhaps that's why the method worked for A Street was Chosen.

See How They Run was written for an anthology about psychopaths edited by my old, and now lamented, friend Robert Bloch. Bob was happy with the tale but not the title, which he'd used for a story of his own, and so I retitled mine For You to Judge. I still preferred my original title, however, and after Bob's death I used it for a reprinting by another much-missed friend, Karl Wagner. Not many days before Bob died I was able to speak to him on the phone for half an hour and tell him he was loved. He told me that he was able to see a pattern in his life. I hope I shall in mine.

The Same in Any Language was a response to a request too. A resurrected Weird Tales, the legendary pulp magazine, was to publish an issue as a tribute to me, much to my delight. My first glimpse of a copy of Weird Tales in a shop window when I was six or seven years old started a yearning which only collecting the magazine could begin to satisfy. Darrell Schweitzer, editor of its latest incarnation, asked me to vary the tone and settings of my stories for the tribute issue as much as I could. Given that The Change was included, I imagine he wanted me to be less bleak. I'd wanted to use Spinalonga as a setting in any case, having forgotten that John Ware had already done so in the thirteenth volume of Herbert van Thal's increasingly pornographic Pan books of horror stories, a series later rescued from itself by Steve Jones and his partner in excellence David Sutton. Ware's tale is an old-fashioned ghost story. How about mine?

1991 was the year I finished The Count of Eleven—a novel of a serial killer who might have been played by Stan Laurel, as one reviewer delighted me by saying—and the comedy I'd discovered there found its way into that year's short stories. Mind you, there may be some who would take The Dead Must Die straight, an unnerving thought. It was written for Narrow Houses, Pete Crowther's anthology about superstition, a human failing I take to mean basing one's life on irrationality. Of course my stuff frequently deals with the irrational, but I trust my readers to recognise that I'm writing fiction. Some writers in the field seem happy to increase their sales by pretending otherwise. Mind you, A Side of the Sea strikes me now as less fantastic than I took it to be at the time, and in McGonagall in the Head I found it difficult to invent worse verse than some of the couplets real people send after the departed. I don't know if any reader needs me to explain that William McGonagall was to poetry what Edward D. Wood of Plan 9 From Outer Space was to the cinema. Fans of either will also be rewarded by the poetry and prose of Amanda McKittrick Ros.

In 1992 I had time to complete only one short story, Between the Floors. That Easter the annual British science fiction convention was held in a Blackpool hotel, where some of the conventioneers were banished to an annexe served by a lift complete with a lugubrious attendant not at all unlike (except in some ways, one hopes) the figure who haunts my tale. What is it about comedians that makes them recur in my stuff? Even the monstrous Hector Woollie in the novel I'm presently writing has ambitions to amuse children. Perhaps I've never felt the same about comedians since reading the nightmarish chapter fourteen of David Storey's Radcliffe.

I saw myself into 1993 by finishing Where They Lived. The idea for it, or more precisely the characters, came to me on a coach ride in Turkey. I overheard nobody like the Lunts on it—indeed, the organiser of the tour had the good taste to play a tape of the Appassionata—but I suspect my subconscious had been scheming for a while to create representatives of the kind of English tourist who goes abroad in search of Blackpool. (American readers should understand that Blackpool can be described as a less tasteful Coney Island.) Any number of lines of Luntish dialogue suggested themselves to me all at once. Having scribbled them down, I was casting about for a suitably macabre situation to build around the Lunts when it occurred to me that they were macabre enough in themselves. See if you agree once you've met them—I hope only on the page.

Going Under (1994) was done for Nancy Collins' book Dark Love. I know it doesn't fit her title very well. I'd somehow convinced myself she was editing an anthology about obsessions, and the tale can claim that preoccupation, I think. Around the time I planned to write it one of the Mersey Tunnels was closed to traffic for a day so that the public could celebrate its anniversary by walking through. I intended to research the experience, but the story grew impatient to be written, and so I saved myself the walk.

Out of the Woods dates from the same year. The editor of a Belgian journal approached me to write a story about wood or paper or a Finnish legend for a magazine he was to edit in English to be sold to Finns worldwide. I assure you that I don't invent these anecdotes. He tempted me to fit the project into my schedule by offering a handsome sum, but when he received the story his offer turned out to be less than forthcoming, and I haven't heard from him since. Still, the story went down well at readings, and I later recorded it (along with The Guide, Calling Card and The Companion) on an audio cassette, Twilight Tales from Merseyside, available from BBC Radio Merseyside and in America from Necronomicon Press.

And so to the chunk of unpublished stuff, *Ra*e*. It was another tale written to an order that proved less firm than it had promised to be. Jeff Gelb and Lonn Friend, editors of the Hot Blood series of anthologies, asked various people to write a long story about one of the seven deadly sins. You will have guessed which attracted me. Alas, for whatever reason, the project failed to find a publisher, and so although I completed the first draft of the tale in early 1996, I saw little point in revising such a lengthy piece to be touted elsewhere. For a while a second volume of Dark Love seemed imminent, and apparently both Nancy Collins and her publishers wanted me in it, but it too faded and vanished. Now here is a place for *Ra*e*, in final draft at last. My thanks to all those who bought it and the book it rounds off, and who have indulged my determination not to repeat myself, which isn't to say that I've by any means always succeeded. All the same, here's to keeping on trying. The journey isn't over, and I hope to have some odd things to show you on the way.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
16 September 1997

Afterword To Scared Stiff: Tales Of Sex And Death

Nobody rebels like a good Catholic boy, and I spent quite a stretch of my childhood in fighting the repressiveness of my upbringing. I needed to. At an early age I was infected by my mother's blushes at anything that might conceal a double meaning, and anything more explicit than that made me horribly uncomfortable: I squirmed when Bluebottle and Eccles in the Goon Show looked up someone's trousers to see who he was, and felt physically ill when Victor Borge introduced the messy soprano who came in a single pile. I couldn't go through life like that, though I'm sure too many people do, and by the time I reached adolescence at a grammar school run by Christian Brothers I was beginning to grow mutinous. I'd no time for the spinsterish way one master wrinkled his nose at sex in pop songs and denied us a hearing of the Porter scene in a recording of Macbeth. No doubt I resented his disapproval partly because pop songs and dirty jokes, some of which would have taken a David Cronenberg to visualise, were all the sexual experience I had. Sex education was thoroughly absent, except for a talk on the ways of the world, delivered on one of my last days at school by a visiting monk who referred to girls' "head-lamps" and boys' "spouts". Still, perhaps the beatings that were frequent at the school were popular with some; in that year's issue of the magazine a school governor reminisces at unhealthy length about them. Myself, I agree with Gore Vidal (and quite a few of its practitioners) in approving of corporal punishment only between consenting adults, a theme I'll return to later.

But my strongest resentment against the church and my upbringing at that time was over the forbidding of books. I had the impression—how accurate I can't say—that as a Catholic I was prevented from reading all sorts of things on pain of some unspecified and therefore daunting penalty. Having persuaded my mother over the years to let me borrow adult ghost books from the library, and eventually, when I was ten, to allow me to buy science fiction magazines and even Weird Tales, I now felt ready to confront censoriousness—or at least, I thought I did. This was the year Lady Chatterley's Lover was first published in Britain, and while I don't think any of my schoolmates were brave enough to bring a copy to school, quite a few claimed to have read it; undoubtedly some of them had. The best I could do, however, was to skulk near bookstalls where it was displayed and clutch the three and sixpence in my pocket in a vain attempt to goad myself into picking up the book. It wasn't until I left school that I determined to make up for lost time by reading whatever I liked.

So I bought Nabokov's Lolita, having seen it recommended by Graham Greene, and found it liberating in several ways, not least as a writer. In order to write anything lively enough for publication I'd needed to unlearn some of the restrictions I'd been taught at school—you couldn't contract "I had" to "I'd", for instance—but the effect of reading Nabokov was an instant lightening of my style and a greatly enhanced enjoyment of language (a pleasure which, I fear, at least one teacher of English literature had had no apparent time for). Meanwhile my first published stories, imitations of Lovecraft, had begun to appear. Pat Kearney, a friend who published the very first in his fanzine Goudy, told me about the Olympia Press, Lolita's original publisher. A house devoted to publishing books banned in Britain sounded fine to me, particularly since I was incensed to discover that so many books were banned, and so with the advance paid on publication of my first book, I took my mother and myself to Paris, whence I returned with William Burroughs' The Soft Machine and The Ticket That Exploded and a copy for Pat Kearney of a book of bawdy ballads pseudonymously edited by Christopher Logue. How I intended to bluff my way through Customs I have no idea, but a rough and protracted Channel crossing came to what I was able to regard retrospectively as my aid. Faced with the sight of me, wavering and pale-faced and be-spattered with remains of that morning's croissants, the Customs officer waved me through. In the introduction to his bibliography of the Olympia Press, Pat Kearney celebrates this incident with a description that makes me think of Anthony Cronin's last grisly sight of Brendan Behan.

Another source of banned books was August Derleth, my friend and mentor and (in the days when Arkham House was pretty well his one-man operation) first professional publisher, who sent me Henry Miller's Tropics and Lawrence Durrell's Black Book. This led me to assume he wouldn't mind if I introduced a different kind of shock into my Lovecraft imitations, but he took the shit out of a line of dialogue. I still think it's what the character would have said, but I see that that may not be relevant to such a stylised form as Lovecraft pastiche. I therefore tried writing for the Olympia Press, who were then publishing a magazine. "A Third-Floor Withdrawal" was an attempt to deal with my adolescent sexual turmoil, and the editor of Olympia gave me the impression that it might have been published except for its brevity (it was about a thousand words in length). I tried again with "The Folding Socket", a plotless fantasy influenced by William Burroughs, which I wrote at my Civil Service desk in the lunch hours. This, I imagine, was too gross for the magazine, which was aimed at the British and American bookstalls. Both stories are lost, and certainly the latter need not be mourned.

Years later—1969, I think—I had a different sort of experience involving Olympia Press. In the first newsletter of a short-lived Liverpool underground film society, I advertised for sale the Olympia edition of de Sade's 120 Days of Sodom, whose three volumes I'd found somewhat tedious. Of course the nondescript fellow who called at the house to examine the books proved to be a plain-clothes policeman, who had no doubt been planted in the film society so as to keep an eye on things, though I didn't realise this until he returned with three of his colleagues and a warrant to search the house. They were unfailingly courteous, and seemed to be impressed by both my naïveté and my having been published. Weeks later I was invited to the police station to be given a cup of tea and the news that the Director of Public Prosecutions had decided not to prosecute, and almost everything they had seized was returned to me, including Kenneth Patchen's Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer and Samuel Beckett's Imagination Dead Imagine, in which page 12 had been marked in pencil, apparently because it begins with "the arse" ("the arse against the wall at A, the knees against the wall at B and C, the feet against the wall between C and A, that is to say inscribed in the semicircle ACB..."). I don't think Beckett had previously been regarded as a pornographic writer. I had to sign away my rights only to the de Sade, a book which caused the policeman to wrinkle his nose in exactly the way pop songs had affected my old schoolmaster. (Footnote: How times change! These days not only the novel but Pasolini's bleak and distressing film of it are openly on sale in Britain.)

By then I had completed Demons by Daylight, my second book, though it wasn't published until 1973. It may not seem especially radical now, but it certainly was then, not least in dealing with characters whose guilts and fears and sexuality and, especially, emotional clumsiness were based on my experience. Indeed, if I hadn't felt driven by the need to bring horror fiction up to date, in line with the contemporary fiction I was reading, I might not have had the courage to continue; I felt that these stories were unlikely to receive August Derleth's approval—so much so that when I'd finished typing the book I fell into a horrible depression, because I both regarded Arkham House as my only market (as Lovecraft regarded Weird Tales as his) and was convinced that Arkham wouldn't touch it. But Derleth bought it, though he never gave me his opinion of it, and I was set on my course.

It is sometimes suggested (by Paul Schrader, for instance, in an attempt to justify his vulgar remake of Cat People) that all horror fiction is about sex. This is nonsense, and unhelpfully reductionist even when applied to tales with sexual themes: it's too easy to slide from "that's what the story is about" to "that's all the story is about." But it's true that many horror stories have a sexual subtext, and I think many of us in the field tended to assume that if the underlying sexual theme was made explicit, it would rob the fiction of its power.

It was the anthologist Michel Parry, an old friend, who gave me the chance to test this theory, though I don't think he quite realised what he was helping to create. After editing three volumes of black magic stories for Mayflower, he complained to me that nobody was submitting tales on a sexual theme. Aroused by the suggestion, I wrote "Dolls," which enabled me both to explore what happened to the supernatural story when the underlying sexual theme (not always present, of course) became overt and to write a long short story that was stronger on narrative than atmosphere, a useful preparation for writing my first novel. Michel hadn't expected anything quite so sexually explicit, and I was amused when his publishers, Mayflower, felt compelled to show "Dolls" to their lawyers for advice. The lawyers advised them to publish, and over the next few years Michel commissioned several more such tales, all of which are included here.

My original title for this book was Horror Erotica. The one it bears was the inspiration of Jeff Conner at Scream/Press. At least we didn't call it Wanking Nightmares. My correspondent Keith B. Johnston of Goshen came up with Eldritchly Erect, and Poppy Z. Brite suggested I should write a second such collection set in Liverpool and called Mersey Beat-Off, though admittedly that was after I proposed she call a book The Phantom of the Okra.

I don't know if much need be said about most of the following stories. "The Other Woman" has offended some readers, and I probably wouldn't write it that way now if at all, but I think it's a story about fantasies of rape rather than merely being such a fantasy itself. I believe "The Seductress" was filmed for the cable television show The Hunger, but although I was paid for it I've never seen the episode. "Merry May" (which was written to tumefy the first edition of this book) became transformed into "Merry Way" on the cover of the American Warner paperback, which also toned the original subtitle ("Tales of Sex and Death") down to "Seven Tales of Seduction and Terror."

"The Body in the Window" was written for the Hot Blood paperback anthology series, while "Kill Me Hideously" suggested itself as soon as I agreed at a British science fiction convention to offer as an auction item the chance for the highest bidder to appear in my next novel. That was The Last Voice They Hear, but the charming bidder had nothing in common with the unlucky Lisette in the present book.

"The Other Woman" and "Loveman's Comeback" were written for the short-lived Devil's Kisses series of anthologies of erotic horror Michel edited as Linda Lovecraft, who was in fact the owner of a chain of sex shops and who is one more reason why asking for Lovecraft in a British bookshop may earn you a dubious look. Perhaps the anthologies were ahead of their time, because the second in the series was pulped shortly after publication, apparently in response to objections from Scotland Yard. Rumour had it that the problem was a tale reprinted from National Lampoon, involving a seven-year-old girl and a horse. Michel held on to "Stages" for a possible anthology about drugs, but after the above incident the story went into limbo. I confess to being more amused than irritated by the banning of More Devil's Kisses, much as I felt upon learning that my first novel had been seen (in a television documentary) on top of a pile of books for burning by Christian fundamentalists—something of a compliment as far as I'm concerned. On reflection, though, I think I wasn't entitled to feel quite so superior about censorship. Though my sexual tales had been, on the whole, progressively darker and more unpleasant, I'd suppressed the third of them, "In the Picture." It was the initial draft of the story published here as "The Limits of Fantasy."

At the time (May 1975) I believed I had decided not to revise and submit the story because it wasn't up to publishable standard, and that was certainly the case. However, the reasons were more personal than I admitted to myself. All fiction is to some extent the product of censorship, whether by the culture within which it is produced or by the writer's own selection of material, both of which processes tend to be to some extent unconscious. Perhaps the most insidious form of censorship, insofar as it may be the most seductive for the writer, is by his own dishonesty. For me the most immediate proof is that it wasn't until Barry Hoffman asked me if I had any suppressed fiction he could publish in Gauntlet that I realised, on rereading "In the Picture," that my dishonesty was its central flaw.

One mode of fiction I dislike—one especially common in my field—is the kind where the act of writing about a character seems designed to announce that the character has nothing to do with the author. On the most basic level, it's nonsense, since by writing about a character the writer must draw that personality to some extent from within himself. More to the present point, it smells of protesting too much, and while that may be clear to the reader, for the writer it's a kind of censorship of self. I hope that "In the Picture" is the only tale in which I succumb to that temptation.

"In the Picture" follows the broad outline of "The Limits of Fantasy," though much more humourlessly, up to the scene with Enid Stone, and then Sid Pym begins to indulge in fantasies of rape and degradation which I believe are foreign to his sexual makeup and which are contrived simply to demonstrate what a swine he is—in other words, that he is quite unlike myself. Nothing could be further from the truth. In response to Barry Hoffman I treated "In the Picture" as the first version of the story and rewrote it exactly as I would any other first draft, and I had the most fun writing Pym's boarding-school fantasy, which is at least as much my fantasy as his. For me his presentation of it is both comic and erotic.

It seems to me that even the most liberal of us employ two definitions of pornography: the kind that turns ourselves on, which we're more prone to regard as erotic, and the kind which appeals to people with sexual tastes unlike our own and which we're more likely to condemn as pornographic. In my case the absurdity is that the group of scenarios which I sum up as the boarding-school fantasy (which is obviously as much fetishistic as sadistic) is the only species of pornography I find appealing, and it was therefore especially dishonest of me to include no more than a hint of it when I collected my sexual tales in Scared Stiff. I suppose, then and in my original suppression of "In the Picture," I was afraid of losing friends, but that really isn't something writers should take into account when writing. I suspect I was assuming that my readers and people in general are squarer when it comes to erotic fantasy than is in fact the case. Since the publication of Scared Stiff I've heard from readers of various sexes that they found parts of the book erotic, and a female reader gave me a copy of Caught Looking, a polemic published by the Feminist Anti-Censorship Taskforce, in which one of the illustrations (all chosen by the FACT designers on the basis that they themselves found the images erotically appealing) is a still from Moral Welfare, a British spanking video. (The Spankarama Cinema in Soho, rather unfairly chastised in the winter 1982/83 Sight and Sound and touched on by association in Incarnate, is long gone; perhaps I should have had a publicity photograph taken under the sign while it was there.) Incidentally, perhaps one minor reason for my reticence was the notion that this sexual taste is peculiarly British, but a few minutes on the Internet will give the lie to that. I keep feeling there's a novel in the theme, to be called Adult Fun, but who would publish it? Meanwhile "The Limits of Fantasy" adds variety to this collection, which has sometimes struck me as too mechanically including the standard variations in tale after tale.

So I trust this hasn't been too embarrassing. I haven't found it so, but then I may sometimes lack tact in these areas: I once greeted a friend I met in a sex shop, who immediately fled. Still, I'm committed to telling as much of the truth as I can, as every writer should be. If we can't tell the truth about ourselves, how can we presume to do so about anyone or anything? Secretiveness is a weakness, whereas honesty is strength.

If I'm told my field is incapable of something, I'll give it a try—hence these and others of my tales. No doubt the irritation of censorship also has something to do with it: here it seems to have behaved like Spanish fly. On that basis I should like to thank censors, especially the self-appointed, for helping me write. I love them all. After all, as they must recognise, we hate most in others what we can't admit about ourselves.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
28 May 2001

Introduction To Alone With The Horrors: "So Far"

Some horror stories are not ghost stories, and some ghost stories are not horror stories, but these terms have often been used interchangeably since long before I was born. I'm in favour of this. Many horror stories communicate awe as well as (sometimes instead of) shock, and it is surely inadequate to lump these stories together with fiction that seeks only to disgust, in a category regarded as the deplorable relative of the ghost story. Quite a few of the stories collected herein are ghost stories, and I hope that at least some of the others offer a little of the quality that has always appealed to me in the best horror fiction, a sense of something larger than is shown.

In 1991 I'd been in print for thirty years, and had these thirty-seven tales to show for them—at least, these are most of the ones my editor at Arkham House, the late Jim Turner, and I thought were representative. One of Jim's criteria was that the contents should be stuff only I could have written, a flattering notion that excluded such tales as The Guide, which otherwise I would have put in. For the record, the book incorporates my British collection Dark Feasts, with the solitary exception of The Whining, no significant loss.

I've made one substitution. Previous editions of Alone with the Horrors have led off with The Room in the Castle, my earliest tale to be professionally published. The idea was to show how I began. Here instead is something rarer to perform the same service. It too dates from when I was doing my best to imitate Lovecraft, but The Tower from Yuggoth (1961) demonstrates how I fared before August Derleth took me under his editorial wing. It was published in Goudy, a fanzine edited by my friend Pat Kearney, who later wrote a greenbacked history of Olympia Press. It was illustrated by Eddie Jones, another old friend but sadly a late one. At the time it felt very much like the start of my career as a writer; now it looks more like a phase I needed Derleth to rescue me from. At least it's eldritch —it keeps saying as much—and it also offers cackling trees and curse-muttering streams. The reader may end up knowing how they felt, and my notion of how Massachusetts rustics spoke may also be productive of a shudder. Had I conjured him up from his essential salts for an opinion, Lovecraft would undoubtedly have pointed out these excesses and many other flaws. And watch out for those peculiar erections in the woods! I used the term in utter innocence, not then having experienced any of them while awake. No doubt a Christian Brotherly promise of hell if one encouraged such developments helped.

Substantially rewritten as The Mine on Yuggoth, the story appeared in The Inhabitant of the Lake, my first published book. In 1964 I was several kinds of lucky to find a publisher, and one kind depended on my having written a Lovecraftian book for Arkham House, the only publisher likely even to have considered it and one of the very few then to be publishing horror. In those days one had time to read everything that was appearing in the field, even the bad stuff, of which there seems to have been proportionately less than now, but I'll rant about this situation later. Suffice it for the moment to say that much of even the best new work—Matheson, Aickman, Leiber, Kirk, as vastly different examples—" being published with less of a fanfare than it deserved.

I mentioned imitation. I've made this point elsewhere, and I do my best not to repeat myself, but this bears repeating: there is nothing wrong with learning your craft by imitation while you discover what you want to write about. In other fields imitation isn't, so far as I know, even an issue. It's common for painters to learn by creating studies of their predecessors' work. Beethoven's first symphony sounds like Haydn, Wagner's symphony sounds like Beethoven, Richard Strauss's first opera sounds remarkably Wagnerian, and there's an early symphonic poem by Bartok that sounds very much like Richard Strauss, but who could mistake the mature work of these composers for the music of anyone else? In my smaller way, once I'd filled a book with my attempts to be Lovecraft I was determined to sound like myself, and Alone with the Horrors may stand as a record of the first thirty years of that process.

In 1964 I took some faltering steps away from Lovecraft and kept fleeing back to him. Among the products of this was The Successor, one of several tales I found so unsatisfactory that I rewrote them from scratch some years later. In this case the result was Cold Print (1966/67), whose protagonist was to some extent based on a Civil Service colleague who did indeed ask to borrow my exciting (Olympia Press) books but found Genet dull as ditchwater, in the old phrase. I had also just read the first edition of Robin Wood's great book on Hitchcock's films, hence the way the tale accuses the reader of wanting the coda, as though I hadn't wanted it myself.

Another 1964 first draft was The Reshaping of Rossiter, a clumsy piece rewritten in 1967 as The Scar. Looking back, I'm struck by how even at that age I was able to create a believable nuclear family from observation, though certainly not of my own domestic background. Perhaps I can also claim to have been writing about child abuse long before it became a fashionable theme in horror fiction. Certainly the vulnerability of children is one of my recurring themes.

I had my first go at The Interloper in 1963 and a fresh one in 1968. In the first version the boy tells his tale to a child psychiatrist who proves to be the creature of the title. My memory is that the psychiatrist was none too convincing a character, even though I was taken to see one at the age of seven or so, apparently because I rolled my eyes a lot and suffered from night terrors. By contrast, the final draft of the tale was a strange kind of revenge on the sort of schooling I'd had to suffer at the hands of Christian Brothers and their lay staff (not all of either, I should add—Ray Thomas, my last English teacher, had a genius for communicating his love of the language and literature); the incident involving the teacher and the poetry notebook actually happened, and the red-haired mathematics teacher was fully as much of a stool as I portray, though the book in question was the first draft of The Inhabitant of the Lake.

All this rewriting, and other examples too, had made me surer of myself. The Guy (1968) saw just one draft. It was an attempt to use the traditional British ghost story to address social themes. Geoff Ryman has suggested that M. R. James's ghosts were attempts to ignore the real terrors of life; whatever the truth of that, I saw increasingly less reason why my stories should (though it can be argued that my Lovecraft imitations did). My tales were becoming more autobiographical, and The End of a Summer's Day (1968) has its roots in a very similar bus trip I took to such a cave with my ex-fiancée of the previous year. I've heard quite a few interpretations of the story. For the record, I've always taken the man in the cave to be a projection of Maria's fears about her husband, which of course doesn't mean the encounter can be explained away.

The Chicago and San Francisco tales of Fritz Leiber were now my models in various ways. I wanted to achieve that sense of supernatural terror which derives from the everyday urban landscape rather than invading it, and I greatly admired—still do—how Fritz wrote thoroughly contemporary weird tales that were nevertheless rooted in the best traditions of the field and drew some of their strength from uniting British and American influences. One of mine in which I used an actual Liverpool location—The Man in the Underpass—has a special significance for me: it was the first tale I wrote after having, encouraged by T. E. D. Klein's exegesis of Demons by Daylight and by my wife, Jenny, stepped into the abyss of full-time writing in July 1973. To begin with I wrote only on weekdays. Lord, did I need to learn.

The Companion dates from later that year, and is set in New Brighton, just along the coast from me as I write, in all but name. The town did indeed contain two fairgrounds, one derelict, for a while, but I fiddled with the geography a little for the purposes of the narrative. Of all my old stories—there are many—that I keep being tempted to tinker with, this may well be the most frustrating. The second half seems effective enough to make me wish I could purge the earlier section of clumsiness. Damon Knight looked at the story for Orbit and declared that he didn't know what was going on in it half the time. I admit it was one of those tales it seemed more important to write than to understand, but then ever since my first viewing of Last Year in Marienbad I've felt that an enigma can be more satisfying than any solution. Too many horror stories, films in particular, strike me as weighed down by explanation.

Admittedly there's nothing enigmatic about Call First or Heading Home, both from early 1974. They're perhaps the best of a handful of pieces written for a Marvel comic that originally proposed to print terse tales of traditional terrors with a twist as text 'twixt the strips. By the time this proved not to be, I'd had fun writing stories in emulation of the EC horror comics of the fifties. I've long felt that a story that ends with a twist needs to be rewarding even if you foresee the end, and I hope that's true of this pair.

In the Bag (1974) is a ghost story I submitted to the Times ghost story competition, though it wasn't written with that in mind. I rather hoped it might appear in the anthology derived from the competition, but the judges (Kingsley Amis, Patricia Highsmith, and Christopher Lee) must have decided otherwise. However, it did gain me my first British Fantasy Award. As David Drake has pointed out, the punning title is inappropriately jokey —a lingering effect of writing the horror-comic tales, perhaps—but I try not to cheat my readers by changing titles once a story has been published.

Baby (1974) is set around Granby Street in Liverpool, later one of the locations for The Doll Who Ate His Mother. It owes its presence in this book to my good friend J. K. Potter, who designed and illustrated the Arkham House edition. He expressed amazement that Jim Turner and I had omitted the tale, and provided an image to justify his enthusiasm.

The Chimney (1975) is disguised autobiography—disguised from me at the time of writing, that is. Was it while reading it aloud at Jack Sullivan's apartment in New York that I became aware of its subtext? It was certainly under those circumstances that I discovered how funny a story it was, though the laughter died well before the end. Robert Aickman described it as the best tale of mine that he'd read, but his correspondence with Cherry Wilder betrays how little he meant by that. Still, it gained me my first World Fantasy Award, and Fritz Leiber told me this was announced to "great applause." Harlan Ellison (also present, I believe) had no time for it. "It was a terrible story," he wanted the readers of Comics Journal to know, "and should not have won the award."

The Brood (1976) had its origins in the view of streetlamps on Princes Avenue from the window of Jenny's and my first flat, which we later lent to the protagonists of The Face That Must Die. When my biographer, David Mathew, recently attempted to photograph me in front of the building, a tenant demanded to know what we were up to. This was one of the rare instances where I found myself assuaging someone's paranoia.

The Gap (1977) indulges my fondness for jigsaws. You'll find me playing cards and Monopoly too, not to mention Nim, at which only my daughter can beat me. Role-playing games (I leave aside the erotic variety) have never tempted me, however, though in my inadvertent way I generated a book of them (Ramsey Campbell's Goatswood) published by Chaosium. As for the tale, it depressed Charles L. Grant too much for him to publish, although he did anthologise some of the others herein.

The Voice of the Beach (1977) was my first concerted attempt to achieve a modicum of Lovecraft's cosmic terror by returning to the principles that led him to create his mythos. The setting is a hallucinated version of the coast of Freshfield, a nature reserve almost facing my workroom window across the Mersey. Recently I made a book-length attempt at the Lovecraftian in The Darkest Part of the Woods. I continue to believe that the finest modern Lovecraftian work of fiction—in its documentary approach, its use of hints and allusions to build up a sense of supernatural dread, and the psychological realism of its characters—is The Blair Witch Project.

Out of Copyright (1977) had no specific anthologist in mind, but Ray Bradbury thought it did, and enthused about it on that basis. Above the World (1977) derived much of its imagery and setting from my one wholly positive, not to mention visionary, LSD experience. The hotel is the very one where Jenny and I spent our belated honeymoon and some other holidays. In the early nineties, a short independent film, Return to Love, was based on the story, though without reading the final credits you mightn't realise; indeed, the title gives fair warning. Mackintosh Willy (1977) was suggested by graffiti within a concrete shelter in the very park the story uses. When I approached I saw that the letters in fact spelled MACK TOSH WILLY. Close by was an area of new concrete, roped off but with the footprints of some scamp embedded in it, and these two elements gave birth to the tale. When J. K. and I were visiting Liverpool locations for the first edition of this book I took him to the shelter, but alas, the legend had been erased from it.

The entire location of The Show Goes On (1978)—the cinema, I mean—is no more. It was the Hippodrome in Liverpool, and I thought I'd failed to do it justice in an earlier tale,The Dark Show. It was built as a music hall, and behind the screen was a maze of passages and dressing-rooms, as I discovered with increasing unease one night when I missed my way to a rear exit. Eventually I reached a pair of barred doors beyond which, as I tried to budge them, a dim illumination seemed to show me figures making for them. Homeless folk, very possibly—they didn't look at all well—but when, years later, I was able, as a film reviewer, to attend the last night of the cinema and explore its less public areas, I never managed to find those doors again.

Only global warming is likely to do away with the location of The Ferries (1978), though the spring tides drive small animals out of the grass onto the promenade—at least, we must hope they're small animals. Midnight Hobo (1978) also had a real setting, a bridge under a railway in Tuebrook in Liverpool. As for Roy and Derrick, they were suggested by a relationship between personnel at Radio Merseyside: Roy was my old producer Tony Wolfe, and Derrick—well, I really mustn't say. Roy's grisly interview with the starlet was based pretty closely on one I had to conduct with a member of the cast of a seventies British sex comedy. According to the Internet Movie Database, she made one more film.

Angela Carter has suggested that the horror story is a holiday from morality. It often is, especially when it uses the idea of supernatural evil as an alibi for horrors we are quite capable of perpetrating ourselves, but it needn't be, as I hope The Depths (1978) and others of my tales confirm. I've always thought of this one as a companion piece to my novel The Nameless. Jaume Balaguero's fine film demonstrates how much of that can be stripped away, but I think the central metaphor of giving up your name and with it your responsibility for your actions and your right to choose is more timely than ever—indeed, perhaps it's time I wrote about it again. The Depths is concerned with the process of demonisation, another way of finding someone else to blame. I'm sure I'm guilty of it myself; the worst writing in my field gives me any number of excuses.

Down There (1978) very nearly joined my other unfinished short stories. I tried to write it when our daughter was just a few weeks old. I felt compelled to write even under those circumstances, but my imagination couldn't grasp the material for several days. I was about to abandon the effort when the image of a fire escape viewed from above in the rain came alive, and so did the tale. The early pages of the first draft had to be taken apart and thoroughly reworked, but there's no harm in that—in fact, it has become increasingly my way. Alas, it wasn't when I wrote The Companion.

With a little more sexual explicitness The Fit (1979) might have found a place in Scared Stiff (two stories from which have been deleted from the present book, but you can find them in the expanded Tor edition of my tales of sex and death). Whereas those stories explore what happens to the horror story if sexual themes become overt, The Fit may be said to squint at the effects of Freudian knowingness. Fanny Cave indeed! I'd originally written

The Depths for my anthology New Terrors, but when Andrew J. Offutt sent in a story that seemed to share the theme, I wrote The Fit as a substitute for mine.

My memory suggests that Hearing is Believing (1979) was an attempt to write about a haunting by a single sense. The Hands (1980) came out of an encounter in the street with a lady bearing a clipboard. I'm reminded of the slogan on the British poster for Devils of Monza: "She was no ordinary nun." Indeed, the real lady wasn't one at all—I suppose some lingering Catholicism effected the transformation for the purposes of the tale. This seems as good a point as any to mention my forthcoming novel Spanked by Nuns.

Again (1980) appeared in the Twilight Zone magazine under T. E. D. Klein's editorship, although I gather Rod Serling's widow took some persuading. One British journal found the tale too disturbing to publish, while a British Sunday newspaper magazine dismissed it as "not horrid enough." Who would have expected Catherine Morland to take up editing? The story saw a powerful graphic adaptation by Michael Zulli in the adult comic Taboo, which was apparently one reason why the publication was and perhaps still is liable to be seized by British Customs.

Two novels occupied my time for the next three years, to the exclusion of any other fiction. While picnicking with the family in Delamere Forest to celebrate having finished Incarnate I thought of the basis for "Just Waiting (1983), and the genesis of a new short story felt like a celebration too. My touch here and in Seeing the World (1983) is lighter than it used to be, or so I like to think. That doesn't mean what's lit up isn't still dark.

Old Clothes (1983) was an attempt to develop the notion of apports. I'm as loath as Lovecraft ever was to use stale occult ideas, but I think this one let me have some fun. In 1984 Alan Ryan asked me for a new Halloween story, and Apples was the result. It became the occasion of one of my more memorable encounters with a copy-editor, though only after the American edition had respected my text. The British paperback version of the tale proved to have suffered something like a hundred changes. The excellent Nick Webb, the managing director of Sphere, had the edition withdrawn and pulped. Had I not written Out of Copyright by then, I might well have turned it into a tale about a copy editor. Of course not all such folk are interfering bloody fools, but perhaps an example of what befell Apples is in order. Where I'd written:

> His dad and mum were like that, they were teachers and tried to make him friends at our school they taught at, boys who didn't like getting dirty and always had combs and handkerchiefs.

The copy editor thought I should have written

> His mum and dad were like that. They were teachers and tried to make friends for him at our school, where they taught boys who didn't like getting dirty and always had combs and handkerchiefs.

I rest my case, and my head.

The Other Side (1985) was an attempt to equal the surrealism of J. K. Potter's picture on which it was based. The last thing I wanted to do was end the story with his image, since the combination would have had much the same effect as the infamous Weird Tales illustration that gave away one of Lovecraft's best endings. The image can be found on page 97 of J. Kidd's superb Paper Tiger collection Horripilations, which also contains (among much else) his illustrations for the aborted limited edition of The Influence.

Kathryn Cramer asked me to write a story in which the building in which it took place would (I may be paraphrasing) itself figure as a character. She certainly didn't mean her letter to potential contributors to be disconcerting, but she pointed to several stories of mine as epitomising her theme, which made me feel expected to imitate myself and daunted by the task. I struggled to come up with an idea until circumstances gave me one, as happens often enough to let me believe in synchronicity. The Campbell family had just moved into the house in which I now write, but we hadn't yet sold the previous one, to which I daily walked. I forget how long it took me to notice that here was the germ of Where the Heart Is (1986).

Boiled Alive (1986)—a title I hoped folk would recognise was meant to be intemperate—" also conceived in response to an invitation, this time from David Pringle of Interzone. When I try to write science fiction my style generally stiffens up, and so I attempted to be ungenerically offbeat instead. That isn't to say I don't think it's a horror story: I think all the stories in this collection are. I'd certainly call Another World (1987) one, and it too was invited, by Paul Gamble ("Gamma") when he worked for Forbidden Planet in London. His idea was an anthology of tales on the theme of a forbidden planet, though when Roz Kaveney took over the editorship she chose stories simply on the basis that the author had signed at the bookshop. I had, but I cleaved to the theme as well.

As for End of the Line (1991), what can I say? It is, but may also have begun a lighter style of comedy in my stuff. Whatever the tone, though, it's still pretty dark in here. I hope the jokes are inextricable from the terror. However, it was less with laughter than with a sneer that a hypnotist who claimed to reawaken people's memories of their past lives once advised me to study his career for when I "started writing seriously," rather as if those responsible for The Amityville Horror had accused, say, Shirley Jackson of having her tongue in her cheek when she wrote The Haunting of Hill House. I see no reason why dealing with the fantastic requires one to write bullshit, and I submit this collection as evidence.

In the thirty years covered by this book I saw horror fiction become enormously more popular and luxuriant. I use the last word, as tends to be my way with words, for its ambiguity. There's certainly something to be said in favour of the growth of a field which has produced so many good new writers and so much good writing. One of its appeals to me, ever since I became aware of the tales of M. R. James, is the way the best work achieves its effects through the use of style, the selection of language. On the other hand, the field has sprouted writers whose fiction I can best describe as Janet and John primers of mutilation, where the length of the sentences, paragraphs, and chapters betrays the maximum attention span of either the audience or the writer or more probably both. There are also quite a bunch of writers with more pretensions whose basic drive appears to be to outdo one another in disgustingness. "It is very easy to be nauseating," M. R. James wrote more than sixty years ago, and the evidence is all around us. However, I hope that in time the genre will return to the mainstream, where it came from and where it belongs.

What to do? Nothing, really, except keep writing and wait for the verdict of history. The field is big enough for everyone, after all. I came into it because I wanted to repay some of the pleasure it had given me—particularly the work of those writers who, as David Aylward put it, "used to strive for awe"—and I stay in it because it allows me to talk about whatever themes I want to address and because I have by no means found its limits. Perhaps in the next thirty years, but I rather hope not. I like to think my best story is the one I haven't written yet, and that's why I continue to write.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
1 December 2002

Introduction to Told By The Dead: "Ramsey Campbell Is The Best Of Us All", an introduction by Poppy Z. Brite

But you needn't take my word for it. The Internet is full of amusing fads. A recent one is the search engine Googlism (www.googlism.com) where you can plug in the name of a person, place, or thing and get back a list of results in the form of simple declarative sentences: a sort of sampling of the Mass Mind. Most subjects will yield a mixture of responses favourable and unfavourable, some funny, some catty, some just plain mean. Only when I plugged in the name 'Ramsey Campbell' did the engine refuse to spit out a single nasty response.

> "Ramsey Campbell is one of the most respected writers in the horror genre"
>
> "Ramsey Campbell is such an acclaimed writer"
>
> "Ramsey Campbell is highly regarded for his sensitive use of the language and his ability to create psychologically"
>
> "Ramsey Campbell is one of the finest exponents of the classic British ghost story"
>
> "Ramsey Campbell is not always a nice place"
>
> "Ramsey Campbell is the best of us all"

That last one really seems to sum it up. I don't mean to suggest that Campbell appeals to everyone—you can always go on Usenet and find some bewildered soul complaining, "I just don't get him" but I don't recall meeting another writer of dark fiction who didn't at least admire him. Way back in 1979, when Campbell had published two novels and a good number of short stories, Stephen King devoted a section of his horror overview Danse Macabre to Ramsey Campbell's work. "Good stuff," he wrote. "But strange; so uniquely Campbell that it might as well be trademarked." No other writer has a voice like Ramsey Campbell's; though he seldom repeats himself, and has grown tremendously as a writer since his early publications, he has maintained a coherent, instantly recognisable voice.

The present collection, Told by the Dead, spans most of his career. The earliest story here ('The Previous Tenant') was written in 1968, the latest ('Tatters', The Retrospective' and 'All For Sale') in 2001. There is a collaboration, 'Little Ones', written with his wife Jenny; though many writers consider their spouses or partners "collaborators" in some sense, it's rare (and interesting) to see a story actually penned by husband and wife.

The book opens with a recent story, 'Return Journey', which may seem like a fairly straightforward horror tale unless you know it's being written by an author born a year after the second World War's end and raised in a city (Liverpool) that still bore the terrible scars of wartime bombing. The image of children ducking into a burial vault during an air raid suggests resilience —life in the midst of death—but the protagonist is ultimately not to be saved from the long arm of the war. The story contains what must be one of the loneliest definitions of adulthood ever written:

> Her parents couldn't keep her safe now; they had never appeared when she'd called out to them in the night to prove they were still somewhere.

Much of Campbell's recent work, in particular, has contained a menacing humour that can make the reader nearly as uncomfortable as the characters. It's seen in several stories here: 'No Story In It', about the futility of the writing life and the terror of trying to care for a family on an author's dwindling income; 'Becoming Visible', which employs Campbell's genius for the paranoid protagonist perhaps first seen in The Face That Must Die (the narrator's imagined description of a rich man's wife—"bristling with jewels and doused in perfume to cover up her smell, her hair glossy as hot tar, the valley of her flesh bared in front of her"—is particularly toothsome); 'The Word', which combines a cruelly accurate send-up of the convention scene with a Salieri-like older writer's hatred for a young, ridiculously successful one.

(I should mention that I had the pleasure of hearing Campbell read 'No Story In It' at Spookycon in San Francisco six weeks before writing this, and I truly think he is the best reader I've ever heard. Particularly when reading one of the blackly humorous stories, his vocal interpretation adds new depths to the material; If you ever have a chance to attend a Campbell reading, don't miss it.)

Ramsey Campbell has never made a secret of his affection for H.P. Lovecraft, and the New Englander casts his gaunt shadow over several stories here, most notably 'Never To Be Heard'. This recent story about an occult symphony being performed in a church at Easter (also the vernal equinox, the pagan season of rebirth) is Lovecraftian in its focus on terrible mysteries never meant to be revealed, and on the irresistible human impulse to reveal them. Campbell's stroke of genius—something Lovecraft wouldn't have thought of and probably couldn't have pulled off if he had—is in telling the story from the point of view of a pre-pubescent choirboy, one of those performing the symphony. The boy's awakening sexuality seems to make him particularly vulnerable to the insidious effects of the music. The Lovecraftian influence is also evident in 'Slow', a 1975 horror story with science fiction trappings and a monster that—like Lovecraft's "rugose cones"—neither the protagonist nor the reader is sure whether to laugh at or fear. A more surprising influence it suggested in 'Dead Letters', a 1974 tale that put this reader in mind of those short, sharp shockers Robert Bloch wrote during the 1950s and '60s.

Along with the aforementioned 'No Story In It', 'No End of Fun' explores the horror of redundancy, impotence, and uselessness that crops up often in Campbell's recent work. In 'No End of Fun' the sense of redundancy seems to be a payback for a childhood act of brutality. Lionel, a retiree of indeterminate age, forced his female cousin into a frightening semi-sexual situation when they were adolescents. Now his fantasies seem to have condemned the deceased cousin to a hellish version of that same situation. Lionel discovers this when he comes to live in her home, now a boarding house run by her daughter and her daughter's daughter, neither of whom has much time for Lionel. The cousins fate is nasty, but the most painful part of the story is the dialogue between Lionel and his younger relatives: his increasingly desperate overtures, their weary rebuffs. One gets the feeling his whole life has been like this—in cosmic retaliation for one act of cruelty, or simply because he's the sort of person who invites such treatment: Campbell leaves it up to us.

Written in 1973, 'Accident Zone' might be viewed as a precursor of the modern (and mostly media-manufactured) phenomenon of "road rage."

More interestingly, it's a twist on the idea of "bad spots" that have been reported by paranormal chroniclers from T.C. Lethbridge to Colin Wilson. Lethbridge wrote of a seaside cliff in Devon where he and his wife experienced sudden, inexplicable feelings of depression, and where his wife felt some unseen force urging her to jump. Later they learned that a man had leapt to his death from that very spot. Lethbridge theorised that the extreme dampness of the spot somehow created a magnetic field upon which strong emotions could be 'recorded'. The water droplets that figure prominently in 'Accident Zone', as well as the fact that the story is set in England's Lake District, suggest that Campbell may have had this theory in mind.

There isn't a weak story in Told by the Dead, but 'The Retrospective' is probably one of the finest and most disturbing tales Campbell has ever written. (It's also one of the most recent, written in 2001.) Trent, a Type-A architect with little time for anything beyond his career, has an unplanned travel delay in the town where he grew up. He decides to visit his elderly parents, whom he has neglected badly, and finds them confused and helpless. Rather than staying to make things right, Trent cuts short the uncomfortable visit and goes to investigate a new museum of the town's history. The visit home is a heartbreaking exaggeration of the truism that childhood's important sites always turn out to be smaller and more squalid than one remembers, and the museum is a horrible, horrible inversion of that truism, where everything is stretched out, overstated, made abnormal and grotesque. The final paragraph brings the horror home to Trent in a way that won't soon be forgotten by anyone who has ever tried to rise above his past, only to find that its fingers are longer and stickier than he had imagined.

Because he is able to do things like this—because he can horrify us in a way that touches not just our brains or our viscera, but our souls—Ramsey Campbell truly is the best of us all, and his own best is well represented in this collection. As my husband once said, "Ramsey's great—as a writer, as a friend, as a pervert." These stories may be Told by the Dead, but I hope Campbell will be alive and telling more for a long, long time.

Poppy Z. Brite
New Orleans
February 2003

Afterword to Told By The Dead

Did this book live up to its title? In time it will, of course. Who knows, perhaps the odd tale may even survive me as a reprint, and until then I won't know if I'll know. Let me chase away some of the shadows. Everything I write, even this, can be seen as the work of a past self-—dead, if you like, though I'd prefer to regard all those personalities as having helped to make me whatever I am. Certainly I find the experience of reading my old or even not so old stuff increasingly strange: it's like encountering it for the first time, and from someone else's pen. As I sort through these performances in the order of writing, we'll see what memories they rouse.

The Previous Tenant dates from 1968, the year before I met my wife. I'd recently completed Demons by Daylight, my first real book, and this story followed. I seem to have felt the need to experiment further (to overcome my sense of having reached an end with Demons) rather than consolidate what I'd learned so far. Presumably that's why I denied the characters names. I later saw that the story recalled The Beckoning Fair One, which I'd read when I was too young to appreciate its subtleties. On the other hand, I've no idea where the central relationship came from except the depths of my head.

Besides meeting Jenny in 1969, I began to review films for the BBC. I'd already been writing about them for years, mainly horror, after my friend Harry Nadler urged me to. He loved the cinema of the fantastic as much as I did, and used reviews of mine in Alien and later in L'Incroyable Cinema, both of which he co-edited in Manchester. Among much else, he was responsible for my first encounter with Fritz Lang's Metropolis. It was entirely typical of Harry that when he learned I hadn't seen the film, he invited me back to the house where he lived with his mother and proceeded to screen it with an 8mm projector in ten-minute reels on his bedroom wall.

Well, I digress. I may well again in the course of this piece. After the Queen (1969) was based on an idea by John Owen of LiG, the Liverpool science fiction group. As Frank Mace he wrote The Ideal Type in Dark Mind, Dark Heart, and The Cuckoo Clock in London Mystery Magazine. The latter journal deftly bought all rights by hiding its contract on the back of the cheque. Though I'm sure John is too seasoned to fall for that now, he didn't realise that the tale had been filmed for Alfred Hitchcock Presents (adapted by Robert Bloch, no less) until Universal contacted him decades later to inform him it was being remade. It was John who introduced me to Val Lewton's magnificently suggestive horror films, along with the music of Villa-Lobos and Milhaud, and John Collier's splendid novel Defy the Foul Fiend. As for After the Queen, the setting is based on a real cinema, the Woolton, one of the few suburban Liverpool cinemas not to close in the sixties or seventies.

The Last Hand (1969) also recalls LiG. For years we had our clubroom at 69A Bold Street, above Helen's Leather Goods, an upstairs business capable of various interpretations. Eventually we were cast out, perhaps because Helen valued privacy on Monday nights, and instead met on Sundays at the house of Norman and Ina Shorrock—one of many reasons for the dedication of this book. They set me appreciating good food and wine—Ina wouldn't leave anyone unfed, and Norman never let a glass stay empty in anyone's hand. I often said that he'd lent me his nose, and Jenny that he had a lovely one. More often than not we played cards—chemin de fer, brag, puddle (Jenny's innovation), knockout whist, ranter go round, many variations of poker... Players included Norman Weedall (the late great wine-maker and collector of Weird Tales), Eddie Jones (who illustrated my first published story and the cover of Demons by Daylight and any amount of science fiction but died in poverty, alas) and, if he was visiting, Phil Rogers (who specified that at his funeral the coffin should be carried off to the strains of the Radetsky March, and so it was). John Roles tended to sit out the games, though he was the only person other than my daughter who could beat me at Nim, which John and I first saw in Last Year in Marienbad. A bookseller and creator of the fanzine Morph, one issue of which made history by being edible, he was strangled to death at his home in June 1999 by a postcard collector and charity worker, Andrew John Swift. John's bookshop suggested the one in Cold Print, and he introduced me to the actual setting of The Cellars. Neither tale is in this book, of course, and so I'd better regain some relevance by mentioning that on trains to science fiction conventions the assembled gamblers of LiG fell to cards. Without this I'm sure The Last Hand would never have occurred to me.

The Worst Fog of the Year (1970) was suggested by the experience of watching films at press shows, still the best way to avoid the distractions of an audience—the stench of their popcorn, the shrilling of their mobile phones, the mutter of their commentaries or conversation. The story first appeared in the British Fantasy Society's journal Dark Horizons. Karl Edward Wagner let me know that he would use it in Year's Best Horror Stories if the ending were less jokey, and I made it so. Both endings appear in this book, in case you didn't notice.

For several years Jenny and I spent our summer holidays in Cumbria, generally in the hotel that figures in Above the World (not included here), Accident Zone (1973) derives from some of our walks. The different views of the landscape the two stories take can be ascribed at least partly to the effects of LSD. When I wrote Accident Zone those experiences were a couple of years in the future. My agent Kirby McCauley found the tale "slow and not very attention getting", and I'm inclined to agree with him. Still, enough readers have found something in it to give me an excuse to reprint it here.

I don't generally use friends as characters. In Dead Letters (1974) I gave two of the cast the first names of stalwarts of LiG, Stan and Marge Nuttall, but none of their characteristics. I hope they were amused. The story was one of a bunch I wrote in emulation of the notorious but subsequently celebrated EC horror comics of the fifties. The market the stories were meant for had second thoughts about buying prose fiction, and they found a home elsewhere. I also wrote some science fiction, my agent having advised me to try, but my style and imagination tended to stiffen at the challenge. Slow (1975) was the last attempt, and relatively sure of itself.

In 1990 I was one of six diners in The Horror Café, a special extended edition of a BBC television arts programme. Also round the table were Pete Atkins, Clive Barker, John Carpenter, Roger Corman and Lisa Tuttle. As we ate and drank we discussed horror. I recall surprising Clive, the elected host, by suggesting that my tales celebrated the unknown—and eventually improvised a round-robin story. At the end of one of his contributions John Carpenter left me to pick up a concept in quantum physics. "Fuck you, John," I was heard to respond, though not in the broadcast version, edited down from three hours to half the length. True to my constitution, I'd taken every opportunity to eat and drink whatever was on offer, an attitude that drew praise from the television reviewer Nancy Banks Smith. When at last the cameras stopped rolling it proved to be Roger Corman's birthday, and much champagne was quaffed. The next day I sat very still for not much less than an eternity outside Euston Station before forcing myself onto a train for Liverpool to sit even stiller. Later that year the Radio Times approached me to put the round robin into publishable form to help promote the broadcast, but whoever commissioned the tale felt I hadn't done justice to the material. Is Facing It fun in its own right? You'll have judged for yourself.

The Word (1993) owes its existence to Douglas E, Winter, the spectacularly talented author of Run. Doug conceived an anthology of tales that would span the last century, one long story to a decade. That much I'm sure of, and memory suggests Steve King was originally to evoke the sixties, but wasn't the underlying theme to be a revelation brought down a mountain? I could swear that's why I included it in my piece. For the rest I leave interpretation to the reader, but I'm reminded that I once attracted some hostility with an article on science fiction conventions in Blazon, the journal of the Knights of St Fanthony. It was the idea of the editor, Eric Bentcliffe ("Eric the Bent"), who originally asked me to read the early work of John W. Campbell Jr in order to vilify it. I'd earned a reputation for controversy, but if people thought I would produce it on demand, it was time to think again.

Little Ones (1996) was written in collaboration with Jenny; that is, for once the shared authorship was made plain. My writing from 1969 onwards owes an increasing amount to her and eventually to Tammy and Matt as well. Of course not only the writing does; much of the best of me comes from them. When Little Ones appeared in print in an anthology of collaborations between partners it was preceded by our comments, and here they are.

> "When Ramsey spoke of a collaboration, my mind went back to when I had a provisional licence previous to passing my driving test, and needed a qualified driver to sit in with me. I'm glad to say that this experience was a much better one than that.
>
> "It brought home to me the sheer professionalism of Ramsey—his ability to return to a story and hone it over an extended period of time as opposed to ray short period of concentrated effort followed by a triumphant 'It's done!'
>
> "On the debit side some changes he made to my original I would have argued against if time and the pressure of work had allowed. Maybe next time..."

> "As so often, Jenny overrates me and underrates herself. I'd say we have collaborated on virtually all the fiction I've written since we met twenty-eight years ago. She's my first editor, the person who reads my initial drafts and makes suggestions and criticisms. Only she could, because she's the only person who can read the handwriting. Mind you, hers is as bad as mine. She had to tell me that Gill's mysterious possession in our story, a plonte quane, was in fact a plaster gnome.
>
> "Jenny's teaching background often figures in my stuff, and even if I wrote some of the details about teaching in the present tale, they're really all hers. I used her story as a first draft and worked at the motivations until I believed in them. Our readers can play at deciding which of us wrote which scenes and which sentences. Jenny and I are so close that I'll bet we fool you. That's love and marriage."

Twice by Fire (1997) was commissioned for an anthology of tales about James O'Barr's creation, the Crow. I see now that it's a sufficiently universal concept that I didn't need to set it in America. I can only hope that aspect isn't too unconvincing, though I'm by no means as good at producing an American voice as Pete Crowther or Pete Atkins or, before them, my follow Wirralian Eric Frank Russell. From the same year, Never to be Heard was another commission, based on a painting by Alan M. Clark. His image helped focus my ambition to write a decent story about music. I was indeed in the choir at grammar school and had to mouth rather than sing when we performed Borodin.

Agatha's Ghost also dates from 1997. I'm dismayed to have to report that I didn't invent the advice Agatha is offered on the air; I heard a lady much like her being told on a Radio Merseyside phone-in to try those solutions—hence the tale. Usually the programme doesn't insult the intelligence. Far worse, to the extent of being horribly fascinating, is Trisha, a British television show very much like Jerry Springer with a veneer of concern. Couples and families rant onstage while the audience jeers and the viewer at home is trapped into feeling superior to them all. To quote an actual subtitle from 19 November 2002: "This family is on self-destruct. What will happen by the end of the show? Don't miss it!" Further drama is always promised "after the break", during DESPERATE MOTHER v DYING DAUGHTERS on 2 December 2002, for instance). You see how guiltily obsessed I am. Body language readers and relationship therapists are often trotted out, but the show's most basic appeal involves lie detectors and DNA tests (neither as reliable as Trisha Goddard wants us to think). "Is he the baby's father? Find out after the break!" It's unnerving when reality catches up with my fiction and I can't invent anything worse, but the reality is one reason why I write.

In 1998 I found time to write four short stories, and they're all in here. Return Journey was suggested by a trip to Llangollen, where a vintage railway had been dressed up as a wartime ride for the weekend. The Entertainment contains echoes of Robert Aickman's The Hospice but is its own tale, I hope, not least in its knockabout and its nervousness about growing old. Aickman professed to find some worth in my stuff, or at least implied as much. His correspondence with the late Cherry Wilder betrays the truth.

No Strings was written for Michele Slung's anthology about strangers, but she found it insufficiently strange. I'm not complaining - without her invitation the story would never have existed, and it has done well for itself. Becoming Visible derives from an incident where I lost my temper with a salesman on the telephone, who did indeed make the mistake of enquiring why I didn't want to buy whatever product he wanted to sell. For some weeks after this he kept making deranged calls to the house, and alas, I couldn't remember the name of the firm he had originally identified. Eventually he went away, leaving me with a story idea. As you see, ideas can be the easy part—indeed, I've more of those in my notebooks than I'm likely to have time to develop.

No Story in It (1999) was the second tale I wrote around an image by Alan Clark—the one that haunts the writer in the tale. I had the late John Brunner at the back of my mind, having recently written a memoir of him (which can be found in my non-fiction book Ramsey Campbell, Probably). While the unlucky protagonist isn't meant to be him, I fear John would have sympathised with many of his experiences. This was one of several tales of mine to be found wanting on a web site where someone criticises horror fiction from the safety of a pseudonym, a rather asinine genre enterprise. The masked reviewer comments about the story "A difficult read in that I was unable to firmly grasp what might be happening an (sic) any given moment. The dialogue was barely coherent as was the plot at times and the final resolution, quite hollow. I've never been happy or impressed by anything has (sic) Campbell has done, sometimes I wonder why I even bother." Well, quite, not least since the review (dark green typeface on a black background) is barely legible. I suppose I shall just have to live with not being admired by a Guy N. Smith fan that thinks M. R. James wrote The Jolly Corner.

1999 also produced Worse than Bones. As far as I'm concerned, inscriptions in second-hand books are a bonus. 2000 saw me complete just one short story, No End of Fun, a tribute to a J. K. Potter picture (the mirror, of course, though his image isn't of a mirror). Then came 2001, which felt like living in science fiction, especially to someone old enough to have seen the film originally in Cinerama. I found it a productive year for my short stories; only half of its crop is included here. Tatters came from a reference on Radio 3 to satirical street ballads, and gave me some scope to joke. The Retrospective felt rather like a tribute to the great Thomas Ligotti, though I'm certain he would handle the notion quite differently. Because of a misunderstanding the last three words were omitted from its original publication and replaced with an ellipsis, an effect I dislike as much as M. R. James did... Here the story is complete. As for All for Sale, a street market did indeed spring up overnight around the first hotel where the family and I stayed in Turkey, and a swarthy hi-fi dealer in Tottenham Court Road once palpated my tits and declared "You are nice." Everything can be material, you see.

So I trundle to my latest conclusion. I hope this jumble of observations has been more rewarding than otherwise. For some of my readers it will revive memories; it did for me. Among the reasons I find the film Hilary and Jackie so moving (besides our daughter's youthful career as a cellist) is that the first and final scenes are shot on Freshfield Beach. Many were the summer picnics LiG and friends enjoyed there for decades. Jenny and I often still picnic there, and sometimes we return along the same path we all followed years ago. More than once I've seemed to see people walking ahead—Norman, Norman, Harry, Phil, John, Eddie—into that evening glow that feels like perfect stillness, the golden light that transforms everything into peace.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
5 April 2003

Foreword To Inconsequential Tales: "Truth Or Consequences"

I hold Ted Klein responsible, at least for my title. Ted ascribes the name of his recent Reassuring Tales to me, but you must discover the reason by reading his book, as you certainly should. However comforting the title and the author may seek to be, let me reassure you that Ted continues to display his considerable talent for terror so quiet that its whispers may go unheard by the careless reader. He's one of the absolute masters of unsettling reticence, and I wish he were more prolific. Where's that second novel? He's unreasonable about his own work in the introduction to Reassuring Tales, and perhaps self-deprecation may be inhibiting his output. As you'll see from what follows, it never stops me. Nevertheless these tales deserve the kind of criticism Ted heaped on his.

The Childish Fear was written in 1963, immediately after I'd completed The Inhabitant of the Lake and Other Unwelcome Tenants (as it was meant to be called) and a tale that read less like Lovecraft, The Stone on the Island. I'd intended Fear to fit into Inhabitant, but August Derleth thought not, finding that "it requires too much knowledge of certain films on the part of the reader to make it effective." He was right, and I should explain that Val Guest directed the first two Quatermass films. Too much of the tale is straight autobiography, even if my childhood habit of turning over stones in search of insects has some thematic relevance. I used to judge the effectiveness of horror films by how much they quickened my pulse, if they managed to. The narrator's opinions of films were all mine at seventeen years old. I disliked Them on a first viewing, although not now, and remain bored by The Blob. I shouted at noisy audiences, which would surprise them into silence the first time but not on repetition, and often sat through films twice: double bills allowed this as well as tempting some viewers to come in before the end (alas, my mother would insist on our doing so).

The tale does convey some sense of the period, when the Liverpool suburbs were still full of cinemas in their decline, and perhaps it vaguely prefigures The Show Goes On of fifteen years later.

From the same year, The Offering to the Dead appears to echo Clark Ashton Smith's An Offering to the Moon, though they have only their titles in common. Like The Stone on the Island, and just about as awkwardly, the tale does convey a naive sense of an unconsummated office romance. The clumsy introverted swain was of course the author, who did indeed pretend to be asleep if anyone (his mother) entered his room when he was abed. Alas, the prose is clumsy too, and holds the narrative at arm's length, although it has its inadvertent moments: "David found his way into a pair of her father's pyjamas," for instance, and what seems to be the thickest carpet in all literature. Radio Luxembourg was a pirate radio station of the time, and stop press reports in newspapers were printed in thick messy type. None of this took Derleth's fancy, and quite right too. "This one does nothing for me, I'm sorry," he wrote. "It seems to be in the tradition of the olde Gothick rather than in your better vein, though it's told well enough—I've no quarrel with its style, though I think you may be mixing your liking for [Henry] Miller and [William] Burroughs with your penchant for the weird, an insoluble combination, unfortunately."

The Reshaping of Rossiter (1964) is the first version of The Scar. It and its much improved rewrite were both produced for Arkham House anthologies, although they could equally well have been destined for Demons by Daylight (in which both Cold Print and The Cellars would have appeared if they hadn't already found other Arkham homes). I completely rewrote several of the Demons tales, but this is the only ur-text that was eventually published. It reads as if it was written too soon in my life, given the unconvincing details of behaviour and dialogue. The influence of Alain Resnais may explain the change of viewpoint halfway through a paragraph (an effect better used for the temporal lurches in Concussion), and the viewpoint shifts again later on, twice too often for a short story, even if Ambrose Bierce brought it off. Like the protagonist of The Moon-Lens, Rossiter at one point falls asleep because the author's imagination did, and the same can be said of the moment when Rossiter's wife faints. The urban wasteland where the finale takes place was the kind of blitzed Liverpool cityscape into which I would venture in search of cinemas, and I appear to have borrowed Rossiter's surname from the film Circus of Horrors. Initially Derleth told me that he "rather liked" the tale for Travellers by Night, although "would it not be improved by an interpolated clarifying paragraph? Many of our readers would find it written with such restraint as to be obscure to them, unmotivated, and fundamentally too puzzling."

In having reread it a month later, however, he reported that he had "decided finally against using it in Travellers by Night... Little things about it continue to bother me—the change in point-of-view midway from Rice to Rossiter, the 'disgustingly familiar' and unmotivated liquid in the cup, and the like. I fear to you these are integral, but to me they are not." They weren't to me either, as The Scar eventually went to prove, but he rejected that version for Dark Things as being unpleasant rather than horrible. I assumed this meant he would refuse it for Demons by Daylight too, and learned my mistake too late.

Having completed Demons by Daylight in 1968, I felt directionless, and it shows in quite a few of the subsequent tales. Some experiments saw print, and some, such as The Void, fell short. The French new novel hovers over this narrative, which is oblique to a fault. Shall I give a hint? Read on. There really are no simpler puzzles: literally, a Nabokovian textual secret.

1969 brought The Other House. The grey protagonist lurking at the edge of drugs and sex was of course the author himself, and the character carried off my dropped first name. His sense of how he sounds and appears to other people was mine, and in other ways too the tale reports more than it invents. The Ingmar Bergman loudly found wanting by students (at Liverpool University) was one of his greatest films, The Shame. By now Brichester hardly bothers to disguise its resemblance to Liverpool, even if I'm not sure that you could find a Chinese restaurant serving sake. Surely the first time I drank that was decades later in Japan.

1969 was the year I became the film reviewer for BBC Radio Merseyside, and it may also have been when I appalled some of the staff at Quarry Bank High School with a lecture on horror. Among the teenage audience was none other than Clive Barker. My BBC producer Tony Wolfe had me invite several of the pupils, Clive included, to discuss horror on the arts programme, and I believe Clive and I did most of the talking. I wouldn't be surprised if this recording was at the back of my mind when I wrote Broadcast, since I was still pretty nervous (unlike Clive, as I recall) of the microphone. Perhaps there's also a trace of the first radio interview I ever gave, soon after The Inhabitant of the Lake saw print. I was so befuddled to be asked why I'd used the Severn Valley as a location that I mumbled about "furtive little cottages," which became the caption under my photograph in a newspaper reprint of the interview. Of course even professional broadcasters can be panicked by the prospect of dead air.

That same year I wrote The Urge and The Sunshine Club. In the first story I made the mistake Robert Aickman thought he made with Just a Song at Twilight—writing the tale too soon after the incident that suggested it rather than taking the time to invent. The actual encounter took place in a Liverpool coffee bar, the Masque. These days I would have used the name for its thematic relevance. A timid interest in drugs may underlie the tale, and perhaps paregoric had lodged in my mind from Naked Lunch. As for The Sunshine Club, Tom Disch reviewed the anthology in which it appeared and marked the tale, I think, D-. It deserved no better.

The next couple of years were my lean ones. Two of the four tales from 1970 are here. Writer's Curse was suggested to me by a neighbour in my birthplace of Nook Rise, Hazel Carline. Her house overlooked the real pavilion, although it wasn't derelict. I can't recall whether any unpublished writers had approached me by then, although Dunn's embittered sense of entitlement rings all too true. The story belongs to the tradition of The Suitable Surroundings and The Un-namable, but is it worthy? It was called Talent until I remembered that Ted Sturgeon had used the title.

Property of the Ring was rewritten as Medusa, though you mightn't realise. I can only hope the dialogue was meant to sound pretentious. The sunlight that requires no participation may be a muffled echo from Beckett's novel Watt. The signet ring was mine, a twenty-first birthday present from my mother. Not long before her death I injured myself, and the ring had to be sawn off in hospital.

1971 was more productive—all of five stories. Night Beat suggests a first attempt to write a horror comic story with a twist in the tale. Later I discovered that Gahan Wilson had already dealt with the idea in a single Playboy cartoon. Perhaps I can comfort myself by reflecting that Steve King's Lunch at the Gotham Café reads like a nightmare variant on Monty Python's dirty fork sketch.

Later that year came The Shadows in the Barn, eventually improved as In the Shadow. It takes us back to my old Cotswold territory, although by now I'd visited the area;, perhaps that shows. This was one of the stories I submitted to the Scott Meredith Agency when they sent me a strangely impersonal invitation—a booklet about their firm accompanied by a note saying "This will express interest in your work." Once I'd followed with the stories with the fifty dollars they'd neglected to mention they required, they responded with a letter listing reasons why they couldn't sell the tales. Certainly the narrative method of The Shadows in the Barn is ineffectually conventional.

We skip ahead to 1973. I'd set out to write full time, supported—propped up, more like—by Jenny. Retrospect demonstrates how untimely my decision was. Kirby McCauley, now my agent, had to tell me that the market for short horror stories was very limited. He tried Damon Knight with The Companion, but Knight responded that he didn't know what was going on in it half the time. My solution was to lurch into science fiction as best I could. Little of it sold, but most of it is here.

The Precognitive Trip was my first attempt, and I appear not even to have sent it to Kirby. It may derive from a notion recorded in Lovecraft's commonplace book. "Berger's mind reverted, striking the present with an almost tangible blow." That's an overstated description of the kind of thoughtful trance I used to enter in my youth, when I became wholly unaware of my surroundings and would return to them with a shock. It's depicted better in my novel Thieving Fear. Elsewhere in Trip the prose gets still more out of hand: "Words she'd spoken tumbled through him, somehow linked". A car tramples someone, and "The whole of him smiled broadly" deserves a place in Thog's gallery of unfortunate writing in Ansible. The narrative traps a few potentially interesting ideas in its amber, but I've no idea why it was infected with a rash of colons. I used to lend my typescripts to my mother (most of them, anyway—not the Scared Stiff tales, which weren't for her), and I was disconcerted to find while transcribing this story onto the computer for this book that she'd revised one sentence in pencil. I enshrine her additions in square brackets: "... as if [it were] on the other side of a thin[,] almost invisible[,] plastic sheet." Is a ghost here?

Medusa followed, and then Murders. The late Ken Bulmer bought this one, commenting that he liked it once he'd found his way past the style, which seems to have seized up whenever I was aware of writing science fiction. It may have been a pity that I hadn't read Brian Aldiss's observation that the prose of the genre was characteristically light and rapid. Whenever the tale is supposed to take place, the future is insufficiently imagined, since its people still send letters. The name Mounth was nothing but a mistyped word. I don't believe in wasting material.

The last tale of the year was Point of View. Like Through the Walls, it tries to depict the effects of LSD before I'd taken any; indeed, cannabis is far more prone to halt time. "I knew that the worst response to an acid flashback was paranoia, because that was self-perpetuating. If you rode the experience it would fade away eventually, integrated." Soon I was to learn how mistaken I was. Kirby had doubts about the story's commercial potential and showed it to another of his clients, David Drake. Dave thought it should have been about two thousand words long, and I think he was right. Coincidentally, the next bunch of tales I wrote—my EC Comics group—were each about that length. I should explain that on Merseyside, last is a slang term for useless; hence the line "Gases are last".

After the EC tales of early 1974 I had another fumble at science fiction. I can't find much to say about The Grip of Peace, which suffers from too much expository dialogue, not all of it even speakable. Rereading my early work, I often feel as if it's someone else's, but I don't recognise myself anywhere in this tale, although the final scene seems unexpectedly authentic years later. Jenny and I had a blazing row as we tried to find our way around the labyrinth of Birmingham, but once booked into our room at Fantasycon we had some of the best sex we've ever had.

Later that year I tried to recapture the skills I'd discovered while inspired by EC, but they'd deserted me, or good ideas had. Only the Wind lives up to its title by containing little else, while Morning Call is a minor piece deriving from my mother's distrust of doctors, though she didn't pester them—quite the reverse. It was another tale I didn't let her read, not out of guilt but simply to avoid an argument.

Did this pair dissatisfy me so much that I fled to another field? Pet was next—more floundering in the shallows of science fiction. I managed to lighten my style to some extent by using a youthful narrator, but the narrative voice is insufficiently naïve, and the predictable ending—weighed down by sentimentalism too—falls with a dull thud. I've recast one sentence ("He had a little pink face under the fur, that looked old and very peaceful") but otherwise I've restrained myself from some considerable editing of what looks like a transcribed first draft. "My father's voice sounded surprised and puzzled, like his expression"! Another quote for Thog, I think. Ken Bulmer bounced the story because of the ending, and quite right too.

It was immediately followed by a further lump of science fiction, Hain's Island. It's vaguely ecological and vaguely psychological, with too little sense of character, which is obscured by stiffened dialogue. It was written by someone I no longer have any sense of having been, and so I've no idea whether I was aware of pinching a motif from The Body Snatchers, if it wasn't from The Quatermass Experiment. Perhaps the tale finally prefigures the central issue of The Long Lost—a fantastic element used as a scapegoat for behaviour that it was hardly needed to cause.

Although I wrote some better stuff that year, Bait mainly goes to show how little interest I had in vampirism, or at least how I felt there was little left to explore. The fissure in the wall might seem deeply Freudian, but I pinched the idea of being spitted on a sword from John Metcalfe. Rounding off 1974, Snakes and Ladders is somewhat more original, and gave rise to an interesting editorial disagreement. The tale was originally intended for Mike Ashley, who felt that it was undermotivated. He took The Gap instead, and I returned to Snakes five years later, reworking it as Playing the Game. By now T. E. D. Klein (he of the highly recommended Reassuring Tales) was the editor of Rod Serling's The Twilight Zone Magazine. I heard from Kirby that Ted had bought Playing the Game, but I only belatedly realised that he'd taken the first version. I offered the second, only for him to prefer the original. "When you rewrite," he commented, "you really rewrite, don't you?" In the cases of some of the contents of this book, not nearly enough.

At least Snakes and Ladders is more substantial than my final offerings, but chronology can't be denied. From 1979, The Burning is another story written too soon after the incident that gave rise to it, a firework display in Newsham Park in Liverpool. Like The Stone on the Island, this one seems to have some roots in M. R. James's Stories I Have Tried to Write. Up pops the scapegoat theme again, uninterestingly handled.

In 1990 a theatrical producer in, I think, Los Angeles contacted me for a contribution to his Grand Guignol revival. I'd just written a drabble—a story of exactly one hundred words for an anthology of them, which ultimately didn't appear—and it suggested itself as suitable for adaptation. A Play for the Jaded was the result, but the producer rescinded his initial enthusiasm after receiving a supposedly similar piece from someone else.

Whether the revival ever saw a stage I have no idea. Here's the sketch to round off this book.

And perhaps it will do as a way of bringing down the curtain on this motley entertainment. Let these misshapen creatures of my superseded mind shuffle and stumble for your amusement as best they can—poor things but mine own, even if the brain cells that produced them may be long gone. Perhaps now it's the author who is losing shape, but he hopes his prose has grown shapelier instead. Besides, if this book sells just a single copy of Reassuring Tales, it will have justified its existence.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
16 July 2007

Afterword To Just Behind You, 2008

I'm fifty as a writer. I didn't say a good one. My first book, completed in 1958, was Ghastly Tales—at least, it should have been called that. Actually, it was entitled Ghostly Tales, but believe me, you don't want to see the ghastly evidence. The world, or at any rate the readers of Pat Kearney's fanzine Goudy, saw my first published tale when I was fifteen, and the following year August Derleth anthologised "The Church in High Street", on which he had understandably wielded his editorial pen. At eighteen I had an Arkham House collection to my name, and nine years later Arkham brought out my first good book, Demons by Daylight. Perhaps I should date my anniversary from that event, in which case—like the Kenneth Williams character in Beyond Our Ken—I can claim thirty-five years. Soon I'll claim more. I don't propose to stop writing until I'm dead, if then.

Here's a selection of my last few years' worth of stories. "Fear the Dead" was my contribution to an anthology of tales about fear. The original line-up of Just Behind You would have included a quartet of terrible old women, but I've reduced them by half. The other two will have to await my next collection. As for fear, it may summon the very thing that's dreaded. In my early years I often feared it would as I lay in bed after reading Le Fanu or M. R. James or "Thurnley Abbey" or even "Beyond the Door". I also heard the kind of superstitious warning the young protagonist receives, and my notions of religion were as ill-defined and ominous. In my house they went together.

"Digging Deep" is one of three tales here that involve the mobile phone. Andy Murray, author of an essential book on Nigel Kneale, used the story in an anthology of stories about phobias. As he points out, my piece revives one of the earliest obsessive horrors in fiction, but the idea came from hearing on Radio 4 that quite a few people insist on keeping their mobile with them as Alan Coe does. Old fears don't necessarily go away—our psyches simply bring them up to date.

"Double Room" was one of two tales I conceived during the 2007 World Fantasy Convention at Saratoga Springs. (The other, "The Long Way", was published as a wintry present for subscribers to PS magazine.) Conventioneering by yourself can be a lonely business, especially while you're in your hotel room (Bob Shaw was terrified of spending any waking hours in his after his wife Sadie's death). One night in my Saratoga bathroom I heard my neighbour on the far side of the wall, and shortly afterwards I was scribbling ideas in my notebook. Originally the manifestations might have been more inexplicable, but the reasons the tale found for them work for me.

Occasionally I try to repay my debt to specific writers. Midnight Sun was my attempt to scale the awesome peak of Algernon Blackwood's achievement, while The Darkest Part of the Woods clambered the Lovecraftian. "The Place of Revelation" goes for another giant of the field. If anybody guesses which one, I'll count the tale some kind of a success. The naive voice can be a highly effective way to tell a tale of terror, creating a tension between what's told and how. I hope it works here.

"The Winner" was written in response to Kealan Patrick Burke's request for a new story about a tavern. I've encountered hostelries less unlike this one than you might care to imagine. Back in the seventies, when I was cycling around Birkenhead Park to research "This Time", I went for lunch in a nearby pub. I used to think the moment when a Western bar goes silent as our hero walks in was exaggerated, but let me tell you, that'll be the day, pilgrim.

"One Copy Only" is an example of the tale that got away. Even more than in "Feeling Remains", a character—in this case, the narrator—took hold of the narrative and ran off with it. I hope this enriches it somewhat, though I often look at it and feel as if a slim Ray Bradbury fable is suffocating inside it. A Fantasycon panel chaired by none other than Pete Crowther discussed the discipline necessary to the short story, and it occurred to me too late to contribute the thought that Ray and one of the writers he frequently cites, Ernest Hemingway, have a crucial trait in common. Ray's prose is irrepressibly exuberant, Hemingway's is pared to the minimum, but neither writer ever lets a short story character take on more life than the theme needs. Me, I sometimes feel like a latter-day Frankenstein whose creations stumble off by themselves, having found their own voice.

"Laid Down" was written for an anthology in which each tale was to be exactly one thousand words long. Apparently publishers were unenthusiastic, though I don't know why given the splendid precedent of Fredric Brown's Nightmares and Geezenstacks. Writing within specified parameters can be a useful discipline, productive of invention. Here's a bit, I hope.

"Unblinking" takes us back to that old theme of mine, madness. Why do I return to it? Even if I don't think of my childhood, I have only to read postings on the Internet, where the deranged who pass for sane in real life throw their disguises away Insanity is all around us, and we may be required to find a new euphemism—"the norm", perhaps. Me, I'm no more mad than you are.

We're back with the mobile again in "Breaking Up". How often has a technological advance been cited as fatal to the tale of supernatural terror? Electric light was supposed to kill it off, but ghosts weren't daunted. Fritz Leiber even celebrated the menace of defective neon. Equally, the mobile phone may appear to provide safety and reassurance, but its potential for treachery is considerable. I'm not deploring the item—I wouldn't be without mine. Rather, it's another opportunity for sinister invention.

"Respects" was suggested by a local incident in which a car thief in his early teens killed himself while fleeing the police. A lamp standard at the site of his demise still decorated with flowers years after the incident, and the tributes on the obituaries page of one Wallasey paper were at least as grotesque as the ones I've invented— the romanticisation of a petty criminal. How much has this to do with the public hunger for a moment in the media? The tendency has produced its own clichés. There almost seems to be a standard script (created by the demand for sound bites) for grieving parents to deliver at press conferences. A lost daughter inevitably becomes "my little princess", and it isn't uncommon to hear very young children described as "my best friend". Does this cheapen the grief? People may need to express their feelings (although not doing so, at least in public, can be useful too), but how much does banality and inaccuracy express?

"Feeling Remains" was written at Ellen Datlow's request for a frightening ghost story. I hope it's one. A generally favourable review commented that it was let down by too broad a caricature of liberalism. In fact the character concerned was drawn from life, and I toned down the portrayal. I fear it still rings true to me, although that needn't mean it does to the reader.

"Direct Line"—no, I can't think of any further comments about mobile phones. Watch out for my iPod trilogy (I tease). At least I have an anecdote about "Skeleton Woods". In the mid-nineties, our daughter went to university in York and my British agent of the time convinced me there was no market for supernatural horror— mine, at any rate. I often drove Tammy to York, and every time we left Leeds or returned that way I saw a sign for Skelton Woods (apparently an area of Leeds). The first time I caught sight of it I immediately added the extra vowel and thought what a title it could make, only to reflect that I would never write the book. At the turn of the century, when I returned to the supernatural novel, the title didn't quite fit the book that appeared as The Darkest Part of the Woods (or even Wods). It hovered somewhere in my mind for years and at last alighted on the ideas that turned into the present tale— indeed, it helped shape them.

"The Unbeheld" is one of those tales that could play like a shaggy dog tale. The reader must decide whether it does—it didn't for me in the writing. There may be comedy in "The Announcement", which is to an extent a sketch for a trick I used in The Grin of the Dark and in another novel. I'm cautious about claiming comedy only because while the tale made me laugh now and then, I gave up directing my readers' reactions many years ago. Otherwise I might go in for Graham Greene's method of separating my output into different lists, as he did to distinguish his entertainments from his serious novels. If I were to yield to the temptation I would class several of mine as comedies, which doesn't mean they aren't serious: not just The Count of Eleven but Needing Ghosts (a novella, of course) as well as Secret Story (as Secret Stories became after dieting), The Grin of the Dark, Creatures of the Pool—perhaps even The One Safe Place. At a recent reading at Borders in Leeds I was struck by the muted mirth with which my fellow writers—Mark Morris, Adam Nevill and Conrad Williams—greeted much of the scene in the disused Preston theatre from The Grin of the Dark. Maybe it's the way I tell them.

Dragged Down might have done for Ellen Datlow's anthology (forthcoming at the time of writing this) of stories about urban legends, but it had already appeared online by the time she asked me for a new tale. Perhaps I could have elaborated on the Liverpool tradition that if a young girl stands on a pedestrian crossing on Scotland Road at midnight, the next face she sees behind a steering wheel will belong to the man she'll marry (if anybody gets married these days). Raised by the Moon is (like The Ferries in another book) one of my Wirral landscape tales, although in this case the setting that suggested it isn't named. In fact it was the West Kirby boating lake, around which you can walk on a stone path. The path is only very slightly higher than the lake and, at the other edge, the river. While following it one windy wave-wracked day I had the notion of being met by walkers from both ends of the path. Steve Jones found hints of Innsmouth in the tale, while others have seen them in Creatures of the Pool. It's enough to turn a writer green around the gills.

And so we come to the title tale, generated by a request from Gary Fry for a contribution to his fine anthology Poe's Progeny. His idea (splendidly achieved, let me say) was for a collection of new tales that demonstrated the influence not just of Poe but of the best traditions of our field. While each contributor was asked to demonstrate the influence of a specific writer, Gary decided against asking me to do so. I believe I did anyway: as in The Guide, I had M. R. James in mind. Equally, I'd taken to heart Geoff Ryman's suggestion that the supernatural element in James sometimes avoids darker emotional themes. Though I don't altogether agree with Geoff, I've never winced from such topics, and I don't see why the Jamesian method can't encompass and express them. Indeed, I've never seen why my field can't, and I've spent most of my career attempting to show that it can. I hope there are a few successes in this book. Here's to the next one!

Safe Words is all I want to salvage from an aborted novel, Spanked by Nuns, which never progressed beyond the notebook stage. Even Pete Crowther looked doubtful about the prospect of the novel, and I kept feeling it might have been too perverse for the mainstream but insufficiently erotic for, say, Adam Nevill's Nexus Books. I finally put it to rest on reading Niki Flynn's fine memoir Dances with Werewolves, which addressed the issues far more cogently than I imagine I would have. Recently Niki filmed a decidedly personal tribute to my old tale "The Chimney". As for "Safe Words", I thought the verbal problem that beset a character from the novel was too much fun to waste.

The title of this book and of the tale that provides it is decades older than either, by the way. I planned to use it for Dark Companions back in the early eighties until I learned that Manly Wade Wellman had a similar title in mind for a book. He never used it, and so at last I did. Let me make it a tribute to him and his wife Frances in memory of good times in Chapel Hill. I'll include in the memorial another good friend of theirs and mine and Jenny's, sadly missed—Karl Edward Wagner. May they all enjoy an eternal autumn of the kind that illuminates the mountains around Chapel Hill.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
5 December 2008

Afterword to Ancient Images

In writing Ancient Images I drew on the history of cinema, and now this has overtaken the novel. It's set in the late 1980s, before DVDs and mobile phones. This was the decade when Britain found a new scapegoat for its ills—uncensored films, particularly horror. A panic akin to the orchestrated outrage that did away with horror comics in the fifties was whipped up by the British media, even most of those that should have known better, and all across the nation police time was wasted on raiding video libraries for the likes of The Evil Dead. For years anyone determined to watch, say, Argento films uncut in Britain often had to make do with blurry pirate videotapes. The Gorehound chapter in my novel gives you an idea how it was. Now that virtually all the offending films can be had complete on British DVD—Last House on the Left was among the last to be reprieved by the British Board of Film Classification, previously the BBF Censors—it's possible for some of us to feel a kind of wry nostalgia for the period. A recent British release (Video Nasties: The Definitive Guide) includes a useful documentary as well as reminiscences by critics who lived through it all.

In one more way the novel is historical. The original printings were dedicated to "Joan, my favourite mother-in-law" (A. Bertram Chandler's wife). Since she's gone to the convention party in the sky, I've dedicated this new edition to two old friends and colleagues who love classic horror films as much as Don D'Auria and I do.

At the time some readers of Ancient Images were apparently surprised that the book came out for subtlety and restraint against graphic gore. I can only think they didn't know my stuff. I'm certainly opposed to censorship—when I was reviewing films for the BBC I often attacked the campaign against the nasties and took apart official press releases that the media seemed reluctant to question—but freedom of speech isn't an excuse to give up moral choice; nothing is. I should say that Andrew Minihin, the Gorehound columnist, isn't based on any particular writer; he's meant to embody an attitude that I suspect is prevalent still. More to the point, Lionel Stillwell wasn't meant to be Leslie Halliwell. While I'm no admirer of Halliwell's guides to film, I don't believe he would have disparaged Karloff and Lugosi. He was also unhappy to learn that North by Northwest had been edited to fit a slot on the television channel for which he bought films. On the other hand, the booksellers in chapter 10 are indeed Dave Gibson and Ted Ball of the Fantasy Centre bookshop, now itself history, alas.

Ancient Images began life as The Blood Hunt—that's the first title in my notes for the novel. Later The Dead Hunt suggested itself. To Feed the Stone came up next, and then almost immediately (while I was staying with Thom and Alice Tessier in Waterbury, I believe) the present title struck me. Originally Giles Spence would have married a Redfield, and casting Karloff as an aristocrat was designed as his insult to the family. The Redfield land was to be used for hare-coursing, but I wanted to avoid making too much overt comment, I think (or perhaps I just didn't have the stomach for the research). Initially I planned Tower of Fear to be the last film Karloff and Lugosi made together and the reason for their split, but the British reaction against horror films in the thirties—again, all true—seemed a more productive background. For a while I thought a rock festival at Redfield would provide the final sacrifice, but in Thatcher's England the counterparts of Enoch's Army were being harried by the police, and in time I saw what this would bring to my tale.

Does the book try to include too much? Better too much than too little, perhaps, and I'm inclined to think the various themes shed a mutual illumination. It occurs to me that among other things this is my vampire novel. I did write an overt one—the adaptation of the 1936 film Dracula's Daughter—but I admit to not finding the theme of vampirism especially inspiring. In Ancient Images we have the aristocratic family that feeds on the blood of its tenants, which could be seen as making explicit one metaphor at the heart of traditional vampire fiction. Or you could argue that the vampire here is the landscape itself, which shares the name of the doomed family in the manner of Poe. In fact I think it was precisely because I was unaware of writing a vampire story that it engaged my imagination so much.

I don't mean to imply that traditional horror movies never did. In the sixties you had to pass for sixteen to see most horror films in Britain, which meant I was fourteen before I could, by which time I'd been collecting Famous Monsters of Filmland for years and knew all the classic monsters in the form of stills. (For the record, the first horror film I fell in love with—among the first I ever saw—was Jacques Tourneur's Night of the Demon, and it remains my favourite.) Graham Nolan was originally to fall through a window, to be impaled as victims are in Argento films, but just because it was the kind of fate he would have deplored in the cinema, this didn't justify its excess. I thought readers might spot that the first and ninth chapters are flashbacks to Redfield—indeed, I meant the second one to let us glimpse Giles Spence—but some people took them to be scenes from Tower of Fear, although they're surely too gruesome for late thirties cinema. On the other hand, the figures on the corbel in chapter 29 could well exist: you can see equivalents (online if you like) at the church in Kilpeck near Hereford.

Decades later I don't mind this novel. It's a snapshot of its time, and it let me convey some of my love of the cinema. One point came to bother me—the film itself contains no occult element, just an image that refers to one—and so I had a second try with The Grin of the Dark. Oddly, one Amazon reviewer of that book thought it was an attempt to imitate Theodore Roszak's Flicker. No, only an attempt to improve on my own book, first published two years before Roszak's. Now, like its author, it's more ancient than ever. I hope we both have a few years still.

Ramsey Campbell
Wallasey, Merseyside
7 May 2011

Afterword to Dark Companions

This was my fourth collection to see print, and the first not to appear through the eldritch portals of Arkham House. After imitating Lovecraft in The Inhabitant of the Lake I'd spent five years developing my own approach, which was loosed upon the world at book length in Demons by Daylight. The Height of the Scream was more experimental, too often wilfully so, and less sure of itself. I'd say Dark Companions leaves those problems behind. Only the title was a compromise: I'd meant to call it Just Behind You until I learned that my old friend Manly Wade Wellman had that in mind for a book of his own. In fact he never used the title, and so I did just a couple of years back.

Let me reminisce as best I can about these tales, written by the long-haired genial freak who appears in a zippered suede shirt on the back flap of the first edition. I'll go at them in the order they appear herein. "Mackintosh Willy" was written in 1977—to be precise, the first draft was begun on 22 August and completed six days later. In those days I kept a diary in a ledger and recorded the progress of my first drafts, though not of the rewriting. Charlie Grant bought the tale for one of his Shadows anthologies but found the punch line understated, even for his taste, and so I substituted the last line we have here. As for the story behind the story, there isn't much to tell. For several years Jenny and I did indeed live across West Derby Road from Newsham Park, where I often took a hashish-eater's stroll. One day I misread the graffiti in a shelter as the narrator does, and noticed footprints set in new concrete around the nearby pond. This was all my imagination needed. Alas, when I took J. K. Potter on a tour of my locations years later, the shelter had been demolished. The tale brought me a World Fantasy Award in the short story category, which I shared with Elizabeth Lynn, and we hugged onstage in Baltimore.

"Napier Court" was the last tale I wrote in 1967, in the midst of the Demons by Daylight bunch. Like several of those stories, it was a radical rewrite of a first draft. The 1965 version had a male protagonist laid up in bed, but Alma Napier is based on my solitary ex-fiancée, from whom I'd parted several months before writing this version. Along with "Concussion" it's among my most nakedly autobiographical tales. Before August Derleth bought it I sent a copy to Kirby McCauley, then a friend and later also my agent. Kirby showed the typescript to J. Vernon Shea, who commented that if I was like Peter in the tale I couldn't be much of a catch. Indeed, and I knew it, which was why I tried to depict myself as honestly as possible: perhaps it was a means of outgrowing that personality as well. Basing the tale on my experience was also certainly a way of bringing it to life.

I've a confession to make about "Down There". It was begun on 9 September 1978, less than three weeks after our daughter's birth. Indeed, four days after she was born I set about writing another tale, "This Time", completed a week later. I may have been afraid that the change in my life might hinder my writing, but was this really an excuse to devote so much time to proving the reverse? The first draft of "Down There" took seven days and is described in the diary as 'laboured'—serve me right, you may think. As I often do, I reassured myself that it could be rewritten, and so it was. It certainly needed it, which I can demonstrate with the opening of the first draft:

> "Hurry along there," Steve called as the girls trooped down the office. "Last one tonight. Mind the doors."
>
> The girls smiled at Elaine as they passed her desk, but their smiles meant different things: just like you to make things more difficult for the rest of us, looks like you've been kept in after school, suppose you've nothing better to do, fancy having to put up with him by yourself. She didn't give a damn what they thought of her, which was part of what irked them, and she was quite content to be alone with Steve—if only he wouldn't make a joke of everything.
>
> Even the lifts, one of which had sunk to the sub-basement every time it was called today. Presumably the sub-basement was no longer so disgusting, but Elaine was glad she hadn't had to go down there, even momentarily. Glancing back through the window that sealed her off from the lobby, she saw that the lift was out of order now. Its twin was stuffing people into itself, closing its doors whether or not they were ready, leaving the girls behind. They loitered near the other lift as though by pretending not to notice it they might persuade it to relent. When one of them caught her eye, Elaine looked away. She wasn't about to let them think she was envying them.

There was nothing to envy, especially when they would have to face the November night, the downpour. Around the office building the warehouses looked like melting chocolate; the river and the canals were opaque with tangled ripples that almost extinguished the reflections of streetlamps. Cottages and terraces, some of them derelict, crowded up the steep hills towards the disused mines. Through the skeins of water on the glass their infrequent lights looked shaky as the flames of candles.

"Goodnight comrade," Steve said like the title of a song as Mr Williams went by, and Elaine had to stifle a grin. Mr Williams had tried to dissuade Elaine from working tonight, from being exploited as he'd called it, long after the rest of them had desisted. It was all very well for him: his father wasn't an invalid, he earned enough to keep his parents without working overtime. He had only annoyed her by harping on the things that were wrong with the place: she had to work overtime—how could it help to remember what might go wrong?

Still, he'd given up finally [unlike this turgid prose, its greying author grumbles], and she was alone on the sixth floor with Steve —alone in the otherwise untenanted building except for the caretaker, wherever he was. Ranks of cabinets like bookcases divided the long room down the middle; they were stuffed with blue Inland Revenue files. Beneath a fluttering fluorescent tube protruding files drowsed, jerked awake [much like the author as he transcribes this]. Smells of dust and old paper drifted about the room, which was growing oppressively hot. Through the steamy window above an unquenchable radiator, Elaine could just make out the frame where the top section of the fire escape should be.

"There goes our Red," Steve remarked. "Into somebody's bed rather than under it, from what I hear." She smiled a little timidly across the stretch of desks at him and lit a cigarette for confidence. Being alone with Steve and his risqué joke made her feel queasy and nervous, an odd sensation like the start of an adventure, but at least the length of the office separated them. She began to compare a tax return with last year's.

"You can understand these union men, especially round here," Steve said. Perhaps he'd taken her shyness for disagreement. "The trouble is, it's never the employers they hurt most, always the public" [or the long-suffering reader who has to trudge through this mire of dialogue].

He reminded her of her father: fair, but not too fair. Was Mr Williams a genuine Red? [Was their author a genuine bore?] Certainly he'd opposed the move to the building long after the rest of the union had accepted it, very temporarily. Of course his father had lost his job when the mines were shut down, but need that mean employers were always wrong?

Steve was gazing at her, blank-faced again. "Are you feeling exploited again?"

Mr Williams had called her the employers' weapon against solidarity. "No, certainly not." She wished Steve would let her be quiet for a while; she would chat when she felt more at ease. "I'm feeling hot," she said.

"Yes, it is a bit much." He stood up, mopping his forehead theatrically. "I'll go and sort out Mr Tuttle," he said. "Maybe he can do something about this bloody awful first draft we're stuck in…"

Well, you get the idea, probably more than you want. For the record, the story came to me when the light failed in the lift at Radio Merseyside, where I then worked as a film reviewer. Some years ago Guillermo del Toro rang me, enthusiastically proposing to film "Down There" as his contribution to an anthology movie. The project was set up—it would have been something like the Twilight Zone film, I believe—but alas, the production company decided not to back it after all. Such is Hollywood.

"Heading Home" was written on 14 January 1974 and, I suspect, little altered in the rewrite. It was the fourth of six such tales I wrote that month, having heard from Kirby McCauley that Marvel Comics planned to resurrect horror comics, short filler stories and all. They needed tales about 1800 words long on traditional themes, and the idea seems to have fired up my imagination. Marvel would abort the proposition, but my offerings all found good homes. Later "Heading Home" was reprinted in Read, a classroom magazine aimed at grades 6 to 10. Among the suggestions for classroom work was this one, apparently provided by a Junior High School Middle School Assembly: "Presumably, the narrator will have his head back on, but it will be held in place only by the regrown nerves and the thread. That's pretty wobbly. Continue the story, telling what happens next." And they call us horror writers warped!

"The Proxy" started life as "The Bed beyond the Window" on 28 April 1977 but adopted the present title on the first of May, and was finished one day later. I hope it doesn't show senility is creeping up on me because I've absolutely no idea where the idea for the story came from. David Lloyd adapted it with style for the A1 comic.

I spent a couple of days researching the locations of "The Depths" (though the diary suggests it was "an excuse for a day off, really." Certainly I met our old friends Stan and Marge Nuttall, veterans of the Liverpool Science Fiction Group, for a drink in the Crown. Marge is heard to sing on the first page that she's glad she's Bugs Bunny, which she had already done in The Face That Must Die. This wasn't a lapse of memory on my part; I'd simply despaired of seeing that book published, given the responses of various editors to its oppressive grimness. I plunged into "The Depths" on 28 July 1978 and surfaced from the first draft on the sixth of August. Again, I can't trace the idea to its source, which may be somewhere in my many notebooks and a quest for someone else to make. I once claimed that the tale was written out of dissatisfaction with my handling of a similar theme in The Nameless, but "The Depths" precedes that novel by a year—so much for the chronology in my cranium. I don't think horror fiction has to be a holiday from morality, as Angela Carter once declared it was, and perhaps that's why I keep writing about scapegoats and the rejection of responsibility.

In early July 1977 we had a contingent from Carolina to stay in our little house in Tuebrook—the Wellmans and the Wagners (Karl and Barbara), I believe, and David Drake. I had "Out of Copyright" in mind and asked Dave for a likely Latin phrase, which I used in the tale. When he got back to Chapel Hill he airmailed me his revised thoughts, but too late—I'd written "Out of Copyright" in three days, starting on 10 July. His off-the-cuff response still seems fine to me, but don't blame Dave for my use of it.

"The Invocation" owes its inspiration to The Godfather. Perhaps it was partly because I knew of Coppola's roots in horror (specifically the film he made for Roger Corman, Dementia 13, which was hacked to bits by the British censor at the time) that I thought the Hollywood mogul would find worse than a horse's head when he peeled back the sheets. What I anticipated happens to Ted in my tale. I saw the film at its first Liverpool showing in August 1972, but didn't start the story until 5 September 1975, completing it on the 12th. When the story was reprinted in Dark Voices 2, a copy-editor presumably assuming ignorance on my part changed Mrs Dame's citation of Finian's Wake to Finnegan's Wake. Sometimes I'm tempted to provide footnotes to make absolutely certain I can't be misunderstood, like so.

"The Little Voice" was apparently to be called "The Playmate" when I made notes for it in early April 1976. I set about writing it on the 30th and finished it on 9 May. Where did it come from? I have no idea—perhaps just a train of thought that made me scribble notes. By now I carried notebooks with me everywhere I went, though previously I'd made life harder for myself by writing notes in the diary ledger. Charlie Grant bought "The Little Voice" for his Shadows anthology series but suggested I should prune it a little. I believe I rid it of about two thousand words, and that's the published version.

"Drawing In" was written over the last three days of May 1977. At a guess the idea came out of cracks in the walls of our Tuebrook house, waving its spindly legs as it emerged. I don't mean I actually saw this happen, despite having taken several acid trips in the preceding couple of years. Strangely enough, I'd dreamed in August 1973 of dropping acid, a year before I ever did. That diary entry records a "genuine sense of growing intensity and muted panic" and notes "powerful images which I constructed in the dream and which remained: a silent avalanche of clouds; walking between amber buildings like banks of sand at sunset". Incidentally, elsewhere I've said that "Through the Walls" was written as a kind of preamble to venturing on my first trip, but in fact it was written just a few days after that experience.

A trip I took in the Cotswolds in May 1975 gave me the seeds of "The Pattern", and so did my impression some days later of the Freshfield coast near Liverpool, which may have echoed the trip. The diary entry describes "green symmetry everywhere, the more complex the more minutely you look: glimpses of larger mandalas" and "a sense that there may be an enormous pattern (only one? or many?)" The next day (the last of May) saw the start of the tale, completed on 6 June. Halfway through I changed the title from "The Screamer". In retrospect I think that the lyricism of the story had to give way to or at least include horror because otherwise its pattern would have struck me as incomplete. In any case lyricism needn't be inimical to horror: see the work of Poppy Z. Brite or Caitlín Kiernan, for instance, or Robert Dunbar, not to mention the father of lyrical horror, Ray Bradbury (too often overlooked as a key writer in my field). Recently I was surprised to learn that Steve Mosby, an excellent writer whose novels are packaged as crime fiction but can certainly be claimed for horror, was fond of the tale—perhaps there's even an echo of it in his brilliant novel Black Flowers. Previously Doc Brite chose it as his favourite horror story for an anthology of such favourites.

"The Show Goes On" started out as "The Usher" on 24 May 1978. By the 27th it had the title it bears now, and the next day it was done. The cinema was based on the Hippodrome in Liverpool, converted from a variety theatre (the Royal Hippodrome) in 1929. A maze of dressing-rooms survived behind the cinema screen, and one night I got lost among them while searching for an exit. Eventually I came to a pair of double doors, and as I made to push them apart I seemed to glimpse a large dim room beyond, full of figures that rose or tottered to their feet to await me. Perhaps they were homeless, but the light reminded me of waking from a nightmare in an ill-lit childhood bedroom, and I made haste to find another way out. Need anyone ask why I write as I do?

"The Puppets" returns to the failed relationship that's at the heart of "Napier Court". One crucial disagreement with Rosemary (the real girl) was over horror fiction, which she didn't care for, not least mine. Dentistry represents or at least is substituted for it in this tale, and the village pageant is an objective correlative for a spectacle Rosemary coaxed out of me, perhaps because she thought it was remote from horror. At a performance in Hoylake of Debussy's Prélude de l'Après-Midi d'un Faune she was one of the orchestral flautists (not the soloist) and persuaded me to read Mallarmé's poem as a preamble, in French and then in English, to the hapless audience. When at last I'd struggled through the original in an accent worthy of Inspector Clouseau I looked up to see the mayor of Hoylake on the front row, clutching his head in his hands. Afterwards, having fortified himself with at least one glass of wine, he described my performance as a tour de force. His accent was better than mine had been. Still, I don't waste material if I can avoid doing so, and a decade later the memory was nothing but fun. According to my diary the writing of the tale (then known as "Curtain Call") was pretty hesitant, stretching from 29 June 1978 to 8 July. On one day, admittedly with a hangover, I wrote just a single paragraph.

I started "Calling Card" on 24 November 1978 and completed it two days later. At that stage it was called "First Foot", a reference to a common New Year's Eve tradition in Britain. It was written in response to a request from the local newspaper for a two-thousand-word ghost story set on Merseyside during the festive season. Alas, the commissioning editor found it too gruesome—presumably he didn't know the kind of thing I wrote. Lin Carter was made of sterner stuff and bought it for Weird Tales, but told me on the train from New York to a World Fantasy Convention in Providence that the title wouldn't mean much to his audience. A few minutes later I gave him the title it bears now. Alas, the anthology series died before he could use it, but by a splendid irony a new editor at the local paper asked me for a Christmas tale five years after the original request, and this time the paper published the tale with no changes (except for entitling it "The Calling Card").

Even more than "The Pattern", "Above the World" owes much to LSD, especially once the tale climbs to the heights—specifically, the last acid trip I ever took (in July 1976, up Bleaberry Fell near Keswick) before a nightmare flashback some months later put me off the drug. The following June I researched Knox's ascent to the Bishop of Barf, and the story was written in three days, starting on 18 July. Alas, the Swan Hotel has been turned into apartments. A nearby hotel that closed recently was called Barf House. I wonder if some folk may have found the name ominous, and perhaps a question on the hotel's web site—"Why Barf?"—didn't help.

"Baby" began on 29 November 1974 and drew to a close on 4 December, which is pretty well all I know. The entry for the 25th notes "some rather nightmarish pram images" but doesn't specify them—I'm guessing that an everyday sight set them off in my head, as frequently happens. I suspect it may have been the swollen faceless plastic head, and has the bag of washing in a pram from "Napier Court" found a new lease of grisly life? For some reason I didn't identify the location by name, but "Baby" is set around Granby Street in Liverpool; in those days finding Chinese vegetables and Indian spices in a grocer's was worthy of remark. The following year I returned to the area in The Doll Who Ate His Mother.

I recall even less about the genesis of "In the Bag". The ledger shows only that the first draft was begun on 20 November 1974 and completed two days later. No doubt the sense of random unreasonable severity came from my schooldays, though the headmaster isn't based on anyone specific. "Conversion" was written on 18 January 1974, but the other EC tale—"Call First"—took all of two days, starting on the 8th. In both cases, as with "Heading Home", I wrote copious notes at speed and incorporated nearly all of them.

I find this as hard to believe as anybody would, but when I wrote "The Chimney" I didn't know it was autobiographical. It was conceived on Christmas Day 1972, after Jenny and I had watched that splendid tale of television terror The Stone Tape. "Child afraid of Santa Claus— Perhaps from a very early age has associated horror with the large fireplace in his bedroom? His parents tell him of Santa Claus— But when they tell him the truth about SC, the horror comes flooding back— And something's always moving in there towards Christmas— He sees it emerge each year: but this year he sees it in more detail…" I got as far as the charred apparition but not, at this stage, its real identity (which, as David Drake pointed out, it has in common with L. P. Hartley's "Someone in the Lift", a tale I'd read back in the early fifties). Often my ideas lie low for years, and I didn't start "The Chimney" until 20 June 1975, finishing it on the 27th. Only when I read the tale aloud at Jack Sullivan's apartment on the Upper West Side years later did I remember how terrified I'd been on most Christmas Days of my childhood—not by Santa Claus but by having to go upstairs and knock on a bedroom door to invite my unseen father down for dinner. That he stayed unseen, then and for nearly all my childhood and early adulthood, only added to my dread.

And so to "The Companion", which took years to get itself together. On 30 June 1969 I had an idea about the derelict fairground in New Brighton. At this stage the protagonist is "a young girl, frightened of people generally". The place seems to be partly operative, with "white faces like papier-mâché at some pay windows". Two years later I had thoughts about a ghost train in a fairground, but they weren't incorporated—maybe, having rediscovered them in the process of writing this afterword, I may develop them. Then on 13 September 1973 there's a page of notes for "The Companion", including a version of the final line and thoughts for an unused encounter with a fortune-teller. The 14th sees most of the ideas for Stone's last ride, and the next few days gather more material, but I have to conclude I was writing the story by then. Certainly once Stone heads for the abandoned fairground I finished the tale in a single session.

If I had the time I'd rewrite much of my old stuff, and "The Companion" is a case where I like some of it (the second half) enough to wish the rest were better. Well, my time is limited, and I'd rather work on something new—perhaps I'll write that ghost train tale from forty years ago. In any case, some people have liked the story—Steve King declared it a favourite, and more recently Jeremy Dyson did. Jeremy and I gave a public reading in Liverpool recently, and "The Companion" seemed to go down pretty well with the audience. Maybe there's life in these old tales yet, and even in this old writer. I'm happy to see Dark Companions rise from its grave.

Ramsey Campbell
Deep Blue Sea Apartments
Georgioupolis, Crete
20 September 2011

Afterword to the story The Page in Shadow Show: All New Stories In Celebration Of Ray Bradbury

Which tale of Ray's first pierced me with a sense of loneliness and loss? It may well have been "The Fog Horn" or "Kaleidoscope" or "The Dwarf" or "The Lake"—I can't now remember the order in which (precocious child) I read his first few books when I was no more than eight years old. I was borrowing adult fiction from the local public library on my mother's tickets, and Ray quickly became one of her favourite authors too. Now I think about it, perhaps that poignant jewel "The Smile" initially alerted us when it was reprinted in our local newspaper. Each of these stories affected me as some of Hans Andersen's fairy tales had—they were inescapably moving and disturbing as well. I think I was already also able to appreciate the poetry of Ray's prose.

On a Bradbury panel at the 2010 British Fantasy Convention, Joel Lane rightly celebrated him for rooting his fiction in the most crucial human experiences. The various panellists named their choice of Ray's tales, and some of the above were mine. An hour wasn't enough to let us say everything we should have, but here's my opportunity to cite a favourite theme of mine in his work—the death of books. While it's most fully explored in Fahrenheit 451, I've never forgotten two other treatments: "The Exiles" (mysteriously missing from the British edition of The Illustrated Man) and "Pillar of Fire," which I first encountered in August Derleth's anthology The Other Side of the Moon. In the latter story I was especially haunted by the last dead man's eulogy for our beloved fears. Back then I didn't know about the carnival magician who bade the twelve-year-old Ray to live forever, nor that Ray had embraced the exhortation by becoming a writer, but the information came as no surprise in the wake of his tales. Believe me, Ray—you'll live that long in the souls of your readers and in the work of the writers you've influenced. I believe that like others—Pete Crowther and Caitlín Kiernan among them—I learned lyricism from you.

For me Ray's achievement is inimitable, and so when Mort Castle asked me to write a tale for this book I vowed to avoid trying to imitate. In the course of my career I've come to believe in the happy coincidence, one of which was the source of The Page. A few weeks after Mort's request my wife and I spent two weeks in Rhodes. As we sunbathed I turned over ideas in my mind for a Bradbury tribute, and on a windy day one blew along—the sight of a man in pursuit of a page that a gust had torn out of the book he was reading on the beach. Thank heaven I always take a notebook with me! I was instantly reminded of "The Exiles" and its relatives, and it didn't take me long to sketch my tale. It's pretty personal, but isn't that the best kind of homage? I hope it contains a little of Ray's poignancy, and perhaps it has some of the redemptive quality you can often find in his work (from the list above, "The Lake," for instance). One final thought: if a character in any of his early stories had a mobile phone, it would be science fiction. Sometimes I feel we're all inhabiting the future he envisioned.

Ramsey Campbell
2012

Signs In The Air: Foreword to The Unspoken, May 2013

In January 2009 my wife Jenny's sister Penny died. She'd been treated for cancer some years earlier. While it wasn't the direct cause of her death, we suspect it was a factor. In my little eulogy at her funeral I said this:

"I've been a skeptic for much of my life, but I do at least believe we all pass into the fabric of the universe. On the morning Penny died I was up in my workroom as usual by dawn. It's on the third floor of a Victorian semi, and I have a view across the river to Liverpool. What I mostly see from my desk is the sky. That morning, all the time that the sun was visible beyond my window it was surrounded by an enormous rainbow halo, the like of which I've never seen. I thought it might be Penny.

"Like all the family I've kept being overtaken by surges of grief these last few weeks. Whenever I am I hear Penny's voice comforting me - saying 'Oh Ramsey' as only she could, with sympathy and humour as well. I don't mean an actual physical voice, but it might as well be; it sounds exactly like her. It certainly feels like her presence, as if in some sense she's still here. I hope she is for as long as she wants to be."

As is the way these days Lum'Rhin Dharvu, the LifeRites Celebrant/Officiant, asked to be sent the eulogies in advance for inclusion in Penny's memorial book. While I was typing this piece to send, the rainbow once again appeared around the sun.

I offer all this as consolation without attempting to interpret it. One way we keep our loved ones with us even once they're gone is by talking about them. We writers have the great gift of being able to pass on memories or elements of our lives to people who don't know us or those who were dear to us. I know that some of the stories in this anthology are based on actual experience, but I won't presume to speculate how many of the others are. I believe it needn't matter. What counts is that the authors have engaged their considerable imaginations with their themes and contributed stories worthy of the book. Perhaps some of them have the ability to heal, at least emotionally. Meanwhile science builds up its own healing power, and our hopes.

I have a last anecdote to share, and once again I'll leave it uninterpreted, though I know what I would like it to mean. Earlier this month we had another death in the family, alas; Jenny's brother's partner Doris died of cancer. I was already booked on the day of the funeral, and so Jenny took the train to Newton Abbot on her own. As she stepped off the train she saw Penny waving to her from the far end of the platform. In a moment Penny was gone but not, I think, for ever. Perhaps my writing this will help her to be here.

A Warning To The Curious by M. R. James

Chosen by Ramsey Campbell for the anthology My Favourite Horror Story

I'm delighted to introduce M. R. James to this anthology, but first let me mention some other tales I might have picked. I might have selected The Colour Out of Space or The White People until I discovered that Lovecraft and Machen were already represented. Still, I'm here to praise James, and I shall, because he is one of the absolute masters of the British tale of terror. His influence alone would ensure him a place in the pantheon. As with all influential writers, his superficial traces can be found in the work of some bad ones—M. P. Dare was surely his most ludicrous literary offspring, and hardly one he would have been pleased to acknowledge—but such excellent and different contributors to the genre as L. P. Hartley, Fritz Leiber, Kingsley Amis, T. E. D. Klein, and Terry Lamsley learned from him. So did I, and in a tale called The Guide attempted to acknowledge my debt in full. He even appears as a character (Dr. Matthews) and tells a new story in Penelope Fitzgerald's superb novel, The Gate of Angels. For me, his achievement is twofold, or more accurately, his two strongest qualities are united in it. No writer better demonstrates how, at its best, the ghost story or supernatural horror story (either term fits his work) achieves its effects through the eloquence and skill of its prose style—and, I think, no writer in the field has shown greater willingness to make his tales as frightening as possible. He can convey more spectral terror in a single glancing phrase than most authors manage in a paragraph or a book. Certainly no writer of fiction aimed mainly at adults gave me more childhood nightmares and night fears. It quickly became apparent to the shrinking short-trousered Campbell that James habitually described just enough to suggest far worse. If only there were more like him today to nourish the dark side of the imagination with a little haute cuisine! I often wonder if he acquired some of his technique from George MacDonald's The Princess and the Goblin, which he might well have read. Among his many memorable horrors are the sheeted spectre of Oh, Whistle, and I'll Come to You, My Lad, the thing that crawls out of the well in The Treasure of Abbot Thomas, the various dismaying manifestations of the powers of Count Magnus (one example of which later appeared, lit too brightly, in the film, The Brides of Dracula), and the unwelcome visitor mistaken for a dog in The Diary of Mr. Poynter (an encounter reworked with less style by Paul Suter in an early Weird Tales story, Beyond the Door). I could have chosen any of these tales, or quite a few others, by James for this book. A Warning to the Curious, however, continues to impress me as offering the most sustained sense of relentless menace of any of his stories. In some ways it resembles The Familiar, his favourite ghost story by J. Sheridan Le Fanu, whose work he championed; but it is very much its own tale, particularly in its lightness of style. I hope readers new to either author will be impelled to seek out their work. A revival of their influence can do our field nothing but good. It was James who said of the Not at Night anthologies that they were "merely nauseating, and it is very easy to be nauseating"—a criticism many of our current writers might usefully consider, along with the following tale.—Ramsey Campbell.

The place on the east coast which the reader is asked to consider is Seaburgh. It is not very different now from what I remember it to have been when I was a child. Marshes intersected by dykes to the south, recalling the early chapters of Great Expectations; flat fields to the north, merging into heath; heath, fir woods, and, above all, gorse, inland. A long sea-front and a street: behind that a spacious church of flint, with a broad, solid western tower and a peal of six bells. How well I remember their sound on a hot Sunday in August, as our party went slowly up the white, dusty slope of road towards them, for the church stands at the top of a short, steep incline. They rang with a flat clacking sort of sound on those hot days, but when the air was softer they were mellower too. The railway ran down to its little terminus farther along the same road. There was a gay white windmill just before you came to the station, and another down near the shingle at the south end of the town, and yet others on higher ground to the north. There were cottages of bright red brick with slate roofs… but why do I encumber you with these commonplace details? The fact is that they come crowding to the point of the pencil when it begins to write of Seaburgh. I should like to be sure that I had allowed the right ones to get on to the paper. But I forgot. I have not quite done with the word-painting business yet.

Walk away from the sea and the town, pass the station, and turn up the road on the right. It is a sandy road, parallel with the railway, and if you follow it, it climbs to somewhat higher ground. On your left (you are now going northward) is heath, on your right (the side towards the sea) is a belt of old firs, wind-beaten, thick at the top, with the slope that old seaside trees have; seen on the sky-line from the train they would tell you in an instant, if you did not know it, that you were approaching a windy coast.

Well, at the top of my little hill, a line of these firs strikes out and runs towards the sea, for there is a ridge that goes that way; and the ridge ends in a rather well-defined mound commanding the level fields of rough grass, and a little knot of fir trees crowns it. And here you may sit on a hot spring day, very well content to look at blue sea, white windmills, red cottages, bright green grass, church tower, and distant martello tower on the south.

As I have said, I began to know Seaburgh as a child; but a gap of a good many years separates my early knowledge from that which is more recent.

Still it keeps its place in my affections, and any tales of it that I pick up have an interest for me. One such tale is this: it came to me in a place very remote from Seaburgh, and quite accidentally, from a man whom I had been able to oblige—enough in his opinion to justify his making me his confidant to this extent.

* * *

I know all that country more or less (he said). I used to go to Seaburgh pretty regularly for golf in the spring. I generally put up at the "Bear," with a friend—Henry Long it was, you knew him perhaps—("Slightly," I said) and we used to take a sitting-room and be very happy there. Since he died I haven't cared to go there. And I don't know that I should anyhow after the particular thing that happened on our last visit.

It was in April, 19—, we were there, and by some chance we were almost the only people in the hotel. So the ordinary public rooms were practically empty, and we were the more surprised when, after dinner, our sitting-room door opened, and a young man put his head in. We were aware of this young man. He was rather a rabbity, anaemic subject—light hair and light eyes—but not unpleasing. So when he said: "I beg your pardon, is this a private room?" we did not growl and say: "Yes, it is," but Long said, or I did—no matter which: "Please come in." "Oh, may I?" he said, and seemed relieved. Of course it was obvious that he wanted company; and as he was a reasonable kind of person—not the sort to bestow his whole family history or you—we urged him to make himself at home. "I dare say you find the other rooms rather bleak," I said. Yes, he did but it was really too good of us, and so on. That being got over, he made some pretence of reading a book. Long was playing Patience, I was writing. It became plain to me after a few minutes that this visitor of ours was in rather a state of fidgets or nerves, which communicated itself to me, and so I put away my writing and turned to at engaging him in talk.

After some remarks, which I forget, he became rather confidential. "You'll think it very odd of me" (this was the sort of way he began), "but the fact is I've had something of a shock." Well, I recommended a drink of some cheering kind, and we had it. The waiter coming in made an interruption (and I thought our young man seemed very jumpy when the door opened), but after a while he got back to his woes again. There was nobody he knew in the place, and he did happen to know who we both were (it turned out there was some common acquaintance in town), and really he did want a word of advice, if we didn't mind. Of course we both said: "By all means," or "Not at all," and Long put away his cards. And we settled down to hear what his difficulty was.

"It began," he said, "more than a week ago, when I bicycled over to Froston, only about five or six miles, to see the church; I'm very much interested in architecture, and it's got one of those pretty porches with niches and shields. I took a photograph of it, and then an old man who was tidying up in the churchyard came and asked if I'd care to look into the church. I said yes, and he produced a key and let me in. There wasn't much inside, but I told him it was a nice little church, and he kept it very clean, 'but,' I said, 'the porch is the best part of it.' We were just outside the porch then, and he said, 'Ah, yes, that is a nice porch; and do you know, sir, what's the meanin' of that coat of arms there?'

"It was the one with the three crowns, and though I'm not much of a herald, I was able to say yes, I thought it was the old arms of the kingdom of East Anglia.

" 'That's right, sir,' he said, 'and do you know the meanin' of them three crowns that's on it?'

"I said I'd no doubt it was known, but I couldn't recollect to have heard it myself.

" 'Well, then,' he said, 'for all you're a scholard, I can tell you something you don't know. Them's the three 'oly crowns what was buried in the ground near by the coast to keep the Germans from landing—ah, I can see you don't believe that. But I tell you, if it hadn't have been for one of them

'oly crowns bein' there still, them Germans would a landed here time and again, they would. Landed with their ships, and killed man, woman and child in their beds. Now then, that's the truth what I'm telling you, that is; and if you don't believe me, you ast the rector. There he comes: you ast him, I says.'

"I looked round, and there was the rector, a nice-looking old man, coming up the path; and before I could begin assuring my old man, who was getting quite excited, that I didn't disbelieve him, the rector struck in, and said: 'What's all this about, John? Good day to you, sir. Have you been looking at our little church?'

"So then there was a little talk which allowed the old man to calm down, and then the rector asked him again what was the matter.

" 'Oh.' he said, 'it warn't nothink, only I was telling this gentleman he'd ought to ast you about them 'oly crowns.'

" 'Ah. yes, to be sure,' said the rector, 'that's a very curious matter, isn't it? But I don't know whether the gentleman is interested in our old stories, eh?'

" 'Oh, he'll be interested fast enough,' says the old man, 'he'll put his confidence in what you tells him, sir; why, you known William Ager yourself, father and son too.'

"Then I put in a word to say how much I should like to hear all about it, and before many minutes I was walking up the village street with the rector, who had one or two words to say to parishioners, and then to the rectory, where he took me into his study. He had made out, on the way, that I really was capable of taking an intelligent interest in a piece of folklore, and not quite the ordinary tripper. So he was very willing to talk, and it is rather surprising to me that the particular legend he told me has not made its way into print before. His account of it was this: 'There has always been a belief in these parts in the three holy crowns. The old people say they were buried in different places near the coast to keep off the Danes or the French or the Germans. And they say that one of the three was dug up a long time ago, and another has disappeared by the encroaching of the sea, and one's still left doing its work, keeping off invaders. Well, now, if you have read the ordinary guides and histories of this county, you will remember perhaps that in 1687 a crown, which was said to be the crown of Redwald, King of the East Angles, was dug up at Rendlesham, and alas! alas! melted down before it was even properly described or drawn. Well, Rendlesham isn't on the coast, but it isn't so very far inland, and it's on a very important line of access. And I believe that is the crown which the people mean when they say that one has been dug up. Then on the south you don't want me to tell you where there was a Saxon royal palace which is now under the sea, eh? Well, there was the second crown, I take it. And up beyond these two, they say, lies the third.'

" 'Do they say where it is?' of course I asked.

"He said, 'Yes, indeed, they do, but they don't tell,' and his manner did not encourage me to put the obvious question. Instead of that I waited a moment, and said: 'What did the old man mean when he said you knew William Ager, as if that had something to do with the crowns?'

" 'To be sure,' he said, 'now that's another curious story. These Agers—it's a very old name in these parts, but I can't find that they were ever people of quality or big owners—these Agers say, or said, that their branch of the family were the guardians of the last crown. A certain old Nathaniel Ager was the first one I knew—I was born and brought up quite near here—and he, I believe, camped out at the place during the whole of the war of 1870. William, his son, did the same, I know, during the South African War. And young William, his son, who has only died fairly recently, took lodgings at the cottage nearest the spot, and I've no doubt hastened his end, for he was a consumptive, by exposure and night watching. And he was the last of that branch. It was a dreadful grief to him to think that he was the last, but he could do nothing, the only relations at all near to him were in the colonies. I wrote letters for him to them imploring them to come over on business very important to their family, but there has been no answer. So the last of the holy crowns, if it's there, has no guardian now.'

"That was what the rector told me, and you can fancy how interesting I found it. The only thing I could think of when I left him was how to hit upon the spot where the crown was supposed to be. I wish I'd left it alone.

"But there was a sort of fate in it, for as I bicycled back past the churchyard wall my eye caught a fairly new gravestone, and on it was the name of William Ager. Of course I got off and read it. It said 'of this parish, died at Seaburgh, 19—, aged 28.' There it was, you see. A little judicious questioning in the right place, and I should at least find the cottage nearest the spot. Only I didn't quite know what was the right place to begin my questioning at. Again there was fate: it took me to the curiosity-shop down that way—you know—and I turned over some old books, and, if you please, one was a prayer book of 1740 odd, in a rather handsome binding—I'll just go and get it, it's in my room."

He left us in a state of some surprise, but we had hardly time to exchange any remarks when he was back, panting, and handed us the book opened at the fly-leaf, on which was. in a straggly hand: Nathaniel Ager is my name and England is my nation, Seaburgh is my dwelling-place and Christ is my Salvation, When I am dead and in my Grave, and all my bones are rotton, I hope the Lard will think on me when I am quite forgotten.

This poem was dated 1754, and there were many more entries of Agers, Nathaniel, Frederick, William, and so on, ending with William, 19—.

"You see," he said, "anybody would call it the greatest bit of luck. I did, but I don't now. Of course I asked the shopman about William Ager, and of course he happened to remember that he lodged in a cottage in the North

Field and died there. This was just chalking the road for me. I knew which the cottage must be: there is only one sizeable one about there. The next thing was to scrape some sort of acquaintance with the people, and I took a walk that way at once. A dog did the business for me: he made at me so fiercely that they had to run out and beat him off, and then naturally begged my pardon, and we got into talk. I had only to bring up Ager's name, and pretend I knew, or thought I knew something of him, and then the woman said how sad it was him dying so young, and she was sure it came of him spending the night out of doors in the cold weather. Then I had to say: "Did he go out on the sea at night?" and she said: "Oh, no, it was on the hillock yonder with the trees on it." And there I was.

"I know something about digging in these barrows: I've opened many of them in the down country. But that was with owner's leave, and in broad daylight and with men to help. I had to prospect very carefully here before I put a spade in: I couldn't trench across the mound, and with those old firs growing there I knew there would be awkward tree roots. Still the soil was very light and sandy and easy, and there was a rabbit hole or so that might be developed into a sort of tunnel. The going out and coming back at odd hours to the hotel was going to be the awkward part. When I made up my mind about the way to excavate I told the people that I was called away for a night, and I spent it out there. I made my tunnel: I won't bore you with the details of how I supported it and filled it in when I'd done, but the main thing is that I got the crown."

Naturally we both broke out into exclamations of surprise and interest I for one had long known about the find of the crown at Rendlesham and had often lamented its fate. No one has ever seen an Anglo-Saxon crown—at least no one had. But our man gazed at us with a rueful eye. "Yes," he said, "and the worst of it is I don't know how to put it back."

"Put it back?" we cried out. "Why, my dear sir, you've made one of the most exciting finds ever heard of in this country. Of course, it ought to go to the Jewel House at the Tower. What's your difficulty? If you're thinking about the owner of the land, and treasure-trove, and all that, we can certainly help you through. Nobody's going to make a fuss about technicalities in a case of this kind."

Probably more was said, but all he did was to put his face in his hands, and mutter: "I don't know how to put it back."

At last Long said: "You'll forgive me, I hope, if I seem impertinent, but are you quite sure you've got it?" I was wanting to ask much the same question myself, for of course the story did seem a lunatic's dream when one thought over it. But I hadn't quite dared to say what might hurt the poor young man's feelings. However, he took it quite calmly—really, with the calm of despair, you might say. He sat up and said: "Oh, yes, there's no doubt of that: I have it here, in my room, locked up in my bag.

You can come and look at it if you like: I won't offer to bring it here."

We were not likely to let the chance slip. We went with him; his room was only a few doors off. The boots was just collecting shoes in the passage: or so we thought: afterwards we were not sure. Our visitor—his name was Paxton—was in a worse state of shivers than before, and went hurriedly into the room, and beckoned us after him, turned on the light, and shut the door carefully. Then he unlocked his kit-bag, and produced a bundle of clean pocket-handkerchiefs in which something was wrapped, laid it on the bed, and undid it. I can now say I have seen an actual Anglo-Saxon crown. It was of silver—as the Rendlesham one is always said to have been—it was set with some gems, mostly antique intaglios and cameos, and was of rather plain, almost rough workmanship. In fact, it was like those you see on the coins and in the manuscripts. I found no reason to think it was later than the ninth century. I was intensely interested, of course, and I wanted to turn it over in my hands, but Paxton prevented me.

"Don't you touch it." he said, "I'll do that." And with a sigh that was, I declare to you, dreadful to hear, he took it up and turned it about so that we could see every part of it. "Seen enough?" he said at last, and we nodded. He wrapped it up and locked it in his bag, and stood looking at us dumbly. "Come back to our room," Long said, "and tell us what the trouble is." He thanked us, and said: "Will you go first and see if—if the coast is clear?" That wasn't very intelligible, for our proceedings hadn't been, after all, very suspicious, and the hotel, as I said, was practically empty. However, we were beginning to have inklings of—we didn't know what, and anyhow nerves are infectious. So we did go, first peering out as we opened the door, and fancying (I found we both had the fancy) that a shadow, or more than a shadow—but it made no sound—passed from before us to one side as we came out into the passage. "It's all right," we whispered to Paxton—whispering seemed the proper tone—and we went, with him between us, back to our sitting-room. I was preparing, when we got there, to be ecstatic about the unique interest of what we had seen, but when I looked at Paxton I saw that would be terribly out of place, and I left it to him to begin.

"What is to be done?" was his opening. Long thought it right (as he explained to me afterwards) to be obtuse, and said: "Why not find out who the owner of the land is, and inform—" "Oh, no, no!" Paxton broke in impatiently. "I beg your pardon: you've been very kind, but don't you see it's got to go back, and I daren't be there at night, and daytime's impossible. Perhaps, though, you don't see: well, then, the truth is that I've never been alone since I touched it." I was beginning some fairly stupid comment, but Long caught my eye, and I stopped. Long said: "I think I do see perhaps: but wouldn't it be—a relief—to tell us a little more clearly what the situation is?"

Then it all came out: Paxton looked over his shoulder and beckoned to us to come nearer to him, and began speaking in a low voice: we listened most intently, of course, and compared notes afterwards, and I wrote down our version, so I am confident I have what he told us almost word for word. He said: "It began when I was first prospecting, and put me off again and again. There was always somebody—a man—standing by one of the firs. This was in daylight, you know. He was never in front of me. I always saw him with the tail of my eye on the left or the right, and he was never there when I looked straight for him. I would lie down for quite a long time and take careful observations, and make sure there was no one, and then when I got up and began prospecting again, there he was. And he began to give me hints, besides: for wherever I put that prayer-book—short of locking it up, which I did at last—when I came back to my room it was always out on my table open at the fly-leaf where the names are, and one of my razors across it to keep it open. I'm sure he just can't open my bag. or something more would have happened. You see, he's light and weak, but all the same I daren't face him. Well, then, when I was making the tunnel, of course it was worse, and if I hadn't been so keen I should have dropped the whole thing and run. It was like someone scraping at my back all the time: I thought for a long time it was only soil dropping on me, but as I got nearer the—the crown, it was unmistakable. And when I actually laid it bare and got my fingers into the ring of it and pulled it out, there came a sort of cry behind me—oh, I can't tell you how desolate it was! And horribly threatening too. It spoilt all my pleasure in my find—cut it off that moment. And if I hadn't been the wretched fool I am, I should have put the thing back and left it. But I didn't. The rest of the time was just awful. I had hours to get through before I could decently come back to the hotel. First I spent time filling up my tunnel and covering my tracks, and all the while he was there trying to thwart me. Sometimes, you know, you see him, and sometimes you don't, just as he pleases, I think: he's there, but he has some power over your eyes. Well. I wasn't off the spot very long before sunrise, and then I had to get to the junction for Seaburgh and take a train back. And though it was daylight fairly soon. I don't know if that made it much better. There were always hedges, or gorse bushes, or park fences along the road—some sort of cover. I mean—and I was never easy for a second. And then when I began to meet people going to work, they always looked behind me very strangely: it might have been that they were surprised at seeing anyone so early; but I didn't think it was only that, and I don't now: they didn't look exactly at me. And the porter at the train was like that too. And the guard held open the door after I'd got into the carriage—just as he would if there was somebody else coming, you know. Oh. you may be very sure it isn't my fancy," he said with a dull sort of laugh. Then he went on: "And even if I do get it put back, he won't forgive me: I can tell that. And I was so happy a fortnight ago." He dropped into a chair, and I believe he began to cry.

We didn't know what to say, but we felt we must come to the rescue somehow, and so—it really seemed the only thing—we said if he was so set on putting the crown back in its place, we would help him. And I must say that after what we had heard it did seem the right thing. If these horrid consequences had come on this poor man, might there not really be something in the original idea of the crown having some curious power bound up with it, to guard the coast? At least, that was my feeling, and I think it was Long's too. Our offer was very welcome to Paxton, anyhow.

When could we do it? It was nearing half-past ten. Could we contrive to make a late walk plausible to the hotel people that very night? We looked out of the window: there was a brilliant full moon—the Paschal moon.

Long undertook to tackle the boots and propitiate him. He was to say that we should not be much over the hour, and if we did find it so pleasant that we stopped out a bit longer we would see that he didn't lose by sitting up.

Well, we were pretty regular customers of the hotel, and did not give much trouble, and were considered by the servants to be not under the mark in the way of tips; and so the boots was propitiated, and let us out on to the sea-front, and remained, as we heard later, looking after us. Paxton had a large coat over his arm, under which was the wrapped-up crown.

So we were off on this strange errand before we had time to think how very much out of the way it was. I have told this part quite shortly on purpose, for it really does represent the haste with which we settled our plan and took action. "The shortest way is up the hill and through the churchyard," Paxton said, as we stood a moment before the hotel looking up and down the front. There was nobody about—nobody at all. Seaburgh out of the season is an early, quiet place. "We can't go along the dyke by the cottage, because of the dog," Paxton also said, when I pointed to what I thought a shorter way along the front and across two fields. The reason he gave was good enough. We went up the road to the church, and turned in at the churchyard gate. I confess to having thought that there might be some lying there who might be conscious of our business: but if it was so, they were also conscious that one who was on their side, so to say, had us under surveillance, and we saw no sign of them. But under observation we felt we were, as I have never felt it at another time. Specially was it so when we passed out of the churchyard into a narrow path with close high hedges, through which we hurried as Christian did through that Valley; and so got out into open fields. Then along hedges, though I would sooner have been in the open, where I could see if anyone was visible behind me; over a gate or two, and then a swerve to the left, taking us up on to the ridge which ended in that mound.

As we neared it, Henry Long felt, and I felt too, that there were what I can only call dim presences waiting for us, as well as a far more actual one attending us. Of Paxton's agitation all this time I can give you no adequate picture: he breathed like a hunted beast, and we could not either of us look at his face. How he would manage when we got to the very place we had not troubled to think: he had seemed so sure that that would not be difficult. Nor was it. I never saw anything like the dash with which he flung himself at a particular spot in the side of the mound, and tore at it, so that in a very few minutes the greater part of his body was out of sight. We stood holding the coat and that bundle of handkerchiefs, and looking, very fearfully, I must admit, about us. There was nothing to be seen: a line of dark firs behind us made one skyline, more trees and the church tower half a mile off on the right, cottages and a windmill on the horizon on the left, calm sea dead in front, faint barking of a dog at a cottage on a gleaming dyke between us and it: full moon making that path we know across the sea: the eternal whisper of the Scotch firs just above us, and of the sea in front. Yet, in all this quiet, an acute, an acrid consciousness of a restrained hostility very near us, like a dog on a leash that might be let go at any moment.

Paxton pulled himself out of the hole, and stretched a hand back to us.

"Give it to me," he whispered, "unwrapped." We pulled off the handkerchiefs, and he took the crown. The moonlight just fell on it as he snatched it. We had not ourselves touched that bit of metal, and I have thought since that it was just as well. In another moment Paxton was out of the hole again and busy shovelling back the soil with hands that were already bleeding. He would have none of our help, though. It was much the longest part of the job to get the place to look undisturbed: yet—I don't know how—he made a wonderful success of it. At last he was satisfied, and we turned back.

We were a couple of hundred yards from the hill when Long suddenly said to him: "I say, you've left your coat there. That won't do. See?" And I certainly did see—the long dark overcoat lying where the tunnel had been. Paxton had not stopped, however he only shook his head, and held up the coat on his arm. And when we joined him, he said, without any excitement, but as if nothing mattered any more: "That wasn't my coat"

And, indeed, when we looked back gain, that dark thing was not to be seen.

Well, we got out on to the road, and came rapidly back that way. It was well before twelve when we got in, trying to put a good face on it, and saying—Long and I—what a lovely night it was for a walk. The boots was on the lookout for us, and we made remarks like that for his edification as we entered the hotel. He gave another look up and down the sea-front before he locked the front door, and said: "You didn't meet many people about, I s'pose, sir" "No, indeed, not a soul," I said; at which I remember Paxton looked oddly at me. "Only I thought I see someone turn up the station road after you gentlemen," said the boots. "Still, you was three together, and I don't suppose he meant mischief." I didn't know what to say; Long merely said "Good night," and we went off upstairs, promising to turn out all the lights, and to go to bed in a few minutes.

Back in our room, we did our very best to make Paxton take a cheerful view. "There's the crown safe back," we said; "very likely you'd have done better not to touch it" (and he heavily assented to that), "but no real harm has been done, and we shall never give this away to anyone who would be so mad as to go near it. Besides, don't you feel better yourself? I don't mind confessing," I said, "that on the way there I was very much inclined to take your view about—well, about being followed; but going back, it wasn't at all the same thing, was it?" No, it wouldn't do: "You've nothing to trouble yourselves about." he said, "but I'm not forgiven. I've got to pay for that miserable sacrilege still. I know what you are going to say. The Church might help. Yes, but it's the body that has to suffer. It's true I'm not feeling that he's waiting outside for me just now. But—" Then he stopped.

Then he turned to thanking us, and we put him off as soon as we could.

And naturally we pressed him to use our sitting-room next day, and said we should be glad to go out with him. Or did he play golf, perhaps? Yes, he did, but he didn't think he should care about that to-morrow. Well, we recommended him to get up late and sit in our room in the morning while we were playing, and we would have a walk later in the day. He was very submissive and piano about it all: ready to do just what we thought best, but clearly quite certain in his own mind that what was coming could not be averted or palliated. You'll wonder why we didn't insist on accompanying him to his home and seeing him safe into the care of brothers or someone. The fact was he had nobody. He had had a flat in town, but lately he had made up his mind to settle for a time in Sweden, and he had dismantled his flat and shipped off his belongings, and was whiling away a fortnight or three weeks before he made a start. Anyhow, we didn't see what we could do better than sleep on it—or not sleep very much, as was my case—and see what we felt like to-morrow morning.

We felt very different, Long and I, on as beautiful an April morning as you could desire; and Paxton also looked very different when we saw him at breakfast. "The first approach to a decent night I seem ever to have had," was what he said. But he was going to do as we had settled: stay in probably all the morning, and come out with us later. We went to the links; we met some other men and played with them in the morning, and had lunch there rather early, so as not to be late back. All the same, the snares of death overtook him.

Whether it could have been prevented, I don't know. I think he would have been got at somehow, do what we might. Anyhow, this is what happened.

We went straight up to our room. Paxton was there, reading quite peaceably. "Ready to come out shortly?" said Long, "say in half an hour's time?" "Certainly," he said: and I said we would change first, and perhaps have baths, and call for him in half an hour. I had my bath first, and went and lay down on my bed, and slept for about ten minutes. We came out of our rooms at the same time, and went together to the sitting-room. Paxton wasn't there—only his book. Nor was he in his room, nor in the downstairs rooms. We shouted for him. A servant came out and said: "Why, I thought you gentlemen was gone to already, and so did the other gentleman. He heard you a-calling from the path there, and run out in a hurry, and I looked out of the coffee-room window, but I didn't see you. 'Owever, he run off down the beach that way."

Without a word we ran that way too—it was the opposite direction to that of last night's expedition. It wasn't quite four o'clock, and the day was fair, though not so fair as it had been, so there was really no reason, you'd say, for anxiety: with people about, surely a man couldn't come to much harm.

But something in our look as we ran out must have struck the servant, for she came out on the steps, and pointed, and said, "Yes, that's the way he went." We ran on as far as the top of the shingle bank, and there pulled up.

There was a choice of ways: past the houses on the sea-front, or along the sand at the bottom of the beach, which, the tide being now out, was fairly broad. Or of course we might keep along the shingle between these two tracks and have some view of both of them; only that was heavy going.

We chose the sand, for that was the loneliest, and someone might come to harm there without being seen from the public path.

Long said he saw Paxton some distance ahead, running and waving his stick, as if he wanted to signal to people who were on ahead of him. I couldn't be sure: one of these sea-mists was coming up very quickly from the south. There was someone, that's all I could say. And there were tracks on the sand as of someone running who wore shoes; and there were other tracks made before those—for the shoes sometimes trod in them and interfered with them—of someone not in shoes. Oh, of course, it's only my word you've got to take for all this: Long's dead, we'd no time or means to make sketches or take casts, and the next tide washed everything away. All we could do was to notice these marks as we hurried on. But there they were over and over again, and we had no doubt whatever that what we saw was the track of a bare foot, and one that showed more bones than flesh.

The notion of Paxton running after—after anything like this, and supposing it to be the friends he was looking for, was very dreadful to us.

You can guess what we fancied: how the thing he was following might stop suddenly and turn round on him, and what sort of face it would show, half-seen at first in the mist—which all the while was getting thicker and thicker. And as I ran on wondering how the poor wretch could have been lured into mistaking that other thing for us, I remembered his saying, "He has some power over your eyes." And then I wondered what the end would be, for I had no hope now that the end could be averted, and—well, there is no need to tell all the dismal and horrid thoughts that flitted through my head as we ran on into the mist. It was uncanny, too, that the sun should still be bright in the sky and we could see nothing. We could only tell that we were now past the houses and had reached that gap there is between them and the old martello tower. When you are past the tower, you know, there is nothing but shingle for a long way—not a house, not a human creature, just that spit of land, or rather shingle, with the river on your right and the sea on your left.

But just before that, just by the martello tower, you remember there is the old battery, close to the sea. I believe there are only a few blocks of concrete left now: the rest has all been washed away, but at this time there was a lot more, though the place was a ruin. Well, when we got there, we clambered to the top as quick as we could to take breath and look over the shingle in front if by chance the mist would let us see anything. But a moment's rest we must have. We had run a mile at least. Nothing whatever was visible ahead of us, and we were just turning by common consent to get down and run hopelessly on, when we heard what I can only call a laugh: and if you can understand what I mean by a breathless, a lungless laugh, you have it: but I don't suppose you can. It came from below, and swerved away into the mist. That was enough. We bent over the wall.

Paxton was there at the bottom.

You don't need to be told that he was dead. His tracks showed that he had run along the side of the battery, had turned sharp round the corner of it, and, small doubt of it, must have dashed straight into the open arms of someone who was waiting there. His mouth was full of sand and stones, and his teeth and jaws were broken to bits. I only glanced once at his face.

At the same moment, just as we were scrambling down from the battery to get to the body, we heard a shout, and saw a man running down the bank of the martello tower. He was the caretaker stationed there, and his keen old eyes had managed to descry through the mist that something was wrong. He had seen Paxton fall, and had seen us a moment after, running up—fortunate this, for otherwise we could hardly have escaped suspicion of being concerned in the dreadful business. Had he we asked, caught sight of anybody attacking our friend? He could not be sure.

We sent him off for help, and stayed by the dead man till they came with the stretcher. It was then that we traced out how he had come, on the narrow fringe of sand under the battery wall. The rest was shingle, and it was hopelessly impossible to tell whither the other had gone.

What were we to say at the inquest? It was a duty, we felt, not to give up, there and then, the secret of the crown, to be published in every paper. I don't know how much you would have told; but what we did agree upon was this: to say that we had only made acquaintance with Paxton the day before, and that he had told us he was under some apprehension of danger at the hands of a man called William Ager. Also that we had seen some other tracks besides Paxton's when we followed him along the beach. But of course by that time everything was gone from the sands.

No one had any knowledge, fortunately, of any William Ager living in the district. The evidence of the man at the martello tower freed us from all suspicion. All that could be done was to return a verdict of wilful murder by some person or persons unknown.

Paxton was so totally without connections that all the inquiries that were subsequently made ended in a No Thoroughfare. And I have never been at Seaburgh, or even near it, since.

Index Of Stories

Note that 'The' and 'A/An' are ignored for alphabetical ordering purposes, i.e. The Horror From The Bridge is to be found amongst Hearing Is Believing, Heading Home and The Horror Under Warrendown.

A

Above the World
Accident
Accident Zone
The Address
After the Queen
Again
Agatha's Ghost
All for Sale
The Alternative
Among The Pictures Are These:
The Announcement
Another World
Apples
Ash
At First Sight
At Lorn Hall
At The End of a Summer's Day

B

Baby Bait

Becoming Visible
Bedtime Story
Before the Storm
Being an Angel
Behind The Doors
Beside the Seaside
Between the Floors
Beyond Words
Blacked Out
The Body in the Window
Boiled Alive
Bradmoor
Breaking Up Broadcast
The Brood
The Burning

C

The Callers
Call First
Calling Card
The Castle Of The Devil
Cat and Mouse
The Cellars
The Change
The Changer Of Names
The Childish Fear
The Children Of Asshur
The Chimney
The Christmas Present

Chucky Comes to Liverpool
The Church in High Street
Cold Print
The Companion
Concussion
Conversation In A Railway Carriage
Conversion
The Correspondence of Cameron Thaddeus Nash
Cyril

D

The Dark Show Dead Letters
The Dead Must Die
The Decorations
The Depths
The Devil's Cart
Digging Deep
Direct Line
Dolls
Double Room
Down There
Dragged Down
Drawing In

E

The Enchanted Fruit
End of the Line
The Entertainment
Eye of Childhood

Eyes End

F

The Face in the Desert
The Faces at Pine Dunes
Facing It
Fear the Dead
Feeling Remains
The Ferries
Find My Name
The Fit
For You to Judge / See How They Run
The Franklyn Paragraphs
The Friend

G

The Gap
Getting It Wrong
Going Under
The Grave In The Desert
The Grip of Peace
The Guide
The Guy

H

Hain's Island
The Hands
Hawk Of Basti
Heading Home
Hearing Is Believing

The Height of the Scream
Holding The Light
Holes For Faces
The Hollow In The Woods
The Horror from the Bridge
Horror House of Blood
The Horror Under Warrendown
The House On Nazareth Hill - Chapter Six (First Draft) Hybrid

I

I Am It And It Is I
The Impression
In the Bag
The Inhabitant of the Lake
The Insects from Shaggai
In the Shadows
The Interloper
In the Trees
The Invocation
It Helps If You Sing

J

Jack's Little Friend
Jack in the Box
Just Behind You
Just Waiting

K

Kill Me Hideously

L

Laid Down
The Last Hand
The Last Revelation Of Gla'aki
Lilith's
The Limits of Fantasy
Litter
Little Man
Little Ones
The Little Voice
The Long Way
Looking Out
The Lost
Loveman's Comeback

M

Mackintosh Willy
Made in Goatswood
A Madness from the Vaults
A Madness from the Vaults [Final Version]
The Man in the Underpass
The Mask
The Maze
McGonagall in the Head
Medusa
Meeting the Author
Merry May ~~Midnight Appointment~~
Midnight Hobo

The Mine on Yuggoth
Missed Connection
Missing
The Moon-Lens
The Moons
Morning Call
The Mouths Of Light
Murders

N

Napier Court
Needing Ghosts
Never to Be Heard
A New Life
The Next Sideshow
Next Time You'll Know Me
Night Beat
Nightmare
No End of Fun
No Story in It
No Strings

O

The Oak Chest
The Offering to the Dead
Old Clothes
The Old Horns
The Old School
One Copy Only
On The Tour

Only the Wind
The Other House
The Other Names
The Other Side
The Other Woman
Out of Copyright
Out of the Woods

P

The Page
Passing Phase
Passing Through Peacehaven
The Pattern
Peep
Pet
The Pit
The Pit Of Wings
The Place of Revelation
The Plain of Sound
A Play for the Jaded
Playing the Game
Point of View Potential
The Precognitive Trip
Premonition
The Pretence
The Previous Tenant
Property of the Ring
The Proxy
The Puppets

R

*Ra*e*
Raised by the Moon
Reading The Signs
Recently Used
The Render of the Veils
Reply Guaranteed
The Reshaping of Rossiter
Respects
The Retrospective
Return Journey
The Return of the Witch
The Revelations of Glaaki
Rising Generation
The Room Beyond
The Room in the Castle
Root Cause
The Rounds
Run Through

S

Safe Words
The Same in Any Language
The Scar
Second Chance
Second Sight
The Second Staircase
The Seductress
See How They Run / For You To Judge

Seeing the World
The Sentinels
The Shadows in the Barn
The Show Goes On
A Side of the Sea
Skeleton Woods
Slow
Smoke Kiss
Snakes and Ladders
The Sneering
The Song at the Hub of the Garden Stages
The Stages of the God
The Stocking
The Stone on the Island
A Street Was Chosen
The Sunshine Club
The Sustenance Of Hoak

T

Tatters
The Telephones
Tem Basish
Things From The Sea
This Time
Through the Walls
The Tomb-Herd
To Wake the Dead
The Tower
The Tower from Yuggoth

The Trick / Trick Or Treat
The Tugging
Twice by Fire

U

The Unbeheld
Unblinking
The Urge

V

Vacant Possession
The Voice of the Beach
The Void

W

Watch the Birdie
The Watched
The Ways of Chaos
Welcomeland
Where the Heart Is Where They Lived
The Whining
The Whirlpool
The Whispering Horror
The Will of Stanley Brooke
The Winner
With the Angels
The Word
The Words That Count
Worse Than Bones

The Worst Fog of the Year
Wrapped Up
Writer's Curse

Thanks to: DrFreudFunkenstein, Duat, Vlad and a further four anonymous contributors.